HERESY, her'e-si, her'ê-si (αἵρεσις, hairesis, from vb. αἵρω, hairô, "to choose"): The word has acquired an ecclesiastical meaning that has passed into common usage, containing elements not found in the term in the NT, except as implied in one passage. In classical Gr, it may be used either in a good or a bad sense, first, simply for "choice," then, "a chosen course of procedure," and afterward of various schools and tendencies. Polybius refers to those devoting themselves to the study of Gr. literature as given to the Hellenikê hairesis. It was used not simply for a teaching or a course followed, but also for those devoting themselves to such pursuit, viz. a sect, or assembly of those advocating a particular doctrine or mode of life. Thus in Acts, the word is used in the Gr, where AV and RV have "sect," "s. of Sadducees" (5 17), "s. of Nazarenes" (24 5). In Acts 26 5 the Pharisees are called "the strictest hairesis [sect]." The name was applied contemptuously to Christianity (Acts 24 14; 28 22). Its application, with censure, is found in 1 Cor 11 19m; Gal 5 20m, where it is shown to interfere with that unity of faith and community of interests that belong to Christians. There being but one standard of truth, and one goal for all Christian life, any arbitrary choice varying from what was common to all believers, becomes an inconsistency and a sin to be warned against. Ellicott, on Gal 5 20, correctly defines "heresies" (AV, ERV) as "a more aggravated form of dichostasia" (ARV "parties") "when the divisions have developed into distinct and organized parties"; so also 1 Cor 11 19, tr<sup>d</sup> by RV "factions." In 2 Pet 2 1, the transition toward the subsequent ecclesiastical sense can be traced. The "destructive heresies" (RVm, ERV "sects of perdition") are those guilty of errors both of doctrine and of life very fully described throughout the entire chapter, and who, in such course, separated themselves from the fellowship of the church.

In the fixed ecclesiastical sense that it ultimately attained, it indicated not merely any doctrinal error, but "the open espousal of fundamental error" (Ellicott on Tit 3 10), or, more fully, the persistent, obstinate maintenance of an error with respect to the central doctrines of Christianity in the face of all better instruction, combined with aggressive attack upon the common faith of the church, and its defenders. Roman Catholics, regarding all professed Christians who are not in their communion as heretics, modify their doctrine on this point by distinguishing between Formal and Material Heresy, the former being unconscious and unintentional, and between different degrees of each of these classes (Cath. Enc., VII, 256 ff). For the development of the ecclesiastical meaning, see Suicer's Thesaurus Ecclesiasticus, I, 119-23.

HERETH, he'reth, THE FOREST OF (יָרֵךְ, ya'ar hâreth; LXX πόλις Σαρεῖκ, pólis Sareik; AV Hareth): David (1 S 22 5) was told by the prophet Gad to depart from Mizpah of Moab and go to the land of Judah, and he "came into the forest of Hereth." The LXX has "city" instead of forest; see also Jos, Ant., VI, xii, 4. The village Kharâs, on an ancient high road, 3 miles S.E. of Aid el mâ, probably David's stronghold ADULLAM (q.v.), may possibly answer to the place (PEF, III, 305, Sh XXI). "Horesh" has been suggested as an alternative reading. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

HERETIC, her'e-tik, her'ê-tik, HERETICAL, he-ret'i-kal (αἱρετικός, hairetikós): Used in Tit 3 10, must be interpreted according to the sense in which Paul employs the word "heresy" (1 Cor 11 19; Gal 5 20) for "parties" or "factions." According to this, the Scriptural meaning of the word is no more than "a factious man" (ARV), an agitator who creates divisions and makes parties. Weizsäcker translates it into German ein Sektierer, "a sectarist." The nature of the offence is described in other words in 2 Thess 2 6.11.

HERITAGE, her'i-tāj (נַחֲלָה, nahālāh, from nāhal, "to give"; κληρώ, klērōō): That which is allotted, possession, property, portion, share, peculiar right, inheritance; applied to land transferred from the Canaanites to Israel (Ps 11 6; 136 22); to Israel, as the heritage of Jeh (Joel 3 2, etc.). In the NT (Eph 1 11) applied to believers, the spiritual Israel, as God's peculiar possession (Ellicott, Eadie).

HERMAS, hūr'mas (Ἑρμᾶς, Hermās): An abbreviated form of several names, e.g. Hermagoras, Hermeros, Hermodorus, Hermogenes, etc.; the name of a Rom Christian to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom 16 14). Origen and some later writers have identified him with the author of The Pastor of Hermas, but without sufficient reason. According to the Canon of Muratori, the author of The Pastor wrote when his brother Pius was bishop of Rome (140-55 AD). He speaks of himself, however, as a contemporary of Clement of Rome (ch 4) (c 100 AD). The name Hermas is very common, and Origen's identification is purely conjectural.

HERMENEUTICS, hūr-mē-nū'tiks. See INTERPRETATION.

HERMES, hūr'mēz (Ἑρμῆς, Hermēs): In RVm of Acts 14 12 for "Mercury" in text (AV "Mercurius").

HERMES (Ἑρμῆς, Hermēs): The name of a Rom Christian, otherwise unknown, to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom 16 14). "Hermes is among the commonest slave names. In the household alone probably not less than a score of persons might be counted up from the inscriptions, who bore this name at or about the time when St. Paul wrote" (Lightfoot, Philippians, 176).

HERMOGENES, hēr-moj'e-nēz (Ἑρμογένης, Hermogēnēs, lit. "born of Hermes," a Gr deity, called by the Romans, "Mercury," 2

1. Where Did He Turn Away? Tim 1 15): Hermogenes was a Christian, mentioned by Paul as having, along with Phygellus and "all that are in Asia," turned away from him.

It is not clear when or where the defection of those Asiatic Christians from the apostle took place, whether it was at Rome at the time of Paul's second imprisonment there, and esp. on the occasion of his being brought before the emperor's supreme court, to be tried on a charge now involving the death penalty, or whether it was at some previous time in Ephesus.

If it was the latter, then the meaning is that Paul wishes to inform Timothy, or perhaps only to remind him, how in Ephesus, where

2. Was It Timothy was the presiding minister in Ephesus? of the church, these persons, Phygellus and Hermogenes with many more, had turned away from him, that is, had refused to submit to his authority, and had rejected the Christian doctrine which he taught. This latter meaning, referring the "turning away" to some previous occasion in Ephesus, is thought by some expositors to be the probable signification, owing to the fact that the vb. "they be turned away" is in the aorist tense, referring to a time long past when the apostle wrote.

On the other hand there is no evidence that there ever was a time when "all they which are in Asia"

(AV) turned away from obedience to Paul. Whatever may have been the disloyalty and disobedience of individuals—and this certainly existed; see, e.g., Acts 20 29 f—yet, certainly the NT does not show that all that were in Asia, the Christian community as a whole, in Ephesus and Miletus and Laodicea and Hierapolis and Colossae and other places, repudiated his apostolic authority. If the words

4. Probability of It Being in Rome "all they which are in Asia" refer to all the Christians from the proconsular province of Asia, who happened to be in Rome at the time of Paul's second imprisonment there, it can easily be understood that they should turn away from him at that testing time. It is impossible to say exactly what form their desertion of the apostle assumed. Their turning away would likely be caused by fear, lest if it were known that they were friends of the prisoner in the Mamertine, they would be involved in the same imprisonment as had overtaken him, and probably also in the same death penalty.

It is altogether in favor of a reference to Rome, that what is said about Phygellus and Hermogenes and their turning away from Paul is immediately followed by a reference to Onesiphorus, and to the great kindness which he showed, when he sought the apostle out very diligently in Rome. On the whole, therefore, a reference to Rome and to the manner in which these persons, named and unnamed, from Asia, had deserted Paul, seems most probable. See PHYGELLUS. JOHN RUTHERFURD

μῶν, Haermōn): The name of the majestic moun-

1. Description tain in which the Anti-Lebanon range terminates to the S. (Dt 3 8, etc). It reaches a height of 9,200 ft. above the sea, and extends some 16 to 20 miles from N. to S. It was called Sirion by the Sidonians (Dt 3 9; cf Ps 29 6), and Senir by the Amorites (Dt 3 9). It is also identified with Sion (Dt 4 48). See SIRION; SENIR; SION. Sometimes it is called "Mt. Hermon" (Dt 3 8; Josh 11

2. The Hermons 17; 1 Ch 5 23, etc); at other times simply "Hermon" (Josh 11 3; Ps 89 12, etc). Once it is called "Hermons" (הַרְמוֹנִים, hermōnim). AV mistakenly renders this "the Hermonites" (Ps 42 6). It must be a reference to the triple summits of the mountain. There are three distinct heads, rising near the middle of the mass, the two higher being toward the E. The eastern declivities are steep and bare; the western slopes are more gradual; and while the upper reaches are barren, the lower are well wooded; and as one descends he passes through fruitful vineyards and orchards, finally entering the rich fields below, in Wādy et-Teim. The Aleppo pine, the oak, and the poplar are plentiful: The wolf and the leopard are still to be found on the mountain; and it is the last resort of the brown, or Syrian, bear. Snow lies long on the summits and shoulders of the mountain; and in some of the deeper hollows, esp. to the N., it may be seen through most of the year.

Mt. Hermon is the source of many blessings to the land over which it so proudly lifts its splendid form. Refreshing breezes blow from its cold heights. Its snows are carried to Damascus and to the towns on the seaboard, where, mingled with the sharāb, "drink," they mitigate the heat of the Syrian summer. Great reservoirs in the depths of the mountain, fed by the melting snows, find outlet in the magnificent springs at Hasbeiyeh, Tell el-Kādy, and Bāniās, while the dew-clouds of Hermon bring a benediction wherever they are carried (Ps 133 3).

Hermon marked the northern limit of Joshua's victorious campaigns (Josh 12 1, etc). It was part of the dominion of Og (ver 5), and

3. Sanctuaries with the fall of that monarch, it would naturally come under Israelitish influence. Its remote and solitary heights must have attracted worshippers from the earliest times; and we cannot doubt that it was a famous sanctuary in far antiquity. Under the highest peak are the ruins of Qasr 'Antar, which may have been an ancient sanctuary of Baal. Onom speaks of a temple on the summit much frequented by the surrounding peoples; and the remains of many temples of the Rom period have been found on the sides and at the base of the mountain. The sacredness of Hermon may be inferred from the allusion in Ps 89 12 (cf En 6 6; and see also BAAL HERMON).

Some have thought that the scene of the Transfiguration should be sought here; see, however, TRANSFIGURATION, MOUNT OF.

The modern name of Hermon is Jebel eth-Thilj, "mount of snow," or Jebel esh-sheikh, "mount of the elder," or "of the chief."

Little Hermon, the name now often applied to the hill between Tabor and Gilboa, possibly the Hill of Moreh, on which is the sanctuary of Nebv Dahy, has no Bib. authority, and dates only from the Middle Ages. W. EWING

HERMONITES, hûr'mon-īts: In Ps 42 6 AV, where RV reads "Hermons." See HERMON.

HEROD, her'ud:

The name Herod (Ἡρώδης, Hērōdēs) is a familiar one in the history of the Jews and of the early Christian church. The name itself signifies "heroic," a name not wholly applicable to the family, which was characterized by craft and knavery rather than by heroism. The fortunes of the Herodian family are inseparably connected with the last flickerings of the flame of Judaism, as a national power, before it was forever extinguished in the great Jewish war of rebellion, 70 AD. The history of the Herodian family is not lacking in elements of greatness, but whatever these elements were and in whomsoever found, they were in every case dimmed by the insufferable egotism which disfigured the family, root and branch. Some of the Herodian princes were undeniably talented; but these talents, wrongly used, left no marks for the good of the people of Israel. Of nearly all the kings of the house of Herod it may truly be said that at their death "they went without being desired," unmissed, unmourned. The entire family history is one of incessant brawls, suspicion, intrigue and shocking immorality. In the baleful and waning light of the rule of the Herodians, Christ lived and died, and under it the foundations of the Christian church were laid.

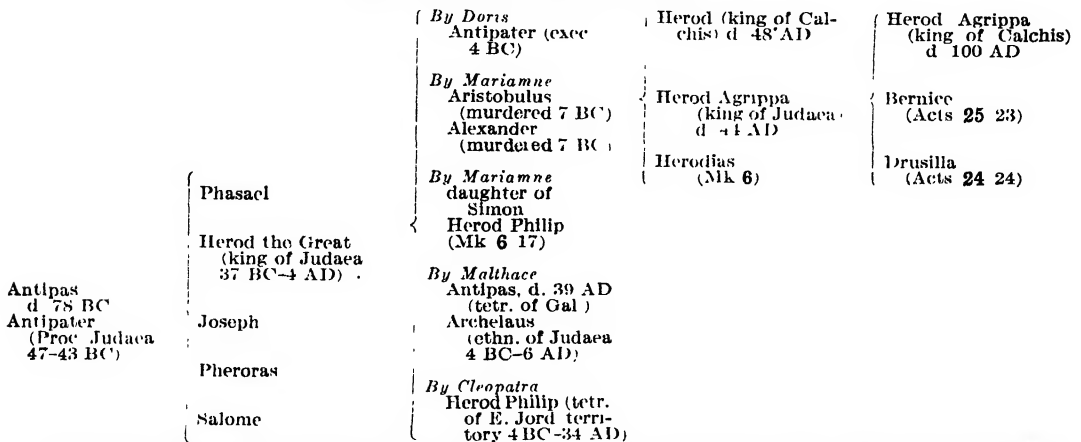

The Herodians were not of Jewish stock. Herod the Great encouraged the circulation of the legend

1. The Family of the family descent from an illustrious Bab Jew (Ant, XIV, i, 3), but it has no historic basis. It is true the Descent Idumaeans were at that time nominal Jews, since they were subdued by John Hyrcanus in 125 BC, and embodied in the Asmonean kingdom through an enforced circumcision, but the old national antagonism remained (Gen 27 41). The Herodian family sprang from Antipas (d. 78 BC), who was appointed governor of Idumaea by Alexander Jannaeus. His son Antipater, who succeeded him, possessed all the cunning, resourcefulness and unbridled ambition of his son Herod the Great. He had an open eye for two things—the unconquerable strength of the Rom power and the pitiable weakness of the decadent Asmoncan house, and on these two factors he built the house of his hopes. He craftily chose the side of Hyrcanus II in his internecine war with Aristobulus his brother (69 BC), and induced him to seek the aid of the Romans. Together they supported the claims of Pompey and, after the latter's defeat, they availed themselves of the magnanimity of Caesar to submit to him, after the crushing defeat of Pompey at Pharsalus (48 BC). As a reward, Antipater received the procuratorship of Judaea (47 BC), while his innocent dupe Hyrcanus had to satisfy himself with the high-priesthood. Antipater died by the hand of an assassin (43 BC) and left four sons, Phasael, Herod the Great, Joseph, Pheroras, and a daughter Salome. The second of these sons raised the family to its highest pinnacle of power and in raising the always welcome tribute-money for the Rom government, gained for him additional power at court. His advance became rapid. Antony appointed him "tetrarch" of Judaea in 41 BC, and although he was forced by circumstances temporarily to leave his domain in the hands of the Parthians and of Antigonus, this, in the end, proved a blessing in disguise. In this final spasm of the dying Asmoncan house, Antigonus took Jerus by storm, and Phasael, Herod's oldest brother, fell into his hands. The latter was governor of the city, and foreseeing his fate, he committed suicide by dashing out his brains against the walls of his prison. Antigonus incapacitated his brother Hyrcanus, who was captured at the same time, from ever holding the holy office again by cropping off his ears (Ant, XIV, xiii, 10). Meanwhile, Herod was at Rome, and through the favor of Antony and Augustus he obtained the crown of Judaea in 37 BC. The fond ambition of his heart was now attained, although he had literally to carve out his glory. Pheroras was nominally his co-regent and, possessed of his father's cunning, maintained himself to the end, surviving his cruel brother, but he cuts a small figure in the family history. He, as well as his sister Salome, proved an endless source of trouble to Herod by the endless family brawls which they occasioned.

With a different environment and with a different character, Herod the Great might have been worthy of the surname which he now bears only as a tribute of inane flattery. What we know of him, we owe, in the main, to the exhaustive treatment of the subject by Jos in his Antiquities and Jewish War, and from Strabo and Dio Cassius among the classics. We may subsume our little sketch of Herod's life under the heads of (1) political activity, (2) evidences of talent, and (3) character and domestic life.

(1) Political activity.—Antipater had great ambitions for his son. Herod was only a young man when he began his career as governor of Galilee. Jos' statement, however, that he was only "fifteen years old" (Ant, XIV, ix, 2) is evidently the mistake of some transcriber, because we are told (XVII, viii, 1) that "he continued his life till a very old age." That was 42 years later, so that Herod at this time must have been at least 25 years old. His activity and success in ridding his dominion of dangerous bands of freebooters, and his still greater success own empire with the sword. He made quick work of the task, cut his way back into Judaea and took Jerus by storm in 37 BC.

The first act of his reign was the extermination of the Asmoncan house, to which Herod himself was related through his marriage with Mariamne, the grandchild of Hyrcanus. Antigonus was slain and with him 45 of his chief adherents. Hyrcanus was recalled from Babylon, to which he had been banished by Antigonus, but the high-priesthood was bestowed on Aristobulus, Herod's brother-in-law, who, however, soon fell a victim to the suspicion and fear of the king (Ant, XV, iii, 3). These outrages against the purest blood in Judaea turned the love of Mariamne, once cherished for Herod, into a bitter hatred. The Jews, loyal to the dynasty of the Maccabees, accused Herod before the Rom court, but he was summarily acquitted by Antony. Hyrcanus, mutilated and helpless as he was, soon followed Aristobulus in the way of death, 31 BC (Ant, XV, vi, 1). When Antony, who had ever befriended Herod, was conquered by Augustus at Actium (31 BC), Herod quickly turned to the powers that were, and, by subtle flattery and timely support, won the imperial favor. The boundaries of his kingdom were now extended by Rome. And Herod proved equal to the greater task. By a decisive victory over the Arabians, he showed, as he had done in his earlier Galilean government, what manner of man he was, when aroused to action.

The Arabians were wholly crushed, and submitted themselves unconditionally under the power of Herod (Ant, XV, v, 5). Afraid to leave a remnant of the Asmonean power alive, he sacrificed Mariamne his wife, the only human being he ever seems to have loved (28 BC), his mother-in-law Alexandra (Ant, XV, vii, 8), and ultimately, shortly before his death, even his own sons by Mariamne, Alexander and Aristobulus 7 BC (Ant, XVI, xi, 7). In his emulation of the habits and views of life of the Romans, he continually offended and defied his Jewish subjects, by the introduction of Rom sports and heathen temples in his dominion. His influence on the younger Jews in this regard was baneful, and slowly a distinct party arose, partly political, partly religious, which called itself the Herodian party, Jews in outward religious forms but Gentiles in their dress and in their whole view of life. They were a bitter offence to the rest of the nation, but were associated with the Pharisees and Sadducees in their opposition to Christ (Mt 22 16; Mk 3 6; Lk 12 13). In vain Herod tried to win over the Jews, by royal charity in time of famine, and by yielding, wherever possible, to their bitter prejudices. They saw in him only a usurper of the throne of David, maintained by the strong arm of the hated Rom oppressor. Innumerable plots were made against his life, but, with almost superhuman cunning, Herod defeated them all (Ant, XV, viii). He robbed his own people that he might give munificent gifts to the Romans; he did not even spare the grave of King David, which was held in almost idolatrous reverence by the people, but robbed it of its treasures (Ant, XVI, vii, 1). The last days of Herod were embittered by endless court intrigues and conspiracies, by an almost insane suspicion on the part of the aged king, and by increasing indications of the restlessness of the nation. Like Augustus himself, Herod was the victim of an incurable and loathsome disease. His temper became more irritable, as the malady made progress, and he made both himself and his court unutterably miserable. The picture drawn by Jos (Ant, XVII) is lifelike and tragic in its vividness. In his last will and testament, he remained true to his life-long fawning upon the Rom power (Ant, XVII, vi, 1). So great became his suffering toward the last that he made a fruitless attempt at suicide. But, true to his character, one of the last acts of his life was an order to execute his son Antipater, who had instigated the murder of his half-brothers, Alexander and Aristobulus, and another order to slay, after his death, a number of nobles, who were guilty of a small outbreak at Jerus and who were confined in the hippodrome (Ant, XVI, vi, 5). He died in the 37th year of his reign, 34 years after he had captured Jerus and slain Antigonus. Jos writes this epitaph: "A man he was of great barbarity toward all men equally, and a slave to his passions, but above the consideration of what was right. Yet was he favored by fortune as much as any man ever was, for from a private man he became a king, and though he were encompassed by ten thousand dangers, he got clear of them all and continued his life to a very old age" (Ant, XVII, viii, 1).

(2) Evidences of talent.—The life of Herod the Great was not a fortuitous chain of favorable accidents. He was unquestionably a man of talent. In a family like that of Antipas and Antipater, talent must necessarily be hereditary, and Herod inherited it more largely than any of his brothers. His whole life exhibits in no small degree statercraft, power of organization, shrewdness. He knew men and he knew how to use them. He won the warmest friendship of Rom emperors, and had a faculty of convincing the Romans of the righteousness of his cause, in every contingency. In his own dominions he was like Ishmael, his hand against all, and the hands of all against him, and yet he maintained himself in the government for a whole generation. His Galilean governorship showed what manner of man he was, a man with iron determination and great generalship. His Judæan conquest proved the same thing, as did his Arabian war. Herod was a born leader of men. Under a different environment he might have developed into a truly great man, and had his character been coördinate with his gifts, he might have done great things for the Jewish people. But by far the greatest talent of Herod was his singular architectural taste and ability. Here he reminds one of the old Egypt Pharaohs. Against the laws of Judaism, which he pretended to obey, he built at Jerus a magnificent theater and an amphitheater, of which the ruins remain. The one was within the city, the other outside the walls. Thus he introduced into the ascetic sphere of the Jewish life the frivolous spirit of the Greeks and the Romans. To offset this cruel infraction of all the maxims of orthodox Judaism, he tried to placate the nation by rebuilding the temple of Zerubbabel and making it more magnificent than even Solomon's temple had been. This work was accomplished somewhere between 19 BC and 11 or 9 BC, although the entire work was not finished till the procuratorship of Albinus, 62–64 AD (Ant, XV, xi, 5, 6; XX, ix, 7; Jn 2 20). It was so transcendently beautiful that it ranked among the world's wonders, and Jos does not tire of describing its glories (BJ, V, v). Even Titus sought to spare the building in the final attack on the city (BJ, VI, iv, 3). Besides this, Herod rebuilt and beautified Strato's Tower, which he called after the emperor, Caesarea. He spent 12 years in this gigantic work, building a theater and amphitheater, and above all in achieving the apparently impossible by creating a harbor where there was none before. This was accomplished by constructing a gigantic mole far out into the sea, and so enduring was the work that the remains of it are seen today. The Romans were so appreciative of the work done by Herod that they made Caesarea the capital of the new régime, after the passing away of the Herodian power. Besides this, Herod rebuilt Samaria, to the utter disgust of the Jews, calling it Sebaste. In Jerus itself he built the three great towers, Antonia, Phasaelus and Mariamne, which survived even the catastrophe of the year 70 AD. All over Herod's dominion were found the evidences of this constructive passion. Antipatris was built by him, on the site of the ancient Kapharsaba, as well as the stronghold Phasaelus near Jericho, where he was destined to see so much suffering and ultimately to die. He even reached beyond his own domain to satisfy this building mania at Ascalon, Damascus, Tyre and Sidon, Tripoli, Ptolemais, nay even at Athens and Lacedaemon. But the universal character of these operations itself occasioned the bitterest hatred against him on the part of the narrow-minded Jews.

(3) Characteristics and domestic life.—The personality of Herod was impressive, and he was possessed of great physical strength. His intellectual powers were far beyond the ordinary; his will was indomitable; he was possessed of great tact, when he saw fit to employ it; in the great crises of his life he was never at a loss what to do; and no one has ever accused Herod the Great of cowardice. There were in him two distinct individualities, as was the case with Nero. Two powers struggled in him for the mastery, and the lower one at last gained complete control. During the first part of his reign there were evidences of large-heartedness, of great possibilities in the man. But the bitter experiences of his life, the endless whisperings and warnings of his court, the irreconcilable spirit of the Jews, as well as the consciousness of his own wrongdoing, changed him into a Jewish Nero: a tyrant, who bathed his own house and his own people in blood. The demons of Herod's life were jealousy of power, and suspicion, its necessary companion.

He was the incarnation of brute lust, which in turn became the burden of the lives of his children. History tells of few more immoral families than the house of Herod, which by intermarriage of its members so entangled the genealogical tree as to make it a veritable puzzle. As these marriages were nearly all within the line of forbidden consanguinity, under the Jewish law, they still further embittered the people of Israel against the Herodian family. When Herod came to the throne of Judaea, Phasaël was dead. Joseph his younger brother had fallen in battle (Ant, XIV, xv, 10), and only Pheroras and Salome survived. The first, as we have seen, nominally shared the government with Herod, but was of little consequence and only proved a thorn in the king's flesh by his endless interference and plotting. To him were allotted the revenues of the East Jordanic territory. Salome, his sister, was ever neck-deep in the intrigues of the Herodian family, but had the cunning of a fox and succeeded in making Herod believe in her unchangeable loyalty, although the king had killed her own son-in-law and her nephew, Aristobulus, his own son. The will of Herod, made shortly before his death, is a convincing proof of his regard for his sister (Ant, XVII, viii, 1).

His domestic relations were very unhappy. Of his marriage with Doris and of her son, Antipater, he reaped only misery, the son, as stated above, ultimately falling a victim to his father's wrath, when the crown, for which he plotted, was practically within his grasp. Herod appears to have been deeply in love with Mariamne, the grandchild of Hyrcanus, in so far as he was capable of such a feeling, but his attitude to the entire Asmonean family and his fixed determination to make an end of it changed whatever love Mariamne had for him into hatred. Ultimately she, as well as her two sons, fell victims to Herod's insane jealousy of power. Like Nero, however, in a similar situation, Herod felt the keenest remorse after her death. As his sons grew up, the family tragedy thickened, and the court of Herod became a veritable hotbed of mutual recriminations, intrigues and catastrophes. The trials and executions of his own conspiring sons were conducted with the acquiescence of the Rom power, for Herod was shrewd enough not to make a move without it. Yet so thoroughly was the condition of the Jewish court understood at Rome, that Augustus, after the death of Mariamne's sons (7 BC), is said to have exclaimed: "I would rather be Herod's hog than his son." At the time of his death, the remaining sons were these: Herod, son of Mariamne, Simon's daughter; Archelaus and Antipas, sons of Malthace, and Herod Philip, son of Cleopatra of Jerus. Alexander and Aristobulus were killed, through the persistent intrigues of Antipater, the oldest son and heir presumptive to the crown, and he himself fell into the grave he had dug for his brothers.

By the final testament of Herod, as ratified by Rome, the kingdom was divided as follows: Archelaus received one-half of the kingdom, with the title of king, really "ethnarch," governing Judaea, Samaria and Idumaea; Antipas was appointed "tetrarch" of Galilee and Peraea; Philip, "tetrarch" of Trachonitis, Gaulonitis and Panceas. To Salome, his intriguing sister, he bequeathed Jamnia, Ashdod and Phasaclus, together with 500,000 drachmas of coined silver. All his kindred were liberally provided for in his will, "so as to leave them all in a wealthy condition" (Ant, XVII, viii, 1). In his death he had been better to his family than in his life. He died unmourned and unbeloved by his own people, to pass into history as a name soiled by violence and blood. As the waters of Callirhoe were unable to cleanse his corrupting body, those of time were unable to wash away the stains of a tyrant's name. The only time he is mentioned in the NT is in Mt 2 and Lk 1. In Mt he is associated with the wise men of the East, who came to investigate the birth of the "king of the Jews." Learning their secret, Herod found out from the "priests and scribes of the people" where the Christ was to be born and ordered the "massacre of the innocents," with which his name is perhaps more generally associated than with any other act of his life. As Herod died in 4 BC and some time elapsed between the massacre and his death (Mt 2 19), we have here a clue to the approximate fixing of the true date of Christ's birth. Another, in this same connection, is an eclipse of the moon, the only one mentioned by Jos (Ant, XVII, vi, 4; text and note), which was seen shortly before Herod's death. This eclipse occurred on March 13, in the year of the Julian Period, 4710, therefore 4 BC.

Herod Antipas was the son of Herod the Great and Malthace, a Samaritan woman. Half Idumaeon, half Samaritan, he had therefore not a drop of Jewish blood in his veins, and "Galilee of the Gentiles" seemed a fit dominion for such a prince.

He ruled as "tetrarch" of Galilee and Peraea (Lk 3 1) from 4 BC till 39 AD. The gospel picture we have of him is far from prepossessing. He is superstitious (Mt 14 1 f), foxlike in his cunning (Lk 13 31 f) and wholly immoral. John the Baptist was brought into his life through an open rebuke of his gross immorality and defiance of the laws of Moses (Lev 18 16), and paid for his courage with his life (Mt 14 10; Ant, XVIII, v, 2).

On the death of his father, although he was younger than his brother Archelaus (Ant, XVII, ix, 4 f; BJ, II, ii, 3), he contested the will of Herod, who had given to the other the major part of the dominion. Rome, however, sustained the will and assigned to him the "tetrarchy" of Galilee and Peraea, as it had been set apart for him by Herod (Ant, XVII, xi, 4). Educated at Rome with Archelaus and Philip, his half-brother, son of Mariamne, daughter of Simon, he imbibed many of the tastes and graces and far more of the vices of the Romans. His first wife was a daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia. But he sent her back to her father at Petra, for the sake of Herodias, the wife of his brother Philip, whom he had met and seduced at Rome. Since the latter was the daughter of Aristobulus, his half-brother, and therefore his niece, and at the same time the wife of another half-brother, the union between her and Antipas was doubly sinful. Aretas repaid this insult to his daughter by a destructive war (Ant, XVIII, v, 1). Herodias had a baneful influence over him and wholly dominated his life (Mt 14 3-10). He emulated the example of his father in a mania for erecting buildings and beautifying cities. Thus he built the wall of Sepphoris and made the place his capital. He elevated Bethsaida to the rank of a city and gave it the name "Julia," after the daughter of Tiberius. Another example of this inherited or cultivated building-mania was the work he did at Betharamphtha, which he called "Julias" (Ant, XVIII, ii, 1). His influence on his subjects was morally bad (Mk 8 15). If his life was less marked by enormities than his father's, it was only so by reason of its inevitable restrictions. The last glimpse the Gospels afford of him shows him to us in the final tragedy of the life of Christ. He is then at Jerus. Pilate in his perplexity had sent the Saviour bound to Herod, and the utter inefficiency and flippancy of the man is revealed in the account the Gospels give us of the incident (Lk 23 7-12; Acts 4 27). It served, however, to bridge the chasm of the enmity between Herod and Pilate (Lk 23 12), both of whom were to be stripped of their power and to die in shameful exile. When Caius Caligula had become emperor and when his scheming favorite Herod Agrippa I, the bitter enemy of Antipas, had been made king in 37 AD, Herodias prevailed on Herod Antipas to accompany her to Rome to demand a similar favor. The machinations of Agrippa and the accusation of high treason preferred against him, however, proved his undoing, and he was banished to Lyons in Gaul, where he died in great misery (Ant, XVIII, vii, 2; BJ, II, ix, 6).

Herod Philip was the son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra of Jerus. At the death of his father he inherited Gaulonitis, Trachonitis and Paneas (Ant, XVII, viii, 1). He was apparently utterly unlike the rest of the Herodian family, retiring, dignified, moderate and just. He was also wholly free from the intriguing spirit of his brothers, and it is but fair to suppose that he inherited this totally un-Herodian character and disposition from his mother. He died in the year 34 AD, and his territory was given three years later to Agrippa I, his nephew and the son of Aristobulus, together with the tetrarchy of Lysanias (Ant, XVIII, iv, 6; XIX, v, 1).

Herod Archelaus was the oldest son of Herod the Great by Malthace, the Samaritan. He was a man of violent temper, reminding one a great deal of his father. Educated like all the Herodian princes at Rome, he was fully familiar with the life and arbitrariness of the Rom court. In the last days of his father's life, Antipater, who evidently aimed at the extermination of all the heirs to the throne, accused him and Philip, his half-brother, of treason. Both were acquitted (Ant, XVI, iv, 4; XVII, vii, 1). By the will of his father, the greater part of the Herodian kingdom fell to his share, with the title of "ethnarch." The will was contested by his brother Antipas before the Rom court. While the matter was in abeyance, Archelaus incurred the hatred of the Jews by the forcible repression of a rebellion, in which some 3,000 people were slain. They therefore opposed his claims at Rome, but Archelaus, in the face of all this opposition, received the Rom support (Ant, XVII, xi, 4). It is very ingeniously suggested that this episode may be the foundation of the parable of Christ, found in Lk 19 12-27. Archelaus, once invested with the government of Judaea, ruled with a hard hand, so that Judaea and Samaria were both soon in a chronic state of unrest. The two nations, bitterly as they hated each other, became friends in this common crisis, and sent an embassy to Rome to complain of the conduct of Archelaus, and this time they were successful. Archelaus was warned by a dream of the coming disaster, whereupon he went at once to Rome to defend himself, but wholly in vain. His government was taken from him, his possessions were all confiscated by the Rom power and he himself was banished to Vienna in Gaul (Ant, XVII, xiii, 2, 3). He, too, displayed some of his father's taste for architecture, in the building of a royal palace at Jericho and of a village, named after himself, Archelais. He was married first to Mariamne, and after his divorce from her to Glaphyra, who had been the wife of his half-brother Alexander (Ant, XVII, xiii). The only mention made of him in the Gospels is found in Mt 2 22.

Of Herod, son of Herod the Great and Mariamne, Simon's daughter, we know nothing except that he married Herodias, the daughter of his dead half-brother Aristobulus. He is called Philip in the NT (Mt 14 3), and it was from him that Antipas lured Herodias away. His later history is wholly unknown, as well as that of Herod, the brother of Philip the tetrarch, and the oldest son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra of Jerus.

Two members of the Herodian family are named Agrippa. They are of the line of Aristobulus, who through Mariamne, granddaughter of Hyrcanus, carried down the line of the Asmonean blood. And it is worthy of note that in this line, nearly extinguished by Herod through his mad jealousy and fear of the Maccabean power, the kingdom of Herod came to its greatest glory again.

Herod Agrippa I, called Agrippa by Jos, was the son of Aristobulus and Bernice and the grandson of Herod the Great and Mariamne. Educated at Rome with Claudius (Ant, XVIII, vi, 1, 4), he was possessed of great shrewdness and tact. Returning to Judaea for a little while, he came back to Rome in 37 AD. He hated his uncle Antipas and left no stone unturned to hurt his cause. His mind was far-seeing, and he cultivated, as his grandfather had done, every means that might lead to his own promotion. He, therefore, made fast friends with Caius Caligula, heir presumptive to the Rom throne, and his rather outspoken advocacy of the latter's claims led to his imprisonment by Tiberius. This proved the making of his fortune, for Caligula did not forget him, but immediately on his accession to the throne, liberated Agrippa and bestowed on him, who up to that time had been merely a private citizen, the "tetrarchies" of Philip, his uncle, and of Lysanias, with the title of king, although he did not come into the possession of the latter till two more years had gone by (Ant, XVIII, vi, 10). The foolish ambition of Herod Antipas led to his undoing, and the emperor, who had heeded the accusation of Agrippa against his uncle, bestowed on him the additional territory of Galilee and Peraea in 39 AD. Agrippa kept in close touch with the imperial government, and when, on the assassination of Caligula, the imperial crown was offered to the indifferent Claudius, it fell to the lot of Agrippa to lead the latter to accept the proffered honor. This led to further imperial favors and further extension of his territory, Judaea and Samaria being added to his domain, 40 AD. The fondest dreams of Agrippa had now been realized, his father's fate was avenged and the old Herodian power had been restored to its original extent. He ruled with great munificence and was very tactful in his contact with the Jews. With this end in view, several years before, he had moved Caligula to recall the command of erecting an imperial statue in the city of Jerus; and when he was forced to take sides in the struggle between Judaism and the nascent Christian sect, he did not hesitate a moment, but assumed the rôle of its bitter persecutor, slaying James the apostle with the sword and harring the church whenever possible (Acts 12). He died, in the full flush of his power, of a death, which, in its harrowing details reminds us of the fate of his grandfather (Acts 12 20-23; Ant, XIX, viii, 2). Of the four children he left (BJ, II, xi, 6), three are known to history—Herod Agrippa II, king of Calchis, Bernice of immoral celebrity, who consorted with her own brother in defiance of human and Divine law, and became a byword even among the heathen (Juv. Sat. vi.156-60), and Drusilla, the wife of the Rom governor Felix (Acts 24 24). According to tradition the latter perished in the eruption of Vesuvius in 79 AD, together with her son Agrippa. With Herod Agrippa I, the Herodian power had virtually run its course.

Herod Agrippa II was the son of Herod Agrippa I and Cypros. When his father died in 44 AD he was a youth of only 17 years and considered too young to assume the govern-

7. Herod Agrippa II ment of Judaea. Claudius therefore placed the country under the care of a procurator. Agrippa had received a royal education in the palace of the emperor himself (Ant, XIX, ix, 2). But he had not wholly forgotten his people, as is proven by his intercession in behalf of the Jews, when they asked to be permitted to have the custody of the official high-priestly robes, till then in the hands of the Romans and to be used only on stated occasions (Ant, XX, i, 1). On the death of his uncle, Herod of Calchis, Claudius made Agrippa II "tetrarch" of the territory, 48 AD (BJ, II, xii, 1; XIV, iv; Ant, XX, v, 2). As Jos tells us, he espoused the cause of the Jews whenever he could (Ant, XX, vi, 3). Four years later (52 AD), Claudius extended the dominion of Agrippa by giving him the old "tetrarchies" of Philip and Lysanias. Even at Calchis they had called him king; now it became his official title (Ant, XX, vii, 1). Still later (55 AD), Nero added some Galilean and Peraean cities to his domain. His whole career indicates the predominating influence of the Asmonean blood, which had shown itself in his father's career also. If the Herodian taste for architecture reveals itself here and there (Ant, XX, viii, 11; IX, iv), there is a total absence of the cold disdain wherewith the Herods in general treated their subjects. The Agrippas are Jews.

Herod Agrippa II figures in the NT in Acts 25 13; 26 32. Paul there calls him "king" and appeals to him as to one knowing the Scriptures. As the brother-in-law of Felix he was a favored guest on this occasion. His relation to Bernice his sister was a scandal among Jews and Gentiles alike (Ant, XX, vii, 3). In the fall of the Jewish nation, Herod Agrippa's kingdom went down. Knowing the futility of resistance, Agrippa warned the Jews not to rebel against Rome, but in vain (BJ, II, xvi, 2-5; XVII, iv; XVIII, ix; XIX, iii). When the war began he boldly sided with Rome and fought under its banners, getting wounded by a sling-stone in the siege of Gamala (BJ, IV, i, 3). The oration by which he sought to persuade the Jews against the rebellion is a masterpiece of its kind and became historical (BJ, II, xvi). When the inevitable came and when with the Jewish nation also the kingdom of Herod Agrippa II had been destroyed, the Romans remembered his loyalty. With Bernice his sister he removed to Rome, where he became a praetor and died in the year 100 AD, at the age of 70 years, in the beginning of Trajan's reign.

HERODIANS, hē-rō'di-anz (Ἡρῳδῆαί, Hērōdianōi): A party mentioned in the Gospels (Mt 22 16|| Mk 12 13; 3 6) as acting with the Pharisees in opposition to Jesus. They were not a religious sect, but, as the name implies, a court or political party, supporters of the dynasty of Herod. Nothing is known of them beyond what the Gospels state. Whatever their political aims, they early perceived that Christ's pure and spiritual teaching on the kingdom of God was irreconcilable with these, and that Christ's influence with the people was antagonistic to their interests. Hence, in Galilee, on the occasion of the healing of the man with the withered hand, they readily joined with the more powerful party of the Pharisees in plots to crush Jesus (Mk 3 6); and again, in Jerus, in the last week of Christ's life, they renewed this alliance in the attempt to entrap Jesus on the question of the tribute money (Mt 22 16). The warning of Jesus to His disciples to "beware of the leaven of Herod" (Mk 8 15) may have had reference to the insidious spirit of this party. JAMES ORR

HERODIAS, hē-rō'di-as (Ἡρῳδίας or Ἡρῳδίας, Hērōdías): The woman who compassed the death of John the Baptist at Machaerus (Mt 14 1-12; Mk 6 14-29; cf also Lk 3 19,20; 9 7-9). According to the Gospel records, Herodias had previously been married to Philip, but had deserted him for his brother Herod the tetrarch. For this Herod was reproved by John (cf Lev 18 16; 20 21), and Herod, therefore, to please Herodias, bound him and cast him into prison. According to Mt 14 5 he would even then have put John to death, but "feared the multitude," which regarded John as a prophet. But Mk 6 19 f relates it was Herodias who esp. desired the death of John, but that she was withstood by Herod whose conscience was not altogether dead. This latter explanation is more in harmony with the sequel. At Herod's birthday feast, Herodias induced her daughter Salome, whose dancing had so charmed the tetrarch, to ask as her reward the head of John the Baptist on a charger. This was given her and she then brought it to her mother.

Herodias was daughter of Aristobulus, son of Herod the Great, by Mariamne, daughter of Hyrcanus. Her second husband (cf above) was Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee and Peraea (c 4-39 AD), son of Herod the Great by Malthace. Herod Antipas was thus the step-brother of Aristobulus, father of Herodias. Regarding the first husband of Herodias, to whom she bore Salome, some hold that the Gospel accounts are at variance with that of Jos. In Mt 14 3; Mk 6 17; Lk 3 19, he is called Philip the brother of Herod (Antipas). But in Mt 14 3 and Lk 3 19 the name Philip is omitted by certain important MSS. According to Jos, he was Herod, son of Herod the Great by Mariamne daughter of Simon the high priest, and was thus a step-brother of Herod Antipas (cf Jos, Ant, XVIII, v, 4). It is suggested in explanation of the discrepancy (1) that Herod, son of Mariamne, bore a second name Philip, or (2) that there is confusion in the Gospels with Herod-Philip, tetrarch of Trachonitis, who was the son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra, and who was in reality the husband of Salome, daughter of Herodias (cf also A. B. Bruce, Expos Gr Test., I, 381; A. C. Headlam, art. "Herod" in HDB, II, 359, 360). According to Jos (Ant, VIII, vii, 2; XVIII, vii, 1) the ambition of Herodias proved the ruin of Herod Antipas. Being jealous of the power of Agrippa her brother, she induced Herod to demand of Caligula the title of king. This was refused through the machinations of Agrippa, and Herod was banished. But the pride of Herodias kept her still faithful to her husband in his misfortune.

HERODION, hē-rō'di-on (Ἡρώδιον, Hērōdion; WH Ἡρώδιον): A Rom Christian to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom 16 11). The name seems to imply that he was a freedman of the Herods, or a member of the household of Aristobulus, the grandson of Herod the Great (ver 10). Paul calls him "my kinsman," i.e. "a Jew" (see JUNIAS, 1).

HERON, her'un (Ἡρὸν, 'ānāphāh; χαρადριός, charadriós; Lat Ardea cinerea): Herons are mentioned only in the abomination lists of Lev 11 19 (m 'ibis') and Dt 14 18. They are near relatives of crane, stork, ibis and bittern. These birds, blue, white or brown, swarmed in Europe and wintered around Merom, along the Jordan, at the headwaters of the Jabbok and along its marshy bed in the dry season. Herons of Southern Africa that summered in the Holy Land loved to nest on the banks of Merom, and raise their young among the bulrushes, papyrus, reeds and water grasses, although it is their usual habit to build in large trees. The white herons were small, the blue, larger, and the brown, close to the same size. The blue were 3½ ft. in length, and had a 5-ft. sweep. The beak, neck and legs constituted two-thirds of the length of the body, which is small, lean and bony, taking its appearance of size from its long loose feathers. Moses no doubt forbade these birds as an article of diet, because they ate fish and in older specimens would be tough, dark and evil smelling. The very poor of our western and southeastern coast states eat them.

HESED, hē'sed, SON OF. See BEN-HESED.

HESHBON, hesh'bon (חֶשְׁבֹן, heshbōn; Ἑσέβων, Heshēbōn): The royal city of Sihon king of the Amorites, taken and occupied by the Israelites under Moses (Nu 21 25 f, etc). It lay on the southern border of Gad (Josh 13 26), and was one of the cities fortified by Reuben (Nu 32 37). It is reckoned among the cities of Gad given to the Merarite Levites (Josh 21 39). In later lit. (Isa 15 4; 16 8 f; Jer 48 2.34.45; 49 3) it is referred to as a city of Moab. It passed again into Jewish hands, and is mentioned by Jos (Ant, XIII, xv, 4) as among their possessions in the country of Moab under Alexander Jannaeus. The city with its district called Hesebonitis, was also under the jurisdiction of Herod the Great (Ant, XV, vii, 5, where it is described as lying in the Peraea). Onom places it 20 Rom miles from the Jordan. It is represented by the modern Hesbān, a ruined site in the mountains over against Jericho, about 16 miles E. of the Jordan. It stands on the edge of Wādī Hesbān in a position of great strength, about 600 ft. above Ain Hesbān. The ruins, dating mainly from Rom times, spread over two hills, respectively 2,930 ft. and 2,954 ft. in height. There are remains of a temple overlooked from the W. by those of a castle. There is also a large ruined reservoir; while the spring in the valley forms a succession of pools (Cant 7 4). The city is approached from the valley by a steep path passing through a cutting in the rock, which may have been closed by a gate (Conder, Heth and Moab, 142). On a hill to the W., el-Kurmīyeh, is a collection of dolmens and stone circles (Musil, Arabia Petraea, I, 383 ff).

W. EWING

HESHMON, hesh'mon (חֶשְׁמוֹן, heshmōn): An unidentified place on the border of Judah toward Edom (Josh 15 27). This may have been the original home of the Hasmoneans.

HETH, hāth (ה): The eighth letter of the Heb alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as h (guttural h). It came also to be used for the number 8. For name, etc, see ALPHABET.

HETH, heth (הֶת, hēth): In Gen 23 10 the ancestor of the Hittites. As the various peoples who occupied Canaan were thought to belong to one stock, Gen 10 15 (1 Ch 1 13) makes Heth the (2d) son of Canaan. In Gen 23 the "sons of Heth" occupy Hebron, but they were known to have come there from the north. A reference to this seems to be preserved in the order of the names in Gen 10 15.16, where Heth is placed between Sidon and the Jebusites. See HITTITES.

HETHLON, heth'lon (חֶתְלֹן, hethlōn; Pesh hethrōn): Name of a place associated with Zedad on the ideal northern boundary of Israel, as given in Ezk 47 15 and 48 1, but not named in Nu 34 8, while the LXX evidently tr'd the text it had. In accordance with the opinion they hold as to the boundary line of Northern Israel, van Kasteren and Buhl seek to identify Hethlon with 'Adlun on the river Qasmīyeh. Much more in harmony with the line of the other border towns given is its identification with Heitala to the N.E. of Tripoli. The "way of Hethlon" would then coincide with the Eleutherus valley, between Homs and the Mediterranean, through which the railway now runs, and to this identification the LXX seems to give testimony, indicating some path of "descent" from the Biq'a'a.

W. M. CHRISTIE

HEWER, hū'ēr (חֹפֶה, hōlēbh): Applies esp. to a wood-worker or wood-gatherer (cf Arab. hattāb, "a woodman") (Josh 9 21.23.27; 2 Ch 2 10; Jer 46 22). Gathering wood, like drawing water, was a menial task. Special servants were assigned to the work (Dt 29 11). Joshua set the Gibeonites to hewing wood and drawing water as a punishment for their trickery, whereas were it not for the oath which the Israelites had sworn, the Gibeonites would probably have been killed. See DRAWER OF WATER.

חָצַב, hācabbh, from the root "to cut" or "to carve," applies to hewers of stone in 1 K 5 15; 2 K 12 12; 1 Ch 22 15; 2 Ch 2 18.

JAMES A. PATCH

HEXATEUCH, hek'sa-tūk: This word, formed on the analogy of Pentateuch, Heptateuch, etc., is used by modern writers to denote the

1. Evidence first six books of the Bible (i.e. the for Law and Josh) collectively. Many critics hold that these six books were composed out of the sources JEP, etc (on which see PENTATEUCH), and only separated very much later into different works. The main grounds for this belief are: (1) the obvious fact that Josh provides the sequel to the Pent, narrating the conquest and settlement in Canaan to which the latter work looks forward, and (2) certain material and stylistic resemblances. The composition of the respective works is considered in the arts. PENTATEUCH and JOSHUA.

Here we must glance at the evidence against the theory of a Hexateuch. It is admitted that there is no trace of any such work as the

2. Evidence Hexateuch anywhere in tradition. against The Jewish Canon places the Pent in a separate category from Josh. The Samaritans went farther and adopted the Pent alone. The orthography of the two works differs in certain important particulars (see E. König, Einführung, 151 f, 250). Hence a different literary history has to be postulated for the two works, even by those who adopt the theory of a Hexateuch. But that theory is open to objection on other grounds. There are grave differences of opinion among its supporters as to whether all the supposed Pentateuchal documents are present in Josh, and in any case it is held that they are quite differently worked up, the redactors having proceeded on one system in the Pent and on quite another in Josh. Arguments are given in the art. PENTATEUCH to show the presence of Mosaic and pre-Mosaic elements in the Pent and the unsoundness of the documentary theory in that work, and if these be correct the theory of a Hexateuch necessarily falls to the ground.

For Bibliography see PENTATEUCH; JOSHUA.

HEZEKI, hez'ê-kî (חֶזְקִיָּה, hizkiyā). See HIZKI.

HEZEKIAH, hez'ê-kî'a (חֶזְקִיָּהוּ, hizkiyāhū):

(1) King of Judah. See special art.

(2) A son of Neariah, of the royal family of Judah (1 Ch 3 23, RV "Hizkiah").

(3) An ancestor of Zephaniah (Zeph 1 1, AV "Hizkiah").

(4) One of the returned exiles from Babylon (Ezr 2 16; Neh 7 21).

HEZEKIAH (חֶזְקִיָּהוּ, hizkiyāhū, "Jeh has strengthened"; also written חֶזְקִיָּה, hizkiyāhū, "Jeh has strengthened him"; Ḥezekias, Hezekias): One of the greatest of the kings of Judah; reigned (according to the most self-consistent chronology) from c 715 to c 690 BC.

On the OT standard of loyalty to Jeh he is eulogized by Jesus Sirach as one of the three kings who alone did not "commit trespass" (Sir

OT Esti- 49 4), the other two being David and mate Josiah. The Chronicler represents him

(2 Ch 32 31) as lapsing from the wisdom of piety only by his vainglory in revealing the resources of his realm to the envoys of Merodach-baladan. In 2 K 18 5, the earliest estimate, his special distinction, beyond all other Judaean kings, before or after, was that he "trusted in Jeh, the God of Israel." It is as the king who "clave to Jeh" (2 K 18 6) that the Heb mind sums up his royal and personal character.

I. Sources for His Life and Times.—The historical accounts in 2 K 18-20 and 2 Ch 29-32 are derived in the main from the same state annals, though the latter seems also to have had the Temple archives

1. Scripture to draw upon. For "the rest of his acts," 2 K refers to a source then still in existence but now lost, "the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah" (2 K 20 20), and 2 Ch to "the vision of Isaiah the prophet the son of Amoz, in the book of the kings of Judah and Israel" (2 Ch 32 32). In this last-named source (if this is the original of our Book of Isa), besides the warnings and directions called out by the course of the history, there is a narrative section (Isa 36-39) recounting the Sennacherib crisis much as do the other histories, but incorporating also a passage of Isaianic prophecy (37 22-32) and a "writing of Hezekiah king of Judah" (38 10-20). Lastly, in Sir 48 17-25, there is a summary of the good and wise deeds of Hezekiah, drawn from the accounts that we already have.

Of these sources the account in 2 K is most purely annalistic, originating at a time when religious and political values, in the Heb mind, were

2. View- inseparable. In 2 Ch the religious point and coloring, esp. in its later developed

Coloring ritual and legal aspects, has the decided predominance. Sirach, with the mind of a man of letters, is concerned mainly with eulogizing H. in his "praise of famous men" (cf Sir 44-50), of course from the devout Heb point of view. In the vision of Isaiah (Isa 1-39), we have the reflection of the moral and spiritual situation in Jerus, as realized in the fervid prophetic consciousness; and in the prophecy of his younger contemporary Micah, the state of things in the outlying country districts nearest the path of invasion, where both the iniquities of the ruling classes and the horrors of war were felt most keenly. Doubtless also many devotional echoes of these times of stress are deducible from the Pss, so far as we can fairly identify them.

It is in Hezekiah's times esp. that the Assyrian inscriptions become illuminating for the history of Israel; for one important thing they

3. Side- furnish certain fixed dates to which the Lights chronology of the times can be adjusted. Of Sennacherib's campaign of 701, for instance, no fewer than six accounts are at present known (see G. A. Smith, Jerus, II, 154, n.), the most detailed being the "Taylor Cylinder," now in the British Museum, which in the main agrees, or at least is not inconsistent, with the Scripture history.

II. Events of His Reign.—From his weak and unprincipled father Ahaz (cf 2 Ch 28 16-25),

Hezekiah inherited not only a disorganized realm but a grievous burden of Assyrian dominance and tribute, and the constant peril and suspense of

1. His greater encroachments from that arrogant and arbitrary power: the state of things foretold in Isa 7 20; 8 7 f. The situation was aggravated by the fact that not only the nation's weakness but its spiritual propensities had incurred it: the dominant classes were aping the sentiments, fashions and cultus of the East (cf Isa 2 6-8), while the neglected common people were exposed to the corruptions of the still surviving heathenism of the land. The realm, in short, was at the spiritual nadir-point from which prophets like Isaiah and Micah were laboring to bring about the birth of a true Heb conscience and faith. Their task was a hard one: with a nation smear-eyed, dull-eared, fat-hearted (Isa 6 10), whose religion was a precept of men learned by rote (Isa 29 13). Clearly, from this point of view, a most difficult career was before him.

The sense of this unspiritual state of things furnishes the best keynote of Hezekiah's reforms in religion, which according to the Chronicler he set about as soon as he came to the throne (2 Ch 29 3). It is the

2. Religious Reform

Chronicler who gives the fullest account of these reforms (2 Ch 29-31); naturally, from his priestly point of view and access to ecclesiastical archives. Hezekiah began with the most pressing constructive need, the opening and cleansing of the Temple, which his father Ahaz had left closed and desecrated (2 Ch 28 24), and went on to the reorganization of its liturgical and choral service. In connection with this work he appointed a Passover observance, which, on a scale and spirit unknown since Solomon (2 Ch 30 26), he designed as a religious reunion of the devout-minded in all Israel, open not only to Jerus and Judah, but to all who would accept his invitation from Samaria, Galilee, and beyond the Jordan (2 Ch 30 5-12.18). The immediate result of the enthusiasm engendered by this Old Home Week was a vigorous popular movement of iconoclasm against the idolatrous high places of the land. That this was no weak fanatical impulse to break something, but a touch of real spiritual quickening, seems evidenced by one incident of it: the breaking up of Moses' old brazen serpent and calling it what it had come to mean, n'hushlān, "a piece of brass" (2 K 18 4); the movement seems in fact to have had in it the sense, however crude, that old religious forms had become hurtful and effete superstitions, hindering spirituality. Nor could the movement stop with the old fetich. With it went the demolition of the high places themselves and the breaking down of the pillars (maṣṣēbhōth) and felling of the sacred groves ('āshērāh), main symbols these of a debasing nature-cult. This reform, on account of later reactions (see under MANASSEH), has been deemed ineffective; rather, its effects were inward and germinal; nor were they less outwardly than could reasonably be expected, before its meanings were more deepened and centralized.

All this, on the king's part, was his response to the spiritual influence of Isaiah, with whose mind his own was sincerely at one. As a devout disciple in the school of prophetic ideas, he earnestly desired to maintain the prophet's insistent attitude of "quietness and confidence" (cf Isa 30 15), that is, of steadfast trust in Jeh alone, and of abstinence from revolt and entangling alliances with foreign powers. This, however, in the stress and suspense of the times, did not preclude a quiet preparation for emergencies; and doubtless the early years of his reign were notable, not only for mild and just administration throughout his realm, but for measures looking to the fortifying and defence of the capital. His work of repairing and extending the walls and of strengthening the citadel (Millo), as mentioned in 2 Ch 32 5, had probably been in progress long before the Assyrian crisis was imminent. Nor was he backward in coming to an understanding with other nations, as to the outlook for revolt against Assyria. He could not learn his lesson of faith all at once, esp. with a factious court pulling the other way. He did not escape the suspicion of Sargon (d. 705), who for his Egypt leanings counted him among the "plot- ters of sedition" (cf COT, 100); while the increasing prosperity and strength of his realm marked him for a leading rôle in an eventual uprising. He weathered at least one chance of rebellion, however, in 711, probably through the strenuous exertions of Isaiah (see Isa 20 1 ff).

3. Internal Improvements

Hezekiah's opportunity to rise against Assyrian domination seems to have been taken about 704.

4. The Assyrian Crisis

How so pious a king came to do it in spite of Isaiah's strenuous warnings, both against opposition to Assyria and alliance with other powers, is not very clear. The present writer ventures to suggest the view that the beginning was forced or perhaps sprung upon him by his princes and nobles. In the year before, Sargon, dying, had left his throne to Sennacherib, and, as at all ancient changes of sovereignty, this was the signal for a general effort for independence on the part of subject provinces. That was also the year of Heze-

kiah's deadly illness (2 K 20; Isa 38), when for a time we know not how long he would be incapacitated for active administration of affairs. Not unlikely on his recovery he found his realm committed beyond withdrawal to an alliance with Egypt and perhaps the leadership of a coalition with Philistia; in which case personally he could only make the best of the situation. There was nothing for it but to confirm this coalition by force, which he did in his Philistia campaign mentioned in 2 K 18 8. Meanwhile, in the same general uprising, the Chaldean Merodach-baladan, who had already been expelled from Babylon after an 11-year reign (721-710), again seized that throne; and in due time envoys from him appeared in Jerus, ostensibly to congratulate the king on his recovery from his illness, but really to secure his aid and alliance against Assyria (2 K 20 12-15; Isa 39 1-4). Hezekiah, flattered by such distinguished attention from so distant and powerful a source, by revealing his resources committed what the Chronicler calls the one impious indiscretion of his life (2 Ch 32 31), incurring also Isaiah's reproof and adverse prediction (2 K 20 17 f; Isa 39 6 f). The conflict with Sennacherib was now inevitable; and Hezekiah, by turning the water supply of Jerus from the Gihon spring to a pool within the walls and closing it from without, put the capital in readiness to stand a siege. The faith evoked by this wise work, confirmed by the subsequent deliverance, is reflected in Ps 46. That this incurring of a hazardous war, however, with its turmoils and treacheries, and the presence of uncouth Arab mercenaries, was little to the king's desire or disposition, seems indicated in Ps 120, which with the other Songs of Degrees (Pss 120-34) may well reflect the religious faith of this period of Hezekiah's life.

The critical moment came in 701, when Sennacherib, who the year before had reconquered Babylon and expelled Merodach-baladan (perhaps Isa 21 1-9 refers to this), was free to invade his rebellious provinces in the W. It was a vigorous and sweeping campaign; in which, beginning with Sidon and advancing down through the coast lands, he speedily subdued the Philistines, defeating them and their southern allies (whether these were from Egypt proper or from its extension across the Sinai peninsula and Northern Arabia, Muḡri, is not quite clear) at Eltekeh; in which campaign, according to his inscription, he took 46 walled towns belonging to Judah with their spoil and deported over 200,000 of their inhabitants. This, which left Jerus a blockaded town (in fact he says of Hezekiah: "Himself I shut up like a bird in a cage in Jerus his royal city"), seems referred to in Isa 1 7-9 and predicted in Isa 6 11f. Its immediate effect was to bring Hezekiah to terms and extort an enormous tribute (2 K 18 14-16). When later, however, he was treacherous enough to disregard the compact thus implied (perhaps Isa ch 33 refers to this), and demanded the surrender of the city (2 K 18 17-19 7; Isa 36 2-37 7), Hezekiah besought the counsel of Isaiah, who bade him refuse the demand, and predicted that Sennacherib would "hear tidings" and return to his own land; which prediction actually came to pass, and suddenly Hezekiah found himself free. A deliverance so great, and so signally vindicating the forthputting of faith, could not but produce a momentous revolution in the nation's mind, like a new spiritual birth in which the faith of the "remnant" became a vital power in Israel; its immediate effect seems portrayed in Ps 124 and perhaps Ps 126, and its deep significance as the birth of a nation in a day seems summarized long afterward in Isa 66 7-9; cf 37 3; 2 K 19 3.

A second summons to surrender, sent from Libnah by letter (2 K 19 1ff; Isa 37 8ff), is treated by the Scripture historians as a later feature of the same campaign; but recent researches seem to make it possible, nay probable, that this belonged to another campaign of Sennacherib, when Taharka of Ethiopia (Tirhākāh, 2 K 19 9; Isa 37 9) came to power in Egypt, in 691. If this was so, there is room in Hezekiah's latter years for a decade of peace and prosperity (cf Ch 32 22.23.27-30), and in Isaiah's old age for a collection and revision of his so wonderfully vindicated prophecies. The historians' evident union of two stories in one makes the new attitude with which this crisis was met, obscure; but the tone of confirmed confidence and courage seems decidedly higher. The discomfiture of Sennacherib in this case was brought about, not by a rumor of rebellions at home, but by an outbreak of plague (2 K 19 35f; Isa 37 36f), which event the Scripture writers interpreted as a miracle. The prophetic sign of deliverance (2 K 19 29; Isa 37 30) may be referred to the recovery of the devastated lands from the ravage inflicted by Sennacherib in his first campaign (cf also Ps 126 5f).

III. His Character.—Our estimate of Hezekiah's character is most consistently made by regarding him as a disciple of Isaiah, who was earnestly minded to carry out his prophetic ideas. As, however, these were to begin with only the initial ideas of a spiritual "remnant," the king's sympathies must needs be identified at heart, not with his imperious nobles and princes, but with a minority of the common people, whose religious faith did not become a recognizable influence in the state until after 701. In the meantime his zeal for purer worship and juster domestic administration, which made him virtually king of the remnant, made him a wise and sagacious prince over the whole realm. Isaiah's glowing prophecy (32 1-8) seems to be a Messianic projection of the saner and clearer-seeing era that his domestic policy adumbrated—a time when king and nobles rule in righteousness, when man can lean on man, when things good and evil are seen as they are and called by their right names. When it came to dealing with the foreign situation, however, esp. according to the Isaianic program, his task was exceedingly difficult, as it were a pioneer venture in faith. His effort to maintain an attitude of steadfast trust in Jeh, with the devout quietism which, though really its consistency and strength looked like a supine passivity, would lead his restlessly scheming nobles to regard him as a pious weakling; and not improbably they came to deem him almost a negligible quantity, and forced his hand into diplomacies and coalitions that were not to his mind. Some such insolent attitude of theirs seems to be portrayed in Isa 28 14-22. This was rendered all the more feasible, perhaps, by the period of incapacitation that must have attended his illness, in the very midst of the nation's critical affairs. Isaiah's words (33 17f) may be an allusion at once to his essential kingliness, to the abeyance of its manifestation due to his disease, and to the constricted condition into which, meanwhile, the realm had fallen. This exceedingly critical episode of Hezekiah's career does not seem to have had its rights with students of the era. Considering the trials that his patient faith must have had, always at cross-purposes with his nobles (cf Ps 120 6f); that now by reason of his sickness they had the whip hand; that his disease cut him off not only from hope of life, but from association with men and access to the sanctuary (cf Isa 38 10.11.12); that, as his son Manasseh was not born till three years within the fifteen now graciously added to his life (cf 2 K 21 1), his illness seemed to endanger the very perpetuity of the Davidic dynasty, we have reason for regarding him as well-nigh a martyr to the new spiritual uprise of faith which Isaiah was laboring to bring about. In the Messianic ideal which, in Isaiah's sublime conception, was rising into personal form, it fell to his lot to adumbrate the first kingly stage, the stage of committal to Jeh's word and will and abiding the event. It was a cardinal element in that composite ideal which the Second Isaiah pushes to its ultimate in his portrayal of the servant of Jeh; another element, the element of sacrifice, has yet to be added. Meanwhile, as with the king so with his remnant-realm, the venture of faith is like a precipitation of spiritual vitality, or, as the prophet puts it, a new birth (cf Isa 26 17f; 37 3; 66 7f, for the stages of it). The event of deliverance, not by men's policies but by Jeh's miraculous hand, was the speedy vindication of such trust; and the revulsion of the next decade witnessed a confirming and solidifying of spiritual integrity in the remnant which made it a factor to be reckoned with in the trying times that succeeded (see under MANASSEH). The date of Hezekiah's death (probably not long after 690) is not certainly known; nor of the death of his mentor Isaiah (tradition puts this by martyrdom under Manasseh); but if our view of his closing years is correct, the king's death crowned a consistent character of strength and spiritual steadfastness; while the unapproachable greatness of Isaiah speaks for itself.

IV. Reflection of His Age in Literature.—The sublime and mature utterances of Isaiah alone, falling in this time, are sufficient evidence

1. Compilation and Revival—that in Hezekiah's age, Israel reached its golden literary prime. Among the idealists and thinkers throughout the nation a new spiritual vigor and insight were awake. Of their fellowship was the king himself, who emulated the activity of his predecessor Solomon as patron of piety and letters. The compilation of the later Solomonic section of the Proverbs (Prov 25-29), attributed to the "men of Hezekiah," indicates the value attached to the accumulations of the so-called Wisdom literature; and it is fair to assume that these men of Hezekiah did not stop with compiling, but stamped upon the body of Proverbs as a whole that sense of it as a philosophy of life which it henceforth bears, and perhaps added the introductory section, Prov 1-9. Nor would a king so zealous for the organization and enrichment of the temple-worship (cf Isa 38 20) be indifferent to its body of sacred song. It seems certain that his was, in all the nation's history, the greatest single agency in compiling and adapting the older Davidic Pss, and in the composition of new ones. Perhaps this union of collecting and creative work in psalmody is referred to in the mention of "the words of David, and of Asaph the seer" (2 Ch 29 30). To Hezekiah himself is attributed one "writing" which is virtually a psalm, Isa 38 20. The custom through all the history of hymnology (in our own day also) of adapting older compositions to new liturgical uses makes uncertain the identification of psalms belonging specifically to this period; still, many psalms of books ii and iii, and esp. those ascribed to Asaph and the sons of Korah, seem a close reflection of the spirit of the times. An interesting theory recently advanced (see Thirle, OT Problems) that the fifteen Songs of the Steps ("Degrees" or "Ascents," Pss 120-34) are a memorial of Hezekiah's fifteen added years, when as a sign the shadow went backward on the steps of Ahaz (2 K 20 8-11), seems to reveal many remarkable echoes of that eventful time. Nor does it seem unlikely that with this first extensive collection of psalms the titles began to be added.

This literary activity of Hezekiah's time, though concerned largely with collecting and reviving the treasures of older literature, was pursued not in the cold scribal spirit, but in a fervid creative way. This may be realized in two of the psalms which the present writer ascribes to this period. Ps 49, a psalm of the sons of Korah, is concerned to make an essential tenet of Wisdom viable in song (cf vs 3,4), as if one of the "men of Hezekiah" who is busy with the Solomonic counsels would popularize the spirit of his findings. Ps 78 in like manner, a Maschil of Asaph, is concerned to make the noble histories of old viable in song (ver 2), esp. the wilderness history when Israel received the law and beheld Jeh's wonders, and down to the time when Ephraim was rejected and Judah, in the person of David, was chosen to the leadership in Israel.

Such a didactic poem would not stand solitary in a period so instructed. As in Wisdom and psalmody, so in the domain of law and its attendant history, the literary activity was vigorous. This age of Hezekiah seems the likeliest time for putting into literary idiom that "book of the law" found later in the Temple (2 K 22); which book Josiah's reforms, carried out according to its commands, prove to have been our Book of Dt. This is not the place to discuss the Deuteronomic problem (see under JOSIAH); it is fair to note here, however, that as compared with the austere statement of the Mosaic statutes elsewhere, this book has a literary art and coloring which seem to stamp its style as that of a later age than Moses', though its substance is Mosaic; and this age of Hezekiah seems the likeliest time to put its re-writing and adaptation. Nor did the new spirit of literary creation feed itself entirely on the past. The king's chastening experience of illness and trial, with the steadfast faith that upbore and survived it, must have been fruitful of new ideas, esp. of that tremendous conception, now just entering into thought, of the ministry of suffering. Time, of course, must be allowed for the ripening of an idea so full of involvement; and it is long before its sacrificial and atoning values come to light in such utterances as Isa 53. But such psalms as 49 and 73, not to mention Hezekiah's own psalm (Isa 38), show that the problem was a living one; it was working, moreover, in connection with the growing Wisdom philosophy, toward the composition of the Book of Job, which in a masterly way both subjects the current Wisdom motives to a searching test and vindicates the intrinsic integrity of the patriarch in a discipline of extremest trial. The life of a king whose experience had some share in clarifying the ideas of such a book was not lived in vain.

HEZEKIAH'S SICKNESS. See DIAL OF AHAZ.

HEZEKIAH, THE MEN OF: A body of men of letters to whom is ascribed the compilation of a supplementary collection of Solomonic proverbs (Prov 25 1). See PROVERBS, BOOK OF, II, 5; HEZEKIAH, IV, 2.

HEZION, hē'zi-on (הֶזְיוֹן, hezayōn; LXX B, Ἀζείν, Azein, A, Ἀζαήλ, Azaēl): An ancestor of Ben-hadad, king of Syria (1 K 15 18).

HEZIR, hē'zēr:

(1) (הֶזִיר, hezir; LXX B, Χηζείν, Chēzein, A, Ἰεζείρ, Iezēir): A Levite in the time of David (1 Ch 24 15).

(2) (LXX Ἡζείρ, Hēzēir): A chief of the people in the time of Nehemiah (Neh 10 20).

HEZRO, hez'rō, HEZRAI, hez'rā-i, hez'rī (הֶזְרַי, hezrō, 2 S 23 35; 1 Ch 11 37, but the Kēṛē of 2 S 23 35 is הֶזְרַי hezray. The ancient VSS almost unanimously support the form Hezrai): A Carmelite, i.e. an inhabitant of Carmel. See CARMELITE. One of David's thirty "mighty men."

HEZRON, hez'ron (הֶזְרוֹן, hezrōn, and הֶזְרִירֹן, hezrōn; LXX Ἀσρών, Asrōn):

(1) A son of Reuben (Gen 46 9; Ex 6 14), and head of the family of the Hezronites (Nu 26 6).

(2) A son of Perez, and grandson of Judah (Gen 46 12; Nu 26 21; 1 Ch 2 5.9.18.21.24.25; 4 1), a direct ancestor of David (Ruth 4 18 f). He appears also in the genealogy of Our Lord (Ἐσρώμ, Esrōm) (Mt 1 3; Lk 3 33).

HEZRON (הֶזְרוֹן, hezrōn, "inclosure"): On the S. boundary of Judah between "Kadesh-barnea" and "Addar" (Josh 15 3); in the || passage (Nu 34 4) "Hazar-addar." The two places may have been near together. Conder suggests that the name survives in Jebel Hadhîreh, a mountain N.W. of Petra in the Tih.

HEZRONITES, hez'ron-its (הֶזְרוֹנִי and הֶזְרִירִי, ha-hezrōnî; LXX ὁ Ἀσρωνεὶ, ho Asrōnēi): The name of the descendants of Hezron the son of Reuben (Nu 26 6), and of the descendants of Hezron the son of Perez (26 21).

HIDDAI, hid'ā-i, hi-dā'ī (הִדַּי, hidday; Alex. Ἀθαί, Halhthat): One of David's thirty "mighty men" (2 S 23 30), described as "of the brooks of Gaash." In the || list in 1 Ch 11 32 the form of the name is "Hurai" (הִרַי, hūray).

HIDDEKEL, hid'ē-kel (הִדְקֵל, hiddēkel): One of the rivers of EDEN (q.v.) (Gen 2 14, RVm "that is, Tigris"; so LXX Τίγρις, Tigris), said to flow E. to Assyria, usually identified with the Tigris, which rises in Armenia near Lake Van and, after flowing S.E. through 8 degrees of latitude, joins the Euphrates in Babylonia to form the Shatt el-'Arab, which runs for 100 miles through a delta which has been formed since the time of Abraham, and now enters the Pers Gulf through 2 branches. About one-third of the distance below its source, and soon after it emerges from the mountains of Kurdistan, the Tigris passes by Mosul, the site of ancient Nineveh, and, lower down at Bagdad, approaches within a few miles of the Euphrates. Here and for many miles below, since the level is lower

HIDDEN, hid'n: The tr of tāman, "to hide," "to bury" (Job 3 16); of ṣāphan "to conceal," "store up" (15 20, "The number of years is hidden to the oppressor," RV "even the number of years that are laid up for the oppressor," m "and years that are numbered are laid up"; Job 24 1, "Why, seeing times are not hidden from the Almighty," RV "Why are times not laid up by the Almighty," m as AV with "Why is it?" prefixed; Ps 83 3, "They consulted [RV "consult"] against thy hidden ones"); of maṣpūnīm (from ṣāphan), "hidden things or places" (Ob ver 6, "How are his hidden things sought up!" RV "treasures," ARV "sought out"); of pālā, "to be wonderful," "difficult" (Dt 30 11, "This commandment . . . is not hidden from thee," RV "too hard for thee," m "or wonderful"); of hāphas, Hithpael, "to hide one's self" (Prov 28 12, RV "When the wicked rise, men hide themselves," m "Heb must be searched for"); of kruplōs, "hidden," "secret" (1 Pet 3 4, "the hidden man of the heart"; 1 Cor 4 5, kruplon, "the hidden things of darkness"; 2 Cor 4 2, "the hidden things of dishonesty," RV "of shame"); of apokrūptō, "to hide away," trop., not to reveal or make known (1 Cor 2 7, "But we speak God's wisdom in a mystery, even the wisdom that hath been hidden"; cf Eph 3 9; Col 1 26).

Among the occurrences of "hidden" in Apoc we have (2 Esd 16 62), "The Spirit of Almighty God . . . searcheth out all hidden things in the secrets of the earth." RV "He who made all things and searcheth out hidden things in hidden places"; Eccles 42 19, "revealing the steps [RV "traces"] of hidden things." apōkruphos; ver 20, "Neither any word is hidden from him," RV "hid," ekrūbē).

HIEL, hī'el (חִילַי, hī'el; Ἀχιλᾶ, Achiēl): A Bethelite who according to 1 K 16 34 rebuilt Jericho, and in fulfilment of a curse pronounced by Joshua (Josh 6 26) sacrificed his two sons. This seems to have been a custom prevalent among primitive peoples, the purpose being to ward off ill luck from the inhabitants, esp. in a case where the destroyer had invoked a curse on him who presumed to rebuild. Numerous instances are brought to light in the excavations of Gezer (Macalister, Bible Side-Lights from the Mound of Gezer, ch x). At first the very best was claimed as a gift to the deity, e.g. one's own sons; then some less valuable member of the community. When civilization prevented human sacrifice, animals were offered instead. The story of Abraham offering Isaac may be a trace of this old custom, the tenor of the story implying that at the time of the writing of the record, the custom was coming to be in disrepute. A similar instance is the offering of his eldest son by the king of Edom to appease the deity and win success in battle (2 K 3 27; cf Mic 6 7). Various conjectures have been made as to the identity of this king. Ewald regarded him as a man of wealth and enterprise (unternehmender reicher Mann); Cheyne following Niebuhr makes it Jehu in disguise, putting 1 K 16 34 after 2 K 10 33; Winckler explains as folklore. W. N. STEARNS

HIERAPOLIS, hē-ēr-ap'ō-lis (Ἱεράπολις, Hierapolis, "sacred city"): As the name implies, Hierapolis was a holy city. It was situated 6 miles from Laodicea and twice that distance from Colossae, on the road from Sardis to Apamea. Though its history is not well known, it seems to have been of Lydian origin, and once bore the name of Kydrara. The Phrygian god Sabazios was worshipped there under the name Echidma, and represented by the symbol of the serpent. Other local deities were Leto and her son Laibrenos. Though called the holy city, Hierapolis was peculiarly regarded as the stronghold of Satan, for there was a Plutonium, or a hole reaching far down into the earth, from which there issued a vapor, even poisoning the birds flying above. It is supposed that upon a stool, deep in the Plutonium, a priest or priestess sat, and, when under the influence of the vapor, uttered prophecies valuable to those who sought them. Though a stronghold of Satan, Hierapolis early became a Christian city, for, according to Col 4 13, the only place where it is mentioned in the NT, a church was founded there through the influence of Paul while he was at Ephesus. Tradition claims that Philip was the first evangelist to preach there, and it also claims that he and his two unmarried daughters were buried there; a third who was married, was buried at Ephesus. Several of the early Christians suffered martyrdom at Hierapolis, yet Christianity flourished, other churches were built, and during the 4th cent. the Christians filled the Plutonium with stones, thus giving evidence that the paganism had been entirely supplanted by the church. During the Rom period, Justinian made the city a metropolis, and it continued to exist into the Middle Ages. In the year 1190 Frederick Barbarossa fought with the Byzantines there.

The modern town is called Pambuk Kalessi, or cotton castle, not because cotton is raised in the vicinity, but because of the white deposit from the water of the calcarous springs. The springs were famous in ancient times because they were supposed to possess Divine powers. The water is tepid, impregnated with alum, but pleasant to the taste. It was used by the ancients for dyeing and medicinal purposes. The deposit of pure white brought up by the water from the springs has heaped itself over the surrounding buildings, nearly burying them, and stalactite formations, resembling icicles, hang from the ruins. The ruins, which are extensive, stand on a terrace, commanding an extensive view, and though they are partly covered by the deposit, one may still trace the city walls, the temple, several churches, the triumphal arch, the gymnasium and baths, and the most perfect theater in Asia Minor. Outside the walls are many tombs.

HIEREEL, hī-er'ē-el (Ἱερεήλ, Hiereēl): 1 Esd 9 21. In Ezr 8 9 the name is Jehiel.

HIERIELUS, hī-er-i-ē'lus (Ἱεζριήλος, Iezriēlos). See JEZRIELUS.

HIEREMOTH, hī-er'ē-moth (Ἱερεμῶθ, Ieremōth):

(1) 1 Esd 9 27 = Jeremoth (Ezr 10 26).

(2) 1 Esd 9 30 = Jeremoth (Ezr 10 29, m "and Ramoth").

HIERMAS, hī-ēr'mas (Ἱερμάς, Hiermās): 1 Esd 9 26, corresponding to Ramiah in Ezr 10 25.

HIGGAION, hi-gā'yon, hi-g'ōn (חִגְּאִיֹן, hig-gāyōn): The meaning of this word is uncertain. Two interpretations are possible; the one based on an allied Arab. root gives "a deep vibrating sound," the other derived from the Gr VSS of Ps 9 16, where we read higgāyōn Ṣelāh, takes it to mean an instrumental interlude. See PSALMS.

HIGH DAY: Is found in Gen 29 7 as a rendering of the Heb יוֹם גָּדוֹל, yōm gādōl, lit. "great day." The Heb means the day at its height, broad daylight, as contrasted with the time for getting the cattle to their sheds for the night (cf Fr. grand jour). In Jn 19 31, "highday" renders μεγάλη הַיּוֹם, megālē hēmēra, lit. "great day," and refers to the Passover Sabbath—and therefore a Sabbath of special sanctity.

HIGHEST, hī'est (הַיְיֹן, 'elyōn; ὑψιστος, hupsistos): The tr of 'elyōn, used frequently of God and commonly tr'd "Most High" (Ps 18 13, "The Highest gave his voice," RV "Most High"; 87 5, "the highest himself," RV "Most High"; Ezk 41 7, "the lowest [chamber] to the highest"); of cammereth, the foliage of a tree (as if the wool or hair of trees), "the highest branch" (Ezk 17 3.22, RV "top," "lofty top"); of rō'sh, "head," "top" (Prov 8 26, "the highest part of the dust of the world," AVm "the chief part," RV "the beginning of," m "sum"); gappē mārōm, "on the ridges of the heights" (Prov 9 3, "the highest places of the city"); ghābhō'h mē'al gābhō'h, lit. "one high [powerful] who is above the high [oppressor]," is tr'd "he that is higher than the highest" (Eccl 5 8), RV "one higher than the high [regardeth]." In the NT, hupsistos (like 'elyōn) is used of God (Lk 1 32, "the Son of the Highest," ver 35, "the power of the Highest," ver 76, "the prophet of the Highest"; 6 35, "the children of the Highest," in these places RV has "Most High"); we have also "Hosanna in the highest" (Mt 21 9; Mk 11 10; see HOSANNA), "Glory to God in the highest" (Lk 2 14), "Glory in the highest" (Lk 19 38); prōtoklasia, "the first reclining-place" (at table), the chief place at meals, the middle place in each couch of the triclinium (Robinson), is rendered (Lk 14 8), "the highest room," RV "chief seat"; "room" was introduced by Tindale; Wiclif had "the first place"; prōtokathedria (prōtos, "first," káthedra, "seat"), "the first or chief seat," is rendered (Lk 20 46) "the highest seats," RV "chief seats," Wiclif "the first chairs."

"The Highest" as a term for God appears (2 Esd 4 11.34, RV "Most High"; Wisd 6 3, hupsistos; Ecclus 28 7, RV "Most High"). See also God, NAMES OF.

HIGHMINDED, hī'mind-ed: In modern usage denotes elevation of mind in a good sense, but formerly it was used to denote upliftedness in a bad sense, pride, arrogance. It is the tr of hupsēlophronēō, "to be highminded," "proud," "haughty" (Rom 11 20, "Be not highminded, but fear"; 1 Tim 6 17, "Charge them that are rich . . . that they be not highminded"); of tuphōō "to wrap in mist or smoke," trop., to wrap in conceit, to make proud, etc (2 Tim 3 4, "Traitors, heady, highminded," RV "puffed up"; cf 1 Tim 3 6; 6 4). "No one can be highminded without thinking better of himself, and worse of others, than he ought to think" (Crabb, English Synonyms).

HIGH, MOST. See God, NAMES OF.

HIGH PLACE: (1) "High place" is the normal tr of הַיָּצֵד, bāmāh, a word that means simply "elevation" (Jer 26 18; Ezk 36 2, etc);

1. General of the use in Job 9 8 of the waves of the sea. For the pl. as a proper noun see BAMOTH. In AV of Ezk 16 24.25.31.39, "high places" is the tr of הַיָּצֵד, rāmāh (RV "lofty places"), a common word (see RAMAH) of exactly the same meaning, indistinguishable from bāmāh in ver 16. In three of these vs of Ezk (24.31.39) rāmāh is paralleled by צֶבֶד, gabh, which again has precisely the same sense ("eminent place" in AV, ERV), and the "vaulted place" of ARV (ERVm) is in disregard of Heb parallelism. In particular, the high places are places of worship, specifically of idolatrous worship. So the title was transferred from the elevation to the sanctuary on the elevation

(1 K 11 7; 14 23; cf the burning of the "high place" in 2 K 23 15), and so came to be used of any idolatrous shrine, whether constructed on an elevation or not (note how in 2 K 16 4; 2 Ch 28 4 the "high places" are distinguished from the "hills"). So the "high places" in the cities (2 K 17 9; 2 Ch 21 11 [LXX]) could have stood anywhere, while in Ezk 16 16 a portable structure seems to be in point. (2) The use of elevations for purposes of worship is so widespread as to be almost universal, and rests, probably, on motives so primitive as to evade formal analysis. If any reason is to be assigned, the best seems to be that to dwellers in hilly country the heaven appears to rest on the ridges and the sun to go forth from them—but such reasons are certainly insufficient to explain everything. Certain it is that Israel, no less than her neighbors, found special sanctity in the hills. Not only was Sinai the "Mount of God," but a long list can be drawn up of peaks that have a special relation to Jeh (see Mount, Mountain; and for the NT, cf Mk 9 2; He 12 18–24, etc). And the choice of a hilltop for the Temple was based on considerations other than convenience and visibility. (But bāmāh is not used of the Temple Mount.)

Archaeological research, particularly at Petra and Gezer, aided by the OT notices, enables us to reconstruct these sanctuaries with

2. Description tolerable fullness. The cult was not limited to the summit of the hill but took place also on the slopes, and the objects of the cult might be scattered over a considerable area. The most sacred objects were the upright stone pillars (maṣṣēbhāh), which seem to have been indispensable. (Probably the simplest "high places" were only a single upright stone.) They were regarded as the habitation of the deity, but, none the less, were usually many in number (a fact that in no way need implicate a plurality of deities). At one time they were the only altars, and even at a later period, when the altar proper was used, libations were sometimes poured on the pillars directly. The altars were of various shapes, according to their purpose (incense, whole burnt offerings, etc), but were always accompanied by one or more pillars. Saucer-shaped depressions, into which sacrifices could be poured, are a remnant of very primitive rites (to this day in Samaria the paschal lamb is cooked in a pit). The trees of the high place, esp. the "terebinths" (oaks?), were sacred, and their number could be supplemented or their absence supplied by an artificial tree or pole ('āsherāh, the "grove" of AV). (Of course the original meaning of the pillar and asherah was not always known to the worshipper.) An amusing feature of the discoveries is that these objects were often of minute size, so that the gods could be gratified at a minimum of expense to the worshipper. Images (ephods?; the trāphim were household objects, normally, are certain, but in Pal no remnants exist (the little Bes and Astarte figures were not idols used in worship). Other necessary features of a high place of the larger size were ample provision of water for lustral purposes, kitchens where the sacrifices could be cooked (normally by boiling), and tables for the sacrificial feasts. Normally, also, the service went on in the open air, but slight shelters were provided frequently for some of the objects. If a regular priest was attached to the high place (not always the case), his dwelling must have been a feature, unless he lived in some nearby village. Huts for those practising incubation (sleeping in the sanctuary to obtain revelations through dreams) seem not to have been uncommon. But formal temples were very rare and "houses of the high places" in 1 K 12 31; 13 32; 2 K 17 29, 32; 23 19 may refer only to the slighter structures just mentioned (see the comm.). In any case, however, the boundaries of the sanctuary were marked out, generally by a low stone wall, and ablutions and removal of the sandals were necessary before the worshipper could enter.

For the ritual, of course, there was no uniform rule. The gods of the different localities were different, and in Pal a more or less thorough rededication of the high places to Jeh had taken place. So the service might be anything from the orderly worship of Jeh under so thoroughly an accredited leader as Samuel (1 S 9 11-24) to the wildest orgiastic rites. That the worship at many high places was intensely licentious is certain (but it must be emphasized against the statements of many writers that there is no evidence for a specific phallic cult, and that the explorations have revealed no unmistakable phallic emblems). The gruesome cemetery for newly born infants at Gezer is only one of the proofs of the prevalence of child-sacrifice, and the evidence for human sacrifice in other forms is unfortunately only too clear. See GEZER, and illustration on p. 1224.

(1) The opposition to the high places had many motives. When used for the worship of other gods their objectionable character is obvious.

3. History vious, but even the worship of Jeh in the high places was intermixed with heathen practices (Hos 4 14, etc.). In Am 5 21-24, etc., sacrifice in the high places is denounced because it is regarded as a substitute for righteousness in exactly the same way that sacrifice in the Temple is denounced in Jer 7 21-24. Or, sacrifice in the high places may be denounced under the best of conditions, because in violation of the law of the one sanctuary (2 Ch 33 17, etc.).

(2) In 1 S, sacrifice outside of Jerus is treated as an entirely normal thing, and Samuel presides in one such case (1 S 9 11-24). In 1 K the practice of using high places is treated as legitimate before the construction of the Temple (1 K 3 2-4), but after that it is condemned unequivocally. The primal sin of Northern Israel was the establishment of high places (1 K 12 31-33; 13. 2.33 f), and their continuance was a chief cause of the evils that came to pass (2 K 17 10 f), while worship in them was a characteristic of the mongrel throng that repopulated Samaria (2 K 17 32). So Judah sinned in building high places (1 K 14 23), but the editor of K notes with obvious regret that even the pious kings (Asa, 1 K 15 14; Jehoshaphat, 22 43; Jehoash, 2 K 12 3; Amaziah, 14 4; Azariah, 15 4; Jotham, 15 35) did not put them away; i.e. the editor of K has about the point of view of Dt 12 8-11, according to which sacrifice was not to be restricted to Jerus until the country should be at peace, but afterward the restriction should be absolute. The practice had been of such long standing that Hezekiah's destruction of the high places (2 K 18 4) could be cited by Rabshakeh as an act of apostasy from Jeh (2 K 18 22; 2 Ch 32 12; Isa 36 7). Under Manassah they were rebuilt, in connection with other idolatrous practices (2 K 21 3-9). This act determined the final punishment of the nation (vs 10-15), and the root-and-branch reformation of Josiah (ch 23) came too late. The attitude of the editor of Ch is still more condemnatory. He explains the sacrifice at Gilbeon as justified by the presence of the Tabernacle (1 Ch 16 39; 21 29; 2 Ch 1 3.13), states that God-fearing northerners avoided the high places (2 Ch 11 16; cf 1 K 19 10.14), and (against K) credits Asa (2 Ch 14 3.5) and Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 17 6) with their removal. (This last notice is also in contradiction with 2 Ch 20 33, but 16 17a is probably meant to refer to the Northern Kingdom, despite 17b.) On the other hand, the construction of high places is added to the sins of Jehoram (2 Ch 21 11) and of Ahaz (2 Ch 28 4.5).

(3) Among the prophets, Elijah felt the destruction of the many altars of God as a terrible grief (1 K 19 10.14). Amos and Hosea each mention the high places by name only once (Am 7 9; Hos 10 8), but both prophets have only denunciation for the sacrificial practices of the Northern Kingdom. That, however, these sacrifices were offered in the wrong place is not said. Isa has nothing to say about the high places, except in 36 7, while Mic 1 5 equates the sins of Jerus with those of the high places (if the text is right), but promises the exaltation of Jerus (4 1 f). In the references in Jer 7 31; 19 5; 32 35; Ezk 6 3.6; 16 16; 20 29; 43 7, idolatry or abominable practices are in point (so probably in Jer 17 3, while Jer 48 35 and Isa 16 12 refer to non-Israelites).

(4) The interpretation of the above data and their historical import depend on the critical position taken as to the general history of Israel's religion. See RELIGION OF ISRAEL; CRITICISM; DEUTERONOMY, etc.

HIGH PRIEST. See PRIEST, HIGH.

HIGH THINGS: The tr of hupsēlos, "high," "lofty," "elevated" (Rom 12 16, "Mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate," AVm "be contented with mean things," RV "Set not your mind on high things, but condescend to [m "Gr be carried away with"] things [m "them"] that are lowly"); high things are proud things, things regarded by the world as high.

High thing is hupsōma, "a high place," "elevation," etc (2 Cor 10 5, "casting down every high thing that is exalted against the knowledge of God," "like a lofty tower or fortress built up proudly by the enemy"). In Jth 10 8; 13 4, hupsōma is rendered "exaltation."

HIGHWAY, hī'wā. See ROAD; WAY.

HILEN, hī'len (הִילֵן, hīlēn): A city in the hill country of Judah, probably W. or S.W. of Hebron, assigned with its suburbs to the Levites (1 Ch 6 58 [Heb 43]). The form of the name in Josh 15 51; 21 15 is HOLON (q.v.).

HILKIAH, hīl-kī'a (חִלְקִיָּה, hilkīyāh, "Jeh is my portion" or "Jeh's portion"): The name of 8 individuals in the OT or 7, if the person mentioned in Neh 12 7.21 was the same who stood with Ezra at the reading of the Law (Neh 8 4). The latter appears as Ezeccias (AV) in 1 Esd 9 43. Five of this name are clearly associated with the priesthood, and the others are presumably so. The etymology suggests this. Either interpretation of the name expresses the person's claim on Jeh or the parents' recognition of Jeh's claim on him.

(1) The person mentioned above (Neh 8 4, etc).
(2) A Levite of the sons of Merari (1 Ch 6 45).
(3) Another Levite of Merari, son of Hosah (1 Ch 26 11). Is he the "porter," i.e. "doorkeeper" of 1 Ch 16 38?

(4) Father of the Gemariah whom Zedekiah of Judah sent to Nebuchadnezzar (Jer 29 3).

(5) The man in 2 K 18 18 ff who is evidently more famous as the father of Eliakim, the major-domo of Hezekiah's palace (Isa 22 20 ff; 36 3 ff). Probably the father's name is given in this and similar cases to distinguish between two persons of otherwise identical name.

(6) A priest of Anathoth, father of Jeremiah (Jer 1 1).

(7) The son of Shallum, and the best known of the name (1 Ch 6 13). He is great-grandfather of Ezra through his son Azariah (1 Esd 8 1; cf 1 Ch 9 11; Neh 11 11). He discovered the lost Book of the Law during the repairing of the Temple (2 K 22 4.8 ff); became chief leader in the ensuing reformation in 621 BC (2 K 23 4; 2 Ch 34 9 ff; 35 8). He showed the recovered book to Shaphan the scribe, who, in turn, brought it to the notice of the king. At Josiah's request he led a deputation to Huldah the prophetess to "enquire of the Lord" concerning the new situation created by the discovery. The book discovered is usually identified with the Book of Dt. See DEUTERONOMY.

HILL, HILL COUNTRY, hīl' kun-tri: The common tr of three Heb words:

(1) גִּבְעָה, gibh'ah, from root meaning "to be curved," is almost always tr<sup>d</sup> "hill"; it is a peculiarly appropriate designation for the very rounded hills of Pal; it is never used for a range of mountains. Several times it occurs as a place-name, "Gibeah of Judah" (Josh 15 20.57); "Gibeah of Benjamin" or "Saul" (Jgs 19 12-16, etc); "Gibeah of Phinehas" (Josh 24 33 m), etc (see GIBEAH). Many such hills were used for idolatrous rites (1 K 14 23; 2 K 17 10; Jer 2 20, etc).

(2) הָר, har, frequently tr<sup>d</sup> in AV "hill," is in RV usually tr<sup>d</sup> "mountain" (cf Gen 7 19; Josh 15 9; 18 15 f, and many other references), or "hill-country." Thus we have the "hill-country of the Amorites" (Dt 1 7.19.20); the "hill-country of Gilead" (Dt 3 12); the "hill-country of Ephraim" (Josh 17 15.16 18; 19 50; 20 7, etc); the "hill-country of Judah" (Josh 11 21; 20 7; 21 11; 2 Ch 27 4, etc; and [ἡ ὄρεινή, hē oreinē] Lk 1 39.65); the "hill-country of Naphtali" (Josh 20 7). For geographical descriptions see PALESTINE; COUNTRY; EPHRAIM; JUDAH, etc.

(3) עֹפֶל, 'ophel, is tr<sup>d</sup> by "hill" in 2 K 5 24; Isa 32 14; Mic 4 8, but may possibly mean

"tower" or "fort." In other passages the word occurs with the art. as a place-name. See OPEL.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

HILL, MOUNT, MOUNTAIN:

(1) The commonest word is הָר, har (also הָרָר, hārār, and הֶרֶר, herer), which is rendered "hill," "mount," or "mountain." It occurs several hundreds of times.

In a number of places RV changes "hill" to "mountain," e.g. Gen 7 19, mountains covered by flood; Ex 24 4, Horeb; Josh 18 14, mountain before Beth-horon; Jgs 16 3, mountain before Hebron; Ps 95 4, "The heights of the mountains are his also"; 121 1, "I will lift up mine eyes unto the mountains," "Hill" remains in Dt 11 11, "land of hills and valleys"; 1 K 20 23, "god of the hills"; Ps 2 6, "my holy hill of Zion"; 95 8, "hills sing for joy." "Mount" is changed to "hill-country" in Dt 1 7, "hill-country of the Amorites"; Jgs 12 15, "hill-country of the Amalekites"; Dt 3 12, "hill-country of Gilead"; but Gen 31 21, "mountain of Gilead"; and Jgs 7 3, "Mount Gilead." "Hill" or "hills" is changed to "hill-country" in Dt 1 7; Josh 9 1; 10 40; 11 16; 17 16; 21 11. In Dt 1 41.43, ARV changes "hill" to "hill-country," while ERV has "mountain." The reasons for these differences of treatment are not in all cases apparent.

(2) The Gr ὄρος, óros, is perhaps etymologically akin to הָר, har. It occurs often in the NT, and is usually tr<sup>d</sup> "mount" or "mountain." In three places (Mt 5 14; Lk 4 29; 9 37) AV has hill, which RV retains, except in Lk 9 37, "when they were come down from the mountain" (of the transfiguration). The derivative ὄρεινός, oreinós, "hill country," occurs in Lk 1 39.65.

(3) The common Heb word for "hill" is גִּבְעָה, gibh'ah=Gibeah (Jgs 19 12); cf Geba, גִּבְעָה, gebha' (1 S 13 3); Gibeon, גִּבְעוֹן, gib'ōn (Josh 9 3), from root גָּבַח, gābha', "to be high"; cf Arab. كَبَّة, kubbeh, "dome"; Lat caput; κεφαλή, kephalē.

(4) In 1 S 9 11, AV has "hill" for מַעְלֵה, ma'āleh, root עָלָה, ālāh, "to ascend"; cf Arab.

عَلَا, 'ala, "to be high," and عَلِيَ, 'ali, "high." Here and elsewhere RV has "ascent."

(5) EV has "hill" in Isa 5 1 for קֶרֶן, keren, "horn"; cf Arab. قَرْن, qarn, "horn," which is also used for a mountain peak.

(6) טָוֵר, tūr, is tr<sup>d</sup> "mountain" in Dnl 2 35.45, but RVm "rock" in Dnl 2 35. The Arab. طَوْر, tūr, "mountain," is esp. used with Sinai, جَبَلِ طَوْرٍ سَيْنَا, jebel tūr sīnā.

(7) מִצֵּב, muṣṣābh (Isa 29 3), is tr<sup>d</sup> in AV "mount," in ERV "fort," in ARV "posted troops"; cf מִצָּב, maṣṣābh, "garrison" (1 S 14 1, etc), from root נָצַב, nāṣabh, "to set"; cf Arab. نَصَب, naṣab, "to set."

(8) סִלְלָה, sol'lāh, from סָלַל, sālāl, "to raise," is in AV and ERV "mount," AVm "engine of shot," ARV "mound" (Jer 32 24; 33 4; Ezk 4 2; 17 17; 21 22; 26 8; Dnl 11 15).

The mountains and hills of Pal are the features of the country, and were much in the thoughts of the Bib. writers. Their general aspect is that of vast expanses of rock. As compared with better-watered regions of the earth, the verdure is sparse and incidental. Snow remains throughout the year on Hermon and the two highest peaks of Lebanon, although in the summer it is in great isolated drifts which are not usually visible from below. In Pal proper, there are no snow mountains. Most of the valleys are dry wadies, and the roads often follow these wadies, which are to the traveler veritable ovens. It is when he reaches a commanding height and sees the peaks and ridges stretching away one after the other, with perhaps, through some opening to the W., a gleam of the sea like molten metal, that he thinks of the vastness and enduring strength of the mountains. At sunset the rosy lights are succeeded by the cool purple shadows that gradually fade into cold gray, and the traveler is glad of the shelter of his tent. The stars come out, and there is no sound outside the camp except perhaps the cries of jackals or the barking of some goat-herd's dog. These mountains are apt to repel the casual traveler by their bareness. They have no great forests on their slopes. Steep and rugged peaks like those of the Alps are entirely absent. There are no snow peaks or glaciers. There are, it is true, cliffs and crags, but the general outlines are not striking. Nevertheless, these mountains and hills have a great charm for those who have come to know them. To the Bib. writers they are symbols of eternity (Gen 49 26; Dt 33 15; Job 15 7; Hab 3 6). They are strong and steadfast, but they too are the creation of God, and they manifest His power (Ps 18 7; 97 5; Isa 40 12; 41 15; 54 10; Jer 4 24; Nah 1 5; Hab 3 6). The hills were places of heathen sacrifice (Dt 12 2; 1 K 11 7; 2 K 16 4; 17 10; Ezk 6 13; Hos 4 13), and also of sacrifice to Jeh (Gen 22 2; 31 54; Josh 8 30). Zion is the hill of the Lord (Ps 2 6; 135 21; Isa 8 18; Joel 3 21; Mic 4 2).

Many proper names are associated with the mountains and hills: as Abarim, Amalekites, Ammah, Amorites, Ararat, Baalah, Baal-hermon, Bashan, Beth-el, Bethor, Carmel, Chesalon, Ebal, Ephraim, Ephron, Esau, Gaash, Gareb, Geba, Gerizim, Gibeah, Gibeon, Gilboa, Gilead, Hachilah, Halak, Hebron, Heres, Hermon, Hor, Horeb, Jearim, Judah, Lebanon, Mizar, Moreh, Moriah, Naphtali, Nebo, Olives, Olivet, Paran, Perazim, Pisgah, Samaria, Seir, Senir, Sephar, Shepherd, Sinai, Sion, Siron, Tabor, Zalmon, Zemaraim, Zion. See also "mountain of the east" (Gen 10 30); "mountains of the leopards" (Cant 4 8); "rocks of the wild goats" (1 S 24 2); "hill of the foreskins" (Gibeah-haaraloth) (Josh 5 3); "mountains of brass" (Zec 6 1); "hill of God" (Gibeah of God) (1 S 10 5); "hill of Jeh" (Ps 24 3); "mount of congregation" (Isa 14 13); see also Mt 4 8; 5 1; 14 23; 15 29; 17 1; 28 16; Lk 8 32; Gal 4 25.

ALFRED ELY DAY

HILLEL, hil'el (הִלֵּל, hillel, "he greatly praised"; LXX ἑλλαλά, Ellala): An inhabitant of Pirathon in the hill country of Ephraim, and father of Abdon, one of the judges of Israel (Jgs 12 13.15).

HIN, hin (הֵין, hīn): A liquid measure containing 12 logs, equal to about 8 quarts. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

HIND, hind. See DEER.

HIND OF THE MORNING, THE: The tr of Ajeleth hash-Shahar ('ayyeleth ha-shahar) in the title of Ps 22, probably the name of some well-known song to which the ps was intended to be sung, which possibly had reference to the early habits of the deer tribe in search of water and food, or to the flight of the hind from the hunters in early dawn; or "morning" may symbolize the deliverance from persecution and sorrow.

"The first rays of the morning sun, by which it announces its appearance before being itself visible, are compared to the fork-like antlers of a stag; and this appearance is called, Ps 22 title, 'The hind of the morning,' because those antler rays preceded the red of dawn, which again forms the transition to sunrise" (Delitzsch, Irs., 107).

According to Hengstenberg, the words indicate the subject-matter of the poem, the character, sufferings, and triumph of the person who is set before us. See PSALMS. For an interesting Messianic interpretation see Hood, Christmas Evans, the Preacher of Wild Wales, 92 ff. M. O. EVANS

HINGE, hinj (חֵבֶה, pōth): Hinges of Jewish sacred buildings in Scripture are mentioned only in connection with Solomon's temple. Here those for the doors, both of the oracle and of the outer temple, are said to have been of gold (1 K 7 50). By this is probably to be understood that the pivots upon which the doors swung, and which turned in the sockets of the threshold and the lintel, were cased in gold. The proverb, "As the door turneth upon its hinges, so doth the sluggard upon his bed" (Prov 26 14), describes the ancient mode of ingress and egress into important edifices. In the British Museum are many examples of stone sockets taken from Bab and Assyrian palaces and temples, engraved with the name and titles of the royal builder; while in the Hauran doors of a single slab of stone with stone pivots are still found in situ. Hinges, as we understand the word, were unknown in the ancient world. See HOUSE II, 1.

HINNOM, hin'om, VALLEY OF (גֵּי הַחִנּוֹם, gē hinnōm, Josh 15 8; 18 16; "valley of the son of Hinnom" [גֵּי בֶן הַחִנּוֹם, gē ben hinnōm], Josh 15 8; 18 16; 2 Ch 28 3; 33 6; Jer 7 31 f; 19 2.6; 32 35; "valley of the children [sons] of Hinnom" [גֵּי בְנֵי הַחִנּוֹם, gē bēnē hinnōm], 2 K 23 10; or simply "the valley," lit. the "hollow" or "ravine" [גֵּי, ha-gay], 2 Ch 26 9; Neh 2 13.15; 3 13; Jer 31 40 and, perhaps also, Jer 2 23 [the above references are in the Heb text; there are some variations in the LXX]): The meaning of "Hinnom" is unknown; the expressions ben Hinnom and bēnē Hinnom would suggest that it is a proper name; in Jer 7 32; 19 6 it is altered by the prophet to "valley of slaughter," and therefore some have thought the original name must have had a pleasing meaning.

It was near the walls of Jerus, "by the entry of the gate Harsith" (Jer 19 2); the Valley Gate opened into it (Neh 2 13; 3 13). The 1. Bible boundary between Judah and Benjamin ran along it (Josh 15 8; 18 16). and History It was the scene of idolatrous practices in the days of Ahaz (2 Ch 28 3) and of Manassah, who "made his children to pass through the fire in the valley of the son of Hinnom" (2 Ch 33 6), but Josiah in the course of his reforms "defiled Topheth, which is in the valley of the children [m "son"] of Hinnom, that no man might make his son or his daughter to pass through the fire to Molech" (2 K 23 10). It was on account of these evil practices that Jeremiah (7 32; 19 6) announced the change of name. Into this valley dead bodies were probably cast to be consumed by the dogs, as is done in the Wādī er-Rabābi today, and fires were here kept burning to consume the rubbish of the city. Such associations led to the Ge-Hinnom (NT "Gehenna") becoming the "type of Hell" (Milton, Paradise Lost, i, 405). See GEHENNA.

The Valley of Hinnom has been located by different writers in each of the three great valleys of Jerus. In favor of the eastern or Kidron valley we have the facts that Eusebius and Jerome (Onom) place "Gehennom" under the eastern wall of Jerus and the Moslem geographical writers, Mukaddasi and Násir-i-khusran, call the Kidron valley Wády Jahamum. The Jewish writer Kimchi also identifies the Valley of Jehoshaphat (i.e. the Kidron) with Hinnom. These ideas are probably due to the identification of the eastern valley, on account of its propinquity to the Temple, as the scene of the last judgment—the "Valley of Jehoshaphat" of Joel 3 2—and the consequent transference there of the scene of the punishment of the wicked, Gehenna, after the ancient geographical position of the Valley of Hinnom, had long been lost. In selecting sacred sites, from the 4th Christian cent. onward, no critical topographical acumen has been displayed until quite modern times. There are three amply sufficient arguments against this view: (1) the Kidron valley is always called a nahal and not a gay' (see KIDRON); (2) the "Gate of the Gai" clearly did not lie to the E. of the city; (3) En-rogel, which lay at the beginning of the Valley of Hinnom and to its E. (Josh 15 8; 18 16) cannot be the "Virgin's fount," the ancient Gihon (2 S 17 17). See GIHON.

Several distinguished modern writers have sought to identify the Tyropœon Valley (el Wād) with Hinnom, but as the Tyropœon was incorporated within the city walls before the days of Manasseh (see JERUSALEM), it is practically impossible that it could have been the scene of the sacrifice of children—a ritual which must have occurred beyond the city's limits (2 K 23 10, etc.).

The clearest geographical fact is found in Josh 15 8; 18 16, where we find that the boundary of Judah and Benjamin passed from

3. Wády er-Rabábi—En-rogel "by the valley of the son of Hinnom"; if the modern Bir Eyyúb is En-rogel, as is certainly most probable, then the Wády er-Rabábi, known traditionally as Hinnom, is correctly so called. It is possible that the name extended to the wide open land formed by the junction of the three valleys; indeed, some would place Tophet at this spot, but there is no need to extend the name beyond the actual gorge. The Wády er-Rabábi commences in a shallow, open valley due W. of the Jaffa Gate, in the center of which lies the Birket Mamilla; near the Jaffa Gate it turns S. for about  $\frac{1}{4}$  of a mile, its course being dammed here to form a large pool, the Birket es Sultán. Below this it gradually curves to the E. and rapidly descends between sides of bare rocky scarps, much steeper in ancient times. A little before the valley joins the wide Kidron valley lies the traditional site of AKELDAMA (q.v.).

HIP (שֵׁק, shōk, "leg," "limb," "hip," "shoulder"): Samson smote the Philis "hip and thigh" (Heb "leg upon thigh"), which was indicative of "a great slaughter" (Jgs 15 8), the bodies being hewed in pieces with such violence that they lay in bloody confusion, their limbs piled up on one another in great heaps. See also SINEW.

HIRAH, hī'ra (חִירָה, hīrāh; LXX Εἰράς, Eirás): A native of Adullam, and a "friend" of Judah (Gen 38 1.12). The LXX and the Vulg both describe him as Judah's "shepherd."

HIRAM, hī'ram (חִירָם, hīrām; LXX Χειράμ, Chirām, but Χειράμ, Cheirām, in 2 S 5 11; 1 Ch 14 1): There is some confusion regarding the form of this name. In the books of S and K the prevailing form is "Hiran" (חִירָן, hīrān); but in 1 K 5 10.18 m (Heb 24.32); 7 40 m "Hirom" (חִירֹם, hīrōm) is found. In Ch the form of the word is uniformly "Huram" (חִירָם, hūrām).

(1) A king of Tyre who lived on most friendly terms with both David and Solomon. After David had taken the stronghold of Zion, Hiram sent messengers and workmen and materials to build a palace for him at Jerus (2 S 5 11; 1 Ch 14 1). Solomon, on his accession to the throne, made a league with Hiram, in consequence of which Hiram furnished the new king of Israel with skilled workmen and with cedar trees and fir trees and alnum trees from Lebanon for the building of the Temple. In return Solomon gave annually to Hiram large quantities of wheat and oil (1 K 5 1 [Heb 15] ff; 2 Ch 2 3 [Heb 2] ff). "At the end of twenty years, wherein Solomon had built the two houses, the house of Jeh and the king's house," Solomon made a present to Hiram of twenty cities in the land of Galilee. Hiram was not at all pleased with these cities and contemptuously called them "Cabul." His displeasure, however, with this gift does not seem to have disturbed the amicable relations that had hitherto existed between the two kings, for subsequently Hiram sent to the king of Israel 120 talents of gold (1 K 9 10-14). Hiram and Solomon maintained merchant vessels on the Mediterranean and shared mutually in a profitable trade with foreign ports (1 K 10 22). Hiram's servants, "shipmen that had knowledge of the sea," taught the sailors of Solomon the route from Ezion-geber and Elath to Ophir, whence large stores of gold were brought to King Solomon (1 K 9 26; 2 Ch 8 17 f).

Jos (Cap, I, 17, 18) informs us, on the authority of the historians Dios and Menander, that Hiram was the son of Abibal, that he had a prosperous reign of 34 years, and died at the age of 53. He tells us on the same authority that Hiram and Solomon sent problems to each other to solve; that Hiram could not solve those sent him by Solomon, whereupon he paid to Solomon a large sum of money, as had at first been agreed upon. Finally, Abde-mon, a man of Tyre, did solve the problems, and proposed others which Solomon was unable to explain; consequently Solomon was obliged to pay back to Hiram a vast sum of money. Jos further states (Ant, VIII, ii, 8) that the correspondence carried on between Solomon and Hiram in regard to the building of the Temple was preserved, not only in the records of the Jews, but also in the public records of Tyre. It is also related by Phœnician historians that Hiram gave his daughter to Solomon in marriage.

(2) The name of a skilful worker in brass and other substances, whom Solomon secured from Hiram king of Tyre to do work on the Temple. His father was a brass-worker of Tyre, and his mother was a woman of the tribe of Naphtali (1 K 7 14), "a woman of the daughters of Dan" (2 Ch 2 14 [Heb 13]; 1 K 7 13 ff; 2 Ch 2 13 f [Heb 12 13]).

HIRCANUS, hēr-kā'nuz. See HYRCANUS.

HIRE, hīr: Two entirely different words are tr<sup>d</sup> "hire" in the OT:

(1) The most frequent one is שָׂכָר, sākhār, vb. שָׂכַר, sākhār, and verbal adj. שָׂכִיר, sākhīr. (a) As a vb. it means "to hire" for a wage, either money or something else; in this sense it is used with regard to ordinary laborers (1 S 2 5; 2 Ch 24 12), or mercenary soldiers (2 S 10 6; 2 K 7 6; 1 Ch 19 6; 2 Ch 25 6), or a goldsmith (Isa 46 6), or a band of loose followers (Jgs 9 4), or a false priest (Jgs 18 4), or Balaam (Dt 23 4; Neh 13 2), or hostile counsellors (Ezr 4 5), or false prophets (Neh 6 12 f). As a verbal adj. it refers to things (Ex 22 15; Isa 7 20) or men (Lev 19 13; Jer 46 21). (b) As a noun it denotes the wage in money, or something else, paid to workmen for their services (Gen 30 32 f; 31 8; Dt 24 15; 1 K 5 6; Zec 8 10), or the rent or hire paid for a thing (Ex 22 15), or a work-beast (Zec 8 10). In Gen 30 16 Leah hires from Rachel the privilege of having Jacob with her again, and her conception and the subsequent birth of a son, she calls her hire or wage from the Lord for the gift of her slave girl to Jacob as a concubine (Gen 30 18).

(2) The other word tr<sup>d</sup> hire is אֶתְנָן, 'ethnān, once אֶתְנָן, 'ethnan. It is rather a gift (from root נָתַן, nāthan, "to give") than a wage earned by labor, and is used uniformly in a bad sense. It is the gift made to a harlot (Dt 23 18), or, reversing the usual custom, made by the harlot nation (Ezk 16 31 41). It was also used metaphorically of the gifts made by Israelites to idols, since this was regarded as spiritual harlotry (Isa 23 17 f; Mic 1 7; cf also Hos 8 9 f).

In the Eng. NT the word occurs once as a vb. and 3 t as a noun as the tr of μισθός, misthós, and its verbal form. In Mt 20 1 8 and Jas 5 4 it refers to the hiring of ordinary field laborers for a daily wage. In Lk 10 7 it signifies the stipend which is due the laborer in the spiritual work of the kingdom of God. It is a wage, earned by toil, as that of other laborers. The word is very significant here and absolutely negatives the idea, all too prevalent, that money received by the spiritual toiler is a gift. It is rather a wage, the reward of real toil.

WILLIAM JOSEPH MCGLOTHLIN

HIRELING, hīr'ling (שָׂכִיר, sākhīr): Occurs only 6 t in the OT, and uniformly means a laborer for a wage. In Job 7 1 f there is reference to the hiring's anxiety for the close of the day. In Isa 16 14 and 21 16 the length of the years of a hireling is referred to, probably because of the accuracy with which they were determined by the employer and the employee. Malachi (3 5) speaks of the oppression of the hireling in his wages, probably by the smallness of the wage or by in some way defrauding him of part of it.

In the NT the word "hireling" (μισθωρός, misthōrós) occurs only in Jn 10 12 f, where his neglect of the sheep is contrasted unfavorably with the care and courage of the shepherd who owns the sheep, who leads them to pasture and lays down his life for their protection from danger and death.

WILLIAM JOSEPH MCGLOTHLIN

HIS, hiz: Used often in AV with reference to a neuter or inanimate thing, or to a lower animal

(Gen 1 11, "after his kind"; Lev 1 16, "pluck away his crop"; Acts 12 10, "of his own accord"; 1 Cor 15 38, "his own body"), etc. RV substitutes "its."

HISS, his (שָׁרַק, shāraḳ): "To hiss" has two applications: (1) to call, (2) to express contempt or scorn.

(1) It is the tr of shāraḳ, a mimetic word meaning to hiss or whistle, to call (bees, etc), (a) Isa 5 26, "I will hiss unto them from the ends of the earth," RV "hiss for them [m "him"] from the end of the earth"; 7 18, "Jeh will hiss for the fly that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt, and for the bee that is in the land of Assyria"; viz. Egyptians whose land was noted for flues (18 1) and Assyrians whose country was preeminently one of bees. Dangerous enemies are compared to bees in Dt 1 44; Ps 118 12 (Skinner's Isaiah): Zec 10 8, "I will hiss for them, and gather them" (His own people, who will come at His call).

(2) More often, to hiss is to express contempt or derision (1 K 9 8; Job 27 23; Jer 19 8, etc). In this sense we have also frequently a hissing (2 Ch 29 8; Jer 19 8; 25 9 18; 29 18; 51 37; Mic 6 16, sherekāh); Jer 18 16, sh'rikōth or sh'rukōth; Eccles 22 1, "Every one will hiss him [the slothful man] out in his disgrace" (eksurissō, "to hiss out"); Wisd 17 9, "hissing of serpents" (surigmós).

HITHERTO, hith'ēr-tōō (to this): Used of both place and time. It is the tr of various words and phrases:

(1) Of place, 'adh hālōm (2 S 7 18, "Thou hast brought me hitherto," RV "thus far"; 1 Ch 17 16; perhaps 1 S 7 12, 'adh hēnnāh, "Hitherto hath Jeh helped us" [in connection with the setting up of the stone Ebenezer]) belongs to this head; hēnnāh is properly an adv. of place: it might always be rendered "thus far."

(2) Of time, 'adh kōh, "unto this" (Ex 7 16, "Hitherto thou hast not hearkened"; Josh 17 14, "Hitherto Jeh hath blessed me"); mā'āz, "from then" (2 S 15 34, RV "in time past"); hāl'āh, "beyond," etc (Isa 18 7, "terrible from their beginning hitherto," RV "onward"); 'adh kāh, Aram. (Dnl 7 28, RV "here," m "hitherto"); 'adh hēnāh, "unto here" (Jgs 16 13; 1 S 1 16; Ps 71 17, etc); āchri tōū deūro (Rom 1 13, "was let [RV "hindered"] hitherto"); hēōs ārti, "until now" (Jn 5 17, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work," RV "even until now," that is, "on the Sabbath as well as on other days, and I do as He does"; 16 24, "Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name: ask, and ye shall receive," that is "up till now"; "now ask in my name and ye shall receive"); ōūpō, "not yet" (1 Cor 3 2, "Hitherto ye were not able to bear it," RV "not yet").

I. OT Notices.—The "sons of Heth" are noticed 12 t and the Hittites 48 t in the OT. In 21 cases the name occurs in the enumeration

1. Enumeration of Races.—of races, in Syria and Canaan, which are said (Gen 10 6 f) to have been akin to the early inhabitants of Chaldaea and Babylon. From at least 2000 BC this population is known, from monumental records, to have been partly Sem and partly Mongolic; and the same mixed race is represented by the Hittite records recently discovered in Cappadocia and Pontus. Thus while the Canaanites ("lowlanders"), Amorites (probably "highlanders"), Hivites ("tribemen") and Perizzites ("rustics") bear Sem titles, the Hittites, Jebusites and Gergashites appear to have non-Sem names. Ezekiel (16 3.45) speaks of the Jebusites as a mixed Hittite-Amorite people.

The names of Hittites noticed in the OT include several that are Sem (Ahimelech, Judith, Basemath, etc), but others like Uriah and Beeri (Gen 26 34) which are probably non-Sem. Uriah appears to have married a Heb wife (Bathsheba), and Esau in like manner married Hittite women (Gen 26 34; 36 2).

2. Individual Hittites.—In the time of Abraham we read of Hittites as far S. as Hebron (Gen 23 3 ff; 27 46), but there is no historic improbability in this at a time when the same race appears (see ZOAN) to have ruled in the Nile Delta (but see Gray in Expos, May, 1898, 340 f).

Lion-Gate at Boghaz-keui.

In later times the "land of the Hittites" (Josh 1 4; Jgs 1 26) was in Syria and near the Euphrates (see TAHMIM-HODSHI); though Uriah

3. Later Mention.—(2 S 11) lived in Jerus, and Ahimelech (1 S 26 6) followed David. In the time of Solomon (1 K 10 29), the "kings of the Hittites" are mentioned with the "kings of Syria," and were still powerful a century later (2 K 7 6). Solomon himself married Hittite wives (1 K 11 1), and a few Hittites seem still to have been left in the S. (2 Ch 8 7), even in his time, if not after the captivity (Ezr 9 1; Neh 9 8).

II. History.—The Hittites were known to the Assyrians as Hatti, and to the Egyptians as Kheta, and their history has been very fully

1. Sources recovered from the records of the XVIIIth and XIXth Egypt Dynasties, from the Am Tab, from Assyrian annals and, quite recently, from copies of letters addressed to Babylonic rulers by the Hittite kings, discovered by Dr. H. Winckler in the ruins of Boghaz-keui ("the town of the pass"), the ancient Pterium in Pontus, E. of the river Halys. The earliest known notice (King, Egypt and W. Asia, 250) is in the reign of Saamsu-ditana, the last king of the first Bab Dynasty, about 2000 BC, when the Hittites marched on the "land of Akkad," or "highlands" N. of Mesopotamia.

The chronology of the Hittites has been made clear by the notices of contemporary rulers in Babylon, Matiene, Syria and Egypt.

2. Chronology.—found by Winckler in the Hittite correspondence above noticed, and is of great importance to Bible history, because, taken in conjunction with the Am Tab, with the Kassite monuments of Nippur, with the Bab chronicles and contemporary chronicles of Babylon and Assyria, it serves to fix the dates of the Egypt kings of the XVIIIth and XIXth Dynasties which were previously uncertain by nearly a century, but which may now be regarded as settled within a few years. From the Am Tab it is known that Thothmes IV was contemporary with the father of Adad-nirari of Assyria (Berlin no. 30), and Amenophis IV with Burna-buriash of Babylon (Brit. Mus. no. 2); while a letter from Hattu-sil, the Hittite contemporary of Rameses II, was addressed to Kadashman-Turgu of Babylon on the occasion of his accession. These notices serve to show that the approximate dates given by Brugsch for the Pharaohs are more correct than those proposed by Mahler; and the following table will be useful for the understanding of the history—Thothmes III being known to have reigned 54 years, Amenophis III at least 36 years, and Rameses II, 66 years or more. The approximate dates appear to be thus fixed.

The Hyksos race having been expelled from the Delta by Aahmes, the founder of the XVIIIth (Theban) Dynasty, after 1700 BC,

3. Egyptian Invasions: the great trade route through Pal and Syria was later conquered by Thothmes XVIIIth, who set up a monument on the W. bank of the Euphrates. The conquests of Aahmes were maintained by his successors Amenophis I and Thothmes I and II; but when Thothmes III attained his majority (about 1580 BC), a great league of Syrian tribes and of Canaanites, from Sharuhin near Gaza and "from the water of Egypt, as far as the land of Naharain" (Aram-naharaim), opposed this Pharaoh in his 22d year, being led by the king of Kadesh—probably Kadesh on the Orontes (now Kedes, N. of Riblah)—but they were defeated near Megiddo in Central Pal; and in successive campaigns down to his 31st year, Thothmes III reconquered the Pal plains, and all Syria to Carchemish on the Euphrates. In his 29th year, after the conquest of Teneb (now Tennib, W. of Arpad), he mentions the tribute of the Hittites including "304 lbs in 8 rings of silver, a great piece of white precious stone, and zagu wood."

They were, however, still powerful, and further wars in Syria were waged by Amenophis II, while Thothmes IV also speaks of his first "campaign against the land of the Kheta." Adad-nirari I wrote to Egypt to say that Thothmes IV had established his father (Bel-tiglat-Assur) as ruler of the land of Marhasse (probably Mer'ash in the extreme N. of Syria), and to ask aid against the "king of the land of the Hittites." Against the increasing power of this race Thothmes IV and his son Amenophis III strengthened themselves by marriage alliances with the Kassite kings of Babylon, and with the cognate rulers of Matiene, E. of the Hittite lands of Syria, and Cappadocia. Dusratta of Matiene, whose sister

Gilukhepa was married by Amenophis III in his 10th year, wrote subsequently to this Pharaoh to announce his own accession (Am Tab, Brit. Mus. no. 9) and his defeat of the Hittites, sending a two-horse chariot and a young man and young woman as "spoils of the land of the Hittites."

About this time (1480 BC) arose a great Hittite ruler bearing the strange name Subbiliuliuma, similar to that of Sapalulmi, chief of the Hattinai, in North Syria, mentioned by Shalmaneser II in the 9th cent. BC. He seems to have ruled at Pterium, and calls himself "the great king, the noble king of the Hatti." He allied himself against Dusratta with Artatama, king of the Harri or North Syrians. The Syrian Hittites in Marhassi, N. of the land of the Amorites, were led shortly after by Edugamma of Kinza (probably Kittiz, N. of Arpad) in alliance with Aziru the Amorite, on a great raid into Phoenicia and to Bashan, S. of Damascus. Thus it appears that the Amorites had only reached this region shortly before the Heb conquest of

The XVIIIth Dynasty was succeeded, about 1400 BC, or a little later, by the XIXth, and

Rameses I appears to have been the Egyptian Pharaoh who made the treaty which 5. Egyptian Invasions: Mursilis, brother of Arandas, contracted with Egypt. But on the XIXth Dynasty accession of Seti I, son of Rameses I, the Syrian tribes prepared to "make a stand in the country of the Harri" against the Egyp resolution to recover the suzerainty of their country. Seti I claims to have conquered "Kadesh (on the Orontes) in the Land of the Amorites," and it is known that Mutallis, the eldest son of Mursilis, fought against Egypt. According to his younger brother Hattusil, he was a tyrant, who was finally driven out by his subjects and died before the accession of Kadeshman-Turgu (about 1355 BC) in Babylon. Hattusil, the contemporary of Rameses II, then seized the throne as "great king of the Hittites" and "king of Kus" ("Cush," Gen 2 13), a term which in the Akkadian language meant "the West." In his 2d year Rameses II advanced, Bashan. Amenophis III repelled them in Phoenicia, and Subbiliuliuma descended on Kinza, having made a treaty with Egypt, and captured Edugamma and his father Suttatarra. He also conquered the land of Ikata which apparently lay E. of the Euphrates and S. of Carchemish. Some 30 years later, in the reign of Amenophis IV, Dusratta of Matiene was murdered, and his kingdom was attacked by the Assyrians; but Subbiliuliuma, though not a friend of Dusratta with whom he disputed the suzerainty of North Syria, sent aid to Dusratta's son Mattipiza, whom he set on his throne, giving him his own daughter as a wife. A little later (about 1440 BC) Aziru the Amorite, who had been subject to Amenophis III, submitted to this same great Hittite ruler, and was soon able to conquer the whole of Phoenicia down to Tyre. All the Egyp conquests were thus lost in the latter part of the reign of Amenophis III, and in that of Amenophis IV. Only Gaza seems to have been retained, and Burna-burias of Babylon, writing to Amenophis IV, speaks of the Canaanite rebellion as beginning in the time of his father Kuri-galzu I (Am Tab, Brit. Mus. no. 2), and of subsequent risings in his own time (Berlin no. 7) which interrupted communication with Egypt. Assur-yuballidh of Assyria (Berlin no. 9), writing to the same Pharaoh, states also that the relations with Assyria, which dated back even to the time of Assur-nadin-akhi (about 1550 BC), had ceased. About this earlier period Thothmes III records that he received presents from Assyria. The ruin of Egypt thus left the Hittites independent, in North Syria, about the time when—according to OT chronology—Pal was conquered by Joshua. They probably acknowledged Arandas, the successor of Subbiliuliuma, as their suzerain.

after the capture of Ashkelon, as far as Beirût, and in his 5th year he advanced on Kadesh where he was opposed by a league of the natives of "the land of the Kheta, the land of Naharain, and of all the Kati" (or inhabitants of Cilicia), among which confederates the "prince of Aleppo" is specially noticed. The famous poem of Pentaur gives an exaggerated account of the victory won by Rameses II at Kadesh, over the allies, who included the people of Carchemish and of many other unknown places; for it admits that the Egyp advance was not continued, and that peace was concluded. A second war occurred later (when the sons of Rameses II were old enough to take part), and a battle was then fought at Tuneb (Tennib) far N. of Kadesh, probably about 1316 BC. The celebrated treaty between Rameses II and Hattusil was then made, in the 21st year of the first named. It was engraved on a silver tablet having on the back the image of Set (or Sutekh), the Hittite god of heaven, and was brought to Egypt by Tar-Tessubas, the Hittite envoy. The two "great kings" treated together as equals, and formed a defensive and offensive alliance, with extradition clauses which show the advanced civilization of the age. In the 34th year of his reign, Rameses II (who was then over 50 years of age) married a daughter of Hattusil, who wrote to a son of Kadashman-Turgu (probably Kadashman-burias) to inform this Kassite ruler of Babylon of the event. He states in another letter that he was allied by marriage to the father of Kadashman-Turgu, but the relations between the Kassite rulers and the Hittites were not very cordial, and complaints were made on both sides. Hattusil died before Rameses II, who ruled to extreme old age; for the latter (and his queen) wrote letters to Pudukhipa, the widow of this successful Hittite overlord. He was succeeded by Dudhalia, who calls himself "the great king" and the "son of Pudukhipa the great queen, queen of the land of the city of the Hatti."

Hittite King and Daughter.

The Hittite power began now, however, to decline, in consequence of attacks from the W. by hostile

6. Declension of Power: Seti Merenptah II, son of Rameses II, these fair "peoples of the North" raided the Syrian coasts, and advanced even to Belbeis and Heliopolis in Egypt, in alliance with the Libyans W. of the Delta. They were defeated, and Merenptah appears to have pursued them even to Pa-Kan'ana near Tyre. A text of his 5th year (found by Dr. Flinders Petrie in 1896) speaks of this campaign, and says that while "Israel is spoiled" the "Hittites are quieted": for Merenptah appears to have been on good terms with them, and allowed corn to be sent in ships "to preserve the life of this people of the Hatti." Dudhalia was succeeded by his son "Arnuanta the great king," of whom a bilingual seal has been found by Dr. Winckler, in Hittite and cuneiform characters; but the confederacy of Hittite tribes which had so long resisted Egypt seems to have been broken up by these disasters and by the increasing power of Assyria.

A second invasion by the Aryans occurred in the reign of Rameses III (about 1200 BC) when "agitation seized the peoples of the North,"

7. Second Aryan Invasion: and "no people stood before their arms, beginning with the people of the Hatti, of the Kati, of Carchemish and Aradus." The invaders, including Danaï (or early Greeks), came by land and sea to Egypt, but were again defeated, and Rameses III—the last of the great Pharaohs—pursued them far north, and is even supposed by Brugsch to have conquered Cyprus. Among the cities which he took he names Carchemish, and among his captives were "the miserable king of the Hatti, a living prisoner," and the "miserable king of the Amorites."

Half a century later (1150 BC) the Assyrians began to invade Syria, and Assur-ris-isi reached Beirût; for even as early as about 1270 BC Tukulti-Ninip of Assyria had conquered the Kassites, and had set a Sem prince on their throne in Babylon. Early in his reign (about 1130 BC) Tiglath-pileser I claims to have subdued 42 kings, marching "to the fords of the Euphrates, the land of the Hatti, and the upper sea of the setting sun"—or

8. Assyrian Invasions: Mediterranean. Soldiers of the Hatti had seized the cities of Sumasti (probably Samosata), but the Assyrian conqueror made his soldiers swim the Euphrates on skin bags, and so attacked "Carchemish of the land of the Hittites." The Moschians in Cappadocia were apparently of Hittite race, and were ruled by 5 kings: for 50 years they had exacted tribute in Commagene (Northeastern Syria), and they were defeated, though placing 20,000 men in the field against Tiglath-pileser I. He advanced to Kumani (probably Comana in Cappadocia), and to Arini which was apparently the Hittite capital called Arinas (now Iranes), W. of Caesarea in the same region.

The power of the Hittites was thus broken by Assyria, yet they continued the struggle for more than 4 centuries afterward.

9. Invasion by Assur-nasir-pal: After the defeat of Tiglath-pileser I by Marduk-nadin-akhi of Babylon (1128-1111 BC), there is a gap in Assyrian records, and we next hear of the Hittites in the reign of Assur-nasir-pal (883-858 BC); he entered Commagene, and took tribute from "the son of Bahian of the land of the Hatti," and from "Sangara of Carchemish in the land of the Hatti," so that it appears that the Hittites no longer acknowledged a single "great king." They were, however, still rich, judging from the spoil taken at Carchemish, which included 20 talents of silver, beads, chains, and sword scabbards of gold, 100 talents of copper, 250 talents of iron, and bronze objects from the palace representing sacred bulls, bowls, cups and censers, couches, seats, thrones, dishes, instruments of ivory and 200 slave girls, besides embroidered robes of linen and of black and purple stuffs, gems, elephants' tusks, chariots and horses. The Assyrian advance continued to 'Azzâz in North Syria, and to the Afrin river, in the country of the Hattinai who were no doubt Hittites, where similar spoils are noticed, with 1,000 oxen and 10,000 sheep: the pagutu, or "maces" which the Syrian kings used as scepters, and which are often represented on Hittite monuments, are specially mentioned in this record. Assur-nasir-pal reached the Mediterranean at Arvad, and received tribute from "kings of the sea coast" including those of Gebal, Sidon and Tyre. He reaped the corn of the Hittites, and from Mt. Amanus in North Syria he took logs of cedar, pine, box and cypress.

His son Shalmaneser II (858-823 BC) also invaded Syria in his 1st year, and again mentions

10. Invasions by Shalmaneser II and Rimmon-nirari III: Sangara of Carchemish, with Sapalulmi of the Hattinai. In Commagene the chief of the Gamgums bore the old Hittite name Mutallis. In 856 BC

Shalmaneser II attacked Mer'ash and advanced by Dabigu (now Toipuk) to 'Azzâz. He took from the Hattinai 3 talents of gold, 100 of silver,

300 of copper, 1,000 bronze vases and 1,000 embroidered robes. He also accepted as wives a daughter of Mutallis and another Syrian princess. Two years later 120,000 Assyrians raided the same region, but the southward advance was barred by the great Syrian league which came to the aid of Irhulêna, king of Hamath, who was not subdued till about 840 BC. In 836 BC the people of Tubal, and the Kati of Cappadocia and Cilicia, were again attacked. In 831 BC Qubarna, the vassal king of the Hattinai in Syria, was murdered by his subjects, and an Assyrian tartanu or general was sent to restore order. The rebels under Sapalulmi had been confederated with Sangara of Carchemish. Adad-nirari III, grandson of Shalmaneser II, was the next Assyrian conqueror: in 805 BC he attacked 'Azzâz and Arpad, but the resistance of the Syrians was feeble, and presents were sent from Tyre, Sidon, Damascus and Edom. This conqueror states that he subdued "the land of the Hittites, the land of the Amorites, to the limits of the land of Sidon," as well as Damascus, Edom and Philistia.

But the Hittites were not as yet thoroughly subdued, and often revolted. In 738 BC Tiglath-pileser II mentions among his tributaries a chief of the Gamgums bearing the Hittite name Tarku-lara, with Pisiris of Carchemish. In 702 BC Sennacherib passed peacefully through the "land of the Hatti" on his way to Sidon: for in 717 BC Sargon had destroyed Carchemish, and had taken many of the Hittites prisoners, sending them away far east and replacing them by Babylonians. Two years later he in the same way took the Hamathites as captives to Assyria. Some of the Hittites may have fled to the S., for in 709 BC Sargon states that the king of Ashdod was deposed by "people of the Hatti plotting rebellion who despised his rule," and who set up Azuri instead.

The power of the Hittites was thus entirely broken before Sennacherib's time, but they were not entirely exterminated, for, in 673 BC, Esarhaddon speaks of "twenty-two kings of the Hatti and near the sea." Hittite names occur in 712 BC (Tarku-nazi of Meletene) and in 711 BC (Mutallis of Commagene), but after this they disappear. Yet, even in a recently found text of Nebuchadnezzar (after 600 BC), we read that "chiefs of the land of the Hattim, bordering on the Euphrates to the W., where by command of Nergal my lord I had destroyed their rule, were made to bring strong beams from the mountain of Lebanon to my city Babylon." A Hittite population seems to have survived even in Roman times in Cilicia and Cappadocia, for (as Dr. Mordtmann observed) a king and his son in this region both bore the name Tarkon-dimotos in the time of Augustus, according to Dio Cassius and Tacitus; and this name recalls that of Tarku-timme, the king of Erine in Cappadocia, occurring on a monument which shows him as brought captive before an Assyrian king, while the same name also occurs on the bilingual silver boss which was the head of his scepter, inscribed in Hittite and cuneiform characters.

12. Break-up of Hittite Power

The power of the Mongolic race decayed gradually as that of the Sem Assyrians increased; but even now in Syria the two races remain mingled, and Turkoman nomads still camp even as far S. as the site of Kadesh on the Orontes, while a few tribes of the same stock (which entered Syria in the Middle Ages) still inhabit the plains of Sharon and Esdraelon, just as the southern Hittites dwelt among the Amorites at Jerus and Hebron in the days of Abraham, before they were driven north by Thothmes III.

III. Language.—The questions of race and language in early times, before the early stocks were mixed or decayed, cannot be dissociated, and we have abundant evidence of the racial type and characteristic dress of the Hittites. The late Dr. Birch of the British Museum pointed out the Mongol character of the Hittite type, and his opinion has been very generally adopted. In 1888 Dr. Sayce (The Hittites, 15, 101) calls them "Mongoloid," and says, "They had in fact, according to craniologists, the characteristics of a Mongoloid race." This was also the opinion of Sir W. Flower; and, if the Hittites were Mongols, it would appear probable that they spoke a Mongol dialect. It is also apparent that, in this case, they would be related to the old Mongol population of Chaldaea (the people of Akkad and Sumir or "of the highlands and river valley") from whom the Sem Babylonians derived their earliest civilization.

1. Mongol Race

Passage-Frieze, Iasili-kala.

The Hittite type is represented, not only on their own monuments, but on those of the XVIIIth and XIXth Egypt Dynasties, including a colored picture of the time of Rameses III. The type represented has a short head and receding forehead, a prominent and sometimes rather curved nose, a strong jaw and a hairless face. The complexion is yellow, the eyes slightly slanting, the hair of the head black, and gathered into a long pigtail behind. The physiognomy is like that of the Sumerians represented on a bas-relief at Tel-loh (Zirgul) in Chaldaea, and very like that of some of the Kirghiz Mongols of the present time, and of some of the more purely Mongolic Turks. The head of Gudea at Zirgul in like manner shows (about 2800 BC) the broad cheek bones and hairless face of the Turkish type; and the language of his texts, in both grammar and vocabulary, is closely similar to pure Turkish speech.

Priest-King and God of Cultivation.

Among Mongolic peoples the beard grows only late in life, and among the Akkadians it is rarely represented—excepting in the case of

less. At Iasili-Kaia—the rock shrine near Pterium—only the supreme god is bearded, and all the other male figures are beardless. At Ibreez, in Lycaonia, the gigantic god who holds corn and grapes in his hands is bearded, and the worshipper who approaches him also has a beard, and his hair is arranged in the distinctive fashion of the Sem Babylonians and Assyrians. This type may represent Sem mixture, for M. Chantre discovered at Kara-eyak, in Cappadocia, tablets in Sem Bab representing traders' letters perhaps as old as 2000 BC. The type of the Ibreez figures has been said to resemble that of the Armenian peasantry of today; but, although the Armenians are Aryans of the old Phrygian stock, and their language almost purely Aryan, they have mixed with the Turkish and Sem races, and have been said even to resemble the Jews. Little reliance can be placed, therefore, on comparison with modern mixed types. The Hittite pigtail is very distinctive of a Mongolic race. It was imposed on the Chinese by the Manchus in the 17th cent., but it is unknown among Aryan or Sem peoples, though it seems to be represented on some Akkadian seals, and on a bas-relief picturing the Mongolic Susians in the 7th cent. BC.

The costume of the Hittites on monuments seems also to indicate Mongolic origin. Kings and priests wear long robes, but warriors (and the gods at Ibreez and Babylon) wear short jerkins, and the Turkish shoe or slipper with a curled-up toe, which, however, is also worn by the Heb tribute bearers from Jehu on the "black obelisk" (about 840 BC) of Shalmaneser II. Hittite gods and warriors are shown as wearing a high, conical head-dress, just like that which (with addition of the Moslem turban) characterized the Turks at least as late as the 18th cent. The short jerkin also appears on Akkadian seals and bas-reliefs, and, generally speaking, the Hittites (who were enemies of the Lycians, Danai and other Aryans to their west) may be held to be very clearly Mongolic in physical type and costume, while the art of their monuments is closely similar to that of the most archaic Akkadian and Bab sculptures of Mesopotamia. It is natural to suppose that they were a branch of the same remarkable race which civilized Chaldaea, but which seems to have had its earliest home in Akkad, or the "highlands" near Ararat and Media, long before the appearance of Aryan tribes either in this region or in Ionia. The conclusion also agrees with the OT statement that the Hittites were akin to the descendants of Ham in Babylonia, and not to the "fair" tribes (Japheth), including Medes, Ionians and other Aryan peoples.

As early as 1866 Chabas remarked that the Hittite names (of which so many have been mentioned above) were clearly not Sem,

5. Hittite Names and this has been generally allowed. Those of the Amorites, on the other hand, are Sem, and the type represented, with brown skin, dark eyes and hair, aquiline features and beards, agrees (as is generally allowed) in indicating a Sem race.

There are now some 60 of these Hittite names known, and they do not suggest any Aryan etymology. They are quite unlike those of the Aryan Medes (such as Baga-datta, etc) mentioned by the Assyrians, or those of the Vannic kings whose language (as shown by recently published bilinguals in Vannic and Assyrian) seems very clearly to have been Iranian—or similar to Pers and Sanskrit—but which only occurs in the later Assyrian age. Comparisons with Armenian and Georgian (derived from the Phrygian and Scythian) also fail to show any similarity of vocabulary or of syntax, while on the other hand comparisons with the Akkadian, the Kassite and modern Turkish at once suggest a linguistic connection which fully agrees with what has been said above of the racial type. The common element Tarku, or Tarkhan, in Hittite names suggests the Mongol dargo and the Turkish tarkhan, meaning a "tribal chief." Sil again is an Akkadian word for a "ruler," and nazi is an element in both Hittite and Kassite names.

It has also been remarked that the vocabulary of the Hittite letters discovered by Chantre at

6. Vocabulary of Pterium Epistles recalls that of the letter written by Dusratta of Matiene to Amenophis III (Am Tab no. 27, Berlin), and that Dusratta adored the Hittite god Tessupas. A careful study of the language of this letter shows that, in syntax and vocabulary alike, it must be regarded as Mongolic and as a dialect of the Akkadian group. The cases of the noun, for instance, are the same as in Akkadian and in modern Turkish. No less than 50 words and terminations are common to the language of this letter and of those discovered by M. Chantre and attributed to the Hittites whose territory immediately adjoined that of Matiene. The majority of these words occur also in Akkadian.

But in addition to these indications we have a letter in the Am Tab (Berlin no. 10) written by a

7. Tell el-Amarna Tablet Hittite prince, in his own tongue and in the cuneiform script. It is from (and not to, as has been wrongly supposed by Knudtzon) a chief named

Tarhun-dara, and is addressed to Amenophis III, whose name stands first. In all the other letters the name of the sender always follows that of the recipient. The general meaning of this letter is clear from the known meanings of the "ideograms" used for many words; and it is also clear that the language is "agglutinative" like the Akkadian. The suffixed possessive pronouns follow the pl. termination of the noun as in Akkadian, and prepositions are not used as they are in Sem and Aryan speech; the precativ form of the vb. has also been recognized to be the same as used in Akkadian. The pronouns mi, "my," and ti, "thy," are to be found in many living Mongolic dialects (e.g. the Zyrianian me and te); in Akkadian also they occur as mi and zi. The letter opens with the usual salutation: "Letter to Amenophis III the great king, king of the land of Egypt [Mizzari-na], from Tarḫun-dara [Tarḫundara-da], king of the land of Arzapi [or Arzaa], thus. To me is prosperity. To my nobles, my hosts, my cavalry, to all that is mine in all my lands, may there be prosperity; [moreover?] may there be prosperity: to thy house, thy wives, thy sons, thy nobles, thy hosts, thy cavalry, to all that is thine in thy lands may there be prosperity." The letter continues to speak of a daughter of the Pharaoh, and of a sum of gold which is being sent in charge of an envoy named Irsappa. It concludes (as in many other instances) with a list of presents, these being sent by "the Hittite prince [Nu Hattu] from the land Igait" (perhaps the same as Ikata), and including, besides the gold, various robes, and ten chairs of ebony inlaid with ivory.

As far as it can at present be understood, the language of this letter, which bears no indications of either Sem or Aryan speech, whether in vocabulary or in syntax, strongly favors the conclusion that the native Hittite language was a dialect of that spoken by the Akkadians, the Kassites and the Minyans of Maticene, in the same age.

IV. Religion.—The Hittites like their neighbors adored many gods. Besides Set (or Sutekh), the "great ruler of heaven," and Istar (Ashtoreth), we also find mentioned (in Hattusil's treaty) gods and goddesses of "the hills and rivers of the land of the Hatti," "the great sea, the winds and the clouds." Tessupas was known to the Babylonians as a name of Rimmon, the god of thunder and rain. On a bilingual seal (in Hittite and cuneiform characters), now in the Ashmolean Museum, we find noticed the goddess Ishara, whose name, among the Kassites, was equivalent to Istar. The Hittite gods are represented—like those of the Assyrians—standing erect on lions. One of them (at Samala in Syria) is lion-headed like Nergal. They also believed in demons, like the Akkadians and others.

Their pantheon was thus also Mongolic, and the suggestion (by Dr. Winckler) that they adored Indian gods (Indra, Varuna), and the

2. Religious Symbolism. Pers Mithra, not only seems improbable, but is also hardly supported by the quotations from Sem texts on which this idea is based. The sphinx is found as a Hittite emblem at Eyuk, N. of Pterium, with the double-headed eagle which again, at Iasili-kaia, supports a pair of deities. It also occurs at Tel-loh as an Akkadian emblem, and was adopted by the Seljuk Turks about 1000 AD. At Eyuk we have a representation of a procession bringing goats and rams to an altar. At Iflatun-bunar the winged sun is an emblem as in Babylonia. At Mer'ash, in Syria, the mother goddess carries her child, while an eagle perches on a harp beside her. At Carchemish the naked Istar is represented with wings. The religious symbolism, like the names of deities, thus suggests a close connection with the emblems and beliefs of the Kassites and Akkadians.

Storm-God Tessupas.

V. Script.—In the 16th cent BC, and down to the 13th cent., the Hittites used the cuneiform characters and the Bab language

1. Cuneiform and Hieroglyphic for correspondence abroad. On seals and mace-heads they used their own hieroglyphics, together with the cuneiform. These emblems, which occur on archaic monuments at Hamath, Carchemish and Aleppo in Syria, as well as very frequently in Cappadocia and Pontus, and less frequently as far W. as Ionia, and on the E. at Babylon, are now proved to be of Hittite origin, since the discovery of the seal of Arnunta already noticed. The suggestion that they were Hittite was first made by the late Dr. W. Wright (British and Foreign Evangelical Review, 1874). About 100 such monuments are now known, including seals from Nineveh and Cappadocia, and Hittite gold ornaments in the Ashmolean Museum; and there can be little doubt that, in cases where the texts accompany figures of the gods, they are of a votive character.

The script is quite distinctive, though many of the emblems are similar to those used by the Akkadians. There are some 170 signs

The interpretation of these texts is still a controversial question, but the most valuable suggestion toward their understanding is that made by the late Canon Isaac Taylor (see The Alphabet, 1883). A syllabary which was afterward used by the Inscription and Mutilated Figure from Jerabis.

Greeks in Cyprus, and which is found extensively spread in Asia Minor, Egypt, Pal, Crete, and even on later coins in Spain, was recognized by Dr. Taylor as being derived from the Hittite signs. It was deciphered by George Smith from a Cypriote-Phoenician bilingual, and appears to give the sounds applying to some 60 signs. These

3. Interpretation of Monuments—sounds are confirmed by the short bitation of linguals as yet known, and they appear in some cases at least to be very clearly the monosyllabic words which apply in Akkadian to similar emblems. We have thus the bases of a comparative study, by aid of a known language and script—a method similar to that which enabled Sir H. Rawlinson to recover scientifically the lost cuneiform, or Champollion to decipher Egypt hieroglyphics. See also ARCHAEOLOGY OF ASIA MINOR; RECENT EXPLORATION.

LITERATURE.—The Egypt notices will be found in Brugsch's A History of Egypt under the Pharaohs, 1879, and the Assyri in Schrader's Cuneiform Inscriptions and the OT, ET, 1885. The discoveries of Chantre are published in his Mission en Cappadoce, 1898, and those of Dr. H. Winckler in the Mitteilungen der deutschen Orient-Gesellschaft, no. 35, December, 1907. The researches of Humann and Puchstein, Reisen in Kleinasien und Nordsyrien, 1890, are also valuable for this question; as is also Dr. Robert Koldewey's discovery of a Hittite monument at Babylon (Die hettische Inschrift, 1900). The recent discovery of sculpture at a site N. of Samala by Professor Garstang is published in the Annals of Archaeology, I, no. 4, 1908, by the University of Liverpool. These sculptures are supposed to date about 800 BC, but no accompanying inscriptions have as yet been found. The views of the present writer are detailed in his Tell Amarna Tablets, 2d ed, 1894, and in The Hittites and Their Languages, 1898. Dr. Sayce has given an account of his researches in a small volume, The Hittites, 1888, but many discoveries by Sir C. Wilson, Mr. D. G. Hogarth, Sir W. Ramsay, and other explorers have since been published, and are scattered in various periodicals not easily accessible. The suggestions of Drs. Jensen, Hommel, and Peiser, in Germany, of comparison with Armenian, Georgian and Turkish, have not as yet produced any agreement; nor have those of Dr. Sayce, who looks to Vannic or to Gr; and further light on Hittite decipherment is still awaited. See, further, Professor Garstang's Land of the Hittites, 1910.

HIVITE, hī'vīt (חִיטִי, hiwīṭi; Ευαίτος, Heuaios): A son of Canaan (Gen 10 17), i.e. an inhabitant of the land of Canaan along with the

1. Name—Canaanite and other tribes (Ex 3 17, etc.). In the list of Canaanite peoples given in Gen 15 19-21, the Hivites are omitted in the Heb text, though inserted in LXX and S. Gesenius suggests that the name is descriptive, meaning "villagers." The difficulty of explaining it is increased by the fact that it has been confused with "Horite" in some passages of the Heb text. In Josh 9 7 the LXX reads "Horite" as also does Cod. A in Gen 34 2, and in Gen 36 2 a comparison with vs 24.25 shows that "Horite" must be substituted for "Hivite."

In Jgs 3 3 the Hittites are described as dwelling "in Mount Lebanon, from Mount Baal-hermon unto the entrance of Hamath," and in accordance with this the Hivite is described

2. Geographical Situation—in Josh 11 3 as being "under Hermon in the land of Mizpeh," and in 2 S 24 7 they are mentioned immediately after "the stronghold of Tyre." Hence the LXX (Cod. A) reading must be right in Gen 34 2 and Josh 9 7, which makes the inhabitants of Shechem and Gibeon Horites instead of Hivites; indeed, in Gen 48 22 the people of Shechem are called Amorite, though this was a general name for the population of Canaan in the patriarchal period. No name resembling Hivite has yet been found in the Egypt or Bab inscriptions. A. H. SAYCE

HIZKI, hiz'ki (חִזְקִי, hizkī; LXX 'Αζακί, Azaki; AV Hezeki): A son of Elpaal, a descendant of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 17).

HIZKIAH, hiz-ki'a (חִזְקִיָּה, hizkiyāh; LXX Ἐζεκία, Ezekia, "strength of Jeh"):

(1) A son of Neariah, a descendant of David (1 Ch 3 23, AV "Hezekiah").

(2) An ancestor of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph 1 1). In RV this word is here tr<sup>d</sup> "Hezekiah." This name again appears in Neh 10 17 [Heb 18] in the form of "Hizkijah" in AV, but as "Hezekiah" in RV. See HEZEKIAH.

HOAR, hōr, HOARY, hōr'i. See COLOR (8); HAIR.

HOAR-FROST, hōr'frost, HOARY. See FROST.

HOBAB, hō'bab (חֻבַּב, hōbhābh, "beloved"; LXX Ὀβάβ, Obāb): This name occurs only twice (Nu 10 29; Jgs 4 11). It is not certain whether it denotes the father-in-law or the brother-in-law of Moses. The direct statement of Nu 10 29 is that Hobab was "the son of Reuel" (AV "Raguel"). This is probably the correct view and finds support in Ex 18 27, which tells us that some time before the departure of the Israelites from Sinai, Jethro had departed and returned to his own land. The statement of Jgs 4 11 is ambiguous, and therefore does not help us out of the difficulty, but is rather itself to be interpreted in the light of the earlier statement in Nu 10 29.

Mohammedan traditions favor the view that Hobab was only another name for Jethro. But this has little weight against the statements of Scripture. However, whether father-in-law or brother-in-law to Moses, the service he rendered to the leader of the hosts of Israel was most valuable and beautiful. Hobab was an experienced sheikh of the desert whose counsel and companionship Moses desired in the unfamiliar regions through which he was to journey. His knowledge of the wilderness and of its possible dangers would enable him to be to the Israelites "instead of eyes."

The facts recorded of this man are too meager to enable us to answer all the questions that arise concerning him. A difficulty that remains unsolved is the fact that in Jgs 1 16 and 4 11 he is described as a Kenite, while in Ex 3 1 and 18 1, the father-in-law of Moses is spoken of as "the priest of Midian."

HOBAB, hō'ba (חֻבַּב, hōbhāh): A place "on the left hand," i.e. to the N. of "Damascus," to which Abraham pursued the defeated army of Chedorlaomer (Gen 14 15). It is probably identical with the modern Hoba, about 60 miles N.W. of Damascus.

HOBABIAH, hō-bā'ya (חֻבַּבְיָה, hōbhāyāh, "whom Jeh hides," i.e. "protects"): The head of a priestly family that returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel. Because they could not trace their genealogy, they were not permitted to serve in the priestly office (Neh 7 63 f). In the K<sup>r</sup>e of this passage and in the || list of Ezr 2 61, this name appears in the form "Habaiah" (חַבַּיָּה, hābhayyāh). "Obdia" is the form of the word in 1 Esd 5 38.

HOCK (חֶקֶר, 'ākar, "to root out"): To hamstring, i.e. to render useless by cutting the tendons of the hock (in AV and ERV "hough"). "In their self-will they hocked an ox" (Gen 49 6, AV "dugged down a wall"), in their destructiveness maiming those which they could not carry off. See also Josh 11 6.9; 2 S 8 4.

HOD, hod (הוֹד, hōdh, "majesty," "splendor"; LXX A, Ὥδ, Hōd; B, Ὠά, Ōā): One of the sons of Zophah, a descendant of Asher (1 Ch 7 37).

HODABIAH, hō-dā'ya. See HODABIAH.

HODAVIAH, hod-a-vi'a (הוֹדָוִיָּה, hōdhawyāh, or הוֹדָוִיָּה, hōdhawyāhū; LXX A, Ὡδοῦα, Hōdoula):

(1) One of the heads of the half-tribe of Manasseh on the E. of the Jordan (1 Ch 5 24).

(2) A Benjamite, the son of Hassenuah (1 Ch 9 7).

(3) A Levite, who seems to have been the head of an important family in that tribe (Ezr 2 40). In Neh 7 43 the name is Hodevah (הוֹדְוָה, hōdh-wāh; קִרְיָה הוֹדְוָה, hōdh-yāh). Cf Ezr 3 9.

(4) A son of Elioenai, and a descendant of David (1 Ch 3 24; הוֹדְוָה, hōdhaywāhū; קִרְיָה הוֹדְוָה, hōdhawyāhū, AV "Hodaiah").

HODESH, hō'desh (חֹדֶשׁ, hōdesh, "new moon"): One of the wives of Shaharaim, a Benjamite (1 Ch 8 9).

HODEVAH, hō-dē'va, hō'dē-va (הוֹדְוָה, hōdh-wāh, הוֹדְוָה, hōdh-yāh, "splendor of Jeh"): A Levite and founder of a Levite family, seventy-four of whom returned from exile with Zerubbabel, 538 BC (Neh 7 43). ARVm gives as another reading "Hodeiah." In Ezr 2 40 he is called Hodaviah, of which Hodevah and Hodeiah are slight textual corruptions, and in Ezr 3 9 Judah, a name practically synonymous.

HODIAH, hō-dī'a, HODIAH, hō-dī'ja (הוֹדִיָּה, hōdhiyāh, "splendor of Jeh"):

(1) A brother-in-law of Naham (1 Ch 4 19), and possibly for that reason reckoned a member of the tribe of Judah. AV tr "his wife" is wrong.

(2) One of the Levites who explained to the people the Law as read by Ezra (Neh 8 7) and led their prayers (Neh 9 5). He is doubtless one of the two Levites of this name who sealed the covenant of Nehemiah (Neh 10 10, 13).

(3) One of the chiefs of the people who sealed the covenant of Nehemiah (Neh 10 18).

J. GRAY MCALLISTER

HOGLAH, hog'la (הֹגְלָה, hoghlāh, "partridge"): The third of five daughters of Zelophehad of the tribe of Manasseh (Nu 26 33). Z. leaving no male heir, it was made a statute that the inheritance in such cases should pass to the daughters, if such there were, as joint heirs, on condition, however, of marriage within the tribe (Nu 27 1-11; 36 1-12; Josh 17 3 f.).

HOHAM, hō'ham (הוֹהָם, hōhām, "whom Jeh impels[?]" Ges): An Amorite king of Hebron and one of the five kings of the Amorites who leagued for war on Gibeon because of its treaty of peace with Joshua. The five were defeated in the decisive battle of Beth-horon, shut up in the cave at Mak-kedah in which they had taken refuge, and after the battle were slain, hanged and cast into the cave (Josh 10 1-27).

HOISE, hoiz: The older form of "hoist" (OE hoise), to raise, to lift, and is the tr of epairō, "to lift up": "they . . . hoised up the mainsail to the wind" (Acts 27 40). RV "and hoisting up the foresail to the wind"; Wiclif has "lefte up," Tindale "hoysed up."

HOLD, hōld: In ARV frequently "stronghold" (Jgs 9 49; 1 S 22 4; 24 22; 2 S 5 17; 23 14; 1 Ch 11 16; 12 16). See FORTIFICATION. In Rev 18 2 for AV "cage" (phulakē) RV substitutes, as in first clause, "hold," and in m "prison."

HOLDING, hōl'ding: Occurs with various shades of meaning: (1) as the tr of tāmakh, "to acquire," it has the sense of taking, obtaining (Isa 33 15, RV "that shaketh his hands from taking a bribe," ERV, as AV, "holding"); (2) of kūl, "to hold," "contain," having the sense of containing or restraining (Jer 6 11, "I am weary with holding in"); (3) of kratēō, "to receive," "observe," "maintain" (Mk 7 3, "holding the tradition of the elders"; 1 Tim 1 19, échō, "holding faith and a good conscience"; 3 9, "holding the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience"); (4) holding fast, cleaving to, kratēō (Col 2 19, "not holding the head," RV "holding fast"; cf Acts 3 11; Rev 7 1, "holding the four winds of the earth, that no wind should blow"); antēchomai, "to hold over against one's self," "to hold fast" (Tit 1 9, RV "holding to the faithful word"); (5) holding forth, epéchō, "to hold upon, to hold out toward" (Phil 2 16, "holding forth the word of life," so RV); Lightfoot has "holding out" (as offering); others, however, render "holding fast," persevering in the Christian faith and life—connecting with being "blameless and harmless" in ver 15.     - (2) As Bound to the Pursuit of an Ethical Ideal

I. In the OT Meaning of the Term.—There has been much discussion as to the original meaning of the Sem root KDSH, by which the notion of holiness is expressed in the OT. Some would connect it with an Assyrian word denoting purity, clearness; most modern scholars incline to the view that the primary idea is that of cutting off or separation. Etymology gives no sure verdict on the point, but the idea of separation lends itself best to the various senses in which the word "holiness" is employed. In primitive Sem usage "holiness" seems to have expressed nothing more than that ceremonial separation of an object from common use which the modern study of savage religions has rendered familiar under the name of taboo (W. R. Smith, Religion of the Semites, Lect iv). But within the Bib. sphere, with which alone we are immediately concerned, holiness attaches itself first of all, not to visible objects, but to the invisible Jeh, and to places, seasons, things and human beings only in so far as they are associated with Him. And while the idea of ceremonial holiness runs through the OT, the ethical significance which Christianity attributes to the term is never wholly absent, and gradually rises in the course of the revelation into more emphatic prominence.

As applied to God the notion of holiness is used in the OT in two distinct senses: (1) First in the more general sense of separation from all that is human and earthly. It thus

1. The Holiness of God denotes the absoluteness, majesty, and awfulness of the Creator in His distinction from the creature. In this use of the word, "holiness" is little more than an equivalent general term for "Godhead," and the adj. "holy" is almost synonymous with "Divine" (cf Dnl 4 8, 9, 18; 5 11). Jeh's "holy arm" (Isa 62 10; Ps 98 1) is His Divine arm, and His "holy name" (Lev 20 3, etc) is His Divine name. When Hannah sings "There is none holy as Jeh" (1 S 2 2), the rest of the verse suggests that she is referring, not to His ethical holiness, but simply to His supreme Divinity.

(2) But, in the next place, holiness of character in the distinct ethical sense is ascribed to God. The injunction, "Be ye holy; for I am holy" (Lev 11 44; 19 2), plainly implies an ethical conception. Men cannot resemble God in His incommunicable attributes. They can reflect His likeness only along the lines of those moral qualities of righteousness and love in which true holiness consists. In the Psalms and Prophets the Divine holiness becomes, above all, an ethical reality convicting men of sin (Isa 6 3.5) and demanding of those who would stand in His presence clean hands and a pure heart (Ps 24 3 f).

From the holiness of God is derived that ceremonial holiness of things which is characteristic of the OT religion. Whatever is con-

2. Holiness nected with the worship of the holy of Place, Jeh is itself holy. Nothing is holy in Time and itself, but anything becomes holy by Object its consecration to Him. A place where He manifests His presence is holy ground (Ex 3 5). The tabernacle or temple in which His glory is revealed is a holy building (Ex 28 29; 2 Ch 35 5); and all its sacrifices (Ex 29 33), ceremonial materials (30 25; Nu 5 17) and utensils (1 K 8 4) are also holy. The Sabbath is holy because it is the Sabbath of the Lord (Ex 20 8-11). "Holiness, in short, expresses a relation, which consists negatively in separation from common use, and positively in dedication to the service of Jeh" (Skinner in HDB, II, 395).

The holiness of men is of two kinds: (1) A ceremonial holiness, corresponding to that of impersonal objects and depending upon their relation to the outward service of Jeh.

3. Holiness of Men Priests and Levites are holy because they have been "hallowed" or "sanctified" by acts of consecration (Ex 29 1; Lev 8 12.30). The Nazirite is holy because he has separated himself unto the Lord (Nu 6 5). Above all, Israel, notwithstanding all its sins and shortcomings, is holy, as a nation separated from other nations for Divine purposes and uses (Ex 19 6, etc; cf Lev 20 24). (2) But out of this merely ceremonial holiness there emerges a higher holiness that is spiritual and ethical. For unlike other creatures man was made in the image of God and capable of reflecting the Divine likeness. And as God reveals Himself as ethically holy, He calls man to a holiness resembling His own (Lev 19 2). In the so-called "Law of Holiness" (Lev 17-26), God's demand for moral holiness is made clear; and yet the moral contents of the Law are still intermingled with ceremonial elements (17 10 ff; 19 19; 21 1 ff). In psalm and prophecy, however, a purely ethical conception comes into view—the conception of a human holiness which rests upon righteousness and truth (Ps 15 1 f) and the possession of a contrite and humble spirit (Isa 57 15). This corresponds to the knowledge of a God who, being Himself ethically holy, esteems justice, mercy and lowly piety more highly than sacrifice (Hos 6 6; Mic 6 6-8).

II. In the NT: The Christian Conception.—The idea of holiness is expressed here chiefly by the word hagios and its derivatives, which correspond very closely to the words of the KDSH group in Heb, and are employed to render them in the LXX. The distinctive feature of the NT idea of holiness is that the external aspect of it has almost entirely disappeared, and the ethical meaning has become supreme. The ceremonial idea still exists in contemporary Judaism, and is typically represented by the Pharisees (Mk 7 1-13; Lk 18 11 f). But Jesus proclaimed a new view of religion and morality according to which men are cleansed or defiled, not by anything outward, but by the thoughts of their hearts (Mt 15 17-20), and God is to be worshipped neither in Samaria nor Jerus, but wherever men seek Him in spirit and in truth (Jn 4 21-24).

In the NT the term "holy" is seldom applied to God, and except in quotations from the OT

(Lk 1 49; 1 Pet 1 15 f), only in the
1. Applied Johannine writings (Jn 17 11; Rev to God 4 8; 6 10). But it is constantly used of the Spirit of God (Mt 1 18; Acts
1 2; Rom 5 5, etc), who now, in contrast with OT usage, becomes specifically the Holy Spirit or Holy Ghost.

In several passages the term is
2. Applied applied to Christ (Mk 1 24; Acts 3 to Christ 14; 4 30, etc), as being the very type of ethical perfection (cf He 7 26).

In keeping with the fact that things are holy in a derivative sense through their relationship to God, the word is used of Jerus (Mt 4 5), 3. Applied the OT covenant (Lk 1 72), the to Things Scriptures (Rom 1 2), the Law (7 12), the Mount of Transfiguration (2 Pet 1 18), etc.

But it is esp. in its application to Christians that the idea of holiness meets us in the NT in a sense that is characteristic and distinctive.

4. Applied to Christians Christ's people are regularly called "saints" or holy persons, and holiness in the high ethical and spiritual meaning of the word is used to denote the appropriate quality of their life and conduct. (1) No doubt, as applied to believers, "saints" conveys in the first place the notion of a separation from the world and a consecration to God. Just as Israel under the old covenant was a chosen race, so the Christian church in succeeding to Israel's privileges becomes a holy nation (1 Pet 2 9), and the Christian individual, as one of the elect people, becomes a holy man or woman (Col 3 12). In Paul's usage all baptized persons are "saints," however far they may still be from the saintly character (cf 1 Cor 1 2.14 with 5 1 ff). (2) But though the use of the name does not imply high ethical character as a realized fact, it always assumes it as an ideal and an obligation.
It is taken for granted that the Holy Spirit has taken up His abode in the heart of every regenerate person, and that a work of positive sanctification is going on there. The NT leaves no room for the thought of a holiness divorced from those moral qualities which the holy God demands of those whom He has called to be His people. See SANCTIFICATION.

HOLLOW, hol'ō (הֶלֶק, kaph, נֶבֶל, nābhah):
"Hollow" is the tr of kaph, "hollow" (Gen 32 25.32, "the hollow of his thigh," the hip-pan or socket, over the sciatic nerve); of nābhah, "to be hollow" (Ex 27 8; 38 7; Jer 52 21); of shō'al, "hollow" (Isa 40 12, "Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand?" [in handfuls; cf 1 K 20 10; Ezk 13 19]); of makhlēsh, "a mortar," "socket of a tooth" (from its shape) (Jgs 15 19, "God clave an [RV "the"] hollow place that is in Lehi"); of sh'ka'ārārōth, prob. from kā'ar, "to sink" (Lev 14 37, "the walls of the house with hollow strakes," so ERV, ARV "hollow streaks," depressions); of kōilōtēs (Wisd 17 19, "the hollow mountains," RV "hollows of the mountains"); of kōilōma (2 Macc 1 19, "hollow place of a pit," RV

"hollow of a well"); of antrōdēs (2 5, "a hollow cave," RV "a chamber in the rock," m "Gr a cavernous chamber").

HOLM-TREE, hōm'trē:

(1) תְּרֵזֶה, tirzāh (Isa 44 14, AV "cypress"): The name, from the root meaning (cf Arab. taraza) "to be hard," implies some very hard wood. Vulg has ilex, which is Lat for holm oak, so named from its holly-like leaves (hollen in OE="holly"); this tr has now been adopted, but it is doubtful.

(2) πρίνος, prīnos, Sus ver 58. This is the ilex or holm oak. There is a play on the words prinos and prisai (lit. "saw") in vs 58 and 59 (see SUSANNA). The evergreen or holm oak is represented by two species in Pal, Quercus ilex and Q. coccifera. The leaf of both species is somewhat like a small holly leaf, is glossy green and usually spiny. The Q. ilex is insignificant, but Q. coccifera is a magnificent tree growing to a height of 40 ft. or more, and often found in Pal flourishing near sacred tombs, and itself not infrequently the object of superstitious veneration.

HOLOFERNES, hol-ō-fūr'nēz (Ὁλοφέρνης, Olophērnēs): According to the Book of Jth, chief captain of Nebuchadnezzar, king of the Assyrians (Jth 2 4), who was commissioned to make war upon the West country and to receive from the inhabitants the usual tokens of complete submission, earth and water. The object of the expedition of H, who thus became the typical persecutor of the Jews, was to compel men everywhere to worship Nebuchadnezzar. He was slain by Judith, the heroine of the book of that name, during the siege of Bethulia. There is no notice of H. except in the Book of Jth. The termination of the word would seem to indicate a Pers origin for the name. The H. of Shakespeare and Rabelais is in no way connected with the deeds of the H. of the Apoc.

HOLON, hō'lon (הֶלֶן or הִלֵּן, hēlōn):

(1) One of the towns in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15 51) assigned to the Levites (21 15). In 1 Ch 6 58 (Heb 43), it is HILEN (which sec). The site may be the important ruins of Beit 'Alam (see PEF, III, 313, 321, Sh XXI).

(2) Probably once an important town in the "plain," i.e. plateau, of Moab (Jer 48 21); the site is unknown.

HOLYDAY, hō'li-dā: This word occurs twice in AV, viz. Ps 42 4, "a multitude that kept [RV "keeping"] holyday," and Col 2 16. In the latter case it is a rendering of the Gr word ἐορτή, heortē, the ordinary term for a religious festival. RV tr "feast day." In the former instance "keeping holyday" renders הִגְדָּה, hōghēgh. The vb. means to "make a pilgrimage," or "keep a religious festival." Occasionally the idea of merrymaking prevails, as in 1 S 30 16—"eating and drinking," and enjoying themselves merrily. The Psalmist (who was perhaps an exiled priest) remembers with poignant regret how he used to lead religious processions on festival occasions.

HOLY GHOST, hō'li gōst. See HOLY SPIRIT.

HOLY GHOST (SPIRIT), SIN AGAINST THE. See BLASPHEMY; HOLY SPIRIT, III, 1, (4).

HOLY OF HOLIES, hō'liz (קֹדֶשׁ הַקְּדוֹשִׁים, kōdesh ha-kōdhāshīm, Ex 26 33, דְּבָהִר, d'bhur, 1 K 6 16, etc; in the NT, ἁγία ἁγίων, hāgia hāgiōn, He 9 3): The name given to the innermost shrine, or adytum of the sanctuary of Jeh.

The most holy place of the tabernacle in the wilderness (Ex 26 31-33) was a small cube of 10 cubits (15 ft.) every way. It was

1. In the divided from the holy place by a veil
Tabernacle which was lifted when entrance was made (see VEIL). Ceiled by curtains which bore cherubic figures embroidered in blue and purple and scarlet (26 1), it contained no furniture but the Ark of the Covenant, covered by a slab of gold called the MERCY-SEAT (q.v.), and having within it only the two stone tables of the Law (see TABERNACLE; ARK OF COVENANT). Only the high priest, and he but once a year, on the great DAY OF ATONEMENT (q.v.), was permitted to enter within the veil, clothed in penitential garments, amid a cloud of incense, and with blood of sacrifice (Lev 16; cf He 9 7).

The proportions of the most holy place in the first temple were the same as in the tabernacle, but the dimensions were doubled.

2. In the The sacred chamber was enlarged to 20
Temple of cubits (30 ft.) each way. We now
Solomon meet with the word d'bhur, "oracle"

(1 K 6 16, etc), which with the exception of Ps 28 2, belonging perhaps to the same age, is met with in Scripture only in the period of Solomon's reign. This sanctum, like its predecessor, contained but one piece of furniture—the Ark of the Covenant. It had, however, one new conspicuous feature in the two large figures of cherubim of olive wood, covered with gold, with wings stretching from wall to wall, beneath which the ark was now placed (1 K 6 23-28; 2 Ch 3 10-13; see TEMPLE).

In Ezekiel's temple plans, which in many things may have been those of the temple of Zerubbabel, the prophet gives 20 cubits as the
3. In Later length and breadth of the most holy Times place, showing that these figures were regarded as too sacred to undergo change (Ezk 41 4). There was then no Ark of the Covenant, but Jewish tradition relates that the blood of the great Day of Atonement was sprinkled on an unhewn stone that stood in its place. In Herod's temple, the dimensions of the two holy chambers remained the same—at least in length and breadth (see TEMPLE, HEROD'S). The holiest place continued empty. In the spoils of the temple depicted on the Arch of Titus there is no representation of the Ark of the Covenant; only of the furniture of the outer chamber or holy place.

In the Ep. to the He we are taught that the true holy of holies is the heaven into which Jesus

4. Figura- has now entered to appear in virtue of tive His own sacrifice in the presence of God for us (He 9 11 ff). Restriction is now removed, and the way into the holiest is made open for all His people (10 19, 20).

hē prōtē skēnē, He 9 6 f): The taber-

1. The nacle consisted of two divisions to Terms which a graduated scale of holiness is attached: "The veil shall separate unto you between the holy place and the most holy" (Ex 26 33). This distinction was never abrogated. In the Ep. to the He these divisions are called the "first" and "second" tabernacles (He 9 6 f). The term "holy place" is not indeed confined to the outer chamber of the sanctuary; in Lev 6 16, it is applied to "the court of the tent of meeting." But the other is its technical use. In Solomon's temple we have a different usage. The word hēkhāl,

"temple," is not at first applied, as after, to the whole building, but is the designation specifically of the holy place, in distinction from the d'bhār, or "oracle" (cf 1 K 6 3.5.16.17.33, etc; so in Ezk 41 1.2.4, etc). The wider usage is later (cf 2 K 11 10.11.13, etc).

The size of the holy place differed at different times. The holy place of the tabernacle was 20 cubits long by 10 broad and 10 high

2. Size of the Holy Place (30×15×15 ft.); that of Solomon's temple was twice this in length and breadth—40 by 20 cubits; but it is contended by many (Bähr, etc) that in height it was the full internal height of the building—30 cubits; the Herodian temple has the same dimensions of length and breadth, but Jos and Middoth give largely increased, though differing, numbers for the height (see TEMPLE, HEROD'S).

The contents of the holy place were from the beginning ordered to be these (Ex 25 23 ff; 30 1-10): the altar of incense, a golden

3. Contents of Holy Place candlestick (in Solomon's temple increased to ten, 1 K 7 49), and a table of showbread (likewise increased to ten, 2 Ch 4 8). For the construction, position, history and uses of these objects, see TABERNACLE; TEMPLE, and arts. under the several headings. This, as shown by Jos and by the sculptures on the Arch of Titus, continued to be the furniture of the holy place till the end.

As the outer division of the sanctuary, into which, as yet, not the people, but only their representatives in the priesthood, were admitted

4. Symbolism while yet the symbols of the people's consecrated life (prayer, light, thanksgiving) were found in it, the holy place may be said to represent the people's relation to God in the earthly life, as the holy of holies represented God's relation to the people in a perfected communion. In the Ep. to the He, the holy place is not largely dwelt on as compared with the court in which the perfect sacrifice was offered, and the holiest of all into which Christ has now entered (Christ passes "through" the tabernacle into the holiest, 9 11). It pertains, however, evidently to the earthly sphere of Christ's manifestation, even as earth is the present scene of the church's fellowship. Through earth, by the way which Christ has opened up, the believer, already in spirit, finally in fact, passes with Him into the holiest (He 10 19; cf 9 8; see Westcott, Hebrews, 233 ff).

LITERATURE

The expression Spirit, or Spirit of God, or Holy Spirit, is found in the great majority of the books of the Bible. In the OT the Heb word uniformly employed for the Spirit as referring to God's Spirit is רוּחַ, rūḥ, meaning "breath," "wind" or "breeze." The vb. form of the word is רָחַץ, rūḥ, or רָחַץ, rūḥ, used only in the Hiphil and meaning "to breathe," "to blow." A kindred vb. is רָוַח, rāwah, meaning "to breathe," "having breathing room," "to be spacious," etc. The word always used in the NT for the Spirit is the Gr neuter noun πνεῦμα, pneûma, with or without the article, and for Holy Spirit, πνεῦμα ἁγίον, pneûma hágion, or τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον, tò pneûma tò hágion. In the NT we find also the expressions, "the Spirit of God," "the Spirit of the Lord," "the Spirit of the Father," "the Spirit of Jesus," "of Christ." The word for Spirit in the Gr is from the vb. πνέω, pnéō, "to breathe," "to blow." The corresponding word in the Lat is spiritus, meaning "spirit."

1. The Teachings as to the Spirit in the OT.—

At the outset we note the significance of the term itself. From the primary meaning of the word which is "wind," as referring to Nature, arises the idea of breath in man and thence the breath, wind or Spirit of God. We have no way of tracing exactly how the minds of the Bib. writers connected the earlier literal meaning of the word with the Divine Spirit. Nearly all shades of meaning from the lowest to the highest appear in the OT, and it is not difficult to conceive how the original narrower meaning was gradually expanded into the larger and wider. The following are some of the shades of OT usage. From the notion of wind or breath, rūḥ came to signify: (1) the principle of life itself; spirit in this sense indicated the degree of vitality: "My spirit is consumed, my days are extinct" (Job 17 1; also Jgs 15 19; 1 S 30 12); (2) human feelings of various kinds, as anger (Jgs 8 3; Prov 29 11), desire (Isa 26 9), courage (Josh 2 11); (3) intelligence (Ex 28 3; Isa 29 24); (4) general disposition (Ps 34 18; 51 17; Prov 14 29; 16 18; 29 23).

No doubt the Bib. writers thought of man as made in the image of God (Gen 1 27 f), and it was easy for them to think of God as being like man. It is remarkable that their anthropomorphism did not go farther. They preserve, however, a highly spiritual conception of God as compared with that of surrounding nations. But as the human breath was an invisible part of man, and as it represented his vitality, his life and energy, it was easy to transfer the conception to God in the effort to represent His energetic and transitive action upon man and Nature. The Spirit of God, therefore, as based upon the idea of the rūḥ or breath of man, originally stood for the energy or power of God (Isa 31 3; cf A. B. Davidson, Theology of the OT, 117-18), as contrasted with the weakness of the flesh.

We consider next the Spirit of God in relation to God Himself in the OT. Here there are several points to be noted. The first is that

2. The Spirit in Relation to the God-head there is no indication of a belief that the Spirit of God was a material particle or emanation from God. The point of view of Bib. writers is nearly always practical rather than speculative. They did not philosophize about the Divine nature. Nevertheless, they retained a very clear distinction between spirit and flesh or other material forms. Again we observe in the OT both an identification of God and the Spirit of God, and also a clear distinction between them. The identification is seen in Ps 139 7 where the omnipresence of the Spirit is declared, and in Isa 63 10; Jer 31 33; Ezk 36 27. In a great number of passages, however, God and the Spirit of God are not thought of as identical, as in Gen 1 2; 6 3; Neh 9 20; Ps 51 11; 104 29f. Of course this does not mean that God and the Spirit of God were two distinct beings in the thought of OT writers, but only that the Spirit had functions of His own in distinction from God. The Spirit was God in action, particularly when the action was specific, with a view to accomplishing some particular end or purpose of God. The Spirit came upon individuals for special purposes. The Spirit was thus God immanent in man and in the world. As the angel of the Lord, or angel of the Covenant in certain passages, represents both Jeh Himself and one sent by Jeh, so in like manner the Spirit of Jeh was both Jeh within or upon man, and at the same time one sent by Jeh to man.

Do the OT teachings indicate that in the view of the writers the Spirit of Jeh was a distinct person in the Divine nature? The passage in Gen 1 26 is scarcely conclusive. The idea and importance of personality were but slowly developed in Israelitish thought. Not until some of the later prophets did it receive great emphasis, and even then scarcely in the fully developed form. The statement in Gen 1 26 may be taken as the pl. of majesty or as referring to the Divine council, and on this account is not conclusive for the Trinitarian view. Indeed, there are no OT passages which compel us to understand the complete NT doctrine of the Trinity and the distinct personality of the Spirit in the NT sense. There are, however, numerous OT passages which are in harmony with the Trinitarian conception and prepare the way for it, such as Ps 139 7; Isa 63 10; 48 16; Hag 2 5; Zec 4 6. The Spirit is grieved, vexed, etc., and in other ways is conceived of personally, but as He is God in action, God exerting power, this was the natural way for the OT writers to think of the Spirit.

The question has been raised as to how the Bib. writers were able to hold the conception of the Spirit of God without violence to their monotheism. A suggested reply is that the idea of the Spirit came gradually and indirectly from the conception of subordinate gods which prevailed among some of the surrounding nations (I. F. Wood, The Spirit of God in Bib. Literature, 30). But the best Israelitish thought developed in opposition to, rather than in analogy with, polytheism. A more natural explanation seems to be that their simple anthropomorphism led them to conceive the Spirit of God as the breath of God parallel with the conception of man's breath as being part of man and yet going forth from him.

We consider next the Spirit of God in external Nature. "And the Spirit of God moved [was brooding or hovering] upon the face

3. The Spirit in External Nature of the waters" (Gen 1 2). The figure is that of a brooding or hovering bird (cf Dt 32 11). Here the Spirit brings order and beauty out of the primeval chaos and conducts the cosmic forces toward the goal of an ordered universe. Again in Ps 104 28-30, God sends forth His Spirit, and visible things are called into being: "Thou sendest forth thy Spirit, they are created; and thou renewest the face of the ground." In Job 26 13 the beauty of the heavens is ascribed to the Spirit: "By his Spirit the heavens are garnished." In Isa 32 15 the wilderness becomes a fruitful field as the result of the outpouring of the Spirit. The Bib. writers scarcely took into their thinking the idea of second causes, certainly not in the modern scientific sense. They regarded the phenomena of Nature as the result of God's direct action through His Spirit. At every point their conception of the Spirit saved them from pantheism on the one hand and polytheism on the other.

The Spirit may next be considered in imparting natural powers both physical and intellectual. In

Gen 2 7 God originates man's personal and intellectual life by breathing Spirit of into his nostrils "the breath of life." God in Man In Nu 16 22 God is "the God of the spirits of all flesh." In Ex 28 3;

31 3; 35 31, wisdom for all kinds of workmanship is declared to be the gift of God. So also physical life is due to the presence of the Spirit of God (Job 27 3); and Elihu declares (Job 33 4) that the Spirit of God made him. See also Ezk 37 14 and 39 29. Thus man is regarded by the OT writers, in all the parts of his being, body, mind and spirit, as the direct result of the action of the Spirit of God. In Gen 6 3 the Spirit of God "strives" with or "rules" in or is "humbled" in man in the antediluvian world. Here reference is not made to the Spirit's activity over and above, but within the moral nature of man.

The greater part of the OT passages which refer to the Spirit of God deal with the subject from the point of view of the covenant relations between Jeh and Israel. And the greater portion of these, in turn, have to do with gifts and powers conferred by the Spirit for service in the ongoing of the kingdom of God. We fail to grasp the full meaning of very many statements of the OT unless we keep constantly in mind the fundamental assumption of all the OT, viz. the covenant relations between God and Israel. Extraordinary powers exhibited by Israelites of whatever kind were usually attributed to the Spirit. These are so numerous that our limits of space forbid an exhaustive presentation. The chief points we may notice.

(1) Powers conferred upon judges and warriors.—

The children of Israel cried unto Jeh and He raised up a savior for them, Othniel, the son of Kenaz: "And the Spirit of Jeh came upon him, and he judged Israel" (Jgs 3 10). So also Gideon (Jgs 6 34): "The Spirit of Jeh came upon [lit. clothed itself with] Gideon." In Jgs 11 29 "the spirit of Jeh came upon Jephthah"; and in 13 25 "the Spirit of Jeh began to move" Samson. In 14 6 "the Spirit of Jeh came mightily upon him." In 1 S 16 14 we read "the Spirit of Jeh departed from Saul, and an evil spirit from Jeh troubled him." In all this class of passages, the Spirit imparts special endowments of power without necessary reference to the moral character of the recipient. The end in view is not personal, merely to the agent, but concerns the theocratic kingdom and implies the covenant between God and Israel. In some cases the Spirit exerts physical energy in a more direct way (2 K 2 16; Ezk 2 1f; 3 12).

(2) Wisdom and skill bestowed for various purposes.—

Bezalel is filled with the Spirit of God in wisdom and in understanding to work in gold, and silver and brass, etc., in the building of the tabernacle (Ex 31 2-4; 35 31); and the Spirit of wisdom is given to others in making Aaron's garments (Ex 28 3). So also of one of the builders of Solomon's temple (1 K 7 14; 2 Ch 2 14). In these cases there seems to be a combination of the thought of natural talents and skill to which is superadded a special endowment of the Spirit. Pharaoh refers to Joseph as one in whom the Spirit of God is, as fitting him for administration and government (Gen 41 38). Joshua is qualified for leadership by the Spirit (Nu 27 18). In this and in Dt 34 9, Joshua is represented as possessing the Spirit through the laying on of the hands of Moses. This is an interesting OT parallel to the bestowment of the Spirit by laying on of hands in the NT (Acts 8 17; 19 6). Daniel is represented as having wisdom to interpret dreams through the Spirit, and afterward because of the Spirit he is exalted to a position of authority and power (Dnl 4 8; 5 11-14; 6 3). The Spirit qualifies Zerubbabel to rebuild the temple (Zec 4 6). The Spirit was given to the people for instruction and strengthening during the wilderness wanderings (Neh 9 20), and to the elders along with Moses (Nu 11 17,25). It thus appears how very widespread were the activities of the redemptive Spirit, or the Spirit in the covenant. All these forms of the Spirit's action bore in some way upon the national life of the people, and were directed in one way or another toward theocratic ends.

(3) The Spirit in OT prophecy—The most distinctive and important manifestation of the Spirit's activity in the OT was in the sphere of prophecy. In the earlier period the prophet was called seer (רֹאֶה, rō'eh), and later he was called prophet (נָבִי, nābhī). The word "prophet" (προφήτης, prophētēs) means one who speaks for God. The prophets were very early differentiated from the masses of the people into a prophetic class or order, although Abraham himself was called a prophet, as were Moses and other leaders (Gen 20 7; Dt 18 15). The prophet was esp. distinguished from others as the man who possessed the Spirit of God (Hos 9 7). The prophets ordinarily began their messages with the phrase, "thus saith Jeh," or its equivalent. But they ascribed their messages directly also to the Spirit of God (Ezk 2 2; 8 3; 11 1,24; 13 3). The case of Balaam presents some difficulties (Nu 24 2). He does not seem to have been a genuine prophet, but rather a diviner, although it is declared that the Spirit of God came upon him. Balaam serves, however, to illustrate the OT point of view. The chief interest was the national or theocratic or covenant ideal, not that of the individual. The Spirit was bestowed at times upon unworthy men for the achievement of these ends. Saul presents a similar example. The prophet was God's messenger speaking God's message by the Spirit. His message was not his own. It came directly from God, and at times overpowered the prophet with its urgency, as in the case of Jeremiah (1 4 ff).

There are quite perceptible stages in the development of the OT prophecy. In the earlier period the prophet was sometimes moved, not so much to intelligible speech, as by a sort of enthusiasm or prophetic ecstasy. In 1 S 10 we have an example of this earlier form of prophecy, where a company with musical instruments prophesied together. To what extent this form of prophetic enthusiasm was attended by warnings and exhortations, if so attended at all, we do not know. There was more in it than in the excitement of the diviners and devotees of the surrounding nations. For the Spirit of Jeh was its source.

In the later period we have prophecy in its highest forms in the OT. The differences between earlier and later prophecy are probably due in part to the conditions. The early period required action, the later required teaching. The judges on whom the Spirit came were deliverers in a turbulent age. There was not need for, nor could the people have borne, the higher ethical and spiritual truths which came in later revelations through the prophets Isaiah, Jeremiah and others. See 2 S 23 2; Ezk 2 2; 8 3; 11 24; 13 3; Mic 3 8; Hos 9 7.

A difficulty arises from statements such as the following: A lying spirit was sometimes present in the prophet (1 K 22 21 f); Jeh puts a spirit in the king of Assyria and turns him back to his destruction (Isa 37 7); because of sin, a lying prophet should serve the people (Mic 2 11); in Micaiah's vision Jeh sends a spirit to entice Ahab through lying prophets (1 K 22 19 ff); an evil spirit from Jeh comes upon Saul (1 S 16 14; 18 10; 19 9). The following considerations may be of value in explaining these passages. Jeh was the source of things generally in OT thought. Its pronounced monotheism appears in this as in so many other ways. Besides this, OT writers usually spoke phenomenally. Prophecy was a particular form of manifestation with certain outward marks and signs. Whatever presented these outward marks was called prophecy, whether the message conveyed was true or false. The standard of discrimination here was not the outward signs of the prophet, but the truth or right of the message as shown by the event. As to the evil spirit from Jeh, it may be explained in either of two ways. First, it may have referred to the evil disposition of the man upon whom God's Spirit was acting, in which case he would resist the Spirit and his own spirit would be the evil spirit. Or the "evil spirit from Jeh" may have referred, in the prophet's mind, to an actual spirit of evil which Jeh sent or permitted to enter the man. The latter is the more probable explanation, in accordance with which the prophet would conceive that Jeh's higher will was accomplished, even through the action of the evil spirit upon man's spirit. Jeh's judicial anger against transgression would, to the prophet's mind, justify the sending of an evil spirit by Jeh.

The activity of the Spirit in the OT is not limited to gifts for service. Moral and spiritual character is traced to the Spirit's operations as well. "Thy holy Spirit" (Ps 51 11); "his holy Spirit" (Isa 63 10); "thy good Spirit" (Neh 9 20); "Thy Spirit is good" (Ps 143 10) are expressions pointing to the ethical quality of the Spirit's action. "Holy" is from the vb. form (קָדַשׁ, qādash), whose root meaning is doubtful, but which probably meant "to be separated," from which it comes to mean to be exalted, and this led to the conception to be Divine. And as Jeh is morally good, the conception of "the holy [= Divine] one" came to signify the holy one in the moral sense. Thence the word was applied to the Spirit of Jeh. Jeh gives His good Spirit for instruction (Neh 9 20); the Spirit is called good because it teaches to do God's will (Ps 143 10); the Spirit gives the fear of the Lord (Isa 11 2-5); judgment and righteousness (Isa 32 15 ff); devotion to the Lord (Isa 44 3-5); hearty obedience and a new heart (Ezk 36 26 f); penitence and prayer (Zec 12 10). In Ps 51 11 there is an intense sense of guilt and sin coupled with the prayer, "Take not thy holy Spirit from me." Thus we see that the OT in numerous ways recognizes the Holy Spirit as the source of inward moral purity, although the thought is not so developed as in the NT.

In both the first and the second sections of Isa, there are distinct references to the Spirit in connection with the Messiah, although

7. The Spirit in the King who springs from the root of Messiah David in some instances, and in others as the Suffering Servant of Jeh. This is not the place to discuss the Messianic import of the latter group of passages which has given rise to much difference of opinion. As in the case of the ideal Davidic King which, in the prophet's mind, passes from the lower to the higher and Messianic conception, so, under the form of the Suffering Servant, the "remnant" of Israel becomes the basis for an ideal which transcends in the Messianic sense the original nucleus of the conception derived from the historic events in the history of Israel. The prophet rises in the employment of both conceptions to the thought of the Messiah who is the "anointed" of Jeh as endowed esp. with the power and wisdom of the Spirit. In Isa 11 1-5 a glowing picture is given of the "shoot out of the stock of Jesse." The Spirit imparts "wisdom and understanding" and endows him with manifold gifts through the exercise of which he shall bring in the kingdom of righteousness and peace. In Isa 42 1 ff, the "servant" is in like manner endowed most richly with the gifts of the Spirit by virtue of which he shall bring forth "justice to the Gentiles." In Isa 61 1 ff occur the notable words cited by Jesus in Lk 4 18 f, beginning, "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me," etc. In these passages the prophet describes elaborately and minutely the Messiah's endowment with a wide range of powers, all of which are traced to the action of God's Spirit.

In the later history of Israel, when the sufferings of the exile pressed heavily, there arose a tendency to idealize a past age as the era of the special blessing of the Spirit, coupled with a very marked optimism as to a future outpouring of the Spirit. In Hag 2 5 reference is made to the Mosaic period as the age of the Spirit, "when ye came out of Egypt, and my Spirit abode among you." In Isa 44 3 the Spirit is to be poured out on Jacob and his seed; and in Isa 59 20 a Redeemer is to come to Zion under the covenant of Jeh, and the Spirit is to abide upon the people. The passage, however, which esp. indicates the transition from OT to NT times is that in Joel 2 28.32 which is cited by Peter in Acts 2 17-21. In this prophecy the bestowal of the Spirit is extended to all classes, is attended by marvelous signs and is accompanied by the gift of salvation. Looking back from the later to the earlier period of OT history, we observe a twofold tendency of teaching in relation to the Spirit. The first is from the outward gift of the Spirit for various uses toward a deepening sense of inner need of the Spirit for moral purity, and consequent emphasis upon the ethical energy of the Spirit. The second tendency is toward a sense of the futility of the merely human or theocratic national organization in and of itself to achieve the ends of Jeh, along with a sense of the need for the Spirit of God upon the people generally, and a prediction of the universal diffusion of the Spirit.

II. The Spirit in Non-Canonical Jewish Literature.—In the Palestinian and Alexandrian literature of the Jews there are comparatively few references to the Spirit of God. The two books in which the teachings as to the Spirit are most explicit and most fully developed are of Alexandrian origin, viz. The Wisdom of Solomon and the writings of Philo.

In the OT Apocrypha and in Jos the references to the Spirit are nearly always merely echoes of a long-past age when the Spirit was active among men. In no particular is the contrast between the canonical and non-canonical literature more striking than in the teaching as to the Spirit of God.

Jos has a number of references to the Holy Spirit, but nearly always they have to do with the long-past history of Israel. He refers to 22 books of the OT which are of the utmost reliability. There are other books, but none "of like authority," because there has "not been an exact succession of prophets" (Cap. I, 8). Samuel is described as having a large place in the affairs of the kingdom because he is a prophet

1. The Spirit in Josephus

place in the affairs of the kingdom because he is a prophet

(Ant. VI, v, 6). God appears to Solomon in sleep and teaches him wisdom (ib, VIII, li); Balaam prophesies through the Spirit's power (ib, IV, v, 6); and Moses was such a prophet that his words were God's words (ib, IV, vii, 49). In Jos we have then simply a testimony to the inspiration and power of the prophets and the books written by them, in so far as we have in him teachings regarding the Spirit of God. Even here the action of the Spirit is usually implied rather than expressed.

In the pseudographic writings the Spirit of God is usually referred to as acting in the long-past history of Israel or in the future Messianic age. In the apocalyptic books, the past age of power, when the Spirit wrought mightily, becomes the ground of the hopes of the future. The past is glorified, and out of it arises the hope of a future kingdom of glory and power. Enoch says to Methuselah: "The word calls me and the Spirit is poured out upon me" (En 91 1). In 49 1-4 the Messiah has the Spirit of wisdom, understanding and might. Enoch is represented as describing his own translation. "He was carried aloft in the chariots of the Spirit" (En 70 2). In Jub 31 16 Isaac is represented as prophesying, and in 25 13 it is said of Rebekah that the "Holy Spirit descended into her mouth." Sometimes the action of the Spirit is closely connected with the moral life, although this is rare. "The Spirit of God rests" on the man of pure and loving heart (XII P, Benj. 8). In Simeon 4 it is declared that Joseph was a good man and that the Spirit of God rested on him. There appears at times a lament for the departed age of prophecy (1 Macc 9 27: 14 41). The future is depicted in glowing colors. The Spirit is to come in a future judgment (XII P, Levi 18); and the spirit of holiness shall rest upon the redeemed in Paradise (Levi 18); and in Levi 2 the spirit of insight is given, and the vision of the sinful world and its salvation follows. Generally speaking, this literature is far below that of the OT, both in moral tone and religious insight. Much of it seems childish, although at times we encounter noble passages. There is lacking in it the prevailing OT mood which is best described as prophetic, in which the writer feels constrained by the power of God's Spirit to speak or write. The OT literature thus possesses a vitality and power which accounts for the strength of its appeal to our religious consciousness.

We note in the next place a few teachings as to the Spirit of God in Wisd. Here the ethical element in character is a condition of the Spirit's indwelling. "Into a malicious soul wisdom shall not enter: nor dwell Wisdom of in the body that is subject unto sin. Solomon For the holy spirit of discipline will flee deceit, and will not abide when unrighteousness cometh in" (Wisd 1 4 f). This "holy spirit of discipline" is evidently God's Holy Spirit, for in ver 7 the writer proceeds to assert, "For the Spirit of the Lord filleth the world," and in vs 8.9 there is a return to the conception of unrighteousness as a hindrance to right speaking. In Wisd 7 7 the Spirit of Wisdom comes in response to prayer. In 7 22-30 is an elaborate and very beautiful description of wisdom: "In her is an understanding spirit, holy, one only, manifold, subtil, lively, clear, undefiled, plain, not subject to hurt, loving the thing that is good, quick, which cannot be letted, ready to do good, kind to man, steadfast, sure," etc. "She is the brightness of the everlasting light, the unspotted mirror of the power of God, and the image of his goodness," etc. No one can know God's counsel except by the Holy Spirit (9 17). The writer of Wisd was deeply possessed of the sense of the omnipresence of the Spirit of God, as seen in 1 7 and in 12 1. In the latter passage we read: "For thine incorruptible spirit is in all things."

In Philo we have what is almost wholly wanting in other Jewish literature, viz. analytic and reflective thought upon the work of the Spirit of God. The interest in Philo is primarily philosophic, and his teachings on the Spirit possess special interest on this account in contrast with Bib. and other extra-Bib. literature. In his Questions and Solutions, 27, 28, he explains the expression in Gen 8 1: "He brought a breath over the earth and the wind ceased." He argues that water is not diminished by wind, but only agitated and disturbed. Hence there must be a reference to God's Spirit or breath by which the whole universe obtains security. He has a similar discussion of the point why the word "Spirit" is not used instead of "breath" in Gen in the account of man's creation, and concludes that "to breathe into" here means to "inspire," and that God by His Spirit imparted to man mental and moral life and capacity for Divine things (Allegories, xiii). In several passages Philo discusses prophecy and the prophetic office. One of the most interesting relates to the prophetic office of Moses (Life of Moses, xxiii ff). He also describes a false prophet who claims to be "inspired and possessed by the Holy Spirit" (On Those Who Offer Sacrifice, xi). In a very notable passage, Philo describes in detail his own subjective experiences under the influence of the Holy Spirit, and his language is that of the intellectual mystic. He says that at times he found himself devoid of impulse or capacity for mental activity, when suddenly by the coming of the Spirit of God, his intellect was rendered very fruitful: "and sometimes when I have come to my work empty I have suddenly become full, ideas being, in an invisible manner, showered upon me and implanted in me from on high; so that through the influence of Divine inspiration I have become greatly excited and have known neither the place in which I was, nor those who were present, nor myself, nor what I was saying, nor what I was writing," etc (Migrations of Abraham, vii).

In Philo, as in the non-canonical literature generally, we find little metaphysical teaching as to the Spirit and His relations to the Godhead. On this point there is no material advance over the OT teaching. The agency of the Holy Spirit in shaping and maintaining the physical universe and as the source of man's capacities and powers is clearly recognized in Philo. In Philo, as in Jos, the conception of inspiration as the complete occupation and domination of the prophet's mind by the Spirit of God, even to the extent of suspending the operation of the natural powers, comes clearly into view. This is rather in contrast with, than in conformity to, the OT and NT conception of inspiration, in which the personality of the prophet remains intensely active while under the influence of the Spirit, except possibly in cases of vision and trance.

III. The Holy Spirit in the NT.—In the NT there is unusual symmetry and completeness of teaching as to the work of the Spirit of God in relation to the Messiah Himself, and to the founding of the Messianic kingdom. The simplest mode of presentation will be to trace the course of the progressive activities of the Spirit, or teachings regarding these activities, as these are presented to us in the NT literature as we now have it, so far as the nature of the subject will permit. This will, of course, disturb to some extent the chronological order in which the NT books were written, since in some cases, as in John's Gospel, a very late book contains early teachings as to the Spirit.

(1) The birth of Jesus.—In Mt 1 18 Mary is found with child "of the Holy Spirit" (ἐκ πνεύματος ἁγίου, ek pneumatōs hagiou); an angel tells Joseph that "which is conceived in her is of the Holy Spirit" (1 20), all of which is declared to be in fulfilment of the prophecy that a virgin shall bring forth a son whose name shall be called Immanuel (Isa 7 14).

In Lk 1 35 the angel says to Mary that the Holy Spirit (pneuma hagion) shall come upon her, and the power of the Most High (δύναμις ὑψίστου, dynamis hypsistōu) shall overshadow her. Here "Holy Spirit" and "power of the Most High" are || expressions meaning the same thing; in the one case emphasizing the Divine source and in the other the holiness of "the holy thing which is begotten" (1 35). In connection with the presentation of the babe in the temple, Simeon is described as one upon whom the Holy Spirit rested, to whom revelation was made through the Spirit and who came into the temple in the Spirit (Lk 2 25-28). So also Anna the prophetess speaks concerning the babe, evidently in Luke's thought, under the influence of the Holy Spirit (Lk 2 36 ff).

It is clear from the foregoing that the passages in Mt and Lk mean to set forth, first, the supernatural origin, and secondly, the sinlessness of the babe born of Mary. The act of the Holy Spirit is regarded as creative, although the words employed signify "begotten" or "born" (γεννηθέν, gennēthēn, Mt 1 20; and γεννώμενον, gennōmenon, Lk 1 35). There is no hint in the stories of the nativity concerning the pretemporal existence of Christ. This doctrine was developed later. Nor is there any suggestion of the immaculate conception or sinlessness of Mary, the mother of Our Lord. Dr. C. A. Briggs has set forth a theory of the sinlessness of Mary somewhat different from the Roman Catholic view, to the effect that the OT prophecies foretell the purification of the Davidic line, and that Mary was the culminating point in the purifying process, who thereby became sinless (Incarnation of the Lord, 230-34). This, however, is speculative and without substantial Bib. warrant. The sinlessness of Jesus was not due to the sinlessness of His mother, but to the Divine origin of His human nature, the Spirit of God.

In He 10 5 ff the writer makes reference to the sinless body of Christ as affording a perfect offering for sins. No direct reference is made to the birth of Jesus, but the origin of His body is ascribed to God (He 10 5), though not specifically to the Holy Spirit.

(2) The baptism of Jesus.—The NT records give us very little information regarding the growth of Jesus to manhood. In Lk 2 40 ff a picture is given of the boyhood, exceedingly brief, but full of significance. The "child grew, and waxed strong, filled with wisdom [m "becoming full of wisdom"]; and the grace of God was upon him." Then follows the account of the visit to the temple. Evidently in all these experiences, the boy is under the influence and guidance of the Spirit. This alone would supply an adequate explanation, although Luke does not expressly name the Spirit as the source of these particular experiences. The Spirit's action is rather assumed.

Great emphasis, however, is given to the descent of the Spirit upon Jesus at His baptism. Mt 3 16 declares that after His baptism "the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the Spirit of God descending as a dove, and coming upon him." Mk 1 10 repeats the statement in substantially equivalent terms. Lk 3 22 declares that the Spirit descended in "bodily form, as a dove" (σωματικῶ εἶδει ὡς περιστέρᾳ, somatikō eidei hōs peristerān). In Jn 1 32-33 the Baptist testifies that he saw the Spirit descending upon Jesus as a dove out of heaven, and that it abode upon Him, and, further, that this descent of the Spirit was the mark by which he was to recognize Jesus as "he that baptizeth in the Holy Spirit."

We gather from these passages that at the baptism there was a new communication of the Spirit to Jesus in great fullness, as a special anointing for His Messianic vocation. The account declares that the dovelike appearance was seen by Jesus as well as John, which is scarcely compatible with a subjective experience merely. Of course, the dove here is to be taken as a symbol, and not as an assertion that God's Spirit assumed the form of a dove actually.

Various meanings have been assigned to the symbol. One connects it with the creative power, according to a gentile usage; others with the speculative philosophy of Alexandrian Judaism, according to which the dove symbolized the Divine wisdom or reason. But the most natural explanation connects the symbolism of the dove with the brooding or hovering of the Spirit in Gen 1 3. In this new spiritual creation of humanity, as in the first physical creation, the Spirit of God is the energy through which the work is carried on. Possibly the dove, as a living organism, complete in itself, may suggest the totality and fullness of the gift of the Spirit to Jesus. At Pentecost, on the contrary, the Spirit is bestowed distributively and partially at least to individuals as such, as suggested by the cloven tongues as of fire which "sat upon each one of them" (Acts 2 3). Jn 3 34 emphasizes the fullness of the bestowal upon Jesus: "For he whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God: for he giveth not the Spirit by measure." In the witness of the Baptist the permanence of the anointing of Jesus is declared: "Upon whomsoever thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and abiding" (1 33).

It is probable that the connection of the bestowal of the Spirit with water baptism, as seen later in the Book of Acts, is traceable to the reception of the Spirit by Jesus at His own baptism. Baptism in the Spirit did not supersede water baptism.

The gift of the Spirit in fullness to Jesus at His baptism was no doubt His formal and public anointing for His Messianic work (Acts 10 38). The baptism of Jesus could not have the same significance with that of sinful men. For the symbolic cleansing from sin had no meaning for the sinless one. Yet as an act of formal public consecration it was appropriate to the Messiah. It brought to a close His private life and introduced Him to His public Messianic career. The conception of an anointing for public service was a familiar one in the OT writings and applied to the priest (Ex 28 41; 40 13; Lev 4 3 5.16; 6 20.22); to kings (1 S 9 16; 10 1; 15 1; 16 3.13); sometimes to prophets (1 K 19 16; cf Isa 61 1; Ps 2 2; 20 6). These anointings were with oil, and the oil came to be regarded as a symbol of the Spirit of God.

The anointing of Jesus with the Holy Spirit qualified Him in two particulars for His Messianic office. (a) It was the source of His own endowments of power for the endurance of temptation, for teaching, for casting out demons, and healing the sick, for His sufferings and death, for His resurrection and ascension. The question is often raised, why Jesus, the Divine one, should have needed the Holy Spirit for His Messianic vocation. The reply is that His human nature, which was real, required the Spirit's presence. Man, made in God's image, is constituted in dependence upon the Spirit of God. Apart from God's Spirit man fails of his true destiny, simply because our nature is constituted as dependent upon the indwelling Spirit of God for the performance of our true functions. Jesus as human, therefore, required the presence of God's Spirit, notwithstanding His Divine-human consciousness. (b) The Holy Spirit's coming upon Jesus in fullness also qualified Him to bestow the Holy Spirit upon His disciples. John the Baptist esp. predicts that it is He who shall baptize in the Holy Spirit (Mt 3 11; Mk 1 8; Lk 3 16; see also Jn 20 22; Acts 1 5). It was esp. true of the king that He was anointed for His office, and the term Messiah (מָשִׁיחַ, māshîḥ, equivalent to the Gr ὁ Χριστός, ho Christós), meaning the Anointed One, points to this fact.

(3) The temptation of Jesus.—The facts as to the temptation are as follows: In Mt 4 1 we are told that Jesus was led by the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil. Mk 1 12 declares in his graphic way that after the baptism "straightway the Spirit driveth [ἐκβάλλει, ekbállēi] him forth into the wilderness." Lk 4 1 more fully declares that Jesus was "full of the Holy Spirit," and that He was "led in the Spirit in the wilderness during 40 days." The impression which the narratives of the temptation give is of energetic spiritual conflict. As the Messiah confronted His life task He was subject to the ordinary conditions of other men in an evil world. Not by sheer divinity and acting from without as God, but as human also and a part of the world, He must overcome, so that while He was sinless, it was nevertheless true that the righteousness of Jesus was also an achieved righteousness. The temptations were no doubt such as were peculiar to His Messianic vocation, the misuse of power, the presumption of faith and the appeal of temporal splendor. To these He opposes the restraint of power, the poise of faith and the conception of a kingdom wholly spiritual in its origin, means and ends. Jesus is hurled, as it were, by the Spirit into this terrific conflict with the powers of evil, and His conquest, like the temptations themselves, was not final, but typical and representative. It is a mistake to suppose that the temptations of Jesus ended at the close of the forty days. Later in His ministry, He refers to the disciples as those who had been with Him in His temptations (Lk 22 28). The temptations continued throughout His life, though, of course, the wilderness temptations were the severest test of all, and the victory there contained in principle and by anticipation later victories. Comment has been made upon the absence of reference to the Holy Spirit's influence upon Jesus in certain remarkable experiences, which in the case of others would ordinarily have been traced directly to the Spirit, as in Lk 11 14 ff, etc (cf art. by James Denney in DCG, I, 732, 734). Is it not true, however, that the point of view of the writers of the Gospels is that Jesus is always under the power of the Spirit? At His baptism, in the temptation, and at the beginning of His public ministry (Lk 4 14) very special stress is placed upon the fact. Thenceforward the Spirit's presence and action are assumed. From time to time, reference is made to the Spirit for special reasons, but the action of the Spirit in and through Jesus is always assumed.

(4) The public ministry of Jesus.—Here we can select only a few points to illustrate a much larger truth. The writers of the Gospels, and esp. Luke, conceived of the entire ministry of Jesus as under the power of the Holy Spirit. After declaring that Jesus was "full of the Holy Spirit" and that He was led about by the Spirit in the wilderness forty days in 4 1, he declares, in 4 14, that Jesus "returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee." This is followed in the next verse by a general summary of His activities: "And he taught in their synagogues, being glorified of all." Then, as if to complete his teaching as to the relation of the Spirit to Jesus, he narrates the visit to Nazareth and the citation by Jesus in the synagogue there of Isaiah's words beginning, "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me," with the detailed description of His Messianic activity, viz. preaching to the poor, announcement of release to the captives, recovering of sight to the blind, and to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord (Isa 61 1 f). Jesus proclaims the fulfilment of this prophecy in Himself (Lk 4 21). In Mt 12 18 ff a citation from Isa 42 1-3 is given in connection with the miraculous healing work of Jesus. It is a passage of exquisite beauty and describes the Messiah as a quiet and unobtrusive and tender minister to human needs, possessed of irresistible power and infinite patience. Thus the highest OT ideals as to the operations of the Spirit of God come to realization, esp. in the public ministry of Jesus. The comprehensive terms of the description make it incontestably clear that the NT writers thought of the entire public life of Jesus as directed by the Spirit of God. We need only to read the evangelic records in order to fill in the details.

The miracles of Jesus were wrought through the power of the Holy Spirit. Occasionally He is seized as it were by a sense of the urgency of His work in some such way as to impress beholders with the presence of a strange power working in Him. In one case men think He is beside Himself (Mk 3 21); in another they are impressed with the authoritativeness of His teaching (Mk 1 22); in another His intense devotion to His task makes Him forget bodily needs (Jn 4 31); again men think He has a demon (Jn 8 48); at one time He is seized with a rapturous joy when the 70 return from their successful evangelistic tour, and Luke declares that at that hour Jesus rejoiced in the Holy Spirit (Lk 10 21; cf Mt 11 25). This whole passage is a remarkable one, containing elements which point to the Johannine conception of Jesus, on which account Harnack is disposed to discredit it at certain points (Sayings of Jesus, 302). One of the most impressive aspects of this activity of Jesus in the Spirit is its suppressed intensity. Nowhere is there lack of self-control. Nowhere is there evidence of a coldly didactic attitude, on the one hand, or of a loose rein upon the will, on the other. Jesus is always an intensely human Master wrapped in Divine power. The miracles contrast strikingly with the miracles of the apocryphal gospels. In the latter all sorts of capricious deeds of power are ascribed to Jesus as a boy. In our Gospels, on the contrary, no miracle is wrought until after His anointing with the Spirit at baptism.

A topic of especial interest is that of blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. Jesus cast out demons by the power of God's Spirit. In Mt 12 31; Mk 3 28f; Lk 12 10, we have the declaration that blasphemy against the Holy Spirit is an unpardonable sin. Mark particularizes the offence of the accusers of Jesus by saying that they said of Jesus, "He hath an unclean spirit." The blasphemy against the Spirit seems to have been not merely rejection of Jesus and His words, which might be due to various causes. It was rather the sin of ascribing works of Divine mercy and power—works which had all the marks of their origin in the goodness of God—to a diabolic source. The charge was that He cast out devils by Beelzebub the prince of devils. We are not to suppose that the unpardonable nature of the sin against the Holy Spirit was due to anything arbitrary in God's arrangements regarding sin. The moral and spiritual attitude involved in the charge against Jesus was simply a hopeless one. It presupposed a warping or wrenching of the moral nature from the truth in such degree, a deep-seated malignity and insusceptibility to Divine influences so complete, that no moral nucleus remained on which the forgiving love of God might work. See BLASPHEMY.

(5) Death, resurrection and Pentecostal gift.—It is not possible to give here a complete outline of the activities of Jesus in the Holy Spirit. We observe one or two additional points as to the relations of the Holy Spirit to Him. In He 9 14 it is declared that Christ "through the eternal Spirit offered himself without blemish unto God," and in Rom 1 4, Paul says He was "declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead" (cf also Rom 8 11).

As already noted, John the Baptist gave as a particular designation of Jesus that it was He who should baptize with the Holy Spirit, in contrast with his own baptism in water. In Jn 20 22, after the resurrection and before the ascension, Jesus breathed on the disciples and said "Receive ye the Holy Spirit." There was probably a real communication of the Spirit in this act of Jesus in anticipation of the outpouring in fulness on the day of Pentecost. In Acts 1 2 it is declared that He gave commandment through the Holy Spirit, and in 1 5 it is predicted by Him that the disciples should "be baptized in the Holy Spirit not many days hence"; and in 1 8 it is declared, "Ye shall receive power, when the Holy Spirit is come upon you."

It is clear from the preceding that in the thought of the NT writers Jesus is completely endued with the power of the Holy Spirit. It is in large measure the OT view of the Spirit; that is to say, the operation of the Spirit in and through Jesus is chiefly with a view to His official Messianic work, the charismatic Spirit imparting power rather than the Spirit for holy living merely. Yet there is a difference between the OT and NT representations here. In the OT the agency of the Spirit is made very prominent when mighty works are performed by His power. In the Gospels the view is concentrated less upon the Spirit than upon Jesus Himself, though it is always assumed that He is acting in the power of the Spirit. In the case of Jesus also, the moral quality of His words and deeds is always assumed.

Our next topic in setting forth the NT teaching is the Holy Spirit in relation to the kingdom of God.

Quite in harmony with the plenary endowment of Jesus, the founder Spirit in the of the kingdom, with the power of the Kingdom Spirit, is the communication of the of God Spirit to the agents employed by Providence in the conduct of the affairs of the kingdom. We need, at all points, in considering the subject in the NT to keep in view the OT background. The covenant relations between God and Israel were the presupposition of all the blessings of the OT. In the NT there is not an identical but an analogous point of view. God is continuing His work among men. Indeed in a real sense He has begun a new work, but this new work is the fulfilment of the old. The new differs from the old in some very important respects, chiefly indeed in this, that now the national and theocratic life is wholly out of sight. Prophecy no longer deals with political questions. The power of the Spirit no longer anoints kings and judges for their duties. The action of the Spirit upon the cosmos now ceases to receive attention. In short, the kingdom of God is intensely spiritualized, and the relation of the Spirit to the individual or the church is nearly always that which is dealt with.

(1) Synoptic teachings.—We consider briefly the synoptic teachings as to the Holy Spirit in relation to the kingdom of God. The forerunner of Jesus goes before His face in the Spirit and power of Elijah (Lk 1 17). Of Him it had been predicted that He should be filled with the Holy Spirit from His mother's womb (Lk 1 15). The Master expressly predicts that the Holy Spirit will give the needed wisdom when the disciples are delivered up. "It is not ye that speak, but the Holy Spirit" (Mk 13 11). In Lk 12 12 it is also declared that "The Holy Spirit shall teach you in that very hour what ye ought to say." Likewise in Mt 10 20, "It is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father that speaketh in you." In Lk 11 13 is a beautiful saying: If we who are evil give good gifts to our children, how much more shall the "heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him." This is a variation from the || passage in Mt (7 11), and illustrates Luke's marked emphasis upon the operations of the Spirit. In Mt 28 19, the disciples are commanded to baptize in the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. This passage has been called in question, but there is not sufficient ground for its rejection. Hitherto there has been almost no hint directly of the personality of the Spirit or the Trinitarian implications in the teaching as to the Spirit. Here, however, we have a very suggestive hint toward a doctrine of the Spirit which attains more complete development later.

(2) In the Gospel of John there is a more elaborate presentation of the office and work of the Holy Spirit, particularly in chs 14-17. Several earlier passages, however, must be noticed. The passage on the new birth in Jn 3 5 ff we notice first. The expression, "except one be born of water and the Spirit," seems to contain a reference to baptism along with the action of the Spirit of God directly on the soul. In the light of other NT teachings, however, we are not warranted in ascribing saving efficacy to baptism here. The "birth," in so far as it relates to baptism, is symbolic simply, not actual. The outward act is the fitting symbolic accompaniment of the spiritual regeneration by the Spirit. Symbolism and spiritual fact move on || lines. The entrance into the kingdom is symbolically effected by means of baptism, just as the "new birth" takes place symbolically by the same means.

In Jn 6 51 ff we have the very difficult words attributed to Jesus concerning the eating of His flesh and the drinking of His blood. The disciples were greatly distressed by these words, and in 6 63 Jesus insists that "it is the spirit that giveth life; the flesh profiteth nothing." One's view of the meaning of this much-discussed passage will turn largely on his point of view in interpreting it. If he adopts the view that John is reading back into the record much that came later in the history, the inference will probably follow that Jesus is here referring to the Lord's Supper. If on the other hand it is held that John is seeking to reproduce substantially what was said, and to convey an impression of the actual situation, the reference to the Supper will not be inferred. Certainly the language fits the later teaching in the establishment of the Supper, although John omits a detailed account of the Supper. But Jesus was meeting a very real situation in the carnal spirit of the multitude which followed Him for the loaves and fishes. His deeply mystical words seem to have been intended to accomplish the result which followed, viz. the separation of the true from the false disciples. There is no necessary reference to the Lord's Supper specifically, therefore, in His words. Spiritual meat and drink, not carnal, are the true food of man. He Himself was that food, but only the spiritually susceptible would grasp His meaning. It is difficult to assign any sufficient reason why Jesus should have here referred to the Supper, or why John should have desired to introduce such reference into the story at this stage.

In Jn 7 37 ff we have a saying of Jesus and its interpretation by John which accords with the synoptic reference to a future baptism in the Holy Spirit to be bestowed by Jesus: "He that believeth on me, as the scripture hath said, from within him shall flow rivers of living water." John adds: "But this spake he of the Spirit, which they that believed on him were to receive: for the Spirit was not yet given; because Jesus was not yet glorified." No doubt John's Gospel is largely a reproduction of the facts and teachings of Jesus in the evangelist's own words. This passage indicates, however, that John discriminated between his own constructions of Christ's teachings and the teachings themselves, and warns us against the custom of many exegetes who broadly assume that John employed his material with slight regard for careful and correct statement, passing it through his own consciousness in such manner as to leave us his own subjective Gospel, rather than a truly historical record. The ethical implications of such a process on John's part would scarcely harmonize with his general tone and esp. the teachings of his Epp. No doubt John's Gospel contains much meaning which he could not have put into it prior to the coming of the Spirit. But what John seeks to give is the teaching of Jesus and not his own theory of Jesus.

We give next an outline of the teachings in the great chapters from 14 to 17, the farewell discourse of Jesus. In 14 16 Jesus says, "I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter" (παράκλητος, parákletos; see PARACLETE). Next Jesus describes this Comforter as one whom the world cannot receive. Disciples know Him because He abides in them. The truth of Christianity is spiritually discerned, i.e. it is discerned by the power and indwelling of the Holy Spirit. In the name of "reality," science sometimes repudiates these inner experiences as "mystical." But Christians cling to them as most real, data of experience as true and reliable as any other forms of human experience. To repudiate them would be for them to repudiate reality itself. The Father and Son shall make their abode in Christians (14 23). This is probably another form of assertion of the Spirit's presence, and not a distinct line of mystical teaching. (Cf Woods, The Spirit of God in Bib. Literature, 243.) For in ver 26 the promise of the Spirit is repeated. The Father is to send the Spirit in the name of Christ, and He is to teach the disciples all things, quickening also their memories. In the NT generally, and esp. in John's and Paul's writings, there is no sense of conflict between Father, Son and Spirit in their work in the Christian. All proceeds from the Father, through the Son, and is accomplished in the Christian by the Holy Spirit. As will appear, Christ in the believer is represented as being practically all that the Spirit does without identifying Christ with the Spirit. So far there are several notes suggesting the personality of the Holy Spirit. The designation "another Comforter," taken in connection with the description of his work, is one. The fact that He is sent or given is another. And another is seen in the specific work which the Spirit is to do. Another is the masculine pronoun employed here (ἐκεῖνος, ekeinos). In ver 26 the function of the Spirit is indicated. He is to bring to "remembrance all that I said unto you." In 15 26 this is made even more comprehensive: "He shall bear witness of me," and yet more emphatically in 16 14, "He shall glorify me: for he shall take of mine, and shall declare it unto you." The sphere of the Spirit's activity is the heart of the individual believer and of the church. His chief function is to illumine the teaching and glorify the person of Jesus. In 15 26 is the passage which has been used in support of the doctrine of the procession of the Spirit. Jesus says, "I will send" (πέμψω, pémpso), future tense, referring to the "Spirit of truth which proceedeth from the Father" (ἐκπορεύεται, ekporéuetai), present tense. The present tense here suggests timeless action and has been taken to indicate an essential relation of the Spirit to God the Father (cf Godet, Comm. on John, in loc.). The hazard of such an interpretation lies chiefly in the absence of other confirmatory Scriptures and in the possibility of another and simpler meaning of the word. However, the language is unusual, and the change of tense in the course of the sentence is suggestive. Perhaps it is one of the many instances where we must admit we do not know the precise import of the language of Scripture.

In 16 7-15 we have a very important passage. Jesus declares to the anxious disciples that it is expedient for Him to go away, because otherwise the Spirit will not come. "He, when he is come, will convict the world in respect of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment" (16 8). The term τὸ "convict" (ἐλέγξει, elégksei) involves a cognitive along with a moral process. The Spirit who deals in truth, and makes His appeal through the truth, shall convict, shall bring the mind on which He is working into a sense of self-condemnation on account of sin. The word means more than reprove, or refute, or convince. It signifies up to a certain point a moral conquest of the mind: "of sin, because they believe not on me" (16 9). Unbelief is the root sin. The revelation of God in Christ is, broadly speaking, His condemnation of all sin. The Spirit may convict of particular sins, but they will all be shown to consist essentially in the rejection of God's love and righteousness in Christ, i.e. in unbelief. "Of righteousness, because I go to the Father, and ye behold me no more" (16 10). What does this mean? Does Jesus mean that His going to the Father will be the proof of His righteousness to those who put Him to death, or that this going to the Father will be the consummating or crowning act of His righteousness which the Spirit is to carry home to the hearts of men? Or does He mean that because He goes away the Spirit will take His place in convicting men of righteousness? The latter meaning seems implied in the words, "and ye behold me no more." Probably, however, the meanings are not mutually exclusive. "Of judgment because the prince of this world hath been judged" (16 11). In His incarnation and death the prince of this world, the usurper, is conquered and cast out.

We may sum up the teachings as to the Spirit in these four chapters as follows: He is the Spirit of truth; He guides into all truth; He brings to memory Christ's teachings; He shows things to come; He glorifies Christ; He speaks not of Himself but of Christ; He, like believers, bears witness to Christ; He enables Christians to do greater works than those of Christ; He convicts the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment; He comes because Christ goes away; He is "another Comforter"; He is to abide with disciples forever.

These teachings cover a very wide range of needs. The Holy Spirit is the subject of the entire discourse. In a sense it is the counterpart of the Sermon on the Mount. There the laws of the kingdom are expounded. Here the means of realization of all the ends of that kingdom are presented. The kingdom now becomes the kingdom of the Spirit. The historical revelation of truth in the life, death, resurrection and glorification of Jesus being completed, the Spirit of truth comes in fullness. The gospel as history is now to become the gospel as experience. The Messiah as a fact is now to become the Messiah as a life through the Spirit's action. All the elements of the Spirit's action are embraced: the charismatic for mighty works; the intellectual for guidance into truth; the moral and spiritual for producing holy lives. This discourse transfers the kingdom, so to speak, from the shoulders of the Master to those of the disciples, but the latter are empowered for their tasks by the might of the indwelling and abiding Spirit. The method of the kingdom's growth and advance is clearly indicated as spiritual, conviction of sin, righteousness and judgment, and obedient and holy lives of Christ's disciples.

Before passing to the next topic, one remark should be made as to the Trinitarian suggestions of these chapters in Jn. The personality of the Spirit is clearly implied in much of the language here. It is true we have no formal teaching on the metaphysical side, no ontology in the strict sense of the word. This fact is made much of by writers who are slow to recognize the personality of the Holy Spirit in the light of the teachings of John and Paul. These writers have no difficulty, however, in asserting that the NT writers hold that God is a personal being (see I. F. Woods, The Spirit of God in Bib. Literature, 256, 268). It must be insisted, however, that in the NT, as in the OT, there is little metaphysics, little ontological teaching as to God. His personality is deduced from the same kind of sayings as those relating to the Spirit. From the ontological point of view, therefore, we should also have to reject the personality of God on the basis of the Bib. teachings. The Trinitarian formulations may not be correct at all points, but the NT warrants the Trinitarian doctrine, just as it warrants belief in the personality of God. We are not insisting on finding metaphysics in Scripture where it is absent, but we do insist upon consistency in construing the popular and practical language of Scripture as to the second and third as well as the first Person of the Trinity.

We add a few lines as to John's teachings in the Epp. and Revelation. In general they are in close harmony with the teachings in his Gospel and do not require extended treatment. The Spirit imparts assurance (1 Jn 3 24); incites to confession of Christ (4 2); bears witness to Christ (5 6 ff). In Rev 1 4 the "seven Spirits" is an expression for the completeness of the Spirit. The Spirit speaks to the churches (2 7.11; 3 6). The seer is "in the Spirit" (4 2). The Spirit joins the church in the invitation of the gospel (22 17).

(3) The Holy Spirit in the Book of Acts.—The Book of Acts contains the record of the beginning of the Dispensation of the Holy Spirit. There is at the outset the closest connection with the recorded predictions of the Holy Spirit in the Gospels. Particularly does Luke make clear the continuity of his own thought regarding the Spirit in his earlier and later writing. Jesus in the first chapter of Acts gives commandment through the Holy Spirit and predicts the reception of power as the result of the baptism in the Holy Spirit which the disciples are soon to receive.

The form of the Spirit's activities in Acts is chiefly charismatic, that is, the miraculous endowment of disciples with power or wisdom for their work in extending the Messianic kingdom. As yet the work of the Spirit within disciples as the chief sanctifying agency is not fully developed, and is later described with great fulness in Paul's writings. Some recent writers have overemphasized the contrast between the earlier and the more developed view of the Spirit with regard to the moral life. In Acts the ethical import of the Spirit's action appears at several points (see Acts 5 3.9; 7 51; 8 18 f; 13 9; 15 28). The chief interest in Acts is naturally the Spirit's agency in founding the Messianic kingdom, since here is recorded the early history of the expansion of that kingdom. The phenomenal rather than the inner moral aspects of that great movement naturally come chiefly into view. But everywhere the ethical implications are present. Gunkel is no doubt correct in the statement that Paul's conception of the Spirit as inward and moral and acting in the daily life of the Christian opens the way for the activity of the Spirit as a historical principle in subsequent ages. After all, this is the fundamental and universal import of the Spirit (see Gunkel, Die Wirkungen des heiligen Geistes, etc, 76; cf Pfeiderer, Paulinismus, 200).

We now proceed to give a brief summary of the Holy Spirit's activities as recorded in Acts, and follow this with a discussion of one or two special points. The great event is of course the outpouring or baptism of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost followed by the completion of the baptism in the Holy Spirit by the baptism of the household of Cornelius (2 1 ff; 10 17-48). Speaking with tongues, and other striking manifestations attended this baptism, as also witnessing to the gospel with power by the apostles. See BAPTISM OF THE HOLY SPIRIT. This outpouring is declared to be in fulfilment of OT prophecy, and the assertion is also made that it is the gift of the exalted Lord Jesus Christ (2 17.33). Following this baptism of the Holy Spirit the disciples are endued with miraculous power for their work. Miracles are wrought (Acts 2 43 ff), and all necessary gifts of wisdom and Divine guidance are bestowed. A frequent form of expression describing the actors in the history is, "filled with the Holy Spirit." It is applied to Peter (4 8); to disciples (4 31); to the seven deacons (6 3); to Stephen (6 5; 7 55); to Saul who becomes Paul (13 9).

The presence of the Spirit and His immediate and direct superintendence of affairs are seen in the fact that Ananias and Sapphira are represented as lying to the Holy Spirit (5 3.9); the Jews are charged by Stephen with resisting the Holy Spirit (7 51); and Simon Magus is rebuked for attempting to purchase the Spirit with money (8 18 f).

The Holy Spirit is connected with the act of baptism, but there does not seem to be any fixed order as between the two. In Acts 9 17 the Spirit comes before baptism; and after baptism in 8 17 and 19 6. In these cases the coming of the Spirit was in connection with the laying on of hands also. But in 10 44 the Holy Spirit falls upon the hearers while Peter is speaking prior to baptism and with no laying on of hands. These instances in which the order of baptism, the laying on of hands and the gift of the Spirit seem to be a matter of indifference, are a striking indication of the non-sacramentarian character of the teaching of the Book of Acts, and indeed in the NT generally. Certainly no particular efficacy seems to be attached to the laying on of hands or baptism except as symbolic representations of spiritual facts. Gunkel, in his excellent work on the Holy Spirit, claims Acts 2 38 as an instance when the Spirit is bestowed during baptism (Die Wirkungen des heiligen Geistes, etc, 7). The words of Peter, however, may refer to a reception of the Spirit subsequent to baptism, although evidently in immediate connection with it. The baptism of the Holy Spirit clearly then was not meant to supplant water baptism. Moreover, in the strict sense the baptism of the Holy Spirit was a historical event or events completed at the outset when the extension of the kingdom of God, beginning at Pentecost, began to reach out to the gentile world. See BAPTISM OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

In Acts the entire historical movement is represented by Luke as being under the direction of the Spirit. He guides Philip to the Ethiopian and then "catches away" Philip (8 29.39). He guides Peter at Joppa through the vision and then leads him to Cornelius at Caesarea (10 19 f; 11 12 f). The Spirit commands the church at Antioch to separate Saul and Barnabas for missionary work (13 2 ff). He guides the church at Jerus (15 28). He forbids the apostle to go to Asia (16 6 f). The Spirit enables Agabus to prophesy that Paul will be bound by the Jews at Jerus (21 11; cf also 20 23). The Spirit appointed the elders at Ephesus (20 28).

One or two points require notice before passing from Acts. The impression we get of the Spirit's action here very strongly suggests a Divine purpose moving on the stage of history in a large and comprehensive way. In Jesus that purpose was individualized. Here the supplementary thought of a vast historic movement is powerfully suggested. Gunkel asserts that usually the Spirit's action is not conceived by the subjects of it in terms of means (Mittel) and end (Zweck), but rather as cause (Ursache) and activity (Wirkung) (see Die Wirkungen des heiligen Geistes, etc, 20). There is an element of truth in this, but the idea of purpose is by no means confined to the historian who later recorded the Spirit's action. The actors in the spiritual drama were everywhere conscious of the great movement of which they as individuals were a part. In some passages the existence of purpose in the Spirit's action is clearly recognized, as in His restraining of Paul at certain points and in the appointment of Saul and Barnabas as missionaries. Divine purpose is indeed implied at all points, and while the particular end in view was not always clear in a given instance, the subjects of the Spirit's working were scarcely so naive in their apprehension of the matter as to think of their experiences merely as so many extraordinary phenomena caused in a particular way.

We note next the glossolalia, or speaking with tongues, recorded in Acts 2, as well as in later chapters and in Paul's Epp. The prevailing view at present is that "speaking with tongues" does not mean speaking actual intelligible words in a foreign language, but rather the utterance of meaningless sounds, as was customary among the heathen and as is sometimes witnessed today where religious life becomes highly emotional in its manifestation. To support this view the account in Acts 2 is questioned, and Paul's instructions in 1 Cor 14 are cited. Of course a man's world-view will be likely to influence his interpretation in this as in other matters. Philosophically an antisupernatural world-view makes it easy to question the glossolalia of the NT. Candid exegesis, however, rather requires the recognition of the presence in the apostolic church of a speaking in foreign tongues, even if alongside of it there existed (which is open to serious doubt) the other phenomenon mentioned above. Acts 2 3 ff is absolutely conclusive taken by itself, and no valid critical grounds have been found for rejecting the passage. 1 Cor 14 confirms this view when its most natural meaning is sought. Paul is here insisting upon the orderly conduct of worship and upon edification as the important thing. To this end he insists that they who speak with tongues pray that they may also interpret (1 Cor 14 5; ch 13). It is difficult to conceive what he means by "interpret" if the speaking with tongues was a meaningless jargon of sounds uttered under emotional excitement, and nothing more. Paul's whole exposition in this chapter implies that "tongues" may be used for edification. He ranks it below prophecy simply because without an interpreter "tongues" would not edify the hearer. Paul himself spoke with tongues more than they all (14 18). It seems scarcely in keeping with Paul's character to suppose that he refers here to a merely emotional volubility in meaningless and disconnected sounds. See TONGUES, GIFT OF.

(4) The Holy Spirit in Paul's writings.—The teachings of Paul on the Holy Spirit are so rich and abundant that space forbids an exhaustive presentation. In his writings the Bib. representations reach their climax. Mr. Wood says correctly that Paul grasped the idea of the unity of the Christian life. All the parts exist in a living whole and the Holy Spirit constitutes and maintains it (Wood, The Spirit of God in Bib. Literature, 268). In fact a careful study of Paul's teachings discloses three || lines, one relating to faith, another to Christ, and the third to the Holy Spirit. That is to say, his teachings coalesce, as it were, point by point, in reference to these three subjects. Faith is the human side of the Divine activity carried on by the Holy Spirit. Faith is therefore implied in the Spirit's action and is the result of or response to it in its various forms. But faith is primarily and essentially faith in Jesus Christ. Hence we find in Paul that Christ is represented as doing substantially everything that the Spirit does. Now we are not to see in this any conflicting conceptions as to Christ and the Spirit, but rather Paul's intense feeling of the unity of the work of Christ and the Spirit. The "law" of the Spirit's action is the revelation and glorification of Christ. In his Gospel, which came later, John, as we have seen, defined the Spirit's function in precisely these terms. Whether or not John was influenced by Paul in the matter we need not here consider.

(a) We begin with a brief reference to the connection in Paul's thought between the Spirit, and Jesus. The Holy Spirit is described as the Spirit of God's Son (Rom 8 14 ff; Gal 4 6), as the Spirit of Christ (Rom 8 9). He who confesses Jesus does so by the Holy Spirit, and no one can say that Jesus is anathema in the Holy Spirit (1 Cor 12 3). Christ is called a life-giving Spirit (15 45); and in 2 Cor 3 17 the statement appears, "Now the Lord is the Spirit." All of this shows how completely one Paul regarded the work of Christ and the Spirit, not because they were identical in the sense in which Beyschlag has contended, but because their task and aim being identical, there was no sense of discord in Paul's mind in explaining their activities in similar terms.

(b) The Spirit appears in Paul as in Acts imparting all kinds of charismatic gifts for the ends of the Messianic kingdom. He enumerates a long list of spiritual gifts which cannot receive separate treatment here, such as prophecy (1 Thess 5 19 f); tongues (1 Cor 12-14); wisdom (2 6 ff); knowledge (12 8); power to work miracles (12 9 f); discerning of spirits (12 10); interpretation of tongues (12 10); faith (12 9); boldness in Christian testimony (2 Cor 3 17 f); charismata generally (1 Thess 1 5; 4 8, etc.). See SPIRITUAL GIFTS. In addition to the above list, Paul esp. emphasizes the Spirit's action in revealing to himself and to Christians the mind of God (1 Cor 2 10-12; Eph 3 5). He speaks in words taught by the Spirit (1 Cor 2 13). He preaches in demonstration of the Spirit and of power (1 Cor 2 4; 1 Thess 1 5).

In the above manifestations of the Spirit, as enumerated in Paul's writings, we have presented in very large measure what we have already seen in Acts, but with some additions. In 1 Cor 14 and elsewhere Paul gives a new view as to the charismatic gifts which was greatly needed in view of the tendency to extravagant and intemperate indulgence in emotional excitement, due to the mighty action of God's Spirit in the Corinthian church. He insists that all things be done unto edification, that spiritual growth is the true aim of all spiritual endowments. This may be regarded as the connecting link between the earlier and later NT teaching as to the Holy Spirit, between the charismatic and moral-religious significance of the Spirit. To the latter we now direct attention.

(c) We note the Spirit in the beginnings of the Christian life. From beginning to end the Christian life is regarded by Paul as under the power of the Holy Spirit, in its inner moral and religious aspects as well as in its charismatic forms. It is a singular fact that Paul does not anywhere expressly declare that the Holy Spirit originates the Christian life. Gunkel is correct in this so far as specific and direct teaching is concerned. But Wood who asserts the contrary is also right, if regard is had to clear implications and legitimate inferences from Paul's statements (op. cit., 202). Rom 8 2 does not perhaps refer to the act of regeneration, and yet it is hard to conceive of the Christian life as thus constituted by the "law of the Spirit of life" apart from its origin through the Spirit. There are other passages which seem to imply very clearly, if they do not directly assert, that the Christian life is originated by the Holy Spirit (1 Thess 1 6; Rom 5 5; 8 9; 1 Cor 2 4; 6 11; Tit 3 5).

The Holy Spirit in the beginnings of the Christian life itself is set forth in many forms of statement. They who have the Spirit belong to Christ (Rom 8 9). We received not the Spirit of bondage but of adoption, "whereby we cry, Abba, Father" (Rom 8 15). "The Spirit himself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are children of God" (Rom 8 16). The Spirit is received by the hearing of faith (Gal 3 2). See also Rom 5 5; 8 2; 1 Cor 16 11; Gal 3 14; Eph 2 18. There are two or three expressions employed by Paul which express some particular aspect of the Spirit's work in believers. One of these is "first-fruits" (Rom 8 23, ἀπαρχή, aparchē), which means that the present possession of the Spirit by the believer is the guarantee of the full redemption which is to come, as the first-fruits were the guarantee of the full harvest. Another of these words is "earnest" (2 Cor 1 22; 5 5, ἀρραβών, arrabōn), which also means a pledge or guarantee. Paul also speaks of the "sealing" of the Christians with the Holy Spirit of promise, as in Eph 1 13 (ἐσφραγίσθητε, esphragisthēte, "ye were sealed"). This refers to the seal by which a king stamped his mark of authorization or ownership upon a document.

(d) Paul gives a great variety of expressions indicating the presence and activity of the Holy Spirit in the religious and moral life of the Christian. In fact at every point that life is under the guidance and sustaining energy of the Spirit. If we live after the flesh, we die; if after the Spirit, we live (Rom 8 6). The Spirit helps the Christian to pray (Rom 8 26 f). The kingdom of God is righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit (Rom 14 17). Christians are to abound in hope through the Holy Spirit (Rom 15 13). "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, self-control" (Gal 5 22). Christians are warned to grieve not the Holy Spirit (Eph 4 30), and are urged to take the sword of the Spirit (6 17). The flesh is contrasted with the Spirit at a number of points in Paul's writings (e.g. Rom 8 5 f; Gal 5 17 ff). The Spirit in these passages probably means either the Spirit of God or man's spirit as under the influence of the Spirit of God. Flesh is a difficult word to define, as it seems to be used in several somewhat different senses. When the flesh is represented as lusting against the Spirit, however, it seems equivalent to the "carnal mind," i.e. the mind of the sinful natural man as distinct from the mind of the spiritual man. This carnal or fleshly mind is thus described because the flesh is thought of as the sphere in which the sinful impulses in large part, though not altogether (Gal 5 19 ff), take their rise.

Paul contrasts the Spirit with the letter (2 Cor 3 6) and puts strong emphasis on the Spirit as the source of Christian liberty. As Gunkel points out, spirit and freedom with Paul are correlatives, like spirit and life. Freedom must needs come of the Spirit's presence because He is superior to all other authorities and powers (Die Wirkungen des heiligen Geistes, etc, 95). See also an excellent passage on the freedom of the Christian from statutory religious requirements in DCG, art. "Holy Spirit" by Dr. James Denney, I, 739.

(e) The Holy Spirit in the church. Toward the end of his ministry and in his later group of epp., Paul devoted much thought to the subject of the church, and one of his favorite figures was of the church as the body of Christ. The Holy Spirit is represented as animating this body, as communicating to it life, and directing all its affairs. As in the case of the individual believer, so also in the body of believers the Spirit is the sovereign energy which rules completely. By one Spirit all are baptized into one body and made to drink of one Spirit (1 Cor 12 13). All the gifts of the church, charismatic and otherwise, are from the Spirit (12 4-8-11). All spiritual gifts in the church are for edification (14 12). Prayer is to be in the Spirit (14 15). The church is to preserve the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace (Eph 4 3). Love (Col 1 8); fellowship (Phil 2 1); worship (3 3) are in the Spirit. The church is the habitation of the Spirit (Eph 2 22). The church is an epistle of Christ written by the Spirit (2 Cor 3 3). Thus the whole life of the church falls under the operation of the Holy Spirit.

(f) The Spirit also carries on His work in believers in raising the body from the dead. In Rom 8 11 Paul asserts that the present indwelling in believers of the Spirit that raised up Jesus from the dead is the guarantee of the quickening of their mortal bodies by the power of the same Spirit. See also 1 Cor 15 44f; Gal 5 5.

We have thus exhibited Paul's teachings as to the Holy Spirit in some detail in order to make clear their scope and comprehensiveness. And we have not exhausted the material supplied by his writings. It will be observed that Paul nowhere elaborates a doctrine of the Spirit, as he does in a number of instances his doctrine of the person of Christ. The references to the Spirit are in connection with other subjects usually. This, however, only serves to indicate how very fundamental the work of the Spirit was in Paul's assumptions as to the Christian life. The Spirit is the Christian life, just as Christ is that life.

The personality of the Spirit appears in Paul as in John. The benediction in 2 Cor 13 14 distinguishes clearly Father, Son and Spirit (cf also Eph 4 4). In many connections the Spirit is distinguished from the Son and Father, and the work of the Spirit is set forth in personal terms. It is true, references are often made to the Holy Spirit by Paul as if the Spirit were an impersonal influence, or at least without clearly personal attributes. This distinguishes his usage as to the Spirit from that as to Christ and God, who are always personal. It is a natural explanation of this fact if we hold that in the case of the impersonal references we have a survival of the current OT conception of the Spirit, while in those which are personal we have the developed conception as found in both Paul and John. Personal attributes are ascribed to the Spirit in so many instances, it would seem unwarranted in us to make the earlier and lower conception determinative of the later and higher.

In Paul's writings we have the crowning factor in the Bib. doctrine of the Holy Spirit. He gathers up most of the preceding elements, and adds to them his own distinctive teaching or emphasis. Some of the earlier OT elements are lacking, but all those which came earlier in the NT are found in Paul. The three points which Paul esp. brought into full expression were first, the law of edification in the use of spiritual gifts, second, the Holy Spirit in the moral life of the believer, and third, the Holy Spirit in the church. Thus Paul enables us to make an important distinction as to the work of the Spirit in founding the kingdom of God, viz. the distinction between means and ends. Charismatic gifts of the Spirit were, after all, means to ethical ends. God's kingdom is moral in its purpose, "righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit." Christianity is, according to Paul, inherently and essentially supernatural. But its permanent and abiding significance is to be found, not in extraordinary phenomena in the form of "mighty works," "wonders," "tongues" and other miracles in the ordinary sense, but in the creation of a new moral order in time and eternity. The supernatural is to become normal and "natural" in human history, therefore, in the building up of this ethical kingdom on the basis of a redemption that is in and through Jesus Christ, and wrought out in all its details by the power of the Holy Spirit.

(5) The Holy Spirit in other NT writings.—There is little to add to the NT teaching as to the Holy Spirit. Paul and John practically cover all the aspects of His work which are presented. There are a few passages, however, we may note in concluding our general survey. In He the Holy Spirit is referred to a number of times as inspiring the OT Scriptures (He 3 7; 9 8; 10 15). We have already referred to the remarkable statement in He 9 14 to the effect that the blood of Christ was offered through the eternal Spirit. In 10 29 doing "despite unto the Spirit of grace" seems to be closely akin to the sin against the Holy Spirit in the Gospels. In He 4 12 there is a very remarkable description of the "word of God" in personal terms, as having all the energy and activity of an actual personal presence of the Spirit, and recalls Paul's language in Eph 6 17. In 1 Pet we need only refer to 1 11 in which Peter declares that the "Spirit of Christ" was in the OT prophets, pointing forward to the sufferings and glories of Christ.

E. Y. MULLINS

HOMAM, hō'mam (חֹמָם, hōmām, "destruction"): A Horite descendant of Esau (1 Ch 1 39). The name appears in Gen 36 22 as "Heman."

HOME, hōm (בַּיִת, bayith, "house," מְקוֹם, mākōm, "place," אוֹהֶל, 'ohel, "tent" [Jgs 19 9], שׁוּבָה, shūbh, "to cause to turn back," תְּאוֹכֶה, tāwekh, אוֹרֶךְ, tōkh, "middle," "midst" [Dt 21 12]; οἶκος, oikos, "house," οἶκος, "household," ἐνδομέω, endōméō, "to be among one's people," οἶκος ἰδίος, oikos idios, "one's own proper [house]"): This term in Scripture does not stand for a single specific word of the original, but for a variety of phrases. Most commonly it is a tr of the Heb bayith, Gr oikos, "house," which means either the building or the persons occupying it. In Gen 43 26 "home" and "into the house" represent the same phrase, "to the house" (ha-bay'thāh). In Ruth 1 21, "hath brought me home again" means "has caused me to return." In 2 Ch 25 10

"home again" means "to their place." In Eccl 12 5 "long home," RV "everlasting home," means "eternal house." In Jn 19 27 "unto his own home" means "unto his own things" (so Jn 1 11). In 2 Cor 5 6 (and RV vs 8.9) "be at home" is a tr of endēmēō, "to be among one's own people," as opposed to ekdēmēō, "to be or live abroad."

BENJAMIN RENO DOWNER

HOME-BORN, hōm'bōrn (חֹמְבֹרֵן, 'ezrah): A native-born Heb, as contrasted with a foreigner of different blood. The same Heb word is found in Lev 16 29; 18 26 and elsewhere, but is tr'd differently. Home-born in Jer 2 14 is a tr of the phrase לִיְדֵי בֵּית, yēdīh bayīth, where it means a person free-born as contrasted with a slave.

HOMER, hō'mēr (חֹמֶר, hōmer): A dry measure containing about 11 bushels. It was equal to 10 ephas. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

HOMICIDE, hom'i-sid (רִצְחָה, rāṣṣāh): Heb has no word for killing or murder; rāṣṣāh is the word for manslayer. The Gr for murder is φόνος, phónos. Homicide was every conscious violent action against a human being with the immediate result of death. It was always to be punished by death, being considered a crime against the image of God. Killing is definitely forbidden in the sixth commandment (Gen 9 5 f; Ex 20 13; 21 12; Lev 24 17.21; Nu 35 16-21; Dt 19 11-13). The penalty of death was not inflicted when the killing was unintentional or unpremeditated (Ex 21 13; Nu 35 22-25; Josh 20 3-5; cf Mish, Makkōth, xi. 5). Cities of Refuge were founded to which the manslayer could escape from the "avenger of blood." There he had to abide till after the death of the officiating high priest. If he left the city before that event, the avenger who should kill him was free from punishment (Ex 21 13; Nu 35 10-15. 25-28.32; Dt 19 1-13; Josh 20 2 ff). See CITIES OF REFUGE. Killing a thief who broke in during the night was not accounted murder (Ex 22 2). Unintentional killing of the pregnant woman in a fray was punished according to the lex talionis, i.e. the husband of the woman killed could kill the wife of the man who committed the offence without being punished (Ex 21 22 f). This was not usually carried out, but it gave the judge a standard by which to fine the offender. If a man failed to build a battlement to his house, and anyone fell over and was killed, blood-guiltiness came upon that man's house (Dt 22 8). He who killed a thief in the daytime was guilty in the same way (Ex 22 3; cf AV). Where a body was found, but the murderer was unknown, the elders of the city nearest to the place where it was found were ordered by a prescribed ceremony to declare that they were not guilty of neglecting their duties, and were therefore innocent of the man's blood (Dt 21 1-9). Two witnesses were necessary for a conviction of murder (Nu 35 30). If a slave died under chastisement, the master was to be punished according to the principle that "he that smiteth a man, so that he dieth, shall surely be put to death" (Ex 21 20; cf Ex 21 12). According to the rabbis the master was to be killed by the sword. Since in this passage the phrase "he shall die" is not used, some have supposed that punishment by death is not indicated. If the slave punished by the master died after one or two days, the master was not liable to punishment (Ex 21 21). Because of the words, "for he is his money," the rabbis held that non-Israelitish slaves were meant. In ancient times the avenger of blood was himself to be the executioner of the murderer (Nu 35 19.21). According to Sanhedrin 9 1 the murderer was to be beheaded. Nothing is said in the law about suicide.

PAUL LEVERTOFF

HONEST, on'est, HONESTY, on'es-ti: The word "honest" in the NT in AV generally represents the adj. καλός, kalós, "good," "excellent," "honorable," and, with the exception of Lk 8 15, "honest and good heart," is changed in RV into the more correct "honorable" (Rom 12 17; 2 Cor 8 21; 13 7; Phil 4 8); in 1 Pet 2 12, into "seemly." In ARV "honestly" in He 13 18 is rendered "honorably," and in 1 Thess 4 12 (here euschēmōnōs) is rendered "becomingly." The noun "honesty" occurs but once in AV as the tr of σεμνότης, semnōtēs (1 Tim 2 2), and in RV is more appropriately rendered "gravity." JAMES ORR

HONEY, hun'i (דְּבַשׁ, dēbhash; μέλι, mēli): One familiar with life in Pal will recognize in dēbhash the Arab. dibs, which is the usual term for a sweet syrup made by boiling down the juice of grapes, raisins, carob beans, or dates. Dibs is seldom, if ever, used as a name for honey (cf Arab. asad), whereas in the OT dēbhash probably had only that meaning. The honey referred to was in most cases wild honey (Dt 32 13; Jgs 14 8.9; 1 S 14 25. 26.29.43), although the offering of honey with the first-fruits would seem to indicate that the bees were also domesticated (2 Ch 31 5). The bees constructed their honeycomb and deposited their honey in holes in the ground (1 S 14 25); under rocks or in crevices between the rocks (Dt 32 13; Ps 81 16). They do the same today. When domesticated they are kept in cylindrical basket hives which are plastered on the outside with mud. The Syrian bee is an esp. hardy type and a good honey producer. It is carried to Europe and America for breeding purposes.

In OT times, as at present, honey was rare enough to be considered a luxury (Gen 43 11; 1 K 14 3). Honey was used in baking sweets (Ex 16 31). It was forbidden to be offered with the meal offering (Lev 2 11), perhaps because it was fermentable, but was presented with the fruit offering (2 Ch 31 5). Honey was offered to David's army (2 S 17 29). It was sometimes stored in the fields (Jer 41 8). It was also exchanged as merchandise (Ezk 27 17). In NT times wild honey was an article of food among the lowly (Mt 3 4; Mk 1 6).

Figurative: "A land flowing with milk and honey" suggested a land filled with abundance of good things (Ex 3 8.17; Lev 20 24; Nu 13 27; Dt 6 3; Josh 5 6; Jer 11 5; Ezk 20 6.15). "A land of olive trees and honey" had the same meaning (Dt 8 8; 2 K 18 32), and similarly "streams of honey and butter" (Job 20 17). Honey was a standard of sweetness (Cant 4 11; Ezk 3 3; Rev 10 9.10). It typified sumptuous fare (Cant 5 1; Isa 7 15.22; Ezk 16 13.19). The ordinances of Jeh were "sweeter than honey and the droppings of the honeycomb" (Ps 19 10; 119 103). "Thou didst eat . . . honey" (Ezk 16 13) expressed Jeh's goodness to Jerusalem. JAMES A. PATCH

HONORABLE, on'ēr-a-b'l (כָּבוֹד, kābhēdh; εὐσχημον, euschēmōn): In the OT "honorable" is for the most part the tr of kābhēdh, properly, "to be heavy," "weighty" (Gen 34 19, RV "honored"; Nu 22 15; 1 S 9 6; Isa 3 5, etc); kābhōdh, "weight," "heaviness," etc, occurs in Isa 5 13; hōdh, "beauty," "majesty," "honor" (Ps 111 3, RV "honor"); ādhar, "to make honorable," "illustrious" (Isa 42 21, "magnify the law, and make it honorable," RVm "make the teaching great and glorious"); yākār, "precious" (Ps 45 9); nāsā' pānīm, "lifted up of face" (2 K 5 1; Isa 3 3; 9 15); nsū phānīm (Job 22 8, RVm "he whose person is accepted"); euschēmōn, lit. "well fashioned," is tr<sup>d</sup> Mk 15 43, AV "honorable," RV "of honorable estate"; cf Acts 13 50; 17 12; ēndoxos, "in glory," occurs 1 Cor 4 10, RV "glory"; timios, "weighty" (He 13 4, RV "had in honor"); dtimos, "without weight or honor" (1 Cor 12 23, "less honorable"); ēntimos, "in honor" (Lk 14 8), "more honorable."

RV gives for "honorable" (1 S 9 6), "held in honor"; for "Yet shall I be glorious" (Isa 49 5), "I am honorable"; "honorable" for "honest" (Rom 12 17; 2 Cor 13 7; Phil 4 8, m "reverent"); for "honestly" (He 13 18) ARV has "honorably."
In Apoc we have ēndōxōs tr<sup>d</sup> "honorable" (Tob 12 7, RV "gloriously"); ēndoxos (Jth 16 21), timios (Wisd 4 8), dōxazō (Ecclus 24 12, RV "glorified"), dōxa (29 27, RV "honor"), etc.

HOOD, hōōd (זִיפְרוֹת, zīphōth): The ladies' "hoods" of Isa 3 23 AV appear as "turbans" RV; and "mitre" of Zec 3 5 is "turban, or diadem" ERV<sup>m</sup>. The word is from the vb. zānaph, "to wrap round." It connotes a head-covering, not a permanent article of dress. See DRESS, 5; HAT.

HOOF, hōōf. See CHEW; CLOVEN.

HOOK, hōōk: (1) חֶקֶה, hakkāh, is rendered "fishhook" in Job 41 1 RV (AV "hook"). RV is correct here and should have used the same tr for the same word in Isa 19 8; Hab 1 15, instead of retaining AV's "angle." Similarly in Am 4 2, צִנְהָה, ṣinnāh, and סִרְרוֹת דִּיגְהָה, ṣirōth dūghāh, appear to be synonyms for "fishhook," although the former may mean the barb of a fisher's spear. In the NT "fishhook" occurs in Mt 17 27 (ἀγκίστρον, āgkistro). (2) The "flesh-hook" (מַזְלֶגֶה, mazlēgh, מִזְלָגְהָה, mizlāghāh) of Ex 27 3, etc., was probably a small pitchfork, with two or three tines. (3) The "pruning-hook" (מַזְמֶרֶה, mazmērāh), used in the culture of the vine (Isa 18 5), was a sickle-shaped knife, small enough to be made from the metal of a spear-point (Isa 2 4; Joel 3 10; Mic 4 3). (4) וָי, wāw, is the name given the supports of certain hangings of the tabernacle (Ex 26 32, etc.). Their form is entirely obscure. (5) חֶה, hah, is rendered "hook" in 2 K 19 28=Isa 37 29; Ezk 29 4; 38 4, and Ezk 19 4,9 RV (AV "chain"). A ring (cf Ex 35 22), put in the nose of a tamed beast and through which a rope is passed to lead him, is probably meant. (6) אֶגְמוֹן, 'agmōn, is rendered "hook" in Job 41 2 AV, but should be "a rope" of rushes or rush-fiber as in RV, or, simply, "a rush" (on which small fish are strung). (7) חֹרֶה, hōrah, is "hook" in Job 41 2 RV (AV "thorn," perhaps right) and 2 Ch 33 11 RV<sup>m</sup> (text "chains," AV "thorns"). On both vs see the comms. (8) שְׁפָתַיִם, shēphattayim, is "hooks" in Ezk 40 43 (RV<sup>m</sup> "ledges"), but the meaning of this word is completely unknown, and "hook" is a mere guess.

HOOPOE, hōōpō; -pō (דִּיכִיפָּת, dūkhīphath; ἑρως, ērōs; Lat Upupa epops): One of the peculiar and famous birds of Pal, having a curved bill and beautiful plumage. It is about the size of a thrush. Its back is a rich cinnamon color, its head golden buff with a crest of feathers of gold, banded with white and tipped with black, that gradually lengthen as they cover the head until, when folded, they lie in lines of black and white, and, when erect, each feather shows its exquisite marking. Its wings and tail are black banded with white and buff. It nests in holes and hollow trees. All ornithologists agree that it is a "nasty, filthy bird" in its feeding and breeding habits. The nest, being paid no attention by the elders, soon becomes soiled and evil smelling. The bird is mentioned only in the lists of abomination (Lev 11 19; and Dt 14 18). One reason why Moses thought it unfit for food was on account of its habits. Quite as strong a one lay in the fact that it was one of the sacred birds of Egypt. There the belief was prevalent that it could detect water and indicate where to dig a well; that it could hear secrets and cure diseases. Its head was a part of the charms used by witches. The hoopoe was believed to have wonderful medicinal powers and was called the "Doctor Bird" by the Arabs. Because it is almost the size of a hoopoe and somewhat suggestive of it in its golden plumage, the lapwing was used in the early translations of the Bible instead of hoopoe. But when it was remembered that the lapwing is a plover, its flesh and eggs esp. dainty food, that it was eaten everywhere it was known, modern commentators rightly decided that the hoopoe was the bird intended by the Mosaic law. It must be put on record, however, that where no superstition attaches to the hoopoe and where its nesting habits are unknown and its feeding propensities little understood, as it passes in migration it is killed, eaten and considered delicious, esp. by residents of Southern Europe.

HOPE, hōp: In RV the NT "hope" represents the noun ἐλπίς, elpis (52 t), and the vb. ἐλπίζω, elpizō (31 t). AV, however, renders the

1. In the noun in He 10 23 by "faith," and for OT the vb. gives "trust" in 18 cases

(apparently without much system, e.g. in Phil 2 cf vs 19 and 23; see TRUST), while in Lk 6 35 it translates ἀπελπίζω, apelpizō, by "hoping for nothing again" (RV "never despairing"). But in the OT there is no Heb word that has the exact force of "expectation of some good thing," so that in AV "hope" (noun and vb.) stands for some 15 Heb words, nearly all of which in other places are given other tr<sup>s</sup> (e.g. מִבְּחָה, mibhāh, is rendered "hope" in Jer 17, "trust" in Ps 40 4, "confidence" in Ps 65 5). RV has attempted to be more systematic and has, for the most part, kept "hope" for the noun תִּקְוָה, tikwāh, and the vb. יָחַל, yāhal, but complete consistency was not possible (e.g. Prov 10 28; 11 23; 23 18). This lack of a specific word for hope has nothing to do with any undervaluation of the virtue among the Hebrews. For the religion of the OT is of all things a religion of hope, centered in God, from whom all deliverance and blessings are confidently expected (Jer 17 17; Joel 3 16; Ps 31 24; 33 18,22; 39

7, etc). The varieties of this hope are countless (see ISRAEL, RELIGION OF; SALVATION, etc), but the form most perfected and with fundamental significance for the NT is the firm trust that at a time appointed God, in person or through His representative (see MESSIAH), will establish a kingdom of righteousness.

(1) The proclamation of this coming kingdom of God was the central element in the teaching of

2. In the NT

Jesus, and the message of its near advent (Mk 1 15, etc), with the certainty of admission to it for those who accepted His teaching (Lk 12 32, etc), is the substance of His teaching as to hope. This teaching, though, is delivered in the language of One to whom the realities of the next world and of the future are perfectly familiar; the tone is not that of prediction so much as it is that of the statement of obvious facts. In other words, "hope" to Christ is "certainty," and the word "hope" is never on His lips (Lk 6 34 and Jn 5 45 are naturally not exceptions). For the details see KINGDOM OF GOD; FAITH; FORGIVENESS, etc. And however far He may have taught that the kingdom was present in His lifetime, none the less the full consummation of that kingdom, with Himself as Messiah, was made by Him a matter of the future (see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT; PAROUSIA).

(2) Hence after the ascension the early church was left with an eschatological expectation that was primarily and almost technically the "hope" of the NT—"looking for the blessed hope and appearing of the glory of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ" (Tit 2 13), "unto a living hope . . . , unto an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, . . . reserved in heaven for you, who by the power of God are guarded through faith unto a salvation ready to be revealed in the last time" (1 Pet 1 3-5; cf Rom 5 2; 8 20-24; 2 Cor 3 12; Eph 1 18-21; Col 1 5.23.27; Tit 1 2; 3 7; 1 Jn 3 2.3). The foundations of this hope were many: (a) Primarily, of course, the promises of the OT, which were the basis of Christ's teaching. Such are often quoted at length (Acts 2 16, etc), while they underlie countless other passages. These promises are the "anchor of hope" that holds the soul fast (He 6 18-20). In part, then, the earliest Christian expectations coincided with the Jewish, and the "hope of Israel" (Acts 28 20; cf 26 6.7; Eph 2 12, and esp. Rom 11 25-32) was a common ground on which Jew and Christian might meet. Still, through the confidence of forgiveness and purification given in the atonement (He 9 14, etc), the Christian felt himself to have a "better hope" (He 7 19), which the Jew could not know. (b) Specifically Christian, however, was the pledge given in the resurrection of Christ. This sealed His Messiahship and proved His lordship (Rom 1 4; Eph 1 18-20; 1 Pet 3 21, etc), so sending forth His followers with the certainty of victory. In addition, Christ's resurrection was felt to be the first step in the general resurrection, and hence a proof that the consummation of all things had begun (1 Cor 15 23; cf Acts 23 6; 24 15; 26 6.7; 1 Thess 4 13.14, etc). (c) But more than all, devotion to Christ produced a religious experience that gave certainty to hope. "Hope putteth not to shame; because the love of God hath been shed abroad in our hearts through the Holy Spirit which was given unto us" (Rom 5 5; cf 8 16.17; 2 Cor 1 22; 5 5; Eph 1 14, etc, and see HOLY SPIRIT). Even visible miracles were wrought by the Spirit that were signs of the end (Acts 2 17) as well as of the individual's certainty of partaking in the final happiness (Acts 10 47; 19 6, etc).

(3) Yet, certain though the hope might be, it was not yet attained, and the interim was an opportunity to develop faith, "the substance of the things hoped for" (He 11 1). Indeed, hope is simply faith directed toward the future, and no sharp distinction between faith and hope is attainable. It is easy enough to see how the AV felt "confession of our faith" clearer than "confession of our hope" in He 10 23, although the rendition of elpis by "faith" was arbitrary. So in Rom 8 20-24, "hope" is scarcely more than "faith" in this specialized aspect. In particular, in ver 24 we have as the most natural tr (cf Eph 2 5.8), "By hope we were saved" (so AV, ERV, ARVm), and only a pedantic insistence on words can find in this any departure from the strictest Pauline theology (cf the essential outlook on the future of the classic example of "saving faith" in Rom 4 18-22, esp. ver 18). Still, the combination is unusual, and the Gr may be rendered equally well "For hope we were saved" ("in hope" of the ARV is not so good); i.e. our salvation, in so far as it is past, is but to prepare us for what is to come (cf Eph 4 4; 1 Pet 1 3). But this postponement of the full attainment, through developing faith, gives steadfastness (Rom 8 25; cf 1 Thess 1 3; 5 8; He 3 6; 6 11), which could be gained in no other way. On the other hand this steadfastness, produced by hope, reacts again on hope and increases it (Rom 5 4; 15 4). And so on. But no attempt is made in the NT to give a catalogue of the "fruits of hope," and, indeed, such lists are inevitably artificial.

(4) One passage that deserves special attention is 1 Cor 13 13, "Now abideth faith, hope, love, these three." "Abideth" is in contrast to "shall be done away" in vs 8.9, and the time of the abiding is consequently after the Parousia; i.e. while many gifts are for the present world only, faith, hope and love are eternal and endure in the next world. 1 Cor 13 is evidently a very carefully written section, and the permanence of faith and hope cannot be set down to any mere carelessness on St. Paul's part, but the meaning is not very clear. Probably he felt that the triad of virtues was so essentially a part of the Christian's character that the existence of the individual without them was unthinkable, without trying to define what the object of faith and hope would be in the glorified state. If any answer is to be given, it must be found in the doctrine that even in heaven life will not be static but will have opportunities of unlimited growth. Never will the finite soul be able to dispense entirely with faith, while at each stage the growth into the next can be anticipated through hope.

Only Adventist bodies can use all the NT promises literally, and the tr of the eschatological language into modern practical terms is not always easy. The simplest method is that already well developed in the Fourth Gospel, where the phrase "kingdom of God" is usually replaced by the words "eternal life," i.e. for a temporal relation between this world and the next is substituted a local, so that the accent is laid on the hope that awaits the individual beyond the grave. On the other hand, the cataclysmic imagery of the NT may be interpreted in evolutionary form. God, by sending into the world the supernatural power seen in the Christian church, is working for the race as well as for the individual, and has for His whole creation, as well as for individual souls, a goal in store. The individual has for his support the motives of the early church and, in particular, learns through the cross that even his own sins shall not disappoint him of his hope. But both of the above interpretations are needed if religion is fairly to represent the spirit of the NT. A pure individualism that looks only beyond the grave for its hope empties the phrase "kingdom of God" of its meaning and tends inevitably to ascetic-cism. And, in contrast, the religion of Jesus cannot be reduced to a mere hope of ethical advance for the present world. A Christianity that loses a transcendent, eschatological hope ceases to be Christianity.

HOPHNI, hof'ni, and PHINEHAS, fin'ē-as, -az (הֹפְנִי, hophni, "pugilist" [?], פִּינְחָס, pīn'hās, prob. "face of brass"): Sons of Eli, priests of the sanctuary at Shiloh. Their character was wicked enough to merit the double designation "sons of Eli" and (AV) "sons of Belial" (RvM "base men," 1 S 2 12). Their evil practices are described (vs 12-17). Twice is Eli warned concerning them, once by an unknown prophet (1 S 2 27 ff) and again by the lips of the young Samuel (1 S 3 11-18). The curse fell at the battle of Aphek (1 S 4 1-18) at which the brothers were slain, the ark was taken and the disaster occurred which caused Eli's death. Phinehas was father of the posthumous Ichabod, whose name marks the calamity (see ICHABOD). A remoter sequel to the prophetic warnings is seen in the deposition of Abiathar, of the house of Eli, from the priestly office (1 K 2 26, 27, 35).

HOPHRA, hof'ra. See PHARAOH-HOPHRA.

HOR, hōr, MOUNT (הָרַי, hōr hā-hār; lit. "Hor, the mountain"):

(1) A tradition identifying this mountain with Jebel Neby Hārūn may be traced from the time of Jos (Ant, IV, iv, 7) downward. Onom (s.v. "Op, Hōr") favors this identification, which has been accepted by many travelers and scholars. In HDB, while noting the fact that it has been questioned, Professor Hull devotes all the space at his disposal to a description of Jebel Neby Hārūn. It is now recognized, however, that this identification is impossible. Niebuhr (Reise nach Arab., 238), Pococke (Description of the East, I, 157), Robinson (BR, I, 185), Ewald (Hist. of Israel, II, 201, n.), and others had pointed out difficulties in the way, but the careful discussion of Dr. H. Clay Trumbull (Kadesh Barnea, 127 ff) finally disposed of the claims of Jebel Neby Hārūn.

From Nu 20 22; 33 37 we may perhaps infer that Mt. Hor, "in the edge of the land of Edom," was about a day's journey from Kadesh. The name "Hor the moun-
2. Suggest-Identification
tain" suggests a prominent feature of the landscape. Aaron was buried there (Nu 20 28; Dt 32 50). It was therefore not in Mt. Seir (Dt 2 5), of which not even a foot-breadth was given to Israel. Jebel Neby Hārūn is certainly a prominent feature of the landscape, towering over the tumbled hills that form the western edges of the Edom plateau to a height of 4,800 ft. But it is much more than a day's journey from Kadesh, while it is well within the boundary of Mt. Seir. The king of Arad was alarmed at the march to Mt. Hor. Had Israel marched toward Jebel Neby Hārūn, away to the S.E., it could have caused him no anxiety, as he dwelt in the north. This points to some eminence to the N. or N.E. of Kadesh. A hill meeting sufficiently all these conditions is Jebel Maderah (see HALAK, MOUNT), which rises to the N.E. of 'Ain kadīs (Kadesh-barnea). It stands at the extreme
3. Jebel
Maderah N.W. boundary of the land of Edom, yet not within that boundary. Above the barrenness of the surrounding plain this "large, singular-looking, isolated chalk hill" rises "alone like a lofty citadel," "steep-sided" and "quite naked." Here the solemn transactions described in Nu 20 22 ff could have been carried out lit. "in the sight of all the congregation." While certainty is impossible, no more likely suggestion has been made.

(2) A mountain named only in Nu 34 7 f as on the N. boundary of the land of Israel. No success has attended the various attempts made to identify this particular height. Some would make it Mt. Hermon (Hull, HDB, s.v.); others Jebel 'Akkār, an outrunner on the N.E. of Lebanon (Furrer, ZDPV, VIII, 27), and others the mountain at the "knee of" Nahr el-Kāsimīyeh (van Kasteren, Rev. Bib., 1895, 30 f). In Ezk 47 15 הָרֵי הָאֲדֵרֶךְ, hā-derekh, should certainly be amended to הָרֵי הָאֲדֵרֶךְ, hadrākāh, a proper name, instead of "the way." Possibly then Mt. Hor should disappear from Nu 34 7 f, and we should read, with slight emendation, "From the great sea ye shall draw a line for you as far as Hadrach, and from Hadrach . . . ." W. EWING

HORAM, hō'ram (הֹרָם, hōrām, "height"): A king of Gezer defeated by Joshua when he came to the help of Lachish, which Joshua was besieging (Josh 10 33).

HOREB, hō'reb. See SINAI.

HOREM, hō'rem (הֹרֵם, hōrēm, "consecrated"): One of the fenced cities in the territory of Naphtali (Josh 19 38), named with Iron and Migdal-el. It may possibly be identified with the modern Hūrah, which lies on a mound at the S. end of Wādī el-'Ain, to the W. of Kedes.

HORESH, hō'resh (הֹרֶשֶׁת, hōrēshēt, 1 S 23 15, 18, m only; LXX ἐν τῇ Καυτῇ, en tē Kainē, "in the New"; EV "in the wood" [בְּהֹרֶשֶׁת, ba-hōrēshēt], the particle "in" being combined with the article): Hōresh in other passages is tr<sup>d</sup> "forest" (cf 2 Ch 27 4; Isa 17 9; Ezk 31 3) and it is most probable that it should be so tr<sup>d</sup> here.

HOR-HAGGIDGAD, hōr-ha-gid'gad (הֹר הַגִּידְגָּד, hōr ha-gidhgdāh): A desert camp of the Israelites between Beeroth Bene-jaakan and Jotbathah (Nu 33 32 f). In Dt 10 7 it is called Gudgodah. See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

(1) A Horite descendant of Esau (Gen 36 22; 1 Ch 1 39).

(2) A Simeonite, father of Shaphat, one of the twelve spies (Nu 13 5).

HORITE, hō'rit, HORIM, hō'rim (הֹרִי, hōrī, הֹרִים, hōrīm; Χορραῖοι, Chorraioi): Denoted the inhabitants of Mt. Seir before its occupation by the Edomites (Dt 2 12). Seir is accordingly called Horite in Gen 36 20, 30, where a list of his descendants is given, who afterward mixed with the invading Edomites. Esau himself married the daughter of the Horite chieftain Anah (Gen 36 25; see ver 2, where "Hivite" must be corrected into "Horite"). The "Horites" in their "Mt. Seir" were among the nations defeated by the army of Chedorlaomer in the age of Abraham (Gen 14 6). The Heb Horite, however, is the Khar of the Egypt inscriptions, a name given to the whole of Southern Palestine and Edom as well as to the adjacent sea. In accordance with this we find in the OT also traces of the existence of the Horites in other parts of the country besides Mt. Seir. In Gen 34 2; Josh 9 7, the LXX (Cod. A) more correctly reads "Horite" instead of "Hivite" for the inhabitants of Shechem and Gibeon, and Caleb is said to be "the son of Hur, the first-born of Ephrathah" or Bethlehem (1 Ch 2 50; 4 4). Hor or Horite has sometimes been explained to mean "cave-dweller"; it more probably, however, denotes the "white" race. The Horites were Semites, and consequently are distinguished in Dt 2 12 from the tall race of Rephaim.

A. H. SAYCE

HORMAH, hōr'ma (חֹרְמָה, hormāh): A city first mentioned in connection with the defeat of the Israelites by the Amalekites and the Canaanites, when, after the ten spies who brought an evil report of the land had died of plague, the people persisted, against the will of Moses, in going "up unto the place which Jehovah hath promised" (Nu 14 45; Dt 1 44). After the injury done them by the king of Arad, Israel took the city, utterly destroyed it, and called it Hormah, i.e. "accursed" (Nu 21 3). To this event probably the reference is in Jgs 1 17, where Judah and Simeon are credited with the work. In Josh 12 14 it is named between Geder and Arad; in Josh 15 30 between Chesil and Ziklag, among the uttermost cities toward the border of Edom in the S.; and in Josh 19 4 between Bethul and Ziklag (cf 1 Ch 4 30). To it David sent a share of the spoil taken from the Amalekites who had raided Ziklag (1 S 30 30). The city must have lain not far from Kadesh, probably to the N.E. No name resembling Hormah has been recovered in that district. The ancient name was Zephath (Jgs 1 17). It is not unlikely that in popular use this name outlived Hormah: and in some form it may survive to this day. In that case it may be represented by the modern es-Sabailā between el-Khalāṣa in the N. and Ain Kādīs in the S., about 23 miles from the latter. If we may identify Ziklag with 'Aslūj, about 14 miles N. of es-Sabailā, the probability is heightened. Robinson (BR, III, 150) compares the name Zephath with that of Nakh es-Ṣafā, to the N. of Wādī el-Fikrah; but this appears to be too far—about 40 miles—from Kadesh. W. EWING

HORN, hōrn (Heb and Aram. קֶרֶן, keren; κέρας, kéras; for the "ram's horn" [יֹבֶהַל, yōbhēl] of Josh 6 see MUSIC, and for the "inkhorn" of Ezk 9 [קֶשֶׁת, kešet] see separate art.):

(1) Keren and keras represent the Eng. "horn" exactly, whether on the animal (Gen 22 13), or used for musical purposes (Josh 6 5; 1 Ch 25 5), or for containing a liquid (1 S 16 1.13; 1 K 1 39), but in Ezk 27 15 the "horns of ivory" are of course tusks and the "horns" of ebony are small (pointed?) logs. Consequently most of the usages require no explanation.

(2) Both the altar of burnt offering (Ex 27 2; 38 2; cf Ezk 43 15) and the incense altar (Ex 30 2; 37 25.26; cf Rev 9 13) had "horns," which are explained to be projections "of one piece with" the wooden framework and covered with the brass (or gold) that covered the altar. They formed the most sacred part of the altar and were anointed with the blood of the most solemn sacrifices (only) (Ex 30 10; Lev 4 7.18.25.30.34; 16 18; cf Ezk 43 20), and according to Lev 8 15; 9 9, the first official sacrifices began by anointing them. Consequently cutting off the horns effectually desecrated the altar (Am 3 14), while "sin graven on them" (Jer 17 1) took all efficacy from the sacrifice. On the other hand they offered the highest sanctuary (1 K 1 50.51; 2 28). Of their symbolism nothing whatever is said, and the eventual origin is quite obscure. "Remnants of a bull-cult" and "miniature sacred towers" have been suggested, but are wholly uncertain. A more likely origin is from an old custom of draping the altar with skins of sacrificed animals (RS, 436). That, however, the "horns" were mere conveniences for binding the sacrificial animals (Ps 118 27, a custom referred to nowhere else in the OT), is most unlikely. See ALTAR.

(3) The common figurative use of "horn" is taken from the image of battling animals (literal use in Dnl 8 7, etc) to denote aggressive strength. So Zedekiah ben Chenaanah illustrates the predicted defeat of the enemies by pushing with iron horns (1 K 22 11; 2 Ch 18 10), while "horns of the wild-ox" (Dt 33 17; Ps 22 21; 92 10, AV "unicorn") represent the magnitude of power, and in Zec 1 18-21 "horns" stand for power in general. In Hab 3 4 the "horns coming out of his hand" denote the potency of Jeh's gesture (RV "rays" may be smoother, but is weak). So to "exalt the horn" (1 S 2 1.10; Ps 75 4, etc) is to clothe with strength, and to "cut off the horn" (not to be explained by Am 3 14) is to rob of power (Ps 75 10; Jer 48 25). Hence the "horn of salvation" in 2 S 22 3; Ps 18 2; Lk 1 69 is a means of active defence and not a place of sanctuary as in 1 K 1 50. When, in Dnl 7 7-24; 8 3.8.9.20.21; Rev 13 1; 17 3.7.12.16, many horns are given to the same animal, they figure successive nations or rulers. But the seven horns in Rev 5 6; 12 3 denote the completeness of the malevolent or righteous power. In Rev 13 11, however, the two horns point only to the external imitation of the harmless lamb, the "horns" being mere stubs. BURTON SCOTT EASTON

HORNS OF THE ALTAR (קַרְנֵי הַמִּזְבֵּחַ, kar-nōth ha-mizbēḥ): These projections at the four corners of the altar of burnt offering

1. The Brazen Altar were of one piece with the altar, and were made of acacia wood overlaid with brass (Ex 27 2, "bronze"). In Ezekiel's altar-specifications their position is described as being on a level with the altar hearth (43 15). Fugitives seeking asylum might cling to the horns of the altar, as did Adonijah (1 K 1 50), which is one proof among many that worshippers had at all times access to the neighborhood of the altar. On certain occasions, as at the consecration of Aaron and his sons (Ex 29 12), and a sin offering for one of the people of the land (Lev 4 30), the horns were touched with sacrificial blood.

The altar of incense, standing in the outer chamber of the sanctuary, had also four horns, which were covered with gold (Ex 37 25). These were touched with blood

2. The Golden Altar in the case of a sin offering for a high priest, or for the whole congregation, if they had sinned unwittingly (Lev 4 7.18). See ALTAR; HORN.

HORNET, hōr'net (צִרְעָה, ṣir'āh; cf צָרְעָה, ṣor'āh, "Zorah" [Jgs 13 2, etc]; also cf צָרְעָה, ṣār'āth, "leprosy" [Lev 13 2, etc]; from root צָרַץ, ṣāra', "to smite"; LXX σφῆκτα, sphēktia, lit. "wasp's nest"): Hornets are mentioned only in Ex 23 28; Dt 7 20; Josh 24 12. All three references are to the miraculous interposition of God in driving out before the Israelites the original inhabitants of the promised land. There has been much speculation as to whether hornets are literally meant. The following seems to throw some light on this question (Ex 23 20.27.28): "Behold, I send an angel before thee, to keep thee by the way, and to bring thee into the place which I have prepared. . . . I will send my terror before thee, and will discomfit all the people to whom thou shalt come, and I will make all thine enemies turn their backs unto thee. And I will send the hornet before thee, which shall drive out the Hivite, the Canaanite, and the Hittite, from before thee." The "terror" of ver 27 may well be considered to be typified by the "hornet" of ver 28, the care for the Israelites (ver 20) being thrown into marked contrast with the confusion of their enemies. Cf Isa 7 18, where the fly and the bee symbolize the military forces of Egypt and Assyria: "And it shall come to pass in that day, that Jeh will hiss for the fly that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt, and for the bee that is in the land of Assyria."

Hornets and wasps belong to the family Vespidae of the order Hymenoptera. Both belong to the genus Vespa, the hornets being distinguished by their large size. Both hornets and wasps are abundant in Pal (cf Zorah, which may mean "town of hornets"). A large kind is called in Arab. debbūr, which recalls the Heb d'bhōrāh, "bee." They sting fiercely, but not unless molested.

HORONAIM, hor-ō-nā'im (הֹרֹנַיִם, hō-rōnayim; Ἀρωναίμ, Arōnaím; in Jer Ὀρωναίμ, Orōnaím, "the two hollows"): An unidentified place in the S. of Moab. It is named in Jer 48 5. Isaiah (15 5) and Jeremiah (48 3) speak of "the way to Horonaim"; and Jeremiah (48 5) of the "descent," or "going down" of Horonaim. Mesha (MS) says he was bidden by Chemosh to "go down" and fight against Horonēm. Probably, therefore, it lay on one of the roads leading down from the Moabite plateau to the Arabah. It is mentioned by Jos as having been taken by Alexander Jannaeus (Ant, XIII, xv, 4). Hyrcanus promised to restore it and the rest to Aretas (XIV, i, 4). There is no indication that in early times it was ever possessed by Israel. Buhl (GAP, 272 f) thinks it may be represented by some significant ruins near Wādy ed-Der'ā'a (Wādy Kerak). W. EWING

HORONITE, hor-ō-nīt, hō-rō-nīt (הֹרֹנִי, hō-hōronī): An appellation of Sanballat (Neh 2 10, 19; 13 28), as an inhabitant of BETH-HORON (q.v.).

HORRIBLE, hor-i-b'l (שֹׁעֲרֵרִי, sha'ārūr, שֹׁעֲרֵרִי, sha'ārūrī): In Jer 5 30 sha'ārūr, "vile," "horrible," is tr<sup>d</sup> "horrible," "a wonderful and horrible thing," RVm "astonishment and horror"; also 23 14; in 18 13; Hos 6 10 it is sha'ārūrī; in Ps 11 6 we have zūl'āphāh, "heat," RV "burning wind"; in Ps 40 2 shā'ōn, "noise," "tumult," "He brought me up . . . out of a horrible pit," RVm "a pit of tumult" (or destruction). Horribly is the tr of sā'ar, "to shudder," "to be whirled away," in Jer 2 12, and of sa'ar, "fear," "trembling," in Ezk 32 10; in Ezk 27 35 RV has "horribly afraid" (sa'ar) for "sore afraid." "Horrible" occurs frequently in Apoc (2 Esd 11 45; 15 28.34; Wisd 3 19, "For horrible [chalepós] is the end of the unrighteous generation," RV "grievous," etc).

HORROR, hor'ēr (אִמְהָה, 'emāh, פִּלְלֹה, pallā-ṣūth): In Gen 15 12 'emāh (often rendered "terror") is tr<sup>d</sup> "horror," "a horror of great darkness"; pallāṣūth, "trembling," "horror" (Ps 55 5; Ezk 7 18); zāl'āphāh, "glow," "heat" (Ps 119 53, RV "hot indignation," m "horror"); cf Ps 11 6; Lam 5 10. For "trembling" (Job 21 6) and for "fearfulness" (Isa 21 4) RV has "horror." "Horror" does not occur in the NT, but in 2 Macc 3 17 we have "The man was so compassed with horror" (phrikasmós), RV "shuddering."

HORSE, hōrs: The common names are (1) סוּס, sūs, and (2) ἵππος, híppos. (3) The word פָּרָשׁ, pārāsh, "horseman," occurs often, and in several cases is tr<sup>d</sup> "horse" or "war-horse" (Isa 28 28; Ezk 27 14; Joel 2 4 RVm); also in 2 S 1 6, where the "horsemen" of EV is הַפָּרָשִׁים, ba'ālē hā-pārāshīm, "owners of horses"; cf Arab. فَارِس, fāris, "horseman," and فَرَس, faras, "horse." (4) The fem. form סוּסָה, sūsāh, occurs in Cant 1 9, and is rendered as follows: LXX ἡ ἵππος, hē híppos; Vulg equitatum; AV "company of horses," RV "steed." It is not clear why EV does not have "mare." (5) The word אַבְבִּירִים, abbirīm, "strong ones," is used for horses in Jgs 5 22; Jer 8 16; 47 3; 50 11 (AV "bulls"). In Ps 22 12 the same word is tr<sup>d</sup> "strong bulls" (of Bashan). (6) For רֶכֶשֶׁת, rekhesheh (cf Arab. رَكْش, rakāḍ, "to run"), in 1 K 4 28; Est 8 10.14; Mic 1 13, RV has "swift steeds," while AV gives "dromedaries" in 1 K and "mules" in Est. (7) For כִּרְכָרוֹת, kirkārōth (Isa 66 20), AV and ERV have "swift beasts"; ERVm and ARV "dromedaries"; LXX σκιάδια, skiádía, perhaps "covered carriages." In Est 8 10.14 we find the doubtful words (8) אֲחַשְׁתָּרְנַיִם, 'ahashṭārānīm, and (9) בְּנֵי הַרֻמָּכִים, b'ne hā-rammākhīm, which have been variously tr<sup>d</sup>. AV has respectively "camels" and "young dromedaries," RV "used in the king's service" and "bred of the stud," RVm "mules" and "young dromedaries." See CAMEL.

The Heb and Egypt names for the horse are alike akin to the Assy. The Jews may have obtained horses from Egypt (Dt 17 16), but the Canaanites before them had horses (Josh 17 16), and in looking toward the N.E. for the origin of the horse, philologists are in agreement with zoologists who consider that the plains of Central Asia, and also of Europe, were the original home of the horse. At least one species of wild horse is still found in Central Asia.

The horses of the Bible are almost exclusively war-horses, or at least the property of kings and not of the common people. A doubtful reference to the use of horses in threshing grain is found in Isa 28 28. Horses are among the property which the Egyptians gave to Joseph in exchange for grain (Gen 47 17). In Dt 17 16 it is enjoined that the king "shall not multiply horses to himself, nor cause the people to return to Egypt, to the end that he may multiply horses." This and other injunctions failed to prevent the Jews from borrowing from the neighboring civilizations their customs, idolatries, and vices. Solomon's horses are enumerated in 1 K 4, and the s'irīm and tebben of 1 K 4 28 (5 8) are identical with the sha'ir ("barley") and tibn ("straw") with which the Arab feeds his horse today. In war, horses were ridden and were driven in chariots (Ex 14 9; Josh 11 4; 2 S 15 1, etc).

The horse is referred to figuratively chiefly in Zec and Rev. A chariot and horses of fire take Elijah up to heaven (2 K 2 11 f). In Ps 20 7; 33 17; and 76 6, the great strength of the horse is recalled as a reminder of the greater strength of God. In Jas 3 3, the small bridle by which the horse can be managed is compared to the tongue (cf Ps 32 9). In Job 39 19-25 we have a magnificent description of a spirited war-horse.

HORSE, BLACK (ἵππος μέλας, híppos mélas): Symbolic of famine ("balance . . . measure of wheat for a shilling," etc, Rev 6 5.6; cf Zec 6 2.6). See REVELATION, BOOK OF.

HORSE GATE. See JERUSALEM.

HORSE, RED (ἵππος πυρρός, híppos purrós): Symbolic of war, bloodshed ("slay one another," etc, Rev 6 4; cf Zec 1 8; 6 2). See REVELATION, BOOK OF.

HORSE, WHITE (ἵππος λευκός, hippos leukós): Symbolic of victory, conquest ("bow . . . conquering and to conquer," Rev 6 2; 19 11.14; cf Zec 1 8; 6 3.6). See REVELATION, BOOK OF.

HORSELEACH, hōrs'lēch (חֲרָשׁ, 'alūkah; cf Arab. عِلْقَة, 'alūkah, "ghoul," and عَلَقَة, 'alakah, "leech," from root علق, 'alik, "to cling"; LXX βδελλα, bdella, "leech"): The word occurs only once, in Prov 30 15, RVM "vampire." In Arab. 'alakah is a leech of any kind, not only a horse-leech. The Arab. 'alūkah, which, it may be noted, is almost identical with the Heb form, is a ghoul (Arab. ghāl), an evil spirit which seeks to injure men and which preys upon the dead. The mythical vampire is similar to the ghoul. In zoology the name "vampire" is applied to a family of bats inhabiting tropical America, some, but not all, of which suck blood. In the passage cited the Arab. Bible has 'alūkah, "ghoul." If leech is meant, there can be no good reason for specifying "horseleech." At least six species of leech are known in Pal and Syria, and doubtless others exist. They are common in streams, pools, and fountains where animals drink. They enter the mouth, attach themselves to the interior of the mouth or pharynx, and are removed only with difficulty.

HORSEMAN, hōrs'man. See ARMY.

HORSES OF THE SUN (2 K 23 11): In connection with the sun-worship practised by idolatrous kings in the temple at Jerus (2 K 23 5; cf Ezk 8 16), horses dedicated to the sun, with chariots, had been placed at the entrance of the sacred edifice. These Josiah, in his great reformation, "took away," and burned the chariots with fire. Horses sacred to the sun were common among oriental peoples (Bochart, Heiroz., 1, 2, 10).

HOSAH, hō'sa (חֹסֶה, hōshāh): A city on the border of Asher, in the neighborhood of Tyre (Josh 19 29). LXX reads Iaseiph, which might suggest identification with Kcfr Yasif, to the N.E. of Acre. Possibly, however, as Sayce (HCM, 429) and Moore (Judges, 51) suggest, Hosah may represent the Assy Usu. Some scholars think that Usu was the Assy name for Palaetyrus. If "the fenced city of Tyre" were that on the island, while the city on the mainland lay at Ras el-'Ain, 30 stadia to the S. (Strabo xvi.758), this identification is not improbable.

HOSANNA, hō-zan'a (ὡσαννά, hōsanná): This Gr transliteration of a Heb word occurs 6 t in the Gospels as the cry of the people when Our Lord entered Jerus as the Messiah represented by Zec (9 9), and of "the children" when He cleansed the temple (Mt 21 9 bis.15; Mk 11 9 f; Jn 12 13). In Mt 21 9 it is "Hosanna to the son of David!" followed by "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; Hosanna in the highest!"; in ver 15 it is also "Hosanna to the Son of David!"; in Mk 11 9 f it is "Hosanna; Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; Blessed is the kingdom that cometh, the kingdom of our father David: Hosanna in the highest"; and in Jn 12 13 it is "Hosanna: Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord, even the King of Israel." Thus in all the evangelists it is an acclamation or ascription of praise. This has raised the question whether the supposed derivation from Ps 118 25, beginning with

'ānnāh YHWH hōshī'āh nnā', "Save now, pray" (which is followed [ver 26] by "Blessed be he that cometh [RVM "or entereth"] in the name of Jeh") is correct. (See Thayer, HDB; Cheyne, EB; Dalman, Words of Jesus.) Various other explanations have been suggested. Thayer remarks, "It is most natural to regard the word Hosanna, as respects its form, as neither syncopated nor contracted, but the shorter Hiphil imperative with the appended enclitic" (hōsha'nā; cf Ps 86 2; Jer 31 7), for which there is Talmudic warrant. "As respects its force, we must for . . . contextual reasons, assume that it had already lost its primary supplicatory sense and become an ejaculation of joy or shout of welcome." It is said to have been so used in this sense at the joyous Feast of Tabernacles, the 7th day of which came to be called "the Great Hosanna," or "Hosanna Day." But, while the word is certainly an ejaculation of praise and not one of supplication, the idea of salvation need not be excluded. As in Rev 7 10 (cf 19 1), we have the acclamation, "Salvation unto God . . . and unto the Lamb," so we might have the cry, "Salvation to the son of David"; and "Hosanna in the Highest," might be the equivalent of "Salvation unto our God!" He who was "coming in the name of the Lord" was the king who was bringing salvation from God to the people. W. L. WALKER

I. The Prophet.—The name (חֹשֶׁה, hōshēa'; LXX Ὡσηέ, Ōsēē; for other forms vide note in DB), probably meaning "help," seems to have been not uncommon, being derived from the auspicious vb. from which we have the frequently recurring word "salvation." It may be a contraction of a larger form of which the Divine name or its abbreviation formed a part, so as to signify "God is help," or "Help, God." According to Nu 13 8.16 that was the original name of Joshua son of Nun, till Moses gave him the longer name (compounded with the name of Jeh) which he continued to bear (חֹשֶׁה יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, y'hōshua'), "Jeh is salvation." The last king of the Northern Kingdom was also named Hosca (2 K 15 30), and we find the same name borne by a chief of the tribe of Ephraim under David (1 Ch 27 20) and by a chief under Nehemiah (Neh 10 23).

Although it is not directly stated in the book, there can be little doubt that he exercised his ministry in the kingdom of the Ten Tribes. Whereas his references to Judah are of a general kind, Ephraim or Samaria being sometimes mentioned in the same connection or more frequently alone, the situation implied throughout and the whole tone of the addresses agree with what we know of the Northern Kingdom at the time, and his references to places and events in that kingdom are so numerous and minute as to lead to the conclusion that he not only prophesied there, but that he was a native of that part of the country. Gilead, e.g. a district little named in the prophets, is twice mentioned (6 8; 12 11) and in such a manner as to suggest that he knew it by personal observation; and Mizpah (mentioned in 5 1) is no doubt the Mizpah in Gilead (Jgs 10 17). Then we find Tabor (5 1), Shechem (6 9 RV), Gilgal and Bethel (4 15; 9 15; 10 5.8.15; 12 11). Even Lebanon in the distant N. is spoken of with a minuteness of detail which could be expected only from one very familiar with Northern Pal (14 5-8). In a stricter sense, therefore, than Amos who, though a native of Tekoa, had a prophetic mission to the N., Hosea may be called the prophet of Northern Israel, and his book, as Ewald has said, is the prophetic voice wrung from the bosom of the kingdom itself.

All that we are told directly as to the time when Hosea prophesied is the statement in the first verse that the word of the Lord came to him "in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam the son of Joash, king of Israel." It is quite evident that his ministry did not extend over the combined reigns of all these kings; for, from the beginning of the reign of Uzziah to the beginning of that of Hezekiah, according to the now usually received chronology (Kautzsch, Literature of the OT, ET), there is a period of 52 years, and Jeroboam came to his throne a few years before the accession of Uzziah.

When we examine the book itself for more precise indications of date, we find that the prophet threatens in God's name that in "a little while" He will "avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu." Now Jeroboam was the great-grandson of Jehu, and his son Zechariah, who succeeded him, reigned only six months and was the last of the line of Jehu. We may, therefore, place the beginning of Hosea's ministry a short time before the death of Jeroboam which took place 743 BC. As to the other limit, it is to be observed that, though the downfall of "the kingdom of the house of Israel" is threatened (1 4), the catastrophe had not occurred when the prophet ceased his ministry. The date of that event is fixed in the year 722 BC, and it is said to have happened in the 6th year of King Hezekiah. This does not give too long a time for Hosea's activity, and it leaves the accuracy of the superscription unchallenged, whoever may have written it. If it is the work of a later editor, it may be that Hosea's ministry ceased before the reign of Hezekiah, though he may have lived on into that king's reign. It should be added, however, that there seems to be no reference to another event which might have been expected to find an echo in the book, viz. the conspiracy in the reign of Ahaz (735 BC) by Pekah of Israel and Rezin of Damascus against the kingdom of Judah (2 K 16 5; Isa 7 1).

Briefly we may say that, though there is uncertainty as to the precise dates of the beginning and end of his activity, he began his work before the middle of the 8th cent., and that he saw the rise and fall of several kings. He would thus be a younger contemporary of Amos whose activity seems to have been confined to the reign of Jeroboam.

Hosea is described as the son of Beeri, who is otherwise unknown. Of his personal history we are told either absolutely nothing or

4. Personal History (Marriage) else a very great deal, according as we interpret chs 1 and 3 of his book. In ancient and in modern times, opinions have been divided as to whether in these chapters we have a recital of actual facts, or the presentation of prophetic teaching in the form of parable or allegory.

(1) Allegorical view.—The Jewish interpreters as a rule took the allegorical view, and Jerome, in the early Christian church, no doubt following Origen the great allegorizer, states it at length, and sees an intimation of the view in the closing words of Hosea's book: "Who is wise, that he may understand these things? prudent, that he may know them?" (14 9).

It is a mystery, he says; for it is a scandal to think of Hosea being commanded to take an unchaste wife and without any reluctance obeying the command. It is a figure, like that of Jeremiah going to the Euphrates (when Jerus was closely besieged) and hiding a girdle in the bed of the river (Jer 13). So Ezekiel is commanded to represent, by means of a tile, the siege of Jerus, and to lie 390 days on his side to indicate the years of their iniquity (Ezk 4); and there are other symbolical acts. Jeromethen proceeds to apply the allegory first to Israel, which is the Gomer of ch 1, and then to Judah, the wife in ch 3, and finally to Christ and the church, the representations being types from beginning to end.

Calvin took the same view. Among modern commentators we find holding the allegorical view not only Hengstenberg, Hävernack and Keil, but also Eichhorn, Rosenmüller and Hitzig. Reuss also (Das AT, II, 88 ff) protests against the literal interpretation as impossible, and that on no moral or reverential considerations, but entirely on exegetical grounds. He thinks it enough to say that, when the prophet calls his children "children of whoredom," he indicates quite clearly that he uses the words in a figurative sense; and he explains the allegory as follows: The prophet is the representative of Jeh; Israel is the wife of Jeh, but faithless to her husband, going after other gods; the children are the Israelites, who are therefore called children of whoredoms because they practise the idolatry of the nation. So they receive names which denote the consequences of their sin. In accordance with the allegory, the children are called the children of the prophet (for Israel is God's own) but this is not the main point; the essential thing is the naming of the children as they are named. In the third chapter, according to this interpretation, allegory again appears, but with a modification and for another purpose. Idolatrous Israel is again the unfaithful wife of the prophet as the representative of Jeh. This relation can again be understood only as figurative; for, if the prophet stands for Jeh, the marriage of Israel to the prophet cannot indicate infidelity to Jeh. The sense is evident: the marriage still subsists; God does not give His people up, but they are for the present divorced "from bed and board"; it is a prophecy of the time when Jeh will leave the people to their fate, till the day of reconciliation comes.

(2) Literal view.—The literal interpretation, adopted by Theodore of Mopsuestia in the ancient church, was followed, after the Reformation, by the chief theologians of the Lutheran church, and has been held, in modern times, by many leading expositors, including Delitzsch, Kurtz, Hofmann, Wellhausen, Cheyne, Robertson Smith, G. A. Smith and others. In this view, as generally held, chs 1 and 3 go together and refer to the same person. The idea is that Hosea married a woman named Gomer, who had the three children here named. Whether it was that she was known to be a worthless woman before the marriage and that the prophet hoped to reclaim her, or that she proved faithless after the marriage, she finally left him and sank deeper and deeper into sin, until, at some future time, the prophet bought her from her paramour and brought her to his own house, keeping her secluded, however, and deprived of all the privileges of a wife. In support of this view it is urged that the details are related in so matter-of-fact a manner that they must be matters of fact. Though the children receive symbolical names (as Isaiah gave such names to his children), the meanings of these are clear and are explained, whereas the name of the wife cannot thus be explained. Then there are details, such as the weaning of one child before the conception of another (1 8) and the precise price paid for the erring wife (3 2), which are not needed to keep up the allegory, and are not invested with symbolical meaning by the prophet. What is considered a still stronger argument is relied on by modern advocates of this view, the psychological argument that there is always a proportion between a revelation vouchsafed and the mental state of the person receiving it. Hosea dates the beginning of his prophetic work from the time of his marriage; it was the unfaithfulness of his wife that brought home to him the apostasy of Israel; and, as his heart went after his wayward wife, so the Divine love was stronger than Israel's sin; and thus through his own domestic experience he was prepared to be a prophet to his people.

The great difficulty in the way of accepting the literal interpretation lies, as Reuss has pointed out, in the statement at the beginning, that the prophet was commanded to take a wife of whoredoms and children of whoredoms. And the advocates of the view meet the difficulties in some way like this: The narrative as it stands is manifestly later than the events. On looking back, the prophet describes his wife as she turned out to be, not as she was at the beginning of the history. It is urged with some force that it was necessary to the analogy (even if the story is only a parable) that the wife should have been first of all chaste; for, in Hosea's representation, Israel at the time of its election in the wilderness was faithful and fell away only afterward (2 15; 9 10; 11 1). The narrative does not require us to assume that Gomer was an immoral person or that she was the mother of children before her marriage. The children receive symbolic names, but these names do not reflect upon Gomer but upon Israel. Why, then, is she described as a woman of whoredoms? It is answered that the expression 'ēsheth z'nūnim is a class-descriptive, and is different from the expression "a woman who is a harlot" ('ishshāh zōnāh). A Jewish interpreter quoted by Aben Ezra says: "Hosea was commanded to take a wife of whoredoms because an honest woman was not to be had. The whole people had gone astray—was an 'adulterous generation'; and she as one of them was a typical example, and the children were involved in the common declension (see 4 1 f)." The comment of Umbreit is worthy of notice: "As the covenant of Jeh with Israel is viewed as a marriage bond, so is the prophetic bond with Israel a marriage, for he is the messenger and mediator. Therefore, if he feels an irresistible impulse to enter into the marriage-bond with Israel, he is bound to unite himself with a bride of an unchaste character. Yea, his own wife Gomer is involved in the universal guilt" (Prak. Comm. über die Propheten, Hamburg, 1844). It is considered, then, on this view, that Gomer, after her marriage, being in heart addicted to the prevailing idolatry, which we know was often associated with gross immorality (see 4 13), felt the irksomeness of restraint in the prophet's house, left him and sank into open profligacy, from which (ch 3) the prophet reclaimed her so far as to bring her back and keep her secluded in his own house.

Quite recently this view has been advocated by Riedel (Alttest. Untersuchungen, Leipzig, 1902), who endeavors to enforce it by giving a symbolic meaning to Gomer's name, Bath-Diblahim. The word is the dual (or might be pointed as a pl.) of a word, dabhēlah, meaning a fruit-cake, i.e. raisins or figs pressed together. It is the word used in the story of Hezekiah's illness (2 K 20 7), and is found in the list of things furnished by Abigail to David (1 S 25 18). See also 1 S 30 12; 1 Ch 12 40. Another name for the same thing, dshishāh, occurs in Hos 3 1, rendered in AV "flagons of wine," but in RV "cakes of raisins." It seems clear that this word, at least here, denotes fruit-cakes offered to the heathen deities, as was the custom in Jeremiah's time (Jer 7 18; 44 17). So Riedel argues that Gomer may have been described as a "daughter of fruit-cakes" according to the Heb idiom in such expressions as "daughters of song," etc (Eccl 12 4; Prov 31 2; 2 S 7 10; Gen 37 3, etc).

It will be perceived that the literal interpretation as thus stated does not involve the supposition that Hosea became aware of his wife's infidelity before the birth of the second child, as Robertson Smith and G. A. Smith suppose. The names given to the children all refer to the infidelity of Israel as a people; and the renderings of Lō-rūhāmāh, "she that never knew a father's love," and of Lō-ammā, "no kin of mine," are too violent in this connection. Nor does the interpretation demand that it was first through his marriage and subsequent experience that the prophet received his call; although no doubt the experience through which he passed deepened the conviction of Israel's apostasy in his mind.

II. The Book.—Scarcely any book in the OT is more difficult of exposition than the Book of Hos.

This does not seem to be owing to any exceptional defect in the transmitted text, but rather to the peculiarity of the style; and partly also, no doubt, to the fact that the historical situation of the prophet was one of bewildering and sudden change of a violent kind, which seems to reflect itself in the book. The style here is preëminently the man.

Whatever view we may take of his personal history, it is evident that he is deeply affected by the situation in which he is placed. He is controlled by his subject, instead of controlling it. It is his heart that speaks; he is not careful to concentrate his thoughts or to mark his transitions; the sentences fall from him like the sobs of a broken heart. Mournful as Jeremiah, he does not indulge in the pleasure of melancholy as that prophet seems to do. Jeremiah broods over his sorrow, nurses it, and tells us he is weeping. Hosea does not say he is weeping, but we hear it in his broken utterances. Instead of laying out his plaint in measured form, he ejaculates it in short, sharp sentences, as the stabs of his people's sin pierce his heart.

The result is the absence of that rhythmic flow and studied parallelism which are such common features of Heb oratory, and are often so helpful to the expositor. His imagery, while highly poetical, is not elaborated; his figures are not so much carried out as thrown out; nor does he dwell long on the same figure. His sentences are like utterances of an oracle, and he forgets himself in identifying himself with the God in whose name he speaks—a feature which is not without significance in its bearing on the question of his personal history. The standing expression "Thus saith the Lord" ("It is the utterance of Jeh" RV), so characteristic of the prophetic style, very rarely occurs (only in 2 13.16.21; 11 11); whereas the words that he speaks are the very words of the Lord; and without any formal indication of the fact, he passes from speaking in his own name to speaking in the name of Jeh (see, e.g. 6 4; 7 12; 8 13; 9 9.10.14-17, etc.). Never was speaker so absorbed in his theme, or more identified with Him for whom he speaks. He seems to be oblivious of his hearers, if indeed his chapters are the transcript or summary of spoken addresses. They certainly want to a great extent the directness and point which are so marked a feature of prophetic diction, so much so that some (e.g. Reuss and Marti) suppose they are the production of one who had readers and not hearers in view.

But, though the style appears in this abrupt form, there is one clear note on divers strings sounding through the whole. The theme is twofold: the love of Jehovah, and the indifference of Israel to that love; and it would be hard to say which of the two is more vividly conceived and more forcibly expressed. Under the figures of the tenderest affection, sometimes that of the pitying, solicitous care of the parent (11 1.3.8; 14 3), but more prominently as the affection of the husband (chs 1, 3), the Divine love is represented as ever enduring in spite of all indifference and opposition; and, on the other hand, the waywardness, unblushing faithlessness of the loved one is painted in colors so repulsive as almost to shock the moral sense, but giving thereby evidence of the painful abhorrence it had produced on the prophet's mind. Thus early does he take the sacred bond of husband and wife as the type of the Divine electing love—a similitude found elsewhere in prophetic literature, and most fully elaborated by Ezekiel (Ezk 16; cf Jer 3). Hosea is the prophet of love, and not without propriety has been called the St. John of the OT.

For the reasons just stated, it is very difficult to give a systematic analysis of the Book of Hos. It may, however, be helpful to that end

2. Historical to recall the situation of the time as Background furnishing a historical setting for the several sections of the book.

At the commencement of the prophet's ministry, the Northern Kingdom was enjoying the prosperity and running into the excesses consequent on the victories of Jeroboam II. The glaring social corruptions of the times are exhibited and castigated by Amos, as they would most impress a stranger from the S.; but Hosea, a native, as we are led to suppose, of the Northern Kingdom, saw more deeply into the malady, and traced all the crime and vice of the nation to the fundamental evil of idolatry and apostasy from the true God. What he describes under the repulsive figure of whoredom was the rampant worship of the b'ālīm, which had practically obscured the recognition of the sole claims to worship of the national Jeh. This worship of the b'ālīm is to be distinguished from that of which we read at the earlier time of Elijah. Ahab's Tyrian wife Jezebel had introduced the worship of her native country, that of the Sidonian Baal, which amounted to the setting up of a foreign deity; and Elijah's contention that it must be a choice between Jeh and Baal appealed to the sense of patriotism and the sentiment of national existence. The worship of the ba'als, however, was an older and more insidious form of idolatry. The worship of the Can tribes, among whom the Israelites found themselves on the occupation of Pal, was a reverence of local divinities, known by the names of the places where each had his shrine or influence. The generic name of ba'al or "lord" was applied naturally as a common word to each of these, with the addition of the name of place or potency to distinguish them. Thus we have Baal-hermon, Baal-gad, Baal-berith, etc. The insidiousness of this kind of worship is proved by its wide prevalence, esp. among people at a low stage of intelligence, when the untutored mind is brought face to face with the mysterious and unseen forces of Nature. And the tenacity of the feeling is proved by the prevalence of such worship, even among people whose professed religion condemns idolatry of every kind. The veneration of local shrines among Christians of the East and in many parts of Europe is well known; and Mohammedans make pilgrimages to the tombs of saints who, though not formally worshipped as deities, are believed to have the power to confer such benefits as the Canaanites expected from the ba'als. The very name ba'al, originally meaning simply lord and master, as in such expressions as "master of a house," "lord of a wife," "owner of an ox," would be misleading; for the Israelites could quite innocently call Jeh their ba'al or Lord, as we can see they did in the formation of proper names. We can, without much difficulty, conceive what would happen among a people like the Israelite tribes, of no high grade of religious intelligence, and with the prevailing superstitions in their blood, when they found themselves in Pal. From a nomad and pastoral people they became, and had to become, agriculturists; the natives of the land would be their instructors, in many or in most cases the actual labor would be done by them. The Book of Jgs tells us emphatically that several of the Israelite tribes "did not drive out" the native inhabitants; the northern tribes in particular, where the land was most fertile, tolerated a large native admixture. We are also told (Jgs 2 7) that the people served the Lord all the days of Joshua and of the elders who outlived Joshua; and this hint of a gradual declension no doubt points to what actually took place. For a time they remembered and thought of Jeh as the God who had done for them great things in Egypt and in the wilderness; and then, as time went on, they had to think of Him as the giver of the land in which they found themselves, with all its varied produce. But this was the very thing the Canaanites ascribed to their ba'als. And so, imperceptibly, by naming places as the natives named them, by observing the customs which the natives followed, and celebrating the festivals of the agricultural year, they were gliding into conformity with the religion of their neighbors; for, in such a state of society, custom is more or less based on religion and passes for religion. Almost before they were aware, they were doing homage to the various ba'als in celebrating their festival days and offering to them the produce of the ground.

Such was the condition which Hosea describes as an absence of the knowledge of God (4 1). And the consequence cannot be better described than in the words of St. Paul: "As they refused to have God in their knowledge, God gave them up unto a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not fitting" (Rom 1 28). Both Hosea and Amos tell us in no ambiguous terms how the devotees of the impure worship gave themselves up "to work all uncleanness with greediness" (Eph 4 19; cf Am 2 7 f; Hos 4 14); and how deeply the canker had worked into the body politic is proved by the rapid collapse and irretrievable ruin which followed soon after the strong hand of Jeroboam was removed. The 21 years that followed his death in 743 BC saw no fewer than six successive occupants of the throne, and the final disappearance of the kingdom of the ten tribes. Zechariah, his son, had reigned only six months when "Shallum the son of Jabesh conspired against him . . . and slew him, and reigned in his stead" (2 K 15 10). Shallum himself reigned only a month when he was in the same bloody manner removed by Menahem. After a reign of 10 years, according to 2 K 15 17 (although the chronology here is uncertain), he was succeeded by his son Pekahiah (2 K 15 22), and after two years Pekah "his captain" conspired against him and reigned in his stead (2 K 15 25). This king also was assassinated, and was succeeded by Hoshea (2 K 15 30), the last king of the ten tribes, for the kingdom came to an end in 722 BC. Hosea must have lived during a great part of those troublous times; and we may expect to hear echoes of the events in his book.

(1) Chs 1-3.—We should naturally expect that the order of the chapters would correspond in the main with the progress of events; and

Divisions follow. In favor of this is the reference in 1 2 to the commencement of the prophet's ministry, as also the threatening of the impending extirpation of the house of Jehu (1 4), implying that it was still in existence; and finally the hints of the abundance amounting to luxury which marked the prosperous time of Jeroboam's reign. These three chapters are to be regarded as going together; and, however they may be viewed as reflecting the prophet's personal experience, they leave no room for doubt in regard to the national apostasy that weighed so heavily on his heart. And this, in effect, is what he says: Just as the wife, espoused to a loving husband, enjoys the protection of home and owes all her provision to her husband, so Israel, chosen by Jeh and brought by Him into a fertile land, has received all she has from Him alone. The giving of recognition to the ba'als for material prosperity was tantamount to a wife's bestowing her affection on another; the accepting of these blessings as bestowed on condition of homage rendered to the ba'als was tantamount to the receiving of hire by an abandoned woman. This being so, the prophet, speaking in God's name, declares what He will do, in a series of a thrice repeated "therefore" (2 6.9.14), marking three stages of His discipline. First of all, changing the metaphor to that of a straying heifer, the prophet in God's name declares (vs 6 ff) that He will hedge up her way with thorns, so that she will not be able to reach her lovers—meaning, no doubt, that whether by drought or blight, or some national misfortune, there would be such a disturbance of the processes of Nature that the usual rites of homage to the ba'als would prove ineffectual. The people would fail to find the "law of the god of the land" (2 K 17 26). In their perplexity they would bethink themselves, begin to doubt the power of the ba'als, and resolve to pay to Jeh the homage they had been giving to the local gods. But this is still the same low conception of Jeh that had led them astray. To exchange one God for another simply in the hope of enjoying material prosperity is not the service which He requires. And then comes the second "therefore" (vs 9 ff). Instead of allowing them to enjoy their corn and wine and oil on the terms of a mere lip allegiance or ritual service, Jeh will take these away, will reduce Israel to her original poverty, causing all the mirth of her festival days to cease, and giving garments of mourning for festal attire. Her lovers will no longer own her, her own husband's hand is heavy upon her, and what remains? The third "therefore" tells us (vs 14 ff). Israel, now bereft of all, helpless, homeless, is at last convinced that, as her God could take away all, so it was from Him she had received all: she is shut up to His love and His mercy alone. And here the prophet's thoughts clothe themselves in language referring to the early betrothal period of national life. A new beginning will be made, she will again lead the wilderness life of daily dependence on God, cheerfully and joyfully she will begin a new journey, out of trouble will come a new hope, and the very recollection of the past will be a pain to her. As all the associations of the name ba'al have been degrading, she shall think of her Lord in a different relation, not as the mere giver of material blessing, but as the husband and desire of her heart, the One Source of all good, as distinguished from one of many benefactors. In all this Hosea does not make it clear how he expected these changes to be brought about, nor do we detect any references to the political history of the time. He mentions no foreign enemy at this stage, or, at most, hints at war in a vague manner (1 4 f). In the second chapter the thing that is emphasized is the heavy hand of God laid on the things through which Israel had been led astray, the paralyzing of Nature's operations, so as to cut at the root of Nature-worship; but the closing stage of the Divine discipline (ch 3), when Israel, like the wife kept in seclusion, neither enjoying the privileges of the lawful spouse nor able to follow after idols, seems to point to, and certainly was not reached till, the captivity when the people, on a foreign soil, could not exercise their ancestral worship, but yet were finally cured of idolatry.

The references to Judah in these chapters are not to be overlooked. Having said (1 6) that Israel would be utterly taken away (which seems to point to exile), the prophet adds that Judah would be saved from that fate, though not by warlike means. Farther down (ver 11) he predicts the union of Israel and Judah under one head, and finally in ch 3 it is said that in the latter day the children of Israel would seek the Lord their God and David their king. Many critics suppose that 1 10 f are out of place (though they cannot find a better place for them); and not a few declare that all the references to Judah must be taken as from a later hand, the usual reason for this conclusion being that the words "disturb the connection." In the case of a writer like Hosea, however, whose transitions are so sharp and sudden, we are not safe in speaking of disturbing the connection: what may to us appear abrupt, because we are not expecting it, may have flashed across the mind of the original writer; and Hosea, in forecasting the future of his people, can scarcely be debarred from having thought of the whole nation. It was Israel as a whole that was the original bride of Jeh, and surely therefore the united Israel would be the partaker of the final glory. As a matter of fact, Judah was at the time in better case than Israel, and the old promise to the Davidic house (2 S 7 16) was deeply cherished to the end.

(2) Chs 4-14.—If it is admissible to consider chs 1-3 as one related piece (though possibly the written deposit of several addresses) it is quite otherwise with chs 4-14. These are, in a manner, a counterpart of the history. When the strong hand of Jeroboam was relaxed, the kingdom rapidly fell to pieces; a series of military usurpers follows with bewildering rapidity; but who can tell how much political disorder and social disintegration lie behind those brief and grim notices: So and So "conspired against him and slew him and reigned in his stead"? So with these chapters. The wail of grief, the echo of violence and excess, is heard through all, but it is very difficult to assign each lament, each reproof, each denunciation to the primary occasion that called it forth. The chapters seem like the recital of the confused, hideous dream through which the nation passed till its rude awakening by the sharp shock of the Assyrian invasion and the exile that followed. The political condition of the time was one of party strife and national impotence. Sometimes Assyria or Egypt is mentioned alone (5 13; 8 9.13; 9 6; 10 6; 14 3), at other times Assyria and Egypt together (7 11; 9 3; 11 5.11; 12 1); but in such a way as to show too plainly that the spirit of self-reliance—not to speak of reliance on Jeh—had departed from a race that was worm-eaten with social sins and rendered selfish and callous by the indulgence of every vice. These foreign powers, which figure as false refuges, are also in the view of the prophet destined to be future scourges (see 5 13; 8 9 f; 7 11; 12 1); and we know, from the Book of K and also from the Assyrian monuments, how much the kings of Israel at this time were at the mercy of the great conquering empires of the East. Such passages as speak of Assyria and Egypt in the same breath may point to the rival policies which were in vogue in the Northern Kingdom (as they appeared also somewhat later in Judah) of making alliances with one or other of these great rival powers. It was in fact the Egyptianizing policy of Hoshea that finally occasioned the ruin of the kingdom (2 K 17 4). Thus it is that, in the last chapter, when the prophet indulges in hope no more mixed with boding fear, he puts into the mouth of repentant Ephraim the words: "Assyria shall not save us; we will not ride upon horses" (14 3), thus alluding to the two foreign powers between which Israel had lost its independence.

It is not possible to give a satisfactory analysis of the chapters under consideration. They are not marked off, as certain sections of other prophetic books are, by headings or refrains, nor are the references to current events sufficiently clear to enable us to assign different parts to different times, nor, in fine, is the matter so distinctly laid out that we can arrange the book under subjects treated. Most expositors accordingly content themselves with indicating the chief topics or lines of thought, and arranging the chapters according to the tone pervading them.

Kell, e.g., would divide all these chapters into three great sections, each forming a kind of prophetic cycle, in which the three great prophetic tones of reproof, threatening, and promise, are heard in succession. His first section embraces chs 4 to 6 3, ending with the gracious promise: "Come, and let us return unto Jeh," etc. The second section, 6 4 to 11 11, ends with the promise: "They shall come trembling as a bird . . . ; and I will make them to dwell in their houses, saith Jeh." The third section, 11 12 to 14 9, ends: "Take with you words, and return unto Jeh," etc. Ewald's arrangement proceeds on the idea that the whole book consists of one narrative piece (chs 1-3) and one long address (chs 4-14), which, however, is marked off by resting points into smaller sections or addresses. The progress of thought is marked by the three great items of arraignment, punishment, and consolation. Thus: from 4 1-6 11 there is arraignment; from 6 11 to 9 9 punishment, and from 9 10-14 10 exhortation and comfort. Driver says of chs 4-14: "These chapters consist of a series of discourses, a summary arranged probably by the prophet himself at the close of his ministry, of the prophecies delivered by him in the years following the death of Jeroboam II. Though the argument is not continuous, or systematically developed, they may be divided into three sections: (a) chs 4-8, in which the thought of Israel's guilt predominates; (b) ch 9-11 11, in which the prevailing thought is that of Israel's punishment; (c) 11 12-ch 14 in which these two lines of thought are both continued (chs 12, 13), but are followed (in ch 14) by a glance at the brighter future which may ensue provided Israel repents." A. B. Davidson, after mentioning the proposed analyses of Ewald and Driver, adds: "But in truth the passage is scarcely divisible; it consists of a multitude of variations all executed on one theme, Israel's apostasy or unfaithfulness to her God. This unfaithfulness is a condition of the mind, a 'spirit of whoredoms,' and is revealed in all the aspects of Israel's life, though particularly in three things: (1) the cultus, which, though ostensibly service of Jeh, is in truth worship of a being altogether different from Him; (2) the internal political disorders, the changes of dynasty, all of which have been effected, with no thought of Jeh in the people's minds; and (3) the foreign politics, the making of covenants with Egypt and Assyria, in the hope that they might heal the internal hurt of the people, instead of relying on Jeh their God. The three things," he adds, "are not independent; the one leads to the other. The fundamental evil is that there is no knowledge of God in the land, no true conception of Deity. He is thought of as a Nature-god, and His conception exercises no restraint on the passions or life of the people; hence the social immoralities, and the furious struggles of rival factions, and these again lead to the appeal for foreign intervention."

Some expositors, however (e.g. Maurer, Hitzig, Delitzsch and Volck), recognizing what they consider as direct references or brief allusions to certain outstanding events in the history, perceive a chronological order in the chapters. Volck, who has attempted a full analysis on this line (PRE?) thinks that chs 4-14 arrange themselves into 6 consecutive sections as follows: (1) ch 4 constitutes a section by itself, determined by the introductory words "Hear the word of Jeh" (4 1), and a similar call at the beginning of ch 5. He assigns this chapter to the reign of Zechariah, as a description of the low condition to which the nation had fallen, the priests, the leaders, being involved in the guilt and reproof (ver 6). (2) The second section extends from 5 1 to 6 3, and is addressed directly to the priests and the royal house, who ought to have been guides but were snares. The prophet in the spirit sees Divine judgment already breaking over the devoted land (5 8). This prophecy, which Hitzig referred to the time of Zechariah, and Maurer to the reign of Pekah, is assigned by Volck to the one month's reign of Shallum, on the ground of 5 7: "Now shall a month [AV and RVm, but RV "the new moon"] devour them." It is by inference from this that Volck puts ch 4 in the preceding reign of Zechariah. (3) The third section, 6 4-7 16, is marked off by the new beginning made at 8 1: "Set the trumpet to thy mouth." The passage which determines its date is 7 7: "All their kings are fallen," which, agreeing with Hitzig, he thinks could not have been said after the fall of one king, Zechariah, and so he assigns it to the beginning of the reign of Menahem who killed Shallum. (4) The next halting place, giving a fourth section, is at 9 9, at the end of which there is a break in the MT, and a new subject begins. Accordingly, the section embraces 8 1 to 9 9, and Volck, agreeing with Hitzig, assigns it to the reign of Menahem, on the ground of 8 4: "They have set up kings, but not by me," referring to the support given to Menahem by the king of Assyria (2 K 15 19). (5) The fifth section extends from 9 10 to 11 11, and is marked by the peculiarity that the prophet three times refers to the early history of Israel (9 10; 10 1; 11 1). Identifying Shalman in 10 14 with Shalmaneser, Volck refers the section to the opening years of the reign of Hoshea, against whom (as stated in 2 K 17 3) Shalmaneser came up and Hoshea became his servant. (6) Lastly there is a sixth section, extending from 12 1 to the end, which looks to the future recovery of the people (13 14) and closes with words of gracious promise. This portion also Volck assigns to the reign of Hoshea, just as the ruin of Samaria was impending, and there was no prospect of any earthly hope. In this way Volck thinks that the statement in the superscription of the Book of Hos is confirmed, and that we have before us, in chronological order if not in precisely their original oral form, the utterances of the prophet during his ministry. Ewald also was strongly of opinion that the book (in its second part at least) has come down to us substantially in the form in which the prophet himself left it.

The impression one receives from this whole section is one of sadness, for the prevailing tone is one of denunciation and doom. And yet Hosea is not a prophet of despair; and, in fact, he bursts forth into hope just at the point where, humanly speaking, there is no ground of hope. But this hope is produced, not by what he sees in the condition of the people: it is enkindled and sustained by his confident faith in the unfailing love of Jeh. And so he ends on the theme on which he began, the love of God prevailing over man's sin.

The references in Hos to the earlier period of history are valuable, seeing that we know his date, and that the dates of the books recording that history are so much in dispute.

4. Testimony to Earlier History These references are particularly valuable from the way in which they occur; for it is the manner of the prophet to introduce them indirectly, and allusively, without dwelling on particulars. Thus every single reference can be understood only by assuming its implications; and, taken together, they do not merely amount to a number of isolated testimonies to single events, but are rather discovered links of a continuous chain of history. For they do not occur by way of rhetorical illustration of some theme that may be in hand, they are of the very essence of the prophet's address. The events of the past are, in the prophet's view, so many elements in the arraignment or threatening, or whatever it may be that is the subject of address for the moment: in a word, the whole history is regarded by him, not as a series of episodes, strung together in a collection of popular stories, but a course of Divine discipline with a moral and religious significance, and recorded or referred to for a high purpose. There is this also to be remembered: that, in referring briefly and by way of allusion to past events, the prophet is taking for granted that his hearers understand what he is referring to, and will not call in question the facts to which he alludes.

This implies that the mass of the people, even in degenerate Israel, were well acquainted with such incidents or episodes as the prophet introduces into his discourses, as well as the links which were necessary to bind them into a connected whole. It is necessary to bear all this in mind in forming an estimate of the historical value of other books. It seems to be taken by many modern writers as certain that those parts of the Pent (JE) which deal with the earlier history were not written till a comparatively short time before Hosea. It is plain, however, that the accounts must be of much earlier date, before they could have become, in an age when books could not have been numerous, the general possession of the national consciousness. Further, the homiletic manner in which Hosea handles these ancient stories makes one suspicious of the modern theory that a number of popular stories were supplied with didactic "frameworks" by later Deuteronomic or other "redactors," and makes it more probable that these accounts were invested with a moral and religious meaning from the beginning. With these considerations in mind, and particularly in view of the use he makes of his references, it is interesting to note the wide range of the prophet's historical survey. If we read with RV "Adam" for "men" (AV 6 7), we have a clear allusion to the Fall, implying in its connection the view which, as all admit, Hosea held of the religious history of his people as a declension and not an upward evolution. This view is more clearly brought out in the reference to the period of the exodus and the desert life (2 15; 9 10; 11 1). Equally suggestive are the allusions to the patriarchal history, as the references to Admah and Zebaiim (11 8), and the repeated references to the weak and the strong points in the character of Jacob (12 3,12). Repeatedly he declares that Jeh is the God of Israel "from the land of Egypt" (12 9; 13 4), alludes to the sin of Achan and the valley of Achor (2 15), asserts that God had in time past "spoken unto the prophets" (12 10), "hewed" His people by prophets (6 5), and by a prophet brought His people out of Egypt (12 13). There are also references to incidents nearer to the prophet's time, some of them not very clear (1 4; 5 1; 9 5, 15; 10 9); and if, as seems probable, "the sin of Israel" (10 8) refers to the schism of the ten tribes, the prominence given to the Davidic kingship, which, along with the references to Judah, some critics reject on merely subjective grounds, is quite intelligible (3 5; 4 15).

We do not expect to find in a prophetic writing the same frequency of reference to the law as to the history; for it is of the essence of

5. Testimony to the Law prophecy to appeal to history and to interpret it. Of course, the moral and social aspects of the law are as much the province of the prophet as of the priest; but the ceremonial part of the law, which was under the care of the priests, though it was designed to be the expression of the same ideas that lay at the foundation of prophecy, is mainly touched upon by the prophets when, as was too frequently the case, it ceased to express those ideas and became an offence. The words of the prophets on this subject, when fairly interpreted, are not opposed to law in any of its authorized forms, but only to its abuses; and there are expressions and allusions in Hosea, although he spoke to the Northern Kingdom, where from the time of the schism there had been a wide departure from the authorized law, which recognize its ancient existence and its Divine sanction. The much-debated passage (8 12), "Though I write for him my law in ten thousand precepts" (RV or RVm "I wrote for him the ten thousand things of my law"), on any understanding of the words or with any reasonable emendation of the text (for which see the comm.), points to written law, and that of considerable compass, and seems hardly consistent with the supposition that in the prophet's time the whole of the written law was confined to a few chapters in Ex, the so-called Book of the Covenant. And the very next verse (8 13), "As for the sacrifices of mine offerings, they sacrifice flesh and eat it; but Jeh accepteth them not," is at once an acknowledgment of the Divine institution of sacrifice, and an illustration of the kind of opposition the prophets entertained to sacrificial service as it was practised. So when it is said, "I will also cause all her mirth to cease, her feasts, her new moons, and her sabbaths, and all her solemn assemblies" (2 11; cf 9 5), the reference, as the context shows, is to a deprivation of what were national distinctive privileges; and the allusions to transgressions and trespasses against the law (8 1; cf Dt 17 2) point in the same direction. We have a plain reference to the Feast of Tabernacles (12 9): "I will yet again make thee to dwell in tents, as in the days of the solemn feast" (cf Lev 23 39-43); and there are phrases which are either in the express language of the law-books or evident allusions to them, as "Thy people are as they that strive with the priest" (4 4; cf Dt 17 12); "The princes of Judah are like them that remove the landmark" (5 10; cf Dt 19 14); "Their sacrifices shall be unto them as the bread of mourners" (9 4; cf Dt 26 14); "They [the priests] feed on the sin of my people" (4 8; cf Lev 6 25 f; 10 17). In one verse the prophet combines the fundamental fact in the nation's history and the fundamental principle of the law: "I am Jeh thy God from the land of Egypt; and thou shalt know no god but me" (13 4; cf Ex 20 3).

It is, however, with the Book of Dt more than with any other portion of the Pent that the Book of

Hos shows affinity; and the resemblances here are so striking, that the critics who hold to the late date of Dt speak of the author of that book as "the spiritual heir of Hosea" (Driver, Comm. on Dt, Intro, xxvii), or of Hosea as "the great spiritual predecessor of the Deuteronomist" (Cheyne, Jeremiah, His Life and Times, 66). The resemblance is seen, not only in the homiletical manner in which historical events are treated, but chiefly in the great underlying principles implied or insisted upon in both books. The choice of Israel to be a peculiar people is the fundamental note in both (Dt 4 37; 7 6; 10 15; 14 2; 26 18; Hos 12 9; 13 4). God's tender care and fatherly discipline are central ideas in both (Dt 8 2,3,5,16; Hos 9 15; 11 1-4; 14 4); and, conversely, the supreme duty of love to God, or reproof of the want of it, is everywhere emphasized (Dt 6 5; 10 12; 11 1,13,22; 13 3; 19 9; 30 6,16,20; Hos 4 1; 6 4,6). Now, when points of resemblance are found in two different books, it is not always easy to say on merely literary grounds which has the claim to priority. But it does seem remarkable, on the one hand, that a writer so late as the time of Josiah should take his keynote from one of the very earliest of the writing prophets two centuries before him; and, on the other hand, that these so-called "prophetic ideas," so suitable to the time of 'the kindness of youth and love of espousals' (Jer 2 2), should have found no place in the mind of that "prophet" by whom the Lord brought Israel out of Egypt (Hos 12 13). The ministry of Moses was to enforce the duty of whole-hearted allegiance to the God who had made special choice of Israel and claimed them as His own. Nor was Hosea the first, as it is sometimes alleged, to represent the religious history of Israel as a defection. Moses had experience of their apostasy under the very shadow of Sinai, and all his life long had to bear with a stiff-necked and rebellious people. Then, again, if these "Deuteronomic" ideas are found so clearly expressed in Hosea, why should it be necessary to postulate a late Deuteronomist going back upon older books, and editing and supplementing them with Deuteronomic matter? If Moses sustained anything like the function which all tradition assigned to him, and if, as all confess, he was the instrument of molding the tribes into one people, those addresses contained in the Book of Dt are precisely in the tone which would be adopted by a great leader in taking farewell of the people. And, if he did so, it is quite conceivable that his words would be treasured by the God-fearing men among his followers and successors, in that unbroken line of prophetic men to whose existence both Amos and Hosea appealed, and that they should be found coming to expression at the very dawn of written prophecy. Undoubtedly these two prophets took such a view, and regarded Moses as the first and greatest Deuteronomist.

HOSEN, hō'z'n. See BREECHES.

HOSHAI AH, hō-shā'ya (הוֹשִׁיעַ אֵה, hōsha'yāh, "whom Jeh helpeth"):

(1) Father of Jezeaniah (probably = Azariah, so LXX; cf. Jer 42 1 and 43 2 with 2 K 25 23 and note similar letters in names in Heb), who with other leaders antagonized the policy and counsel of Jeremiah after the fall of Jerus (Jer 42 1—43 7).

(2) A man, probably of Judah, who led half of the princes of Judah in procession at the dedication of the wall of Jerus (Neh 12 32).

HOSHAMA, hosh'a-ma, hō-shā'ma (הוֹשָׁמָה, hōshāmā, abbreviated from הוֹשִׁיעַ מָה, y'hōshāmā, "whom Jeh heareth"): One of the sons or descendants of Jeconiah, the captive king of Judah (1 Ch 3 18).

HOSHEA, hō-shē'a (הוֹשִׁעַ, hōshē'a, "salvation"; Ῥοσῆ, Hosē, 2 K 17 1—9): Son of Elah, the 19th and last king of Israel. The time was

1. A Satrap one of social revolution and dynastic of Assyria change. Of the last five kings of Israel, four had met their deaths by violence. Hoshea himself was one of these assassins (2 K 15 30), and the nominee of Tiglath-pileser III, whose annals read, "Pekah I slew, Hoshea I appointed over them." Though called king, Hoshea was thus really a satrap of Assyria and held his appointment only during good behavior. The realm which he administered was but the shadow of its former self. Tiglath-pileser had already carried into captivity the northern tribes of Zebulun, Naphtali, Asher and Dan; as also the two and a half tribes E. of the Jordan (2 K 15 29). Apart from those forming the kingdom of

2. The Reduced Kingdom of Israel Judah, there remained only Ephraim, Issachar, and the half-tribe of Manasseh. Isaiah refers to the fall of Syria in the words, "Damascus is taken away from being a city" (Isa 17 1), and to the foreign occupations of Northern Israel in the words, "He brought into contempt the land of Zebulun and the land of Naphtali . . . by the way of the sea, beyond the Jordan, Galilee of the nations" (Isa 9 1).

But Hosea is the prophet in whose writings we see most clearly the reflection of the politics of the

3. Hosea and Ephraim day, and the altered condition of things in Israel. In the 2d division of his book, chs 4—14, Hosea deals with a state of things which can only be subsequent to the first great deportation of Israelites, and therefore belongs to the reigns of Pekah and Hoshea. The larger part of the nation being removed, he addresses his utterances no longer to all Israel, but to Ephraim, the chief of the remaining tribes. This name he uses no less than 35 t, though not to the total exclusion of the term "Israel," as in 11 1, "When Israel was a child, then I loved him," the whole nation in such cases being meant. Of the 35 uses of "Ephraim," the first is, "Ephraim is joined to idols; let him alone" (4 17), and the last, "Ephraim shall say, What have I to do any more with idols?" (14 8), showing that, in the prophet's estimation, the idolatrous worship of Jeh, as associated with the golden calves of Dan and Bethel, lay at the root of the nation's calamities.

Over this shrunken and weakened kingdom—corresponding generally with the Samaritan district of the NT—Hoshea was placed

4. Hoshea's Position as the viceroy of a foreign power. The first official year of his governorship was 729, though he may have been appointed a few months earlier.

Tiglath-pileser III died in 727, so that three years' tribute was probably paid to Nineveh. There was, however, a political party in Samaria, which, ground down by cruel exactions, was for making an alliance with Egypt, hoping that, in the jealousy and antipathies of the two world-powers, it might find some relief or even a measure of independence. Hoshea, himself a prophet of the north, allows us to see beneath the surface of court life in Samaria. "They call unto Egypt, they go to Assyria" (7 11), and again, "They make a covenant with Assyria, and oil is carried into Egypt" (12 1). This political duplicity from which it was the king's prime duty

5. His Treasonable Action to save his people, probably took its origin about the time of Tiglath-pileser's death in 727. That event either caused or promoted the treasonable action, and the passage of large quantities of oil on the southward road was an object-lesson to be read of all men. On the accession of Shalmaneser IV—who is the Shalmaneser of the Bible (2 K 17 3; 18 9)—Hoshea would seem to have carried, or sent, the annual tribute for 726 to the treasury at Nineveh (2 K 17 3). The text is not clear as to who was the bearer of this tribute, but from the statement that Shalmaneser came up against him, and Hoshea became his servant, it may be presumed that the tribute for the first year after Tiglath-pileser's death was at first refused, then, when a military demonstration took place, was paid, and obedience promised. In such a case Hoshea would be required to attend at his suzerain's court and do homage to the sovereign.

This is what probably took place, not without inquiry into the past. Grave suspicions were thus

6. His Final Arrest aroused as to the loyalty of Hoshea, and on these being confirmed by the confession or discovery that messengers had passed to "So king of Egypt," and the further withholding of the tribute (2 K 17 4), Hoshea was arrested and shut up in prison. Here he disappears from history. Such was the ignominious end of a line of kings, not one of whom had, in all the vicissitudes of two and a quarter centuries, been in harmony with the theocratic spirit, or realized that the true welfare and dignity of the state lay in the unalloyed worship of Jeh.

With Hoshea in his hands, Shalmaneser's troops marched, in the spring or summer of 725, to the completion of Assyria's work in Pal.

7. Battle of Beth-arbel Isaiah has much to say in his 10th and 11th chs on the divinely sanctioned mission of "the Assyrian," and of the ultimate fate that should befall him for his pride and cruelty in carrying out his mission. The campaign was not a bloodless one. At Beth-arbel—at present unidentified—the hostile forces met, with the result that might have been expected. "Shalman spoiled Beth-arbel in the day of battle" (Hos 10 14). The defeated army took refuge behind the walls of Samaria, and the siege began. The city was well placed for purposes of defence, being built on the summit of a lonely hill, which was Omri's reason for moving the capital from Tirzah (1 K 16 24). It was probably during the continuance of the siege that Isaiah wrote his prophecy, "Woe to the crown of pride of the drunkards of Ephraim," etc (Isa 28), in which the hill of Samaria with its coronet of walls is compared to a diadem of flowers worn in a scene of revelry, which should fade and die. Micah's elegy on the fall of Samaria (ch 1) has the same topographical note, "I will pour down the stones thereof into the valley, and I will uncover the foundations thereof" (ver 6).

Shalmaneser's reign was one of exactly five years, December, 727 to December, 722, and the city fell in the 1st month of his successor's reign.

8. Fall of Samaria in 721 The history of its fall is summarized in Sargon's great Khorsabad inscription in these words, "Samaria I besieged, I captured. 27,290 of her inhabitants I carried away. 50 chariots I collected from their midst. The rest of their property I caused to be taken."

Hoshea's character is summed up in the qualified phrase, "He did evil in the sight of the Lord, yet not as the kings of Israel that were before

9. Hoshea's Character The meaning may be that, while not a high-principled man or of irreproachable life, he did not give to the idolatry of Bethel the official sanction and prominence which each of his 18 predecessors had done. According to Hos 10 6 the golden calf of Samaria was to be taken to Assyria, to the shame of its erstwhile worshippers.

W. SHAW CALDECOTT
HOSPITALITY, hos-pi-tal'i-ti, HOST, hōst (φιλοξενία, philoxenia, "love of strangers," ξένος, xénos, "guest," "friend"; πανδοχέυς, pandochéus, "innkeeper"):

1. Among Nomads When the civilization of a people has advanced so far that some traveling has become necessary, but not yet so far that traveling by individuals is a usual thing, then hospitality is a virtue indispensable to the life of the people. This stage of culture was that represented in ancient Pal and the stage whose customs are still preserved among the present-day Arabs of the desert. Hospitality is regarded as a right by the traveler, to whom it never occurs to thank his host as if for a favor. And hospitality is granted as a duty by the host, who himself may very soon be dependent on some one else's hospitality. But none the less, both in OT times and today, the granting of that right is surrounded by an etiquette that has made Arabian hospitality so justly celebrated. The traveler is made the literal master of the house during his stay; his host will perform for him the most servile offices, and will not even sit in his presence without express request. To the use of the guest is given over all that his host possesses, stopping not even short of the honor of wife or daughter. "Be we not all," say the poor nomads, 'guests of Ullah? Has God given unto them, God's guest shall partake with them thereof: if they will not for God render his own, it should not go well with them'" (Doughty, Arabia Deserta, 1, 228). The host is in duty bound to defend his guest against all comers and to lay aside any personal hatred—the murderer of a father is safe as the guest of the son.

An exquisite example of the etiquette of hospitality is found in Gen 18 1-8. The very fact that the three strangers have passed by Abraham's door gives him the privilege of entertaining them. When he sees them approaching he runs to beg the honor of their turning in to him, with oriental courtesy depreciates the feast that he is about to lay before them as "a morsel of bread," and stands by them while they eat. Manoah (Jgs 13 15) is equally pressing although more matter-of-fact, while Jethro (Ex 2 20) sends out that the stranger may be brought in. And Job (31 32) repels the very thought that he could let the sojourner be unprovided for. The one case where a breach of hospitality receives praise is that of Jael (Jgs 4-5), perhaps to be referred to degeneration of customs in the conflicts with the Canaanites or (perhaps more plausibly) to literary-critical considerations, according to which in Jgs 5 Sisera is not represented as entering Jael's tent or possibly not as actually tasting the food, a state of affairs misunderstood in Jgs 4, written under later circumstances of city life. (For contrasting opinions see "Jael" in EB and HDB.)

It is well to understand that to secure the right to hospitality it is not necessary, even in modern times, for the guest to eat with his host, still less to eat salt specifically. Indeed, guests arriving after sunset and departing the next morning do not, as a rule, eat at all in the tent of the host. It is sufficient to enter the tent, to grasp a tent-pin, or even, under certain circumstances, to invoke the name of a man as host. On the other hand, the bond of hospitality is certainly strengthened by eating with one's host, or the bond may actually be created by eating food belonging to him, even by stealth or in an act of theft. Here a quite different set of motives is at work. The idea here is that of kinship arising from participation in a common sacrificial meal, and the modern Arab still terms the animal killed for his guest the dhabīḥah or "sacrifice" (cf HDB, II, 428). This concept finds its rather materialistic expression in the theory that after the processes of digestion are completed (a time estimated as two nights and the included day), the bond lapses if it is not renewed. There seem to be various references in the Bible to some such idea of a "table-bond" (Ps 41 9, e.g.), but hardly in connection directly with hospitality. For a discussion of them see BREAD; GUEST; SACRIFICE.

In the city, naturally, the exercise of hospitality was more restricted. Where travel was great, doubtless commercial provision for the

4. In the City travelers was made from a very early day (cf Lk 10 34 and see INN), and at all events free hospitality to all comers would have been unbearably abused. Lot in Sodom (Gen 19) is the nomad who has preserved his old ideas, although settled in the city, and who thinks of the "shadow of his roof" (ver 8) as his tent. The same is true of the old man in Gibeah of Jgs 19 16 ff. And the sin of Sodom and of Gibeah is not that wanderers cannot find hospitality so much as it is that they are unsafe in the streets at night. Both Lot and "the old man,"

however, are firm in their duty and willing to sacrifice their daughters for the safety of their guests. (Later ideas as to the position of woman should not be read back into these narratives.) However, when the city-dweller Rahab refuses to surrender her guests (Josh 2), her reason is not the breach of hospitality involved but her fear of Jeh (ver 9). When Abraham's old slave is in Nahor, and begs a night's lodging for himself and his camels, he accompanies the request with a substantial present, evidently conceived of as pay for the same (Gen 24 22f). Such also are the modern conditions; cf Benzinger-Socin in Baedeker's Palestine, xxxv, who observe that "in-mates" of private houses "are aware that Franks always pay, and therefore receive them gladly." None the less, in NT times, if not earlier, and even at present, a room was set apart in each village for the use of strangers, whose expenses were borne by the entire community. Most interpreters consider that the katáluma of Lk 2 7 was a room of this sort, but this opinion cannot be regarded as quite certain. But many of the wealthier city-dwellers still strive to attain a reputation for hospitality, a zeal that naturally was found in the ancient world as well.

Christ's directions to the apostles to "take nothing for their journey" (Mk 6 8, etc) presupposes that they were sure of always finding hospitality. Indeed, it is assumed that they may even make their own choice of hosts (Mt 10 11) and may stay as long as they choose (Lk 10 7). In this case, however, the claims of the travelers to hospitality are accentuated by the fact that they are bearers of good tidings for the people, and it is in view of this latter fact that hospitality to them becomes so great a virtue—the "cup of cold water" becomes so highly meritorious because it is given "in the name of a disciple" (Mt 10 42; cf ver 41, and Mk 9 41). Rejection of hospitality to one of Christ's "least brethren" (almost certainly to be understood as disciples) is equivalent to the rejection of Christ Himself (Mt 25 43; cf ver 35). It is not quite clear whether in Mt 10 14 and vs, simple refusal of hospitality is the sin in point or refusal to hear the message or both.

In the Dispersion, the Jew who was traveling seemed always to be sure of finding entertainment from the Jews resident in whatever city he might happen to be passing through. The importance of this fact for the spread of early Christianity is incalculable. To be sure, some of the first missionaries may have been men who were able to bear their own traveling expenses or who were merchants that taught the new religion when on business tours. In the case of soldiers or slaves their opportunity to carry the gospel into new fields came often through the movements of the army or of their masters. And it was by an "infiltration" of this sort, probably, rather than by any specific missionary effort that the church of Rome, at least, was founded. See ROMANS, EPISTLE TO THE. But the ordinary missionary, whether apostle (in any sense of the word) or evangelist, would have been helpless if it had not been that he could count so confidently on the hospitality everywhere. From this fact comes one reason why St. Paul, for instance, could plan tours of such magnitude with such assurance: he knew that he would not have to face any problem of sustenance in a strange city (Rom 16 23).

As the first Christian churches were founded, the exercise of hospitality took on a new aspect, esp. after the breach with the Jews had begun. Not only did the traveling Christian look naturally to his brethren for hospitality, but the individual churches looked to the traveler for fostering the sense of the unity of the church throughout the world. Hospitality became a virtue in-

7. In the Churches dispensable to the well-being of the church—one reason for the emphasis laid on it (Rom 12 13; 16 1f; He 13 2). As the organization of the churches became more perfected, the exercise of hospitality grew to be an official duty of the ministry and a reputation for hospitality was a prerequisite in some cases (1 Tim 3 2; 5 10; Tit 1 8). The exercise of such hospitality must have become burdensome at times (1 Pet 4 9), and as false teachers began to appear in the church a new set of problems was created in discriminating among applicants for hospitality. 2 and 3 Jn reflect some of the difficulties. For the later history of hospitality in the church interesting matter will be found in the Didache, chs xi, xii, Apology of Aristides, ch xv, and Lucian's Death of Peregrinus, ch xvi. The church certainly preferred to err by excess of the virtue.

An evaluation of the Bib. directions regarding hospitality for modern times is extremely difficult on account of the utterly changed conditions. Be it said at once, esp., that certain well-meant criticism of modern missionary methods, with their boards, organized finance, etc, on the basis of Christ's directions to the Twelve, is a woeful misapplication of Bib. teaching. The hospitality that an apostle could count on in his own day is something that the modern missionary simply cannot expect and something that it would be arrant folly for him to expect (Weinel, Die urchristliche und die heutige Mission, should be read by everyone desiring to compare modern missions with the apostolic). In general, the basis for hospitality has become so altered that the special virtue has become merged in the larger field of charitable enterprise of various sorts. The modern problem nearest related to the old virtue is the question of providing for the necessities of the indigent traveler, a distinctly minor problem, although a very real one, in the general field of social problems that the modern church has to study. In so far as the NT exhortations are based on missionary motives there has been again a merging into general appeals for missions, perhaps specialized occasionally as appeals for traveling expense. The "hospitality" of today, by which is meant the entertainment of friends or relatives, hardly comes within the Bib. use of the term as denoting a special virtue.

HOSTAGE, hos'tāj. See WAR.

HOST OF HEAVEN (צָבָא הַשָּׁמַיִם, ṣbha' ha-shamayim): The expression is employed in the OT to denote (1) the stars, frequently as objects of idolatry (Dt 4 19; 17 3; 2 K 17 16; 21 3.5; 23 4f; Jer 8 2; 19 13; Zeph 1 5), but also as witnesses in their number, order and splendor, to the majesty and providential rule and care of Jeh (Isa 34 4; 40 26, "callest them all by name"; 45 12; Jer 33 22); and (2) the angels (1 K 22 19; 2 Ch 18 18; Neh 9 6; cf Ps 103 21).

(1) Star-worship seems to have been an enticement to Israel from the first (Dt 4 19; 17 3; Am 5 26; cf Acts 7 42.43), but attained special prominence in the days of the later kings of Judah. The name of Manasseh is particularly connected with it. This king built altars for "all the host of heaven" in the courts of the temple (2 K 21 3.5). Josiah destroyed these altars, and cleansed the temple from the idolatry by putting down the priests and burning the vessels associated with it (2 K 23 4.5.12).

(2) In the other meaning of the expression, the angels are regarded as forming Jeh's "host" or army, and He himself is the leader of them—"Jeh of hosts" (Isa 31 4, etc.)—though this designation has a much wider reference. See ANGELS; ASTRONOMY; LORD OF HOSTS; cf Oehler, Theol of OT, II, 270 ff (ET).

HOSTS, hōsts, LORD OF. See LORD OF HOSTS.

HOTHAM, hō'tham, HOTHAN, hō'than (הוֹתָם, hōthām, "seal"):

(1) An Asherite, son of Heber, family of Beriah (1 Ch 7 32).

(2) An Aroerite, father of two of the mighty men of David (1 Ch 11 44). AV, following LXX Χωθάν, Chōthán, has, incorrectly, Hothan.

HOTHIR, hō'thir (הוֹתִיר, hōthīr, "abundance"): Mentioned in 1 Ch 25 4.28 among the sons of Heman, and one of those set apart by David for the musical service of the house of God (cf ver 6).

HOUGH, hok. See HOCK.

HOURL, our (שָׂעָה, sha'āthā, שָׂעָה, shē'ā; ὥρα, hōra): Hour as a division of the day does not occur in the OT; the term shē'ā (sha'āthā) found in Dnl, is Aram., and as used there denotes a short period or point of time of no definite length (Dan 3 6.15; 4 33 [Heb 30]; 5 5). The Gr hōra is commonly used in the NT in the same way, as "that same hour," "from that hour," etc, but it also occurs as a division of the day, as, "the third hour," "the ninth hour," etc. The Hebrews would seem to have become acquainted with this division of time through the Babylonians, but whether before the captivity we are not certain. The mention of the sun dial of Ahaz would seem to indicate some such reckoning of time during the monarchy. See TIME.

HOURS OF PRAYER: The Mosaic law did not regulate the offering of prayer, but fully recognized its spontaneous character. In what manner or how far back in Jewish history the sacrificial prayer, mentioned in Lk 1 10, originated no one knows. In the days of Christ it had evidently become an institution. But ages before that, stated hours of prayer were known and religiously observed by all devout Jews. It evidently belonged to the evolutionary process of Jewish worship, in connection with the temple-ritual. Devout Jews, living at Jerus, went to the temple to pray (Lk 18 10; Acts 3 1). The pious Jews of the Diaspora opened their windows "toward Jerus" and prayed "toward" the place of God's presence (1 K 8 48; Dnl 6 10; Ps 5 7). The regular hours of prayer, as we may infer from Ps 55 17 and Dnl 6 10, were three in number. The first coincided with the morning sacrifice, at the 3d hour of the morning, at 9 AM therefore (Acts 2 15). The second was at the 6th hour, or at noon, and may have coincided with the thanksgiving for the chief meal of the day, a religious custom apparently universally observed (Mt 15 36; Acts 27 35). The 3d hour of prayer coincided with the evening sacrifice, at the ninth hour (Acts 3 1; 10 30). Thus every day, as belonging to God, was religiously subdivided, and regular seasons of prayer were assigned to the devout believer. Its influence on the development of the religious spirit must have been incalculable, and it undoubtedly is, at least in part, the solution of the riddle of the preservation of the Jewish faith in the cruel centuries of its bitter persecution. Mohammedanism borrowed this feature of worship from the Jews and early Christians, and made it one of the chief pillars of its faith. HENRY E. DOSKER

I. Cave Dwellings.—The earliest permanent habitations of the prehistoric inhabitants of Pal were the natural caves which abound throughout the country. As the people increased and grouped themselves into communities, these abodes were supplemented by systems of artificial caves which, in some cases, developed into extensive burrowings of many adjoining compartments, having in each system several entrances. These entrances were usually cut through the roof down a few steps, or simply dropped to the floor from the rock surface. The sinking was shallow and the headroom low but sufficient for the undersized troglodites who were the occupiers. Fig. 1 is the plan of an elaborate system of cave dwellings from Gezer, all adjoining and approached by 9 separate entrances (PEFS, October, 1905).

II. Stone- and Mud-Brick-built Houses.—There are many references to the use of caves as dwellings in the OT. Lot dwelt with his two daughters in a cave (Gen 19 30). Elijah, fleeing from Jezebel, lodged in a cave (1 K 19 9). The natural successor to the cave was the stone-built hut, and just as the loose field-boulders and the stones, quarried from the caves, served their first and most vital uses in the building of defence walls, so did they later become material for the first hut. Caves, during the rainy season, were faulty dwellings, as at the time when protection was most needed, they were being flooded through the surface openings which formed their entrances. The rudest cell built of rough stones in mud and covered with a roof of brushwood and mud was at first sufficient. More elaborate plans of several apartments, entering from what may be called a living-room, followed as a matter of course, and these, huddled together, constituted the homes of the people. Mud-brick buildings (Job 4 19) of similar plan occur, and to protect this friable material from the weather, the walls were sometimes covered with a casing of stone slabs, as at Lachish. (See Bliss, A Mound of Many Cities.) Generally speaking, this rude type of building prevailed, although, in some of the larger buildings, square dressed and jointed stones were used. There is little or no sign of improvement until the period of the Hellenistic influence, and even then the improvement was slight, so far as the homes of the common people were concerned.

Figs. 2 and 3 are the isometric sketch and plan showing construction of a typical small house from Gezer. The house is protected and requirements, but in the main, this plan may be taken as typical. When members of a family married, extra accommodation was required. Additions were made as well as could be arranged on the cramped site, and in consequence, plans often became such a meaningless jumble that it is impossible to identify the respective limits of adjoining houses. The forecourt was absorbed and crushed out of existence, so that in many of the plans recovered the arrangement shown in Figs. 2 and 3 is lost. Fig. 4 shows the elevation of the house from the court.

(1) Corner-stone (כִּנְנֹר, pinnāh, Isa 28 16; Jer 51 26; λίθος ἀκρογωνιαίος, lithos akrogonaios, 1 Pet 2 6).—In the construction of rude boulder walls, more esp. on a sloping site, as can be seen today in the highlands of Scotland and Wales, a large projecting boulder was built into the lower angle-course.

to find floors of beaten clay similar to the native floor of the present day. Stone slabs were sparingly used, and only appear in the houses of the great.

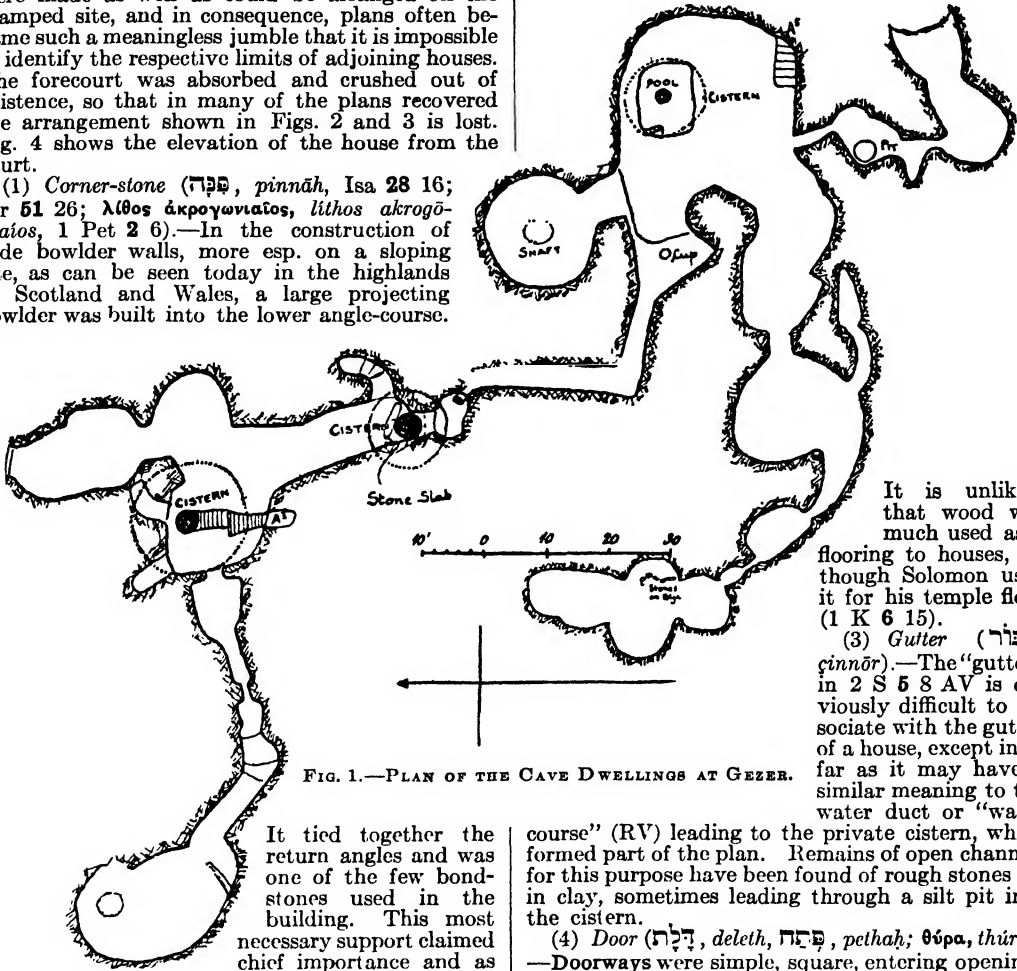

FIG. 1.—PLAN OF THE CAVE DWELLINGS AT GEZER.

It is unlikely that wood was much used as a flooring to houses, although Solomon used it for his temple floor (1 K 6 15).

(3) Gutter (צִנּוֹר, cinnōr).—The “gutter” in 2 S 5 8 AV is obviously difficult to associate with the gutter of a house, except in so far as it may have a similar meaning to the water duct or “water

It tied together the return angles and was one of the few bond-stones used in the building. This most necessary support claimed chief importance and as such assumed a figurative meaning frequently used (Isa 28 16; 1 Pet 2 6; see CORNER-STONE). The importance given to the laying of a sure foundation is further emphasized by the dedication rites in common practice, evidence of which has been found on various sites in Pal (see Excavations of Gezer). The discovery of human remains placed diagonally below the foundations of the returning angle of the house gives proof of the exercise of dedication rites both before and after the conquest. Hiel sacrificed his firstborn to the foundations of Jericho and his youngest son to the gates thereof (1 K 16 34). But this was in a great cause compared with a similar sacrifice to a private dwelling. The latter manifests a respect scarcely borne out by the miserable nature of the houses so dedicated. At the same time, it gives proof of the frequent collapse of structures which the winter rains made inevitable and at which superstition trembled. The fear of pending disaster to the man who failed to make his sacrifice is recorded in Dt 20 5: “What man is there that hath built a new house, and hath not dedicated it? let him go and return to his house, lest he die in the battle.” See illustration, p. 550

(2) Floor (כָּרָק, karkā).—When houses were built on the rock outcrop, the floor was roughly leveled on the rock surface, but it is more common course” (RV) leading to the private cistern, which formed part of the plan. Remains of open channels for this purpose have been found of rough stones set in clay, sometimes leading through a silt pit into the cistern.

(4) Door (דֶּלֶת, deleth, פֶּתַח, pethah; θύρα, thúra).—Doorways were simple, square, entering openings in the wall with a stone or wood lintel (mashkōph, Ex 12 22.23; ʿayil, 1 K 6 31) and a stone threshold raised slightly above the floor. It is easy to imagine the earliest wooden door as a simple movable boarded cover with back bars, fixed vertically by a movable bar slipped into sockets in the stone jambs. Doorposts (saph, Ezk 41 16) appear to have been in use, but, until locks were introduced, it is difficult to imagine a reason for them. Posts, when introduced, were probably let into the stone at top and bottom, and, unlike our present door frame, had no head-piece. When no wood was used, the stone jambs of the opening constituted the doorposts. To the present day the post retains its function as commanded in Dt 6 9; 11 20, and in it is fitted a small case containing a parchment on which is written the exhortation to obedience.

(5) Hinge (פֶּתַח, pōth, 1 K 7 50; צֵיר, ṣīr, Prov 26 14).—Specimens of sill and head sockets of stone have been discovered which suggest the use of the pivot hinge, the elongated swinging stile of the door being let into the sockets at top and bottom. A more advanced form of construction was necessary to this type of door than in the previous instance, and some little skill was required to brace it so that it would hold together. The construction of doors and windows is an interesting question, as it is in these two details that the joinery craft first claimed development. There is no indication, however, of anything of the nature of advancement, and it seems probable that there was none.

(6) Lock and key ("lock," man'ul, Neh 3 3 ff; Cant 5 5; "key," maphlēḥ, Jgs 3 25; fig. Isa 22 22; kleis, Mt 16 19, etc).—In later Hellenic times a sort of primitive lock and key appeared, similar to the Arab. type. See Excavations of Gezer, I, 197, and illustration in art. KEY.

Fig. 5.—Window.

(7) Threshold (שָׁפַח, ṣaph, 1 K 14 17; Ezk 40 6 ff; מִפְתָּן, miphtān, 1 S 5 4.5; Ezk 9 3, etc).—Next to the corner-stone, the threshold was specially sacred, and in many instances foundation-sacrifices have been found buried under the threshold. In later times, when the Hebrews became weaned of this unholy practice, the rite remained with the substitution of a lamp inclosed between two bowls as a symbol of the life. See GEZER.

(8) Hearth (אֵשׁ, 'āh, Jer 36 22.23, RV "brazier"; כִּיּוֹר, kiyyōr).—The references in the OT and the frequent discovery of hearths make it clear that so much provision for heating had been made. It is unlikely, however, that chimneys were provided. The smoke from the wood or charcoal fuel was allowed to find its way through the door and windows and the many interstices occurring in workmanship of the worst possible description. The "chimney" referred to (Hos 13 3) is a doubtful tr. The "fire in the brazier" (Jer 36 22 RV) which burned before the king of Judah in his "winter house" was probably of charcoal. The modern natives, during the cold season, huddle around and warm their hands at a tiny glow in much the same way as their ancient predecessors. The use of cow and camel dung for baking-oven (tannūr) fires appears to have continued from the earliest time to the present day (Ezk 4 15). See also HEARTH.

Fig. 6.—Living-Room of House.

(9) Window (θύρα, thuris, Acts 20 9; 2 Cor 11 33).—It would appear that windows were often simple openings in the wall which were furnished with some method of closing, such as is suggested in Fig. 5, which, it may be conjectured, was somewhat the same as the primitive door previously mentioned. The window of the ark (hallōn, Gen 8 6), the references in Gen 26 8; Josh 2 15, and the window from which Jezebel looked (2 K 9 30), were presumably of the casement class. Ahaziah fell through a lattice (ṣḥakkāh) in the same palace, and the same word is used for the "networks" (1 K 7 41) "covering the bowls of the capitals," and in Cant 2 9, "through the lattice" (ḥārakkīm). It would appear, therefore, that some variety of treatment existed, and that the simple window opening with casement and the opening filled in with a lattice or grill were distinct. Windows were small, and, according to the Mish, were kept not less than the country; see Excavations of Gezer, I, 190; PEFS, Warren's letters, 46. "They let him down through the tiles [kéramos, kéramos] with his couch into the midst before Jesus" (Lk 5 19) refers to the breaking through of a roof similar to this. The roof ("housetop," gagh; δῶμα, dōma) was an important part of every house and was subjected to many uses. It was used for worship (2 K 23 12; Jer 19 13; 32 29; Zeph 1 5; Acts 10 9). Absalom spread his tent on the "top of the house" (2 S 16 22). In the Feast of the Tabernacles temporary booths (šukkāh) were erected on the housetops. The people, as is their habit today, gathered together on the roof as a common meeting-place on high days and holidays (Jgs 16 27). The 6 ft. from floor to sill. The lattice was open, without glass filling, and in this connection there is the interesting figurative reference in Isa 54 12 AV, "windows of agates," tr<sup>d</sup> in RV "pinnacles of rubies." Heaven is spoken of as having "windows" ('ārubbāh) for rain (Gen 7 11; 8 2; 2 K 7 2, etc).

(10) Roofs (גַּח, gagh; στέγη, stégē).—These were flat, and their construction is illustrated in Figs. 2 and 6. Cf "The beams of our house are cedars, and our rafters are firs" (Cant 1 17). To get over the difficulty of the larger spans, a common practice was to introduce a main beam (kūrāh) carried on the walls and strengthened by one or more intermediate posts let into stone sockets laid on the floor. Smaller timbers as joists ("rafters," rāhū) were spaced out and covered in turn with brushwood; the final covering, being of mud mixed with chopped straw, was beaten and rolled. A tiny stone roller is found on every modern native roof, and is used to roll the mud into greater solidity every year on the advent of the first rains. Similar rollers have been found among the ancient remains throughout wild wranglings which can be heard in any modern native village, resulting in vile accusations and exposure of family secrets hurled from the housetops of the conflicting parties, illustrate the passage, "And what ye have spoken in the ear in the inner chambers shall be proclaimed upon the housetops" (Lk 12 3).

(1) Upper chambers and stairs.—It is certain that there were upper chambers ('ālīyāh; ὑπερῶν, hyperōn, Acts 9 37, etc) to some of the houses. Ahaziah was fatally injured by falling from the window of

2. Houses of More than One Story his palace, and a somewhat similar fate befell his mother, Jezebel (2 K 1 2; 9 33). The escape of the spies from the house on the wall at Jericho (Josh 2 15) and that of Paul from Damascus (2 Cor 11 33) give substantial evidence of window openings at a considerable height. Elijah carried the son of the widow of Zarephath "up into the chamber." The Last Supper was held in an upper chamber (Mk 14 15). Some sort of stairs (ma'ālāh) of stone or wood must have existed, and the lack of the remains of stone steps suggests that they were wood steps, probably in the form of ladders.

(2) Palaces and castles ('armōn, bīrah, hēkhāl; αὐλή, αὐλή, παρεμβολή, parembolē).—These were part of every city and were more elaborate in plan, raised in all probability to some considerable height. The Can. castle discovered by Macalister at Gezer shows a building of enormously thick walls and small rooms. Reisner has unearthed Ahab's palace at Samaria, revealing a plan of considerable area. Solomon's palace is detailed in 1 K 7 (see TEMPLE). In this class may also be included the megalithic fortified residences with the beehive guard towers of an earlier date, described by Dr. Mackenzie (PEF, I).

Walls were plastered (Lev 14 43 48), and small fragments of painted (Jer 22 14) plaster discovered from time to time show that some attempt at mural decoration was made, usually in the form of crudely painted line ornament. Walls were recessed here and there into various forms of cupboards (q.v.) at various levels. The smaller cuttings in the wall were probably for lamps, and in the larger and deeper recesses bedmats may have been kept and garments stored. Fig. 6 shows the living-room of an ordinary house, as previously described.

III. Other Meanings.—The word has often the sense of "household," and this term is frequently substituted in RV for "house" of AV (e.g. Ex 12 3; 2 K 7 11; 10 5; 15 5; Isa 36 3; 1 Cor 1 11; 1 Tim 5 14); in certain cases for phrases with "house" RV has "at home" (Acts 2 46; 5 42). See HOUSE OF GOD; HOUSEHOLD.

HOUSE, GARDEN. See GARDEN HOUSE.

HOUSE OF GOD: In Gen 28 17.22 = BETHEL (q.v.). In Jgs, 1 and 2 Ch, Ezr, Neh, Ps, etc (bēth hā-'ēlōhīm), a designation of the sanctuary = "house of Jeh" (of the tabernacle, Jgs 18 31; 20 18.26 AV; of the temple, 1 Ch 9 11; 24 5 AV; 2 Ch 5 14; Ps 42 4; Isa 2 3, etc; of the 2d temple, Ezr 5 8.15; Neh 6 10; 13 11; cf Mt 12 4). Spiritually, in the NT, the "house of God" (oikos theou) is the church or community of believers (1 Tim 3 15; He 10 21; 1 Pet 4 17; cf 1 Cor 3 9.16.17; 1 Pet 2 5).

HOUSEHOLD, hous'hōld: Three words are usually found in the Bible where the family is indicated. These three are the Heb word bayith and the Gr words oikia and oikos. The unit of the national life of Israel, from the very beginning, was found in the family. In the old patriarchal days each family was complete within itself, the oldest living sire being the unquestioned head of the whole, possessed of almost arbitrary powers. The house and the household are practically synonymous. God had called Abraham "that he might command his children and household after him" (Gen 18 19). The Passover-lamb was to be eaten by the "household" (Ex 12 3). The "households" of the rebels in the camp of Israel shared their doom (Nu 16 31-33; Dt 11 6). David's household shares his humiliation (2 S 15 16); the children everywhere in the OT are the bearers of the sins of the fathers. Human life is not a conglomerate of individuals; the family is its center and unit.

Nor is it different in the NT. The curse and the blessing of the apostles are to abide on a house, according to its attitude (Mt 10 13). A divided house falls (Mk 3 25). The household believes with the head thereof (Jn 4 53; Acts 16 15.34). Thus the households became the nuclei for the early life of the church, e.g. the house of Prisca and Aquila at Rome (Rom 16 5), of Stephanas (1 Cor 16 15), of Onesiphorus (2 Tim 1 16), etc. No wonder that the early church made so much of the family life. And in the midst of all our modern, rampant individualism, the family is still the throbbing heart of the church as well as of the nation.

HOUSEHOLDER, hous'hōl-dēr (οικοδεσπότης, oikodespōtēs): The word occurs in Mt 13 27.52; 20 1; 21 33, for the master or owner of a "household," i.e. of servants (δούλοι). The Gr word emphasizes the authority of the master.

HOUSETOP, hous'top. See HOUSE.

HOW: Represents various Heb and Gr words, interrogative, interjectional and relative. Its different uses refer to (1) the manner or way, e.g. Gen 44 34, "How shall I go up to my father?" ('ēkh); Mt 6 28, "how they grow" (pōs); 1 Cor 15 35, "How are the dead raised?" (2) degree, extent, frequently, "how great" (Dnl 4 3, māh; Mk 5 19, hōsos, "how much"); "how many" (Mt 27 13, pōsos); "how much" (Acts 9 13, hosos); "how much more" (Mt 7 11, posos; 1 S 14 30, aph kī); "how oft" (Ps 78 40, kammāh; Mt 18 21, posakis); "how long" (Job 7 19, kammāh; Mt 17 17, hōōs pōte), etc; (3) the reason, wherefore, etc (Mt 18 12; Lk 2 49, tis); (4) means—by what means? (Jn 3 4.9, pōs); (5) cause (Jn 12 34; Acts 2 8; 4 21, pōs); (6) condition, in what state, etc (Lk 23 55, hōs; Acts 15 36, pōs; Eph 6 21, tis); "how" is sometimes used to emphasize a statement or exclamation (2 S 1 19.25.27, "How are the mighty fallen!"); "how" is also used for "that" (Gen 30 29, 'ēth 'āsher, frequently "how that"; Ex 9 29, kī most frequently, in the NT, hōti, Mt 12 5; 16 12.21; Acts 7 25; Rom 7 1, etc, in AV).

RV has "wherefore" for "how" (Gen 38 29, m "how"); has "what" (Jgs 13 12; 1 K 12 6; Job 22 13; 1 Cor 14 26), omits (2 Cor 13 5); has "how that" (1 S 2 22); "that" (1 Ch 18 9; Lk 1 58; Gal 4 13; Jas 2 22; Rev 2 2); has "that even" for "how that" (He 12 17); "What is this?" for "How is it that?" (Lk 16 2), omits "How is it?" (Mk 2 16, different text); has "Do ye not yet," for "How is it that?" (Mk 8 21); "Have ye not yet?" (Mk 4 40, different text); "what" for "how much" (Lk 19 15, different text); omits "how that" (Lk 7 22); "then how" (Jas 2 24); has "cannot" for "How can he" (1 Jn 4 20); omits "How hast thou" (Job 26 3); "how is" (Jer 51 41); has "how" for "the fashion which" (Gen 6 15); for "and" (Ex 18 1), for "what" (Jgs 18 24; 1 S 4 16; 1 Cor 7 16), for "why" (Job 19 28; 31 1; Jer 2 33; Gal 2 14), for "when" (Job 37 15), for "for" (Ps 42 4), for "but God" (Prov 21 12), for "whereunto" (Mk 4 30); for "by what means" (Lk 8 36; Jn 9 21), for "how greatly" (Phil 1 8); "how that" for "because" (Ezk 6 9; 1 Thess 1 5), for "and how" (Acts 20 20); "know how to" for "can" (Mt 16 3); "how" for "by whom" (Am 7 2.5).

"How" in compounds gives us Howbeit (how be it). It is the tr of 'ulām, "but," "truly," "yet" (Jgs 18 29); of 'akh, "certainly," "only" (1 S 8 9); of 'ephēs, "moreover," etc (2 S 12 14); of kēn, "so," "thus" (2 Ch 32 31); of raḥ, "only," "surely," "nevertheless" (1 K 11 13); of allā, "but," etc (Jn 7 27; Acts 7 48; 1 Cor 8 7, etc); of dē, "but," etc (Jn 6 23); of mētoi (Jn 13 13 AV); many other instances.

For "howbeit," RV has frequently "but" (2 K 12 13, etc), "and" (2 Ch 21 20, Mk 5 19), "surely" (ERV) (Job 30 24), "now" (Jn 11 13), "yet" (2 Cor 11 21), "nay, did" (He 3 16); omits (Mt 17 21, different text); it has "howbeit" for "but" (2 K 12 3; Lk 19 27; Jn 5 34, etc.), for "also" (Lev 23 27.39), for "nevertheless" (Nu 13 28; 1 K 22 43; Mk 14 36; Lk 13 33 ERV; 18 8; 2 Tim 2 19), for "notwithstanding" (Josh 22 19; Lk 10 20 ERV, "nevertheless" ARV; Phil 4 14), for "nay" (Rom 7 7).

Howsoever (in what manner soever, although, however) is the tr of kōl 'āsher, "all that which," etc (Zeph 3 7, "howsoever I punished them," RV "according to all that I have appointed concerning her," m "howsoever I have punished her"; ERV omits "have"); of raḳ, "only," "surely," "nevertheless" (Jgs 19 20); of yhī-māh, "let be what" (2 S 18 22.23, RV "but come what may"); in 2 S 24 3 "how" and "soever" are separated (kāhēm), "how many soever they may be," lit. "as they and as they." W. L. WALKER

HOZAI, hō'zā-i (חֲזַי, hōzay, or as it stands at the close of the verse in question, 2 Ch 33 19, חֲזַי, hōzāy; LXX τῶν ὁράωντων, tōn horōntōn; Vulg "Hozai"; AV the seers; AVm "Hosai"; ARV "Hozai," ARVm "the seers." LXX not improbably reads חֲזַיִם, ha-hōzīm, as in ver 18; an easy error, since there we find חֲזַיִם, hōzīm, and here חֲזַיִם, hōzīm, "the words of the seers," and here חֲזַיִם, hōzīm, "the words of Hozai." Kittel, following Budde, conjectures as the original reading חֲזַיִם, hōzīm, "his [Manasseh's] seers": A historiographer of Manasseh, king of Judah. Thought by many of the Jews, incorrectly, to be the prophet Isaiah, who, as we learn from 2 Ch 26 22, was historiographer of a preceding king, Uzziah. This "History of Hozai" has not come down to us. The prayer of Manasseh, mentioned in 33 12 f. 18 f and included in this history, suggested the apocryphal book, "The Prayer of Manasses," written, probably, in the 1st cent. BC. See APOCRYPHA.

HUCKSTER, huk'stēr: A retailer of small wares, provisions, or the like; a peddler. "A huckster shall not be acquitted of sin" (Sir 26 29). Neither a merchant nor a huckster is without sin.

HUKKOK, huk'ok (חֻקֹּק, hukkōk): A town on the border of Naphtali named with Aznoth-tabor (Josh 19 34). It is usually identified with the village of yākūk, which stands on the W. of Wady el-'Amūd, to the N.W. of Gennesaret, about 4 miles from the sea. This would fall on the boundary of Zebulun and Naphtali, between Tabor and Han-nathon (Josh 19 14). The identification may be correct; but it seems too far from Tabor.

HUKOK, hū'kok. See HELKATH.

HUL, hul (חֻל, hul): The name of one of the "sons of Aram" in the list of nations descended from Noah, but a people of uncertain identity and location (Gen 10 23; 1 Ch 1 17).

HULDAH, hul'da (חֻלְדָּה, huldāh, "weasel"; Ὀλδα, Hōlda): A prophetess who lived in Jerus during the reign of Josiah. She was the wife of Shallum, keeper of the wardrobe, and resided in the "Mishneh" or second part or quarter of Jerus (location unknown). Cheyne says it should read, "She was sitting in the upper part of the gate of the Old City," i.e. in a public central place ready to receive any who wished to inquire of Jeh. He gives no reason for such a change of text. The standing and reputation of Huldah in the city are attested by the fact that she was consulted when the Book of the Law was discovered. The king, high priest, counsellors, etc, appealed to her rather than to Jeremiah, and her word was accepted by all as the word of Jeh (2 K 22 14-20; 2 Ch 34 22-29).

HUMAN SACRIFICE. See SACRIFICE, HUMAN.

HUMILIATION, hū-mil-i-ā'shun, OF CHRIST (Acts 8 33; Phil 2 8). See KENOSIS; PERSON OF CHRIST.

HUMILITY, hū-mil'i-ti (הִנָּחָה, 'ānāwāh; ταπεινοφροσύνη, tapeinophrosunē):

(1) The noun occurs in the OT only in Prov 15 33; 18 12; 22 4, but the adj. "humble" appears frequently as the tr of 'āni, 'ānāw, shāphāl, meaning also "poor," "afflicted"; the vb., as the tr of 'ānāh, "to afflict," "to humble," and of kāna, "to be or become humbled," cāna, "to be lowly," occurs in Mic 6 8. For "humble" (Ps 9 12; 10 12) RV has "poor"; Ps 10 17: 34 2; 69 32, "meek"; for "humbled" (Ps 35 13), "afflicted" (Isa 2 11; 10 33), "brought low"; for "He humbleth himself" (Isa 2 9), "is brought low," m "humbleth himself"; Ps 10 10, "boweth down"; tapeinophrosunē is tr'd "humility" (Col 2 18.23; 1 Pet 5 5); in several other places it is tr'd "lowliness" and "lowliness of mind"; tapeinōs is tr'd "humble" (Jas 4 6; 1 Pet 5 5), else where "lowly," etc.; 1 Pet 3 8, tapeinōphrōn, RV "humble-minded"; tapeinōō, "to humble," occurs frequently (Mt 18 4; 23 12, etc); tapeinōsis is "humiliation" (Acts 8 33); for "vile body" (Phil 3 21) RV gives "body of our humiliation."

(2) (a) In the OT as well as in the NT, humility is an essential characteristic of true piety, or of the man who is right with God. God humbles men in order to bring them to Himself (Dt 8 2.3, etc), and it is when men humble themselves before Him that they are accepted (1 K 21 29; 2 Ch 7 14, etc); to "walk humbly with thy God" completes the Divine requirements (Mic 6 8). In Ps 18 35 (2 S 22 36) the quality is ascribed to God Himself, "Thy gentleness [or condescension] hath made me great." Of "him that hath his seat on high" it is said, "[He] humbleth [shāphāl] himself to behold the things that are in heaven and in the earth" (Ps 113 6). It is in the humble heart that "the high and lofty One, . . . whose name is Holy" dwells (Isa 57 15; cf 66 2).

(b) The word tapeinophrosunē is not found in classical Gr (Lightfoot); in the NT (with the exception of 1 Pet 5 5) it is Pauline. In Gr pre-Christian writers tapeinos is, with a few exceptions in Plato and Platonic writers, used in a bad or inferior sense—as denoting something evil or unworthy. The prominence it gained in Christian thought indicates the new conception of man in relation to God, to himself, and to his fellows, which is due to Christianity. It by no means implies slavishness or servility; nor is it inconsistent with a right estimate of oneself, one's gifts and calling of God, or with proper self-assertion when called for. But the habitual frame of mind of a child of God is that of one who feels not only that he owes all his natural gifts, etc, to God, but that he has been the object of undeserved redeeming love, and who regards himself as being not his own, but God's in Christ. He cannot exalt himself, for he knows that he has nothing of himself. The humble mind is thus at the root of all other graces and virtues. Self-exaltation spoils everything. There can be no real love without humility. "Love," said Paul, "vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up" (1 Cor 13 4). As Augustine said, humility is first, second and third in Christianity.

(c) Jesus not only strongly impressed His disciples with the need of humility, but was in Himself its supreme example. He described Himself as "meek and lowly [tapeinos] in heart" (Mt 11 29). The first of the Beatitudes was to "the poor in spirit" (Mt 5 3), and it was "the meek" who should "inherit the earth." Humility is the way to true greatness: he who should "humble himself as this little child" should be "the greatest in the kingdom of heaven"; "Whosoever shall exalt himself shall be humbled; and whosoever shall humble himself shall be exalted" (Mt 18 4; 23 12; Lk

14 11; 18 14). To the humble mind truth is revealed (Mt 11 25; Lk 10 21). Jesus set a touching example of humility in His washing His disciples' feet (Jn 13 1-17).

(d) St. Paul, therefore, makes an earnest appeal to Christians (Phil 2 1-11) that they should cherish and manifest the Spirit of their Lord's humility—"in lowliness of mind each counting other better than himself," and adduces the supreme example of the self-emptying (kénōsis) of Christ: "Have this mind in you, which was also in Christ Jesus," etc. The rendering of heaulōn ekénōsen (Phil 2 7 AV) by "he humbled himself" has given rise to the designation of the Incarnation as "the Humiliation of Christ."

(e) There is a false humility which Paul warns against, a self-sought, "voluntary humility" (Col 2 18.23). This still exists in many forms, and has to be guarded against. It is not genuine humility when we humble ourselves with the feeling that we are greater than others, but only when we do not think of self at all. It is not alone the sense of sin that should create the humble spirit: Jesus had no sin. It belongs not merely to the creature, but even to a son in relation to God. There may be much self-satisfaction where sinfulness is confessed. We may be proud of our humility. It is necessary also always to beware of "the pride that apes humility."

HUMPS, humps: Appears in Isa 30 6 in ARV for "bunches" in AV.

HUMTAH, hum'ta (חֻמְתָּה, humtāh): An unidentified place mentioned between Aphekah and Hebron in the mountain of Judah (Josh 15 54).

HUNDRED, hun'dred (מֵאָה, mē'āh; ἑκατόν, hekátón). See NUMBER.

HUNGER, hun'gēr (רָעָב, rā'ābh; λιμός, limós (subs.), πεινάω, peināō (vb.)): (1) The desire for food, a physiological sensation associated with emptiness of the stomach, and dependent on some state of the mucous membrane; (2) starvation as the effect of want of food, as Ex 16 3; Isa 49 10; (3) to feel the craving for food as Dt 8 3; when used to indicate the condition due to general scarcity of food as Jer 38 9; Ezk 34 29 it is replaced in RV by "famine." The word is used to express the poverty which follows idleness and sloth (Prov 19 15). The absence of this condition is given as one of the characteristics of the future state of happiness (Isa 49 10; Ezk 34 29; Rev 7 16). Metaphorically the passionate striving for moral and spiritual rectitude is called hungering and thirsting after righteousness (Mt 5 6); and the satisfaction of the soul which receives Christ is described as a state in which "he shall not hunger" (Jn 6 35).

On two occasions it is said of Our Lord that He hungered (Mt 21 18; Lk 4 2); 9 t the old Eng. expression "an hungred" is used, the "an" being a prefix which indicates that the condition is being continued (Mt 12 1.3; 25 35.37.42.44; Mk 2 25; Lk 6 3 AV). In Mt 4 2 AV, "an hungred" has been changed to "hungered" in RV. "Hard be-stead and hungry" in Isa 8 21 means bested (that is, placed) in a condition of hardship, "sore distressed," ARV. The word occurs in Spenser, "Thus ill bestedd and fearful more of shame" (I, i, 24). The reference of the aggravation of the sensation of hunger when one who is starving awakes from a dream of food (Isa 29 8) is graphically illustrated by the experience of the antarctic voyager (Shackleton, Heart of the Antarctic, II, 9).

HUNTING, hunt'ing (צָיִד, ṣayīd): The hunting of wild animals for sport, or for the defence of men and flocks, or for food, was common in Western Asia and Egypt, esp. in early times. Some of the Egypt and Assyrian kings were great hunters in the first sense, for example Amenhotep III (1411-1375 BC), "a lion-hunting and bull-baiting Pharaoh," who boasted of having slain 76 bulls in the course of one expedition, and of having killed at one time or other 102 lions; and the Assyrian conqueror, Tiglath-pileser I (c 1100 BC), who claimed 4 wild bulls, 14 elephants and 920 lions as the trophies of his skill and courage.

The Bib. prototype of these heroes of war and the chase is Nimrod, "a mighty hunter before Jeh" (Gen 10 9), that is perhaps "a hunter

1. Nimrod who had no equal," a figure not yet clearly identifiable with any historical or mythical character in the Assyro-Bab monuments, but possibly the Gilgamesh of the great epic, who may be the hero represented on seals and reliefs as victorious over the lion (Skinner, "Gen," ICC, 208). We are reminded also of Samson's exploit at Timnah (Jgs 14 5 f), but this, like David's encounter with the lion and the bear (1 S 17 34 f) and Benaiah's struggle with a lion in a pit on a snowy day (2 S 23 20), was an occasional incident and scarcely comes under the category of hunting. There is no evidence that hunting for sport was ever practised by the kings of Judah and Israel. Not until the time of Herod the Great, who had a hunting establishment and was a great hunter of boars, stags, and wild asses (Jos, BJ, I, xxi, 13), mastering as many as 40 beasts in one day, do we find a ruler of Pal indulging in this pastime.

Hunting, however, for the two other purposes mentioned above was probably as frequent among the Israelites, even after they had

2. Hunting ceased to be nomads, as among their neighbors. We know indeed of only two personal examples, both in the patriarchal period and both outside the direct line of Israelitish descent: Esau (Gen 25 27 ff) and Ishmael (Gen 21 20); but there are several references and many figurative allusions to the pursuit and its methods and instruments. Hunting (inclusive of fowling) is mentioned in the Pent in the regulation about pouring out the blood and covering it with dust (Lev 17 13); and there is a general reference in the proverb (Prov 12 27): "The slothful man roasteth not that which he took in hunting." The hunting of the lion is assumed in Ezekiel's allegory of the lioness and her two whelps (Ezk 19 1-9; cf Job 10 16); of the antelope or oryx (Dt 14 5; Isa 51 20); of the roe (Prov 6 5); of the partridge in the mountains (1 S 26 20), and of birds in general in many passages. Hunting is probably implied in the statement about the provision of harts, gazelles and roebucks for Solomon's kitchen (1 K 4 23), and to some extent in the reference to the den of lions in Babylon (Dnl 6 7 ff).

The weapons most frequently employed by hunters seem to have been bows and arrows. Isaac (Gen 27 3) commands Esau to take

3. Methods his bow and quiver and procure him of Hunters venison or game (cf also Isa 7 24; Job 41 28). This method is amply illustrated by the monuments. Ashur-nazir-pal III (885-860 BC) and Darius (c 500 BC), for example, are depicted shooting at lions from the chariot. Use was also made of the sword, the spear, the dart or javelin, the sling and the club (Job 41 26.28 f, where the application of these weapons to hunting is implied). The larger animals were sometimes caught in a pit. The classical reference is in Ezekiel's allegory, "He was taken in their pit" (shāhath, Ezk 19 4.8; cf also Isa 24 17 f; Jer 48 43 f; Ps 35 7, etc). The details of this mode of capture as practised at the present day, and probably in ancient times, are described by Tristram in his Natural History of the Bible (118 f). A more elaborate method is described by Maspero in Lectures historiques (285).

Assyrian Lion Hunt.

To make the pit-capture more effective, nets were also employed: "They spread their net over him" (Ezk 19 8; cf Ps 35 7). When caught, the lion was sometimes placed in a large wooden cage (Ezk 19 9, sūghar, the Assyrian shigāru; for the word and the thing of SBOT, "Ezk," Eng., 132; Heb, 71). The lion (or any other large animal) was led about by a ring or hook (hāh) inserted in the jaws or nose (2 K 19 28=Isa 37 29; Ezk 19 4.9; 29 4; 38 4). From wild animals the brutal Assyrians transferred the custom to their human captives, as the Israelites were well aware (2 Ch 33 11 RVm, Heb hōq̄h; for monumental illustrations of SBOT, "Ezk," Eng., 132 f). Nets were also used for other animals such as the oryx or antelope (Isa 51 20). The Egypt and Assyrian monuments show that dogs were employed in hunting in the ancient East, and it is not improbable that they were put to this service by the Hebrews also, but there is no clear Bib. evidence, as "greyhound" in Prov 30 31 is a questionable rendering. Jos indeed (Ant, IV, viii, 9) mentions the hunting dog in a law ascribed to Moses, but the value of the allusion is uncertain.

The hunting of birds or fowling is so often referred or alluded to that it must have been very widely practised (cf Ps 91 3, 124 7; Prov 1 17; 6 5; Eccl 9 12; Am 3 5, etc). The only bird specifically mentioned is the partridge, said to be hunted on the mountains (1 S 26 20). The method of hunting is supposed by Tristram (NHB, 225) to be that still prevalent—continual pursuit until the creature is struck down by sticks thrown along the ground—but the interpretation is uncertain. Birds were generally caught by snares or traps. Two passages are peculiarly instructive on this point: Job 18 8–10, where six words are used for such contrivances, represented respectively by "net," "toils," "gin," "snare," "noose,"

Hunting Deer in an Enclosed Field.

"trap"; and Am 3 5, which is important enough to be cited in full: "Can a bird fall in a snare upon the earth, where no gin is set for him? shall a snare spring up from the ground, and have taken nothing at all? The word for "snare" in this passage (pah) probably describes a net laid on the ground, perhaps a circular net like the Egypt bird-trap represented in the Cambridge Bible, "Amos," 157. The word for "gin," usually trd in RV "snare" (mōkēsh, lit. "fowling instrument") is supposed to refer either to the bait (ib, 158) or to the catch connected with it which causes the net to collapse (Siegfried). For a full account of Egypt modes of fowling which probably illustrate ancient Palestinian methods, cf Wilkinson, Popular Account, II, 178–83. The two words (mōkēsh and pah) mentioned above are used figuratively in many OT passages, the former repeatedly of the deadly influence of Canaanitish idolatry on Israel, as in Ex 23 33, "For if thou serve their gods, it will surely be a snare unto thee" (cf Ex 34 12; Dt 7 16; Josh 23 13). The use of the hawk in fowling, which is attested for Northern Syria by a bas-relief found in 1908 at Sakje-Geuzi, is not mentioned in the OT, but there may perhaps be an allusion in Apoc (Bar 3 17, "they that had their pastime with the fowls of the air"). A reference to the use of decoys has been found in Jer 5 27, "a cage . . . full of birds," but that is a doubtful interpretation, and in the Gr of Sir 11 30, "As a decoy partridge in a cage, so is the heart of a proud man," but the Heb text of the latter is less explicit. See FOWLER.

The NT has a few figurative allusions to hunting. The words for "catch" in Mk 12 13 and Lk 11 54

(agreuō and thēreuō) mean lit. "hunt." 5. Allusions The vb. "ensnare" (pagideuō) occurs in the NT once in the Gospels (Mt 22 15), and the noun "snare" (pagis) is met with in 5 passages (Lk 21 34; Rom 11 9; 1 Tim 3 7; 6 9; 2 Tim 2 26). Another word for "snare" (brōchos), which means lit. "noose" (RVm), is used in 1 Cor 7 35. The words for "things that cause stumbling" and "stumble" (skandalon and skandalizō) may possibly conceal in some passages an allusion to a hunter's trap or snare. Skandalon is closely allied to skandalēthron, "the stick in a trap on which the bait is placed," and is used in LXX for mōkēsh. The abundant use of imagery taken from hunting in the Bible is remarkable, in view of the comparative rarity of literal references.

LITERATURE.—In addition to the works cited in the course of the art, the art. "Hunting" in DB<sup>9</sup>, HDB large and small, EB, Jew Enc; and "Jagd" in German Bible Dicts. of Guthe, Riehm, and Wiener, and in RE<sup>3</sup>.

WILLIAM TAYLOR SMITH

HUPHAM, hū'fām (חֻפָּאם, hūphām, "coast-inhabitant"): One of Benjamin's sons and head of the Huphamite family (Nu 26 39). See HUPPIM.

HUPPAH, hup'a (חֻפָּה, huppāh, "protection"): The priest in charge of the 13th course as prescribed under David (1 Ch 24 13).

HUPPIM, hup'im (חֻפִּים, huppīm, "coast-people"): Probably a variant form of HUPHAM (q.v.). From the only mention made of him (Gen 46 21; 1 Ch 7 12.15), his direct descent is difficult to establish.

HUR, hūr (חֹר, hūr):

(1) A prominent official in Israel. With Aaron he held up Moses' hands during the battle against the Amalekites (Ex 17 10.12) and assisted him as judicial head of the people during Moses' stay in the mount (Ex 24 14).

(2) Grandfather of Bezalel, the head artificer in the construction of the Tabernacle (Ex 31 2; 35 30; 38 22; 2 Ch 1 5). He is here assigned to the tribe of Judah, and in 1 Ch is connected with the same by descent through Caleb (2 19.20.50; 4 1.4). Jos (Ant, III, ii, 4; vi, 1) makes him identical with (1) and the husband of Miriam.

(3) One of the five kings of Midian slain along with Balaam when Israel avenged the "matter of Peor" upon this people (Nu 31 8; cf vs 1.2.16). In Josh 13 21 these kings are spoken of as "chiefs [n'sī'im] of Midian" and "princes [n'sīk'hīm] of Sihon," king of the Amorites.

(4) According to 1 K 4 8 AV, the father of one of Solomon's twelve officers who provided food for the king's household, and whose district was the hill country of Ephraim. Here RV has "Ben-hur," taking the Heb ben, "son of," as part of the proper name; and the same is true in reference to the names of four others of these officers (cf vs 9.10. 11.13).

(5) Father of Rephaiah, who was one of the builders of the wall under Nehemiah, and ruler of half the district of Jerus (Neh 3 9).

BENJAMIN RENO DOWNER

HURAI, hū'ri, hū'rā-i, hū-rā'i (חורִי, hūray, "linen-weaver"): One of David's "mighty men" mentioned in 1 Ch 11 32 as of the brooks of Gaash, i.e. from Mt. Gaash. In the || 2 S 23 30, the orthography is Hiddai.

HURAM, hū'ram (חורם, hūrām, "noble-born"):

(1) Grandson of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 5).
(2) King of Tyre in alliance with David and Solomon. So named in 2 Ch 2 3.11.12; 8 2; 9 10.21, but elsewhere written HIRAM (q.v.).

(3) The Tyrian artisan who is so named in 2 Ch 2 13; 4 11.16, but elsewhere called "Hiram."

HURI, hū'ri (חורי, hūri, "linen weaver"): One of the immediate descendants of Gad, and father of Abihail, a chief man of his family (1 Ch 5 14).

HURT, hūrt: The term (noun and vb.) represents a large number of Heb words, of which the chief are רָע, ra' (vb. רָעָה, rā'a'), "evil" (Gen 26 29; 1 S 24 19; Ps 35 4, etc.) and שָׁבַר or שָׁבַר, shēbher or shebher (from שָׁבַר, shābhar), "a fracture" or "breaking" (Jer 6 14; 8 11.21; 10 19; cf Ex 22 10.14). In Gr a principal vb. is ἀδικέω, adikēō, "to do injustice" (Lk 10 19; Rev 2 11; 6 6, etc); once the word "hurt" is used in AV (Acts 27 10, story of Paul's shipwreck) for ὑβρίς, hūbris, "injury" (thus RV). In RV "hurt" sometimes takes the place of other words in AV, as "sick" (Prov 23 35), "breach" (Isa 30 26), "bruise" (Jer 30 12; Nah 3 19); sometimes, on the other hand, the word in AV is exchanged in RV for "evil" (Josh 24 20), "harm" (Acts 18 10), or, as above, "injury" (Acts 27 10). These references sufficiently show the meaning of the word—harm, bruise, breaking, etc. In Jer (ut supra) the word is used figuratively for moral disease or corruption.

JAMES ORR

HUSBAND, huz'band (אִישׁ, 'ish; ἀνὴρ, anēr): In the Heb household the husband and father was the chief personage of an institution which was regarded as more than a social organism, inasmuch as the family in primitive Sem society had a distinctively religious character and significance. It was through it that the cult of the household and tribal deities was practised and perpetuated. The house-father, by virtue of being the family head, was priest of the household, and as such, responsible for the religious life of the family and the maintenance of the family altar. As priest he offered sacrifices to the family gods, as at first, before the centralization of worship, he did to Jeh as the tribal or national Deity. We see this reflected in the stories of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and in the Book of Job. This goes far to explain such records as we have in Gen 31 53; 32 9, and the exceptional reverence that was paid the paternal sepulchers (1 S 20 6). Abraham was regarded as being the father of a nation. It was customary, it would seem, to assign a "father" to every known tribe and nation (Gen 10). So the family came to play an important and constructive part in Heb thought and life, forming the base upon which the social structure was built, merging gradually into the wider organism of the clan or tribe, and vitally affecting at last the political and religious life of the nation itself.

The husband from the first had supreme authority over his wife, or wives, and children. In his own domain his rule was well-nigh absolute. The wife, or wives, looked up to him as their lord (Gen 18 12). He was chief (cf Arab. shēik), and to dishonor him was a crime to be punished by death (Ex 21 15.17). He was permitted to divorce his wife with little reason, and divorces were all too common (Dt 22 13.19.28.29; Isa 50 1; Jer 3 8; 5 8; Mal 2 16, etc). The wife seems to have had no redress if wronged by him. Absolute faithfulness, though required of the wife, was apparently not expected or exacted of the husband, so long as he did not violate the rights of another husband. In general among Eastern people women were lightly esteemed, as in the Japhetic nations they came to be. Plato counted a state "disorganized" "where slaves are disobedient to their masters, and wives are on equality with their husbands." "Is there a human being," asks Socrates, "with whom you talk less than with your wife?" But from the first, among the Hebrews the ideal husband trained his household in the way they should go religiously, as well as instructed them in the traditions of the family, the tribe, and the nation (Gen 18 19; Ex 12 26; 13 8; Dt 6 7, etc). It was due to this, in part at least, that, in spite of the discords and evils incident to polygamy, the Heb household was a nursery of virtue and piety to an unusual degree, and became a genuine anticipation of the ideal realized later in the Christian home (1 Cor 7 2 ff; Eph 5 25; 1 Pet 3 7).

Used figuratively of the relation (1) between Jeh and His people (Isa 54 5; Jer 3 14; Hos 2 19 f); (2) between Christ and His church (Mt 9 15; 2 Cor 11 2; Eph 5 25; Rev 19 7; 21 2).

GEO. B. EAGER

HUSBANDMAN, huz'band-man, HUSBANDRY, huz'band-ri: Husbandman, originally a "householder" or "master of the house," is now limited in its meaning to "farmer" or "tiller of the soil." In this sense it is the correct tr of the various Bib. words: אִישׁ אֲדָמָה, 'ish 'ādhāmāh, lit. "man of the soil" (Gen 9 20); אִיקָר, 'ikkār, lit. "digger," "a farmer" (2 Ch 26 10; Jer 31 24; 51 23; Am 5 16; Joel 1 11); גִּבֵּי, gūbh, "to dig" (2 K 25 12); דִּגְבַּ, yāghabh, "to dig" (Jer 52 16); γεωργός, geōrgós, "cultivator" (Mt 21 33 ff; Jn 15 1; Jas 5 7). See AGRICULTURE.

It is a common practice in Pal and Syria today for a rich man to own lands in many different parts of the country. He sets farmers over these different tracts who, with the helpers, do the plowing, planting, reaping, etc; or he lets out his lands to farmers who pay him an annual rental or return to him a certain percentage of the crop. Much of the plain of Esdraelon, for example, was until recently owned by Beirut proprietors and farmed in this way. The writer while riding on the plain near ancient Dan, was surprised to overtake an acquaintance from Beirut (3 days' journey away), who had just dismounted at one of his farms to inspect it and to receive the annual account of his farmer. The pride with which the husbandman pointed out the abundant harvest will not be forgotten. All the difficulties of the owner with his husbandmen described by Jesus are often repeated today.

Figurative: Jesus said "I am the true vine, and my father is the husbandman" (Jn 15 1). He sows, cultivates, prunes and expects fruits from His church. In the parable of the Householder (Mt 21 33 ff), the wicked husbandmen were the Jews. The church is referred to as "God's husbandry" in 1 Cor 3 9 (m "tilled land").

JAMES A. PATCH

HUSBAND'S BROTHER (אֲבִי, yābhām, "brother-in-law"; ἐπιγαμβρεύω, epigambreūō; Late Lat levir): He was required (Dt 25 5-10; Mt 22 24) "to perform the duty of a husband's brother" (yibb'māh); that is, if his brother, living with him on the paternal estate, died without male issue, he should take the widow to wife, and "raise up seed unto his brother," the firstborn of the new marriage inheriting the deceased brother's estate. Refusal of the duty was possible, but entailed public ceremonial disgrace and lasting reproach. This provision for a specific case modified the general law which forbade the marriage of a sister-in-law (Lev 18 16, 18). It was a patriarchal custom (Gen 38; Judah and Tamar), and is alluded to in Ruth 1 11-13. A related custom is found in Ruth 4 1, Boaz playing, however, the part, not of levir ("brother-in-law"), but of gō'el ("redeemer"). It was at least theoretically in force in Our Lord's time (Mt 22 23-28; the question of the Sadducees concerning the resurrection). For the origin and object of this custom see FAMILY; MARRIAGE.

PHILIP WENDELL CRANNELL

HUSHAH, hū'sha (חֹשֶׁה, hūshāh, "haste"): Mentioned in 1 Ch 4 4 as probably an individual, a Judahite, or a family name; but may possibly be a place.

HUSHAI, hū'shī, hū'shā-i (חֹשֶׁי, hūshay, Χουσεϊ, Chousei; Jos, Chousi): An Archite, native of Archi or Erech(?), W. of Bethel on the northern border of Benjamin and southern border of Joseph (Josh 16 2). Hushai was one of David's most faithful and wise counsellors. When David was fleeing from Jerus and Absalom, Hushai met him, having his coat rent and earth on his head. The king persuaded him to return to Jerus, feign submission to Absalom, and try to defeat the counsel of Ahithophel (2 S 15 32 f.). Whatever Absalom decided on, Hushai was to send word to David through two young men, sons of the priests Zadok and Abiathar (15 34-36). Hushai obeyed, and succeeded in persuading Absalom to adopt his counsel rather than that of Ahithophel (2 S 16 16-17 14). He sent word to David of the nature of Ahithophel's counsel, and the king made good his escape that night across the Jordan. The result was the suicide of Ahithophel and the ultimate defeat and death of Absalom.

HUSHAM, hū'sham (חֹשָׁם, hūshām, Gen 36 34; חֹשָׁם, hūshām, 1 Ch 1 45-46, "alert"): According to the former reference, Husham was one of the kings of Edom, and according to the latter he was "of the land of the Temanites" and (1 Ch 1 35 f.) descended from Esau.

HUSHATHITE, hū'shath-it (חֹשְׁתִּי, hūshāthī, "a dweller in Hushah"?): The patronymic given in two forms, but probably of the same man, Sih-beccai, one of David's thirty heroes (2 S 21 18; 1 Ch 11 29; 20 4; 27 11), or Mebunnai as named in the || passage (2 S 23 27).

HUSHIM, hū'shim (חֹשִׁים, hūshīm, "hastens"):

(1) Family name of the children of Dan (Gen 46 23), but of form "Shuham" in Nu 26 42.

(2) The sons of Aher, of the lineage of Benjamin (1 Ch 7 12).

(3) One of the wives of Shaharaim, of the family of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 8.11).

HUSHSHATHITE, hush'shath-it (חֹשְׁשִׁתִּי, hush-shāthī). Same as HUSHATHITE (q.v.), except in reduplicated form (1 Ch 27 11; cf 11 29, Heb pronunciation).

HUSKS, husks (κεράτια, kerátia, i.e. "little horns," Lk 15 16): These are the pods of the carob tree (RVm), also called the locust tree (Ceratonia siliqua). This tree flourishes all over Pal, esp. on the western mountain slopes toward the sea; by the Arabs it is called kharrāb. It is dioecious, has dense, dark, evergreen foliage, glossy leaves and long, curved pods, like small horns (hence the name). These pods which are from 4 to 9 in. in length, have a leathery case containing a pulpy substance in which the beans are imbedded; this pulp is of a pleasant, sweetish flavor and has a characteristic odor, and is much loved by children. The pods are sold in the markets, both as cattle food and for the poor, who extract by boiling them a sweetish substance like molasses. The tradition that the "locusts" of Mt 3 4; Mk 1 6 were carob pods is preserved in the name given to them, "St. John's bread," but it has little to be said for it.

Carob Tree (Ceratonia siliqua).

HUZ, huz (Gen 22 21 AV). See Uz.

HUZZAB, huz'ab (הֻזָּב, huṣṣāb, only in Nah 2 7 AV and RVm): Its meaning is doubtful. According to Gesenius, it is a vb., Hoph. of צָבַב, ṣābhabh, "flow," hence to be rendered with preceding ver, "The palace is dissolved and made to flow down." Wordsworth made it Pual of צָבַב, nāṣāb, "fix": "The palace is dissolved, though established." LXX renders with the next word, hē hypóstasis apokalúphthē, "The foundation [or treasure] is uncovered." AV, RVm and ARV text make it Hoph. of nāṣāb, "fix," hence "It is decreed." Perhaps more probably, with AV and RV text and ARVm, it is a name, or noun with the article (or the corruption of such a word), referring either to the Assy queen, or personifying Nineveh. No such queen is now known, but Assyriology may throw light. The "name" interpretation accords best with the general trend of the passage, which describes the discomfiture of a royal personage. BDB calls it "perhaps textual error." The Massoretic vocalization may be at fault.

HYACINTH, hī'a-sinth (ὕακινθος, huákinthos): RV uses this word in Rev 9 17 for AV "jacinth," with reference, not to stone, but to dark-purple color. In Rev 21 20, where stone is meant, RV tr "sapphire."

HYADES, hī'a-dēz. See ASTROLOGY, II, 4.

HYDASPES, hī-das'pēz (Ὑδάσπης, Hudáspēs): A river mentioned in Jth 1 6 in connection with the Euphrates and Tigris, but otherwise unknown. It is possible there may be a confusion with the Hydaspes of India. Some have conjectured an identity with the Choaspes.

HYENA, hī-ē'na (צִבְיָה, ṣābhūā' [Jer 12 9]; LXX ὑαίνα, huainē [Jer 12 9; Eccles 13 18]; cf Arab. ضَبُع or ضَبْع, ḍab' or ḍabū', "hyaena"; cf

צִבְעִים, ṣābhō'im, Zeboim [1 S 13 18; Neh 11 34]; also cf צִבְעֹן, ṣābh'on, Zibeon [Gen 36 2.14.20; 1 Ch 1 38]; but not צִבְיִים, ṣābhōyīm, Zeboiim [Gen 10 19; 14 2, etc]: EV does not contain the word "hyena," except in Eccles 13 18, "What peace is there between the hyena and the dog? and what peace between the rich man and the poor?" In Jer 12 9, where the Heb has ha-'ayit çābhūa' (RV "a speckled bird of prey"), LXX has σπήλαιον ὕαινης, spēlalion huainēs, "a hyena's den," as if from a Heb original having m'ārāh, "cave," instead of ha-'ayit, "bird." The root çābhā' may mean "to seize as prey" (cf Arab. seb', "lion" or "rapacious animal"), or "to dip" or "to dye" (cf Arab. šabagh, "to dye"), hence the two tr of çābhūa' as "hyena" and as "speckled" (Vulg versicolor).

The hyena of Pal is the striped hyena (Hyena striata) which ranges from India to North Africa. The striped, the spotted, and the brown hyenas constitute a distinct family of the order of Carnivora, having certain peculiarities of dentition and having four toes on each foot, instead of four behind and five in front, as in most of the order. The hyena is a nocturnal animal, rarely seen though fairly abundant, powerful but cowardly, a feeder on carrion and addicted to grave-robbing. The last habit in particular has won it the abhorrence of the natives of the countries which it inhabits. In the passage cited in Eccles, it is to be noted that it is to the hyena that the rich man is compared. The jaws and teeth of the hyena are exceedingly strong and fitted for crushing bones which have resisted the efforts of dogs and jackals. Its dens are in desolate places and are littered with fragments of skeletons. "Is my heritage unto me as a speckled bird of prey?" (Jer 12 9) becomes a more striking passage if the LXX is followed, "Is my heritage unto me as a hyena's den?"

Shakk-ud-Dibā', "Cleft of the hyenas," is the name of a valley north of Wādi-ul-Kelt, and Wādi-Abu-Dibā' (of similar meaning) is the name of an affluent of Wādi-ul-Kelt. Either of these, or possibly Wādi-ul-Kelt itself, may be the valley of Zeboim (valley of hyenas) of 1 S 13 18.

The name of Zibeon the Horite (Gen 36 2, etc) is more doubtfully connected with "hyena."

ALFRED ELY DAY

HYMENAEUS, hi-men-ē'us (Ὑμέναιος, Humēnaios, so named from Hymen, the god of marriage, 1 Tim 1 20; 2 Tim 2 17): A heretical teacher in Ephesus, an opponent of the apostle Paul, who in the former reference associates him with Alexander (see ALEXANDER), and in the latter, with Philetus (see PHILETUS).

It is worthy of notice that in both passages where these persons are mentioned, the name of Hymenaeus occurs first, showing, perhaps, that he was the leader. In the passage in

1. His Career 1 Tim Hymenaeus is included in the "some" who had put away faith and a good conscience and who had made shipwreck concerning faith. The apostle adds that he had delivered Hymenaeus and Alexander unto Satan, that they might learn not to blaspheme.

In the passage in 2 Tim, Hymenaeus and Philetus are included among persons whose profane and vain babblings will increase unto more ungodliness, and whose word "will eat as doth a gangrene." The apostle declares that Hymenaeus and Philetus are of the number of such people as those just described, and he adds that those two persons "concerning the truth have erred, saying that the resurrection is past already, and overthrow the faith of some." Then, for the guidance of Timothy, he goes on to say the seal upon the foundation of God is, "The Lord knoweth them that are his: and, Let every one that nameth the name of the Lord depart from unrighteousness." The inference intended is, that though Hymenaeus and Philetus had named the name of Christ, they did not depart from iniquity. There is no doubt in regard to the identity of this Hymenaeus with the person of the same name in 1 Tim. Accordingly, the facts mentioned in the two epistles must be placed together, viz. that though he had made a Christian profession by naming the name of Christ, yet he had not departed from iniquity, but by his profane teaching he proceeded unto more ungodliness, and that he had put away faith and a good conscience and had made shipwreck of faith.

The error, therefore, of Hymenaeus and his two companions would amount to this: They taught that "the resurrection is past already," that there shall be no bodily resurrection at all, but that all that resurrection means is that the soul awakes from sin. This awakening from sin had already taken place with themselves, so they held, and therefore there could be no day in the future when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God and shall come forth from the grave (Jn 5 28).

This teaching of Hymenaeus had been so far successful: it had "overthrown the faith of some" (2 Tim 2 18). It is impossible to define exactly the full nature of this heresy, but what Paul says regarding it makes it evident that it was a form of incipient Gnosticism.

3. Incipient Gnosticism This spiritualizing of the resurrection sprang from the idea of the necessarily evil nature of all material substance. This idea immediately led to the conclusion of the essentially evil nature of the human body, and that if man is to rise to his true nature, he must rid himself of the thralldom, not of sin, but of the body. This contempt for the body led to the denial of the resurrection in its literal sense; and all that Christ had taught on the subject was explained only, in an allegorical sense, of the resurrection of the soul from sin.

Teaching of this kind is described by Paul as having effects similar to the "eating" caused by a gangrene. It is deadly; it overthrows Christian faith.

4. Overthrows Faith If not destroyed, it would corrupt the community, for if there is no literal resurrection of the dead, then, as Paul shows in 1 Cor 15, Christ is not raised; and if the literal resurrection of Christ is denied, Christian believers are yet in their sins, and the Christian religion is false.

The way in which the apostle dealt with these teachers, Hymenaeus and his companions, was not

5. Delivered unto Satan merely in the renewed assertion of the truth which they denied, but also by passing sentence upon these teachers—"whom I delivered unto Satan, that they might be taught not to blaspheme."

In regard to the meaning of this sentence much difficulty of interpretation exists. Some understand it to mean simple excommunication from the church. But this seems quite inadequate to exhaust the meaning of the words employed by Paul. Others take it to signify the infliction of some bodily suffering or disease. This also is quite insufficient as an explanation. It seems that a person who was delivered unto Satan was cut off from all Christian privileges, he was "put away" from the body of Christian believers, and handed over to "the Satan," the Evil One in his most distinct personality (1 Cor 5 2.5.13). Cf the cases of Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5), and of Elymas (Acts 13 11).

It is important that the purpose of this terrible sentence should not be overlooked. The intention of the punishment was distinctly remedial. Both in the case of Hymenaeus and Alexander, and in that of the person dealt with in 1 Cor 5, the intention was the attaining of an ultimate good. In 1 Cor it is "for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus." Similarly, Hymenaeus and Alexander are delivered unto Satan, not for their final perdition, but that they may be taught, through this terrible discipline—for such is the signification of the word which is trd "taught"—not to blaspheme. The purpose of this discipline, that they might learn not to blaspheme, shows the dreadful length of impiety and of railing at Christian truth to which Hymenaeus had gone.

In the history of Hymenaeus and his companions, and in their bold and anti-Christian teaching which had overthrown the faith of some, we cannot fail to see the fulfilment of what Paul had said many years previously, in his farewell address to the elders of the church in Ephesus: "I know that after my departing grievous wolves shall enter in among you, not sparing the flock; and from among your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away the disciples after them" (Acts 20 29 f.). It was in the Ephesian church that Hymenaeus and Alexander and Philetus had arisen. The gangrene-like nature of their teaching has already been described.

JOHN RUTHERFURD

HYMN, him (ᾠμος, hymnos): In Col 3 16; Eph 5 19 St. Paul bids his readers sing "psalms and hymns and spiritual songs." Gregory of Nyssa (4th cent.) distinguishes these as follows: the Ps were accompanied by instruments, the hymns were mainly vocal, and the song, ode, was a general term comprehending both. This distinction might suggest that the psalm belonged especially to the public worship of the church, while the hymn was the production, more or less spontaneous, of the individual member. The inference is, however, inconsistent with 1 Cor 14 26, and it is probable that in the apostolic age, at least, the terms were used indiscriminately. Of Christian psalms or hymns we have examples in the NT. Lk 1 and 2 contain such hymns in the songs of Mary, Zacharias and Simeon. The Apocalypse is studded with hymns or odes, many of them quite general in character, and probably borrowed or adapted from Jewish books of praise. In the Epp. of Paul, esp. the later ones, fragments of hymns seem to be quoted. Lightfoot detects one in Eph 5 14, and others readily suggest themselves.

It is probable that the hymn mentioned as having been sung by Jesus and the disciples after the Passover (Mt 26 30; Mk 14 26) was the second part of the Hallel, i.e. Ps 115-18, and the hymns of Paul and Silas were most likely also taken from the Psalter. But the practice of interpolating and altering Jewish non-canonical books, like the Psalter of Solomon and the recently discovered Odes of Solomon, shows that the early Christians adopted for devotional purposes the rich store of sacred poetry possessed by their nation. For the music to which these psalms, etc. were sung, see Music; Song.

HYPOCRISY, hi-pok'ri-si, HYPOCRITE, hip'ō-krit (חֲזָקָה, hōneph, חֲזָקָה, hānēph; ὑπόκρισις, hypōkrisis, ὑποκριτής, hypokritēs):

(1) "Hypocrisy" occurs only once in the OT as the tr of hōneph (Isa 32 6, RV "profaneness"); hānēph, from which it is derived, means properly "to cover," "to hide," or "becloud," hence to pollute, to be polluted or defiled, to make profane, to seduce; as a subst. it is tr<sup>d</sup> "hypocrite" (Job 8 13; 13 16; 15 34; 17 8; 20 5; 27 8; 34 30; 36 13, in all which instances RV has "godless man," "godless men," "godless"; Prov 11 9, RV "the godless man"; Isa 9 17, RV "profane"; Isa 33 14, RV "the godless ones"); it is rendered "hypocritical," in Ps 35 16; Isa 10 6, RV "profane."

(2) "Hypocrisy," "hypocrite" are frequent in the NT, chiefly in Christ's discourses in the Gospels. The word hypokrisis (primarily, "an answer," "response") meant generally, in classical Gr, stage-playing, acting, the histrionic art; hence it came to mean acting a part in life, etc. We find hypokrisis in this sense in 2 Macc 6 25, RV "dissimulation," and hypokrinomai, "to pretend," "to feign," etc. Ecclus 1 29; 32 15; 33 2, tr<sup>d</sup> "hypocrite"; 2 Macc

5 25, "pretending peace," RV "playing the man of peace"; 6 21, RV "to make as if." Hypokritēs (lit. "an actor") is the LXX for hānēph (Job 34 30; 36 13), equivalent to bad, wicked, godless, which is perhaps included in some of Our Lord's uses of the words, e.g. Mt 23 27 f., "full of hypocrisy and iniquity" (cf vs 29 f.; 24 51); but, in general, the meaning is acting a part, false, deceptive and deceived, formally and outwardly religious and good, but inwardly insincere and unrighteous; the hypocrite may come to deceive himself as well as others, but "the hypocrite's hope shall perish" (Job 8 13 AV). On no class did Our Lord pronounce such severe condemnation as on the hypocrites of His day.

"Hypocrisy" (hypokrisis) occurs in Mt 23 28; Mk 12 15; Lk 12 1; 1 Tim 4 2; 1 Pet 2 1 (in Gal 2 13 it is rendered "dissimulation"); "hypocrite" (hypokritēs), Mt 6 2.5.16; 7 5; 15 7; 22 18; 23 13.15.23.25 ff.29; 24 51; Mk 7 6; Lk 12 56; 13 15; in Jas 3 17, anupōkritos is "without hypocrisy," so RV, Rom 12 9 ("unfeigned," 2 Cor 6 6; 1 Tim 1 5; 2 Tim 1 5; 1 Pet 1 22).

HYRCANUS, hēr-kā'nus (Ἰρκανός, Hurkanós): "Son of Tobias, a man of great dignity," who had a large sum of money deposited in the Temple of Jerus when Heliodorus was sent to confiscate it in 187 BC (2 Macc 3 11 ff.). Opinions differ as to the identity of this H. with the grandson of Tobias whose birth and history are related at considerable length by Jos (Ant, XII, iv, 6 ff.), or with another of the same name mentioned in Ant, XIII, viii, 4. See ASMONEANS; MACCABAEUS.

HYSSOP, his'up (חֲזָזִית, 'ēzōh; ὕσσωπος, hūs-sōpos, Ex 12 22; Lev 14 4.6.49 ff.; Nu 19 6.18; 1 K 4 33; Ps 51 7; Jn 19 29; He 9 19): A plant used for ritual cleansing purposes; a humble plant springing out of the wall (1 K 4 33), the extreme contrast to the cedar.

Caper (Capparis spinosa).

The common hyssop (Hyssopus officinalis) of the N.O. Labiatae, an aromatic plant with stomatic properties, cannot be the hyssop of the Bible as it is unknown in Pal, but allied aromatic plants of the same N.O. have by Maimonides (Neg. xiv.6) and other Jewish writers been identified with it. Probably hyssop is identical with the Arab. zaf'ār, a name applied to a group of aromatic plants of the genus marjoram and thyme. They would any of them furnish a bunch suitable for sprinkling, and they have the important recommendation that they

trēta): There is ever in the human mind a craving for visible forms to express religious conceptions, and this tendency does not disappear with the acceptance, or even with the constant recognition, of pure spiritual truths (see IMAGES). Idolatry originally meant the worship of idols, or the worship of false gods by means of idols, but came to mean among the OT Hebrews any worship of false gods, whether by images or otherwise, and finally the worship of Jch through visible symbols (Hos 6 5,6; 10 5); and ultimately in the NT idolatry came to mean, not only the giving to any creature or human creation the honor or devotion which belonged to God alone, but the giving to any human desire a precedence over God's will (1 Cor 10 14; Gal 5 20; Col 3 5; 1 Pet 4 3). The neighboring gods of Phoenicia, Canaan, Moab—Baal, Melkart, Astarte, Chemosh, Moloch, etc.—were particularly attractive to Jerus, while the old Sem calf-worship seriously affected the state religion of the Northern Kingdom (see GOLDEN CALF). As early as the Assyrian and Bab periods (8th and 7th cents. BC), various deities from the Tigris and Euphrates had intruded themselves—the worship of Tammuz becoming a little later the most popular and seductive of all (Ezk 8 14)—while the worship of the sun, moon, stars and signs of the Zodiac became so intensely fascinating that these were introduced even into the temple itself (2 K 17 16; 21 3-7; 23 4,12; Jer 19 13; Ezk 8 16; Am 5 26).

The special enticements to idolatry as offered by these various cults were found in their dedication of natural forces and their appeal to primitive human desires, esp. the sexual; also through associations produced by intermarriage and through the appeal to patriotism, when the help of some cruel deity was sought in time of war. Baal and Astarte worship, which was esp. attractive, was closely associated with fornication and drunkenness (Am 2 7,8; cf 1 K 14 23 f), and also appealed greatly to magic and soothsaying (e.g. Isa 2 6; 3 2; 8 19).

Sacrifices to the idols were offered by fire (Hos 4 13); libations were poured out (Isa 57 6; Jer 7 18); the first-fruits of the earth and tithes were presented (Hos 2 8); tables of food were set before them (Isa 65 11); the worshippers kissed the idols or threw them kisses (1 K 19 18; Hos 13 2; Job 31 27); stretched out their hands in adoration (Isa 44 20); knelt or prostrated themselves before them and sometimes danced about the altar, gashing themselves with knives (1 K 18 26,28; for a fuller summary see EB).

Even earlier than the Bab exile the Heb prophets taught that Jch was not only superior to all other gods, but reigned alone as God, other deities being nonentities (Lev 19 4; Isa 2 8,18,20; 19 1,3; 31 7; 44 9-20). The severe satire of this period proves that the former fear of living demons supposed to inhabit the idols had disappeared. These prophets also taught that the temple, ark and sacrifices were not essential to true spiritual worship (e.g. Jer 3 16; Am 5 21-25). These prophecies produced a strong reaction against the previously popular idol-worship, though later indications of this worship are not infrequent (Ezk 14 1-8; Isa 42 17). The Maccabean epoch placed national heroism plainly on the side of the one God, Jch; and although Gr and Egypt idols were worshipped in Gaza and Ascalon and other half-heathen communities clear down to the 5th or 6th cent. of the Christian era, yet in orthodox centers like Jerus these were despised and repudiated utterly from the 2d cent. BC onward. See also GOLDEN CALF; GODS; IMAGES; TERAPHIM.

IDUEL, id'ū-el (Ἰδουήλος, Idouēlos): 1 Esd 8 43, EVm "ARIEL" (q.v.).

IDUMAEA, id-ū-mē'a, IDUMAEANS, id-ū-mē'-anz. See EDOM.

IEDDIAS, yed-i'as, i-ed-i'as, AV Eddias (Ἰεδδίας, Ieddias): One who agreed to put away his foreign wife (1 Esd 9 26); called also "Jezeias."

IEZER, i-ē-zēr, IEZERITES, i-ē-zēr-its (יִזְעָר, 'īezer, Nu 26 30): Contracted from ABIEZER (Josh 17 2, etc) (q.v.).

IGAL, ī'gal (יִגָּל, yigh'al, "he [God] redeems"; LXX variously Ἰγᾶλ, Igál, Γαῶλ, Gaál, Ἰωήλ, Iōēl): (1) One of the twelve spies sent by Moses from the wilderness of Paran; son of Joseph, tribe of Issachar (Nu 13 7).

(2) One of David's heroes, son of Nathan of Zobah (2 S 23 36). In 1 Ch 11 38 he is "Joel" (יֹאֵל, yō'ēl), the brother of Nathan."

(3) Son of Shemaiah of the royal house of David, descendant of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 22, AV "Igeal").

IGDALIAH, ig-da-lī'a (יִגְדָּלְיָהּ, yighdalyāhū, "Jeh is great"): Ancestor of certain persons who had a "chamber" in the temple in Jeremiah's time (Jer 35 4).

IGEAL, ī'gē-al, ī'jē-al (יִגְעָל, yigh'al, "he [i.e. God] redeems"): A remote descendant of David (1 Ch 3 22, RV "Igal").

IGNORANCE, ig'nō-rans (ἡγνοῦσι, sh'ghāghāh; ἄγνοια, agnoia): "Ignorance" is the tr of sh'ghāghāh, "wandering," "going astray" (Lev 4 2, etc, "if a soul sin through ignorance," RV "unwittingly," m "through error"; 5 15; Nu 15 24 ff; cf 35 11; Josh 20 3 ff; Eccl 5 6; 10 5, "an error"). In the Law sh'ghāghāh means "innocent error," such as had to be taken with consideration in judgment (see passages referred to). "Ignorance" is also expressed by the negative lō' w'ith yādha', "to know" (Isa 56 10; 63 16; Ps 73 22); also by bi-bh'el da'ath, lit. "in want of knowledge" (Dt 19 4; cf 4 12; Josh 20 5, tr<sup>d</sup> "unawares," "unwittingly").

In the NT the words are agnoia, "absence of knowledge" (Acts 3 17; 17 30; Eph 4 18; 1 Pet 1 14); agnōtēma, "error" (He 9 7, RVm "Gr ignorances"); agnōstia, "ignorance" (1 Pet 2 15), "no knowledge" (1 Cor 15 34 RV); agnoeō, "to be without knowledge," "ignorant" (Rom 1 13; 10 3; 11 25, etc), "not knowing" (Rom 2 4, etc), "understood not" (Mk 9 32, etc), "ignorantly" (Acts 17 23, RV "in ignorance"; 1 Tim 1 13); idiōtēs, tr<sup>d</sup> "ignorant" (Acts 4 13), "unlearned" (1 Cor 14 16, RVm "him that is without gifts," and so in vs 23,24), "rude" (2 Cor 11 6); agrammatos, once only in connection with idiōtēs (Acts 4 13, "unlearned and ignorant men"); agrammatos corresponds to modern "illiterate" (cf Jn 7 15; Acts 26 24); idiōtēs originally denoted "the private man" as distinguished from those with a knowledge of affairs, and took on the idea of contempt and scorn. In Philo it denoted the whole congregation of Israel as distinguished from the priests (De Vita Mosis, III. 29). With Paul (1 Cor 14 16,23,24) it seems to denote "plain believers as distinguished from those with special spiritual gifts." In Acts 4 13 it may refer to the want of Jewish learning; certainly it does not mean ignorant in the modern sense.

Paul in Rom 1 18,32 attributes the pre-Christian ignorance of God to "the ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who hinder the truth in unrighteousness" (but m has, with AV, "hold the truth, cf 1 Cor 7 30, Gr"); many, however (Alford, De Wette, Meyer and others), tr "hold back the truth." A wilful ignorance is also referred to in Eph 4 17 f; 2 Pet 3 5. But there is also a less blameworthy ignorance. Paul at Athens spoke of "times of ignorance" which God had "overlooked" (Acts 17 30); Paul says of himself that he "obtained mercy, because [he] did it [against Christ] ignorantly in unbelief" (1 Tim 1 13); Peter said to the Jews (Acts 3 17) that they and their rulers rejected Christ "in ignorance" (cf 1 Cor 2 8); and Jesus Himself prayed for those who crucified Him: "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do"; (Lk 23 34); in He 5 2 the necessary qualification of a high priest is that he "can bear gently with the ignorant and erring"—those who sin in ignorance or go astray (cf 9 7, "blood, which he offereth for himself, and for the errors of the people," m "Gr ignorances"). Growing light, however, brings with it increasing responsibility, and the "ignorance" that may be "overlooked" at one stage of the history of men and nations may be blameworthy and even criminal at another. IIM, i'im (יִימ, 'iyīm): Same as IYIM (q.v.).

IJE-ABARIM, i-jē-ab'a-rim. See IYE-ABARIM.

IJON, i'jon (יִיֶּזֶן, 'iyōn; LXX in K has 'Αἶν, Ain, or Ναῖν, Nain; in Ch 'Iā, Iā; Αἶν, Aīn): A town in the territory of Naphtali, first mentioned in connection with the invasion of Ben-hadad, in the reign of Baasha. It was captured along with Dan and Abel-beth-maacah (1 K 15 20; 2 Ch 16 4). It shared with these cities a similar fate at the hands of Tiglath-pileser in the reign of Pekah (2 K 15 29). The name survives in that of Merj A'yūn, "meadow of springs," a rich, oval-shaped plain to the N.W. of Tell el Kādū, where the Litāny turns sharply westward to the sea. The ancient city may be represented by Tell Dibbin, an important site to the N. of the plain. W. EWING

IKKESH, ik'esh (עֶקֶשׁ, 'ikkēsh, "crooked"): A Tekoite, father of Ira, one of David's "thirty" (2 S 23 26; 1 Ch 11 28; 27 9).

ILAI, i'lā-i, i'li (עֵלִי, 'ilay): A mighty man of David (1 Ch 11 29); called Zalmon in 2 S 23 28.

ILIADUN, i-lī'a-dun, il'i-ad-un (Ἐλεადούν, Elia-doun, 1 Esd 5 58; AV Eleadun): Possibly corresponding to Henadad in Ezr 3 9.

ILL, il, ILL-FAVORED, il-fū'vėrd. See EVIL-FAVOREDNES.

ILLUMINATION, i-lū-mi-nā'shun: He 10 32 AV, only, "the former days, in which, after ye were illuminated [RV "enlightened"], ye endured a great fight of afflictions." The vb. is φωτίζω, phōtizō, rendered in 6 4 by "enlightened" and in both passages (and not elsewhere in the NT) being used to describe complete conversion. The vb., indeed, is used in such a technical way that Syr VSS render by "baptized," and it is not perhaps impossible that the author of He had baptism definitely in mind. (In the early church baptism is frequently described as "illumination," e.g. Justin, Apol., i.61.) But this probably would go too far; the most that can be said is that he means the state of mind of a full Christian and not that of a catechumen (cf also Bar 4 2 AV; Sir 25 11).

BURTON SCOTT EASTON

ILLUSTRIOUS, i-lus'tri-us, THE (θαυμαστός, thaumastós): A title of rank and merit attached to the name of Bartacus, the father of Apame (1 Esd 4 29, AV "the admirable"). Instead of "the illustrious" we should possibly read "colonel" (Ant, XI, iii, 5; EB, s.v.). See BARTACUS; APAME.

ILLYRICUM, i-lir'i-kum (Ἰλλυρικόν, Illyrikón): A province of the Rom Empire, lying E. and N.E. of the Adriatic Sea. In his Ep. to the Rom Paul emphasizes the extent of his missionary activities in the assertion that "from Jerus, and round about even unto Illyricum, I have fully preached the gospel of Christ" (15 19). An examination of this statement involves three questions: What is the force of the preposition "even unto" (μέχρι, méchri)? What meaning is borne by the word Illyricum? and, At what period of his missionary career did Paul reach the limit here spoken of?

In Gr, as in Eng., the preposition "unto" may either be exclusive or inclusive. In other words,

Paul may mean that he has preached
1. Force of throughout Macedonia as far as the "even unto" Illyrian frontier, or his words may involve a journey within Illyricum itself, extending perhaps to Dyrrhachium (mod. Durazzo) on the Adriatic seaboard, which, though belonging politically to Macedonia, lay in "Gr Illyria." But since no word is said in the Acts of any extension of Paul's travels beyond the confines of Macedonia, and since the phrase, "I have fully preached," precludes a reference to a hurried or cursory tour in Illyricum, we should probably take the word "unto" in its exclusive sense, and understand that Paul claims to have evangelized Macedonia as far as the frontier of Illyricum.

What, then, does the word "Illyricum" denote? It is sometimes used, like the Gr terms Illyris and Illyria, to signify a vast area lying 2. Meaning between the Danube on the N. and of "Illyricum" Macedonia and Thrace on the S., extending from the Adriatic and the Alps to the Black Sea, and inhabited by a number of warlike and semi-civilized tribes known to the Greeks under the general title of Illyrians (Appian, Illyr. 1; Suetonius, Tiberius, 16); it thus comprised the provinces of Illyricum (in the narrower sense), Pannonia and Moesia, which for certain financial and military purposes formed a single administrative area, together with a strip of coast land between Dalmatia and Epirus and, at a later date, Dacia. Appian (Illyr. 6) even extends the term to include Raetia and Noricum, but in this he appears to be in error. But Illyricum has also a narrower and more precise meaning, denoting a single Roman province, which varied in extent with the advance of the Roman conquest but was finally organized in 10 AD by the emperor Augustus. At first it bore the name superior provincia Illyricum or simply Illyricum; later it came to be known as Dalmatia (Tac. Annals, iv.5; Jos, BJ, II, xvi; Dio Cassius, xlix.36, etc). In accordance with Paul's habitual usage of such terms, together with the fact that he employs a Gr form which is a transliteration of the Lat Illyricum but does not occur in any other extant Gr writer, and the fact that he is here writing to the church at Rome, we may conclude that in Rom 15 19 Illyricum bears its more restricted meaning.

The Romans waged two Illyrian wars: in 229-228 BC and in 219 BC, but no province was formed until 167 when, after the fall of the Macedonian power, Illyria received its provincial constitution (Liv., xlv.26). At this time it extended from the Drilo (mod. Drin) to Dalmatia, which was gradually subjugated by Rom arms. In 59 BC Julius Caesar received as his province Illyricum and Gaul, and later Octavian and his generals, Asinius Pollio and Statilius Taurus, waged war there with such success that in 27 BC, at the partition of the provinces between Augustus and the Senate, Illyricum was regarded as wholly pacified and was assigned to the latter. Renewed disturbances led, however, to its transference to the emperor in 11 BC. Two years later the province was extended to the Danube, but in 9 AD, at the close of the 2d Pannonian War, it was divided into two separate provinces, Pannonia and Illyricum (Dalmatia). The latter remained an imperial province, administered by a consular legatus Augusti pro praetore residing at Salonae (mod. Spalato), and two legions were stationed there, at Delminium and at Burnum. One of these was removed by Nero, the other by Vespasian, and thenceforward the province was garrisoned only by auxiliary troops. It fell into three judicial circuits (conventus), that of Scardona comprising Liburnia, the northern portion of the province, while those of Salonae and Narnona made up the district of Dalmatia in the narrower sense. The land was rugged and mountainous, and civilization progressed but slowly; the Romans, however, organized 5 Rom colonies within the province and a considerable number of municipia.

The extension of Paul's preaching to the Illyrian frontier must be assigned to his 3d missionary journey, i.e. to his 2d visit to Macedonia. His movements during the 1st visit (Acts 16 12—17 15) are too fully recorded to admit of our attributing it to that period, but the account in Acts 20 2 of his second tour is not only very brief, but the words, "when he had gone through those parts," suggest an extensive tour through the province, occupying, according to Ramsay, the summer and autumn of 56 AD. See also DALMATIA.

IMAGE, im'āj (עִקּוֹן, ḥelem; εἰκών, eikōn): Its usage falls under 3 main heads. (1) "Image" as object of idolatrous worship (tr<sup>s</sup> about a dozen words, including עִקּוֹן, maṣṣēkhāh, "molten image" [Dt 9 12, etc]; עֲבֹדָה, maṣṣēbhāh, in AV tr<sup>d</sup> "image" or "pillar," in RV always "pillar" [Ex 23 24, etc]; פֶּסֶל, peṣel, "graven image" [Ex 20 4, etc]; ḥelem, "image" [2 K 11 18, etc]; eikōn, "image" [e.g. Rev 14 9]); (2) of man as made in the image of God; (3) of Christ as the image of God. Here we are concerned with the last two usages. For "image" in connection with idolatrous practices, see IDOLATRY; IMAGES; PILLAR; TERAPHIM, etc.

1. Man as Made in the Divine Image.—To define man's fundamental relation to God, the priestly writer in Gen uses two words: "image"

1. In (ḥelem) and "likeness" (d'mūth); once the OT employing both together (Gen 1 26; cf 5 3), but elsewhere one without the other, "image" only in 1 27; 9 6, and "likeness" only in 5 1. The priestly writer alone in the OT uses this expression to describe the nature of man, though the general meaning of the passage Gen 1 26 f is echoed in Ps 8 5-8, and the term itself reappears in Apoc (Sir 17 3; Wisd 2 23) and in the NT (see below).

The idea is important in relation to the Bib. doctrine of man, and has figured prominently in theological discussion. The following are some of the questions that arise:

(1) Is there any distinction to be understood between "image" and "likeness"? Most of the Fathers, and some later theologians, attempt to distinguish between them. (a) Some have referred "image" to man's bodily form, and "likeness" to his spiritual nature (Justin Martyr, Irenaeus). (b) Others, esp. the Alexandrian Fathers, understood by the "image" the mental and moral endowments native to man, and by the "likeness" the Divine perfections which man can only gradually acquire by free development and moral conflict (Clement of Alexandria and Origen), or which is conferred on man as a gift of grace. (c) This became the basis of the later Roman Catholic distinction between the natural gifts of rationality and freedom (=the image), and the supernatural endowments of grace which God bestowed on man after He had created him (the likeness=donum superadditum). The former remained after the Fall, though in an enfeebled state; the latter was lost through sin, but restored by Christ. The early Protestants rejected this distinction, maintaining that supernatural righteousness was part of the true nature and idea of man, i.e. was included in the "image," and not merely externally superadded. Whatever truth these distinctions may or may not contain theologically, they cannot be exegetically inferred from Gen 1 26, where (as is now generally admitted) no real difference is intended.

We have here simply a "duplication of synonyms" (Driver) for the sake of emphasis. The two terms are elsewhere used interchangeably.

(2) What, then, is to be understood by the Divine image? Various answers have been given. (a) Some of the Fathers (influenced by Philo) supposed that the "image" here = the Logos (called "the image of the invisible God" in Col 1 15), on the pattern of whom man was created. But to read the Logos doctrine into the creation narrative is to ignore the historic order of doctrinal development. (b) That it connotes physical resemblance to God (see (1), (a) above; so in the main Skinner, ICC, in loc.). It may be admitted that there is a secondary reference to the Divine dignity of the human body; but this does not touch the essence of the matter, inasmuch as God is not represented as having physical form. (c) That it consists of dominion over the creatures (Socinian view; so also Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, etc). This would involve an unwarranted narrowing of the idea. It is true that such "dominion" is closely associated with the image in Gen 1 26 (cf Ps 8 6-8). But the "image of God" must denote primarily man's relation to his Creator, rather than his relation to the creation. Man's lordship over Nature is not identical with the image, but is an effect of it. (d) It is best to take the term as referring to the whole dignity of man, in virtue of his fundamental affinity to God. It implies the possession by man of a free, self-conscious, rational and moral personality, like unto that of God—a nature capable of distinguishing right and wrong, of choosing the right and rejecting the wrong, and of ascending to the heights of spiritual attainment and communion with God. This involves a separation of man from the beast, and his supremacy as the culmination of the creative process.

(3) Does the term imply man's original perfection, lost through sin? The old Protestant divines maintained that the first man, before the Fall, possessed original righteousness, not only in germ but in developed form, and that this Divine image was destroyed by the Fall. Exegetically considered, this is certainly not taught by the priestly writer, who makes no mention of the Fall, assumes that the image was transmitted from father to son (cf Gen 5 1 with 5 3), and naively speaks of post-diluvian men as created in the image of God (Gen 9 6; cf 1 Cor 11 7; Jas 3 9). Theologically considered, the idea of the perfect holiness of primitive man is based on an abstract conception of God's work in creation, which precludes the idea of development, ignores the progressive method of the Divine government and the essential place of effort and growth in human character. It is more in harmony with modern conceptions (a) to regard man as originally endowed with the power of right choice, rather than with a complete character given from the first; and (b) to think of the Divine image (though seriously defaced) as continuing even in the sinful state, as man's inalienable capacity for goodness and his true destination. If the Divine image in man is a self-conscious, rational and ethical personality, it cannot be a merely accidental or transitory attribute, but is an essential constituent of his being.

Two features may be distinguished in the NT doctrine of the Divine image in man: (1) man's first creation in Adam, (2) his second or new creation in Christ. As to (1), the doctrine of the OT is assumed in the NT. Paul makes a special application of it to the question of the relation of husband and wife, which is a relation of subordination on the part of the wife, based on the fact that man alone was created immediately after the Divine image (1 Cor 11 7). Thus Paul, for the special purpose of his argument, confines the meaning of the image to man's lordly authority, though to infer that he regards this as exhausting its significance would be quite unwarranted. Man's affinity to God is implied, though the term "image" is not used, in Paul's sermon to the Athenians (Acts 17 28 f, man the "offspring" of God). See also Jas 3 9 (it is wrong to curse men, for they are "made after the likeness of God").

(2) More characteristic of the NT is the doctrine of the new creation. (a) The redeemed man is said to be in the image of God (the Father). He is "renewed unto knowledge after the image of him that created him" (Col 3 10), i.e. of God the Creator, not here of Christ or the Logos (as some) (cf Eph 4 24, "after God"). Though there is here an evident reference to Gen 1 26 f, this does not imply that the new creation in Christ is identical with the original creation, but only that the two are analogous. To Paul, the spiritual man in Christ is on a higher level than the natural ("psychical") man as found in Adam (cf esp. 1 Cor 15 44-49), in whom the Divine image consisted (as we have seen) in potential goodness, rather than in full perfection. Redemption is infinitely more than the restoration of man's primitive state. (b) The Christian is further said to be gradually transformed into the image of the Son of God. This progressive metamorphosis involves not only moral and spiritual likeness to Christ, but also ultimately the Christian's future glory, including the glorified body, the "passing through a gradual assimilation of mind and character to an ultimate assimilation of His δόξα, dóxa, the absorption of the splendor of His presence" (Sanday and Headlam, Rom, 218; see Rom 8 29; 1 Cor 15 49; 2 Cor 3 18; and cf Phil 3 21; 1 Jn 3 2).

II. Christ the Image of God.—In 3 important passages in EV, the term "image" defines the relation of Christ to God the Father; twice in Paul: "the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God" (2 Cor 4 4); "who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of all creation" (Col 1 15); and once in He: "who being the effulgence of his glory, and the very image of his substance" (1 3). These statements, taken in their contexts, register the highest reach of the Christology of the Epp.

In the two Pauline passages, the word used is eikōn, which was generally the LXX rendering of selem (Vulg imago); it is derived from εἶκω, eikō, εἶκα, εἶκα, "to be like,"

1. The Terms "resemble," and means that which resembles an object and represents it, as a copy represents the original. In He 1 3 the word used is χαρακτήρ (charaktēr), which is found here only in the NT, and is tr<sup>d</sup> in Vulg figura, AV "express image," RV "very image," RvM "impress." It is derived from χαράσσω (charássō), "to engrave," and has passed through the following meanings: (1) an engraving instrument (active sense); (2) the engraved stamp or mark on the instrument (passive sense); (3) the impress made by the instrument on wax or other object; (4) hence, generally, the exact image or expression of any person or thing as corresponding to the original, the distinguishing feature, or traits by which a person or thing is known (hence Eng. words "character," "characteristic"). The word conveys practically the same meaning as eikōn; but Westcott distinguishes them by saying that the latter "gives a complete representation, under conditions of earth, of that which it figures," while charaktēr "conveys representative traits only" (Westcott on He 1 3).

The idea here expressed is closely akin to that of the Logos doctrine in Jn (1 1-18). Like the Logos, the Image in Paul and in He is the

2. Meaning Son of God, and is the agent of creation as Applied as well as the medium of revelation. to Christ "What a word (logos) is to the ear, namely a revelation of what is within, an image is to the eye; and thus in the expression there is only a translation, as it were, of the same fact from one sense to another" (Dorner, System of Ch. D., ET, III, 178). As Image, Christ is the visible representation and manifestation of the invisible God, the objective expression of the Divine nature, the face of God turned as it were toward the world, the exact likeness of the Father in all things except being the Father. Thus we receive "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (2 Cor 4 6). He is the facsimile of God.

Is Christ described as the Image of God in His preincarnate, His incarnate, or else His exalted state? It is best to say that different

3. To What State Does It Refer? passages refer to different states, but that if we take the whole trend of NT teaching, Christ is seen to be essentially, and in every state, the Image of God. (a) In He 1 3 the reference seems to be to the eternal, preincarnate Son, who is inherently and essentially the expression of the Divine substance. So Paul declares that He subsisted originally in the form of God (ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων, en morphē theōi hypárchōn, Phil 2 6). (b) In Jn 1 13; 12 45; 14 9, though the term image is not used, we have the idea of the historical Jesus as a perfect revelation of the character and glory of God. (c) In the two Pauline passages (2 Cor 4 4; Col 1 15), the reference is probably to the glorified, exalted Christ; not to His preexistent Divine nature, nor to His temporal manifestation, but to His "whole Person, in the divine-human state of His present heavenly existence" (Meyer). These passages in their cumulative impressions convey the idea that the Image is an inalienable property of His personality, not to be limited to any stage of His existence.

Does this involve identity of essence of Father and Son, as in the Homousion formula of the Nicene Creed? Not necessarily, for man

4. Theological Implications also bears the image of God, even in his sinful state (see I above), a fact which the Arians sought to turn to their advantage. Yet in the light of the context, we must affirm of Christ an absolutely unique kinship with God. In the Col passage, not only are vast cosmic and redemptive functions assigned to Him, but there is said to dwell in Him "all the fulness of the Godhead bodily" (1 19; 2 9). In He not only is the Son the final revelation of God to men, the upholder of the universe, and the very image of the Divine nature, but also the effulgence (ἀπαύρασμα, apaúgasma) of God's glory, and therefore of one nature with Him as the ray is of one essence with the sun (1 1-3). The superiority of the Son is thus not merely one of function but of nature. On the other hand, the figure of the "image" certainly guards against any Sabellian identification of Father and Son, as if they were but modes of the one Person; for we cannot identify the pattern with its copy, nor speak of anyone as an image of himself. And, finally, we must not overlook the affinity of the Logos with man; both are the image of God, though the former in a unique sense. The Logos is at once the prototype of humanity within the Godhead, and the immanent Divine principle within humanity.

Both in Paul and in He we have an echo of the Jewish doctrine of Wisdom, and of Philo's doctrine of the Logos. In the Alexandrine Book of Wisdom, written probably under Stoic influence, Divine Wisdom is pictorially represented as "an effulgence [apau-gasma] from everlasting light, and an unspotted mirror of the working of God, and an image [eikōn] of His goodness" (7 26). Philo repeatedly calls the Logos or Divine world-principle the image [eikōn, charaktēr] of God, and also describes it as an effulgence of God. But this use of current Alexandrian terminology and the superficial resemblance of ideas are no proof of conscious borrowing on the part of the apostles. There is this fundamental distinction, that Philo's Logos is not a self-conscious personality, still less a historical individual, but an allegorical hypostatizing of an abstract idea; whereas in Paul and He, as in John, the Divine archetype is actually realized in a historical person, Jesus Christ, the Son and Revealer of God.

IMAGE OF GOD. See GOD, IMAGE OF.

IMAGERY, im'āj-ri (מַשְׁכִּית, maskith, "carved figure"): Only in Ezk 8 12, "every man in his chambers of imagery," i.e. dark chambers on whose walls were pictures in relief representing all kinds of reptiles and vermin, worshipped by elders of Israel. Some maintain that the cult was of foreign origin, either Egypt (Bertholet, Comm. on Ezk), or Bab (Redpath, Westminster Comm. on Ezk); others that it was the revival of ancient superstitions of a totemistic kind which had survived in obscure circles in Israel (W. R. Smith, Lectures on the Religion of the Semites, rev. ed, 357). The word here rendered "imagery" is elsewhere in AV tr<sup>d</sup> "image" (of stone) (Lev 26 1, RV "figured stone"), "pictures" (Nu 33 52, RV "figured stones"; Prov 25 11, RV "network"); twice it means imagination, conceit, i.e. a mental picture (Ps 73 20; Prov 18 11). "Imagery" occurs once in Apoc (Sir 38 27 AV, εἰς ὁμοιωσάι ζωγραφίαν, eis homoiōsai zōgraphían, RV "to preserve likeness in his portraiture").

LITERATURE

Images, as used here, are visible representations of supposedly supernatural or divine beings or powers. They may be (1) themselves objects of worship, (2) pictures, emblems or dwelling-places (temple, ark, pillar, priests) of deities worshipped, (3) empowered instruments (amulets, charms, etc) of object or objects worshipped, (4) pictures or symbols of deities revered though not worshipped. These images may be shapeless blocks, or symmetrically carved figures, or objects of Nature, such as animals, sun, moon, stars, etc.

These visible objects may sometimes be considered, esp. by the uninstructed, as deities, while by others in the small community they are thought of as instruments or symbolizations of deity. Even when they are thought of as deities, this does not exclude a sense and apprehension of a spiritual godhead, since visible corporeal beings may have invisible souls and spiritual attributes, and even the stars may be thought of as "seats of celestial spirits." An idol is usually considered as either the deity itself or his permanent tenement; a fetish is an object which has been given a magical or divine power, either because of its having been the temporary home of the deity, or because it has been formed or handled or otherwise spiritually influenced by such deity. The idol is generally communal, the fetish private; the idol is protective, the fetish is usually not for the common good. (See Jevons, Idea of God in Early Religions, 1910.) Relics and symbolic figures do not become "images" in the objectionable sense until reverence changes to worship. Until comparatively recent times, the Hebrews seem to have offered no religious objection to "artistic" images, as is proved not only from the description of Solomon's temple, but also from the discoveries of the highly decorated temple of Jeh at Syene dating from the 6th cent. BC, and from ruins of synagogues dating from the pre-Christian and early Christian periods (PEF, January, 1908; Expos, December, 1907; Expos T, January and February, 1908). The Second Commandment was not an attack upon artists and sculptors but upon idolaters. Decoration by means of graven figures was not anciently condemned, though, as Jos shows, by the time of the Seleucidae all plastic art was regarded with suspicion. The brazen serpent was probably destroyed in Hezekiah's time because it had ceased to be an ancient artistic relic and had become an object of worship (see below). So the destruction of the ark and altar and temple, which for so long a time had been the means of holy worship, became at last a prophetic hope (Isa 6 7; Jer 3 6; Am 5 25; Hos 6 6; cf Zec 14 20). While the temple is not naturally thought of as an "image," it was as truly so as any Bethel. An idol was the temple in miniature—a dwelling-place of the god. When an image became the object of worship or a means by which a false god was worshipped, it became antagonistic to the First and Second Commandments respectively.

The learned author of the art. on "Image Worship" in the EB (11th ed) disposes too easily of this question when he suggests that image-worship is "a continuance by adults of their childish games with dolls. . . . Idolatrous cults repose largely on make-believe."

Compare the similar statement made from a very different standpoint by the author of Great Is Diana of the Ephesians, or the Original of Idolatry (1695): "All Superstitions are to the People but like several sports to children, which varying in their several seasons yield them pretty entertainment," etc.

No universal institution or custom is founded wholly on superstition. If it does not answer to some real human need, and "if its foundations are not laid broad and deep in the nature of things, it must perish" (J. G. Fraser, Psyche's Task, 1909, 103; cf Salomon Reinach, Revue des études grecques, 1906, 324). Image-worship is too widespread and too natural to humanity, as is proved in modern centuries as well as in the cruder earlier times, to have its basis and source in any mere external and accidental circumstances. All modern research tends to corroborate our belief that this is psychological rather than ecclesiastical in its origin. It is not imposed externally; it comes from within, and naturally accompanies the organic unfoldment of the human animal in his struggle toward self-expression. This is now generally acknowledged to be true of religious feeling and instinct (see esp. Rudolf Eucken, Christianity and the New Idealism, 1909, ch i; I. King, The Development of Religion, 1910); it ought to be counted equally true of religious expression. Neither can the origin of image-worship or even of magical rites be fully explained, as Fraser thinks, by the ordinary laws of association. These associations only become significant because the devoted worshipper already has a body of beliefs and generalizations which make him attentive to the associations which seem to him religiously or magically important. (Jastrow, Aspects of Rel. Belief and Practice in Babylonia and Assyria; cf James H. Leuba, Psychological Origin and Nature of Religion, 1909; Study of Religions, 1911). So animism must be regarded as a philosophy rather than as an original religious faith, since it is based on an "explanation of phenomena rather than an attitude of mind toward the cause of these phenomena" (EB, 11th ed, art. "Animism," and of Höffding, Philosophy of Religion, 1906, 138). In whatever ways the various image-worshipping cults arose historically—whether from a primitive demonology or from the apotheosis of natural objects, or from symbolism, or a false connection of cause with effect—in any case it had some human need behind it and human nature beneath it. The presence of the image testifies to faith in the supernatural being represented by the image and to a desire to keep the object of worship near. Prayer is easier when the worshipper can see his god or some sacred thing the god has honored (cf M. L'abbé E. Van Drival, De l'origine et des sources de l'idolatrie, Paris, 1860).

The first man was not born with a totem-pole in his fist, nor did the earliest historic men possess images. They lacked temples and altars and cphods and idols, as they lacked the fire-stick and potter's wheel. Religion, which showed itself so strong in the next stage of human life, must have had very firm beginnings in the prehistoric period; but what were its external expressions we do not yet certainly know, excepting in the methods of burying and caring for the dead. It seems probable that primitive historic man saw in everything that moved an active soul, and that he saw in every extraordinary thing in earth or heaven the expression of a supernatural power. Yet reflective thinking began earlier than Tylor and all the older scientific anthropologists supposed. Those earlier investigators were without extended chronological data, and although ingenuity was exercised in systematizing the beliefs and customs of modern savages, it was necessarily impossible always to determine in this way which were the most primitive cults. Excavations in Babylonia, Egypt and elsewhere have enabled us for the first time to trace with some chronological certainty the religious expressions of earliest historic man. That primitive man was so stupid that he could not tell the difference between men and things, and that therefore totemism or fetishism or a low form of animism was necessarily the first expression of religious thought is a theory which can no longer be held very buoyantly in the face of the new and striking knowledge, material and religious, which is now seen to be incorporated in some of the most ancient myths of mankind. (See e.g. Winckler, Die jüngsten Kämpfe wider den Panbabylonismus, 1907; Jeremias, The OT in the Light of the Ancient East, 2 vols, 1911.) The pan-Bab theory, which makes so much use of these texts, is not certain, but the facts upon which the theory depends are clear. It is a suggestive fact that among the earliest known deities or symbols of deities mentioned in the most ancient inscriptions are to be found the sun, moon, stars and other great forces of Nature. Out of these conceptions and the mystery of life—which seems to have affected early mankind even more powerfully than ourselves—sprang the earliest known religious language, the myth, which antedated by aeons our oldest written texts, since some of these myths appear fully formed in the oldest texts. Rough figures of these solar and stellar deities are found from very early times in Babylonia. So in the earliest Egypt texts the sun appears as divine and the moon as "the bull among the stars," and rough figures of the gods were carved in human or animal form, or these are represented pictorially by diadems or horns or ostrich feathers, as far back as the IId Dynasty, while even earlier than this stakes and pillars and heaps of stones are sacred. (See further, HDB, 5th vol, 176 ff; Erman, A Handbook of Egypt Rel.; Steindorf, Rel. of the Ancient Egyptians, 1905.) These rude and unshaped objects do not testify, as was once supposed, to a lower form of religious development than when sculptured images are found. The shapeless fetish, which not long ago was generally accepted as the earliest form of image, really represents a more advanced stage and higher form of religious expression than the worship of a beautifully or horribly carved image. It has been generally conceded since the days of Robertson Smith that it takes at least as much imagination and reflection to see an expression of deity in imageless matter as in the carved forms. Rude objects untouched by human hand, even in the most highly developed worships, have been most prized. The earliest images were probably natural objects which, because of their peculiar shapes or functions, were thought of either as divine or as made sacred by the touch of deity. Multiplied copies of these objects would naturally be made when worshippers increased or migrations occurred. While images may have been used in the most early cults, yet the highest development of image-worship has occurred among the most civilized peoples. Both deities and idols are less numerous in the early than in the later days of a religion. This is true in India, Assyria, Babylonia, and Egypt, as all experts now agree. Idols are not found among uncivilized peoples, such as the Bushmen, Fuegians, Eskimos, etc. (See e.g. Allen Menzies, History of Rel., 1895.) Images of the gods presuppose a power of discrimination that could only be the result of reflection. The earliest idols known among the Semites were rude stone pillars or unshapen blocks. These, as the fetish, were probably adored, not for themselves, but for the spirit that was supposed to be in them or to have touched them. Deities and idols are multiplied easily, not only by philological, geographical and social causes, but through inter-tribal and international associations. One thing absolutely proved by recent excavations has been the extent to which the representations of local deities have been modified by the symbolic art of surrounding nations. Babylonia, for example, was influenced by the Syro-Hittite religious art at least as much as by that of Egypt (William Hayes Ward, Cylinders and Other Ancient Oriental Seals, 1909; Clay, Amurru, 1910). Even in adjacent localities the same deity varied greatly in its pictorial representation. See PALESTINE EXPLORATION, and Revue biblique, XIV, 315-48. With the possible exception of one reign in Egypt, during which Ikhnaton refused to allow any deities to be worshipped excepting the sun disc and himself, idolatry outside of the Heb kingdom was never made a crime against the state until the days of Constantine. Theodosius (392 AD) not only placed sacrifices and divination among the capital crimes, but placed a penalty upon anyone who entered a heathen temple.

The dignity of the image in common thought in Bible times may be seen from the fact that man is said to have been made in God's image

4. Bible (עִלְמִי, elem; cf 1 S 6 5; Nu 33 52), References and Christ is said to be "the image of the invisible God" (εἰκών, eikōn; cf Col 1 15 with Rom 1 23). The Customs heathen thought of the sun and stars and idols as being images of the gods, but the Hebrews, though Jeh's temple was imageless, thought of normal humanity as in some true sense possessing a sacred resemblance to Deity, though early Christians taught that only Christ was the Father's "image" in unique and absolute perfection. See IMAGE. The ordinary words for "image" by a slight change came to mean vermin, carrion, false gods, no gods, carcasses, dung, etc. Heathen gods were undoubtedly accounted real beings by the early Hebrews, and the images of these enemies of Jeh were doubtless looked upon as possessing an evil associated (?) power. In the earlier OT era, images, idols, and false gods are synonymous; but as early as the 8th cent. BC Heb prophets begin to reach the lofty conception that heathen gods are non-existent, or at least practically so, when compared with the ever-living Jeh, while the idols are "worthless things" or "non-entities" (Isa 2 8.18.20; 10 10.11; 19 1; 31 7; cf Jer 14 14; Ezk 30 13; note the satiric term 'ēlōlīm, as contrasted with the powerful 'ēlōhīm). The many ordinary terms used by the Hebrews for an idol or image mean "copy," simulacrum, "likeness," "representation." These are often, however, so compounded as technically to express a particular form, as "graven" or "carved" image (e.g. Ex 20 4; 2 Ch 33 7) of wood or stone, i.e. one cut into shape by a tool; "molten image" (e.g. Ex 32 4; Lev 19 4), i.e. one cast out of melted metal (standing image) (Lev 26 1 AV, and see below), etc. However, a few of the OT terms and modes of worship are unusual, or have a more difficult technical meaning, or have been given a new interest by new discoveries, and such deserve a more extended notice.

עֲצָבִים, maṣṣebhāh: These were upright stone pillars, often mentioned in the OT, sometimes as abodes (Bethels) or symbols of deity—

5. Most esp. as used by the heathen—but also Important as votive offerings, memorial and grave Technical stones (Gen 28 18; 31 45; 35 14.20; Terms Josh 24 26; 1 S 7 12). The reverence for these stones is closely connected with that found among all Sem peoples for obelisks (Gen 33 20; 35 7), cairns (Gen 28 18; Josh 4 6), and circles (Josh 4 3.5.20). Rough stone pillars from time immemorial were used in Sem worship (Kittel, Hist of the Hebrews, II, 84). They were thought of primitively as dwelling-places of deity, and the stones and the spots where they stood were therefore accounted sacred. From very early times the mystery of life pressed itself upon human attention, and these stones were viewed as phallic images. These images were at first rough and undifferentiated, but became later well defined as male organs. At Tell Zakariyah the end of one is sculptured to represent a human face. Some sort of phallicism underlies all early Sem religion, the form of which is determined by the attention paid to the date palm, to the breeding of flocks, to astrology, and to social life. This phallicism did not always represent coarse thought, but sometimes a very profound spiritual conception; *cf GOLDEN

CALF, and note Wiedemann's statement in HDB, V, 180 that in Egypt the gods Hu, "Taste," and Sa, "Perception," were created from the blood of the sun-god's phallus. These images of fertility and reproduction were naturally connected in Canaan with the worship of the Baals or "lords" of each locality, upon whose favor as possessor of the land fertility depended. They were also naturally associated with the cult of Astarte, the female counterpart of all the Baals (see ASTARTE). In the OT the Baalim and Asherim are almost invariably classed together, although the latter were wooden posts dedicated to a particular goddess, while "Baal" was merely a title which could be given to any male Sem deity, and sometimes even to his female associate. The maṣṣebhōth were set up in a "high place" (q.v.), attracting reverence because of its "elevation, isolation and mystery" (Vincent). Originally these pillars were not considered as idols, but were naturally erected to Jeh (Gen 28 18; 31 45; 35 14; Ex 24 4), and even Isaiah (19 19) and Hosea (3 4) approve them, though pillars dedicated to idols must of course be destroyed (Ex 23 24; 34 13; Jer 43 13; Ezk 26 11). Only in late times or by very far-sighted law-givers were the maṣṣebhōth erected to Jeh condemned; but after the centralization of the Jeh-worship in Jerus, these pillars were condemned, even when set up in the name of Jeh, and the older places of worship with their indiscriminate rituals and necessary heathen affiliations were also wisely discarded (Lev 26 1; Dt 16 22; see also GOLDEN CALF).

אֲשֶׁרָה, ʾāshērāh: Perhaps a goddess (see ASHERAH), but as ordinarily used in the OT, a sacred tree or stump of a tree planted in the earth (Dt 16 21) or a pole made of wood and set up near the altar (Jgs 6 26; 1 K 16 33; Isa 17 8).

It has been supposed that these were primarily symbols of a goddess Asherah or Ashtoreth (Kuenen, Baethgen), and they were certainly in primitive thought connected with the tree cult and the sacred groves so universally honored by the Semites (see esp. W. R. Smith, Religion of the Semites, 169, 437; Stade, Geschichte, 160 ff; Fraser, Golden Bough, II, 56-117; John O'Neill, Night of the Gods, II, 57); but the tree of life is closely connected in texts and pictures with the human organ of generation, and there can be no doubt that there is a phallic meaning connected with this sacred stake or pole, as with the maṣṣebhōth described above. See references in HDB under "Asherah," and cf Transactions of the Victoria Institute, XXXIX, 234; Winckler, Keilinschriftliches Textbuch zum AT. As these wooden posts from earliest times represented the ideas of fertility and were connected with the mystery of life, they naturally became the signs and symbols in many lands of the local gods and goddesses of fertility.

Astarte was by far the most popular deity of ancient Pal. See ASHTORETH. The figures of Astarte from the 12th to the 9th cent. BC, as found at Gezer, have large hips, disclosing an exaggerated idea of fecundity. In close connection with the Astarte sanctuaries in Pal were found numberless bodies of little children, none over a week old, undoubtedly representing the sacrifice of the firstborn by these Canaanites (R.A.S. Macalister, Excavation of Gezer, 3 vols). These Asherim were erected at the most sacred Heb sanctuaries, at Samaria (2 K 13 6), Bethel (2 K 23 15), and even in the Temple of Jerus (2 K 23 6). The crowning act of King Josiah's reformation was to break down these images (2 K 23 14). As the astrological symbol of Baal was the sun, Astarte is often thought of as the moon-goddess, but her symbol was really Venus. She was, however, sometimes called "Queen of Heaven" (Jer 7 18; 44 17.19; but see ZATW, VI, 123-30).

חַמָּאִן, hammān, AV "images," "idols"; RV "sun-images" (Lev 26 30; 2 Ch 14 5; 34 4.7; Isa 17 8; 27 9; Ezk 6 4.6). This worship may originally have come from Babylonia, but the reverence of the sun under the name Baal-hamman had long been common in Pal before Joshua and the Israelites entered the country. These sun-images were probably obelisks or pillars connected with the worship of some local Baal. The chariot and horses of the sun, mentioned (2 K 23 11) as having an honored place at the western entrance of the Jerus Temple, represented not a local but a foreign cult. In Bab temples, sacrifices were made to the sun-chariot, which seems to have had a special significance in time of war (Pinches, HDB, IV, 629; see also CHARIOTS OF THE SUN).

(1) Golden Calf and Jeroboam's Calves (see GOLDEN CALF).

(2) Brazen Serpent (Nu 21 4-9; 2 K 6. Obscure 18 4).—The serpent, because of its strange, lightning-like power of poisonous attack, its power to shed its skin, and to paralyze its prey, has been the most universally revered of all creatures. Living serpents were kept in Bab temples. So the cobra was the guardian of royalty in Egypt, symbolizing the kingly power of life and death. In mythology, the serpent was not always considered a bad demon, enemy of the Creator, but often appears as the emblem of wisdom, esp. in connection with health-giving and life-giving gods, such as Ea, savior of mankind from the flood, and special "god of the physicians" in Babylon; Thoth, the god of wisdom in Egypt, who healed the eye of Horus and brought Osiris to life again; Apollo, the embodiment of physical perfection, and his son, Aesculapius, most famous giver of physical and moral health and curer of disease among the Greeks. Among the Hebrews also a seal (1500-1000 BC) shows a worshipper before a horned serpent raised on a pole (Wm. Hayes Ward). In Phoen mythology the serpent is also connected with wisdom and long life, and it is found on the oldest Heb seals and on late Jewish talismans (Revue biblique internationale, July, 1908, 382-94); at Gezer, in Pal, a small "brazen serpent" (a cobra) was found in the "cave of oracles," and in early Christian art Jesus the Lord of Life is often represented standing triumphantly upon the serpent or holding it in His fist. In the Heb narrative found in Nu 21, the serpent evidently appears as a well-known symbol representing the Divine ability to cure disease, being erected before the eyes of the Israelites to encourage faith and stop the plague. It was not a totem, for the totem belongs to a single family and is never set up for the veneration of other families (Ramsay, Cities of St. Paul, 39). Hezekiah destroyed it because it was receiving idolatrous worship (2 K 18 4), though there is no hint that such worship was ever a part of the official temple cult (Benzinger); for if this had been done, the earlier prophets could hardly have remained silent. The above explanation seems preferable to the one formerly offered that the serpent was merely a copy of the disease-bearer, as the images offered by the Philis were copies of the ulcers that plagued them (1 S 6 4). See further NĒ-HUSHTAN.

(3) Teraphim (תְּרָפִים, trāphīm).—These are usually considered household gods, but this does not necessarily include the idea that they were images of ancestors, though this is not improbable (Nowack, Hebrew Archaeology, II, 23; HDB, II, 190); that they were images of Jeh is a baseless supposition (see Kautzsch, HDB, V, 643). Sometimes they appear in the house (1 S 19 13, 16); sometimes in sanctuaries (Jgs 17 5; 18 14); sometimes as carried by travelers and armies (Gen 31 30; Ezk 21 21). They are never directly spoken of as objects of worship (yet cf Gen 31 30), but are mentioned in connection with wizardry (2 K 23 24), and as a means of divination (Ezk 21 21; Zec 10 2), perhaps not necessarily inconsistent with Jeh-worship (Hos 3 4). They were sometimes small and could be easily hidden (Gen 31 34); at other times larger and in some way resembling a human being (1 S 19 13). Jewish commentators thought the trāphīm were in early times mummified human heads which were represented in later centuries by rude images (Moore, Crit. and Exeg. Comm. on Jgs, 1895, 382; see esp. Chwolson, Die Ssabier u. der Ssabismus, II, 19, 150). Customs of divination by means of such heads were not unknown. In Israel the trāphīm were sometimes certainly used in consulting Jeh (Jgs 17 5; 18 14 ff), though their use was later officially condemned (2 K 23 24). The trāphīm in the home doubtless correspond in use to the EPHOD (which see) in the sanctuary, and therefore these are frequently connected. Certain small rude images have lately been uncovered in Pal by Bliss, at Tell el-Hesi, and by Sellin, at Tell Ta'annuk, which are supposed to be teraphim.

"Household God" from Gezer.

(4) Image of jealousy (שֶׁמֶל, semel).—It is not certain what this statue was which was set up by the door of the inner gate of the Jerus temple (Ezk 8 3). It was no doubt some idol, perhaps the image of the Asherah (2 K 21 7; 23 6), which certainly had previously been set up in the temple and may have been there again in this day of apostasy. "Jealousy" is not the name of the idol, but it was probably called "image of jealousy" because in a peculiar manner this particular image seems to have been drawing the people from the worship of Jeh and therefore provoking Him to jealousy.

(5) Chambers of imagery (חַדְרֵי מַסְכֻּלֹה, hadhrē maskūlō).—Does Ezekiel mean that in his heart every man in his chambers of imagery was an idol-worshipper, or does this refer to actual wall decorations in the Jerus Temple (Ezk 8 11, 12)? Most expositors take it literally. W. R. Smith has been followed almost if not quite universally in his supposition that a debased form of vermin-worship is described in the "creeping things and abominable beasts" (ver 10). But while this low and ignorant worship was an ancient cult, it had been banished for centuries from respectable heathen worship, and it seems inconceivable that these Israelites who were of the highest class could have fallen to these depths, or if they had done so that the Tammuz and sun-worship should have been considered so much worse (vs 13, 14). To the writer it seems more probable that the references are to Egypt or Gr mysteries which would be described by a Hebrew just as Ezekiel describes this secret chamber. It is now known that the Gr mysteries experienced a revival at exactly this era, and it was probably this revival which was making itself felt in Jerus, for Gr influence was at this time greatly affecting Pal (see Duruy, Hist of Greece, II, 126-80, 374; Cobern, Comm. on Ezk and Dnl, 80-83, 280-82; and separate arts., CHAMBERS OF IMAGERY; IMAGERY).

(6) Ephod (אֶפֶד, 'ēphōdh).—There is no doubt that this was the name of a vestment or ritual loin cloth of linen worn by common priests and temple servants and on special occasions by the king (1 S 2 18; 22 18; 2 S 6 14). The ephod of the high priest was an ornamental waist coat on the front of which was fastened the holy breastplate containing the pocket in which were the Urim and Thummim (Ex 28 6, 30; 29 5; 39 2-5; Lev 8 28).

There are several passages, however, which have convinced many scholars that another ephod is mentioned which must be an image of Jeh (see EPHOD). The chief passages relied upon are Jgs 8 26.27, where Gideon made an ephod with 1,700 shekels of gold and "set" this in Ophrah, where it became an object of worship. So in Jgs 17 4; 18 14-20, Micah provides an ephod as well as an image and pillar for his sanctuary; in 1 S 21 9 the sword of Goliath is preserved behind the ephod; while in various places the will of Jeh is ascertained, not by putting on the ephod, but by "bringing it near" and "bearing" and "carrying" it (1 S 23 6.9; 30 7, etc.). On the basis of these passages Kautzsch (HDB, V, 641) concludes most inconsistently that the ephod appears "exclusively as an image of Jeh." Driver, after an examination of each text, concludes that just in one passage (Jgs 8 27) the term "ephod" is certainly used of the gold casing of an image, and that therefore it may also have this meaning in other passages (HDB, I, 725). It does not seem quite certain, however, that a ceremonial vestment heavily ornamented with gold might not have been "set" or "erected" in a holy place where later it might become an object of worship. If this had been an idolatrous image, would Hosea have deplored its loss (Hos 3 4), and would its use not have been forbidden in some Bible passage?

Kautzsch's view that the ephod meant primarily the garment used to clothe the Divine image, which afterward gave its name to the image itself, is a guess unsupported by the Scriptures quoted or, I think, by any archaeological parallel. We conclude that there is no certain proof that this was an image of Jeh, though it was used ritualistically in receiving the oracles of Jeh (cf Kuenen, Religion of Israel, I, 100; Kittel, Hist of the Hebrews, II, 42; König, Die Hauptprobleme, 59-63). IMAGINATION, i-maj-i-nā'shun (יָצָוּת, yēcer, יָצָוּת, šerirūth; δianoia, dianoia): "Imagination" is the tr of yēcer, properly "a shaping;" hence "a thought" (Gen 6 5; 8 21; Dt 31 21; 1 Ch 28 9; 29 18). In Isa 26 3 yēcer is tr<sup>d</sup> "mind" (AVm "thought" or "imagination"), "whose mind is stayed on thee" (RVm "or imagination"); in Ps 103 14 it is "frame"; of šerirūth, "obstinacy," "stubbornness" (Dt 29 19; Jer 3 17; 7 24; 9 14; 11 8; 13 10; 16 12; 18 12; 23 17); in Ps 81 12 AV it is, "lust," m "hardness or imaginations"; 3 t of maḥāshebheṭh, "thought" or "purpose" in AV (Prov 6 18; Lam 3 60.61); once of dianoia, "mind," "understanding" (Lk 1 51); of logismós, "reasoning" (2 Cor 10 5); and of dialogismós, "reasoning through" (Rom 1 21 AV).

RV gives "stubbornness" in each instance where šerirūth is in AV tr<sup>d</sup> "imagination"; in Prov 6 18 ARV has "purposes"; RV has "devices" (Lam 3 60.61) and "reasonings" (Rom 1 21), "imagination" for "conceit" (Prov 18 11), and (ERV) for "device" (Lam 3 62).

"Imagination" is frequent in Apoc, e.g. Ecclus 22 18 (dianóēma); 37 3 (enthūēma, "wicked imagination"); 40 2 (dialogismos, RV "expectation").

IMAGINE, i-maj'in (יָצָוּת, hāshabh; μελετάω, meletáo): The word most frequently tr<sup>d</sup> "to imagine" in the OT, only in AV and ERV, not in ARV, is hāshabh, "to bind," "combine," "think" (Job 6 26; Ps 10 2; 21 11; 140 2; Hos 7 15; Nah 1 9.11; Zec 7 10; 8 17); we have also hāghāh in AV and ERV, but not in ARV, "to meditate," "mutter," "speak" (Ps 2 1; 38 12); zāmam, "to devise" (Gen 11 6 AV); hārash, "to grave," "devise" (Prov 12 20 AV); hāthath, "to break in upon," "to attack unjustly" (Ps 62 3 AV); mele-tāō, "to meditate" (Acts 4 25). W. L. WALKER

IMALCUE, i-mal-kū'e (Ἰμαλκούη, Imalkouē; AV Simalcue): An Arabian prince to whom Alexander Balas entrusted the upbringing of his young son Antiochus. Tryphon, who had formerly been on the side of Alexander, persuaded Imalcue to set up the young Antiochus (Antiochus VI) against Demetrius, who had incurred the enmity of his men of war (1 Macc 11 39.40). Antiochus confirmed Jonathan in the high-priesthood and appointed him to be one of the king's friends (ver 57). In Jos (Ant, XIII, v, 1) the name is given as Malchus.

IMLA, im'la, IMLAH (יִמְלָח, yimlāh, "fulness"?): Father of the prophet Micaiah (1 K 22 8.9; 2 Ch 18 7.8).

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION, i-mak'ū-lāt kon-sep'shun, THE:

The historic designation of the Roman Catholic dogma promulgated by Pope Pius IX on December 8, 1854, in the Papal Bull entitled

1. Defini- "Ineffabilis Deus." The term is often tion incorrectly applied, even by those whose intelligence should make such an error impossible, to the VIRGIN BIRTH OF CHRIST (q.v.).

The central affirmation of this proclamation, which was read in St. Peter's in the presence of over two hundred bishops, is expressed in the following words: It is proclaimed

2. State- "by the authority of Our Lord Jesus ment of the Christ and the blessed Apostles Peter Dogma and Paul and in our own authority, that the doctrine which holds the blessed Virgin Mary to have been, from the first instant of her conception, by a singular grace and privilege of Almighty God, in view of the merits of Christ Jesus the Saviour of Mankind, preserved free from all stain of original sin, was revealed by God, and is, therefore, to be firmly and constantly believed by all the faithful" (see Schaff, A History of the Creeds of Christendom, II, 211, 212).

(1) Drawn from specifically Protestant principles.—Objections to the dogma are mainly two: (a) the claim to authority upon which the proclamation rests. There is every reason to believe that one of the major motives to the entire transaction was the wish, on the part of Pius and his advisers, to make an unmistakable assertion of absolute doctrinal authority by the Rom pontiff.

To Protestants of all shades of opinion there would be unbearable offence in the wording of the decree, even if assent could be given to the doctrine itself. The whole vital issue of the Reformation is involved in the use by an ecclesiastic of the words "in our own authority" in addition to the words "by the authority of Our Lord Jesus Christ and the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul." (b) The tendency to Mariolatry in the entire movement. As we shall see, the ascription of Divine honors to Mary is avoided in the public statement of the dogma and in the defence of it by Roman Catholic writers, but one has but to survey the course of discussion leading up to the publication of 1854, and subsequent to it, to discover a growing tendency to lift Mary out of the realm of human beings and to endow her with Divine attributes and functions. An extended discussion of Mariolatry lies beyond the range of this art. (see MARY); it is only necessary to point out the obvious connections (see Roman Catholic Dictionary and church histories, sub loc.).

(2) Drawn from Roman Catholic principles.—It is far from the truth to suppose that there are no objections to this modern dogma save those which are specifically Protestant. From the viewpoint of the devout Roman Catholic, and for the sake of the prestige of the papacy, this particular dogma seems to have been unfortunately chosen.

(a) It has no basis in Scripture. The only attempt made to provide a Scriptural argument is by using a vague and unsatisfactory || between Mary and Eve before the Fall, to be found in the writings of certain church Fathers who did not hold the papal dogma but unconsciously provided a slender and most insecure basis for it (see infra). Most Roman Catholic writers are intelligent enough to admit that the theory of inspired tradition alone can be appealed to in support of the idea. The ordinary and only tenable argument is that the ecclesiastical promulgation and acceptance of the doctrine prove its apostolic origin (see Catholic Dictionary, sub loc.).

(b) It weakens the authority of the church. It would almost seem as if the doctrines of ecclesiastical authority and particularly of papal infallibility had, in this unfortunate proclamation, reached a reductio ad absurdum for the comfort of their foes. Notice with care the historical standing of this dogma: (a) The acknowledged absence of all positive evidence for apostolic origin and primitive authority (see Catholic Dictionary ut supra). (b) The abundant positive evidence that the principal Fathers of the early church did not believe in the sinlessness of Mary (see list of names and references given by H. C. Sheldon, History of the Christian Church, sub loc.). (c) The uncertain and equivocal testimony per contra drawn from the early Fathers. They are practically confined to the following: Ephrem Syrus (Carmina, Hymn 27, strophe 8), where he says "Truly it is Thou and Thy mother only who are fair altogether. For in Thee there is no stain and in Thy mother no spot"; St. Augustine (De Natura et Gratia, cap. 26), "Two were made simple, innocent, perfectly like each other, Mary and Eve," etc. To these may be added the words of Irenaeus: "The knot of Eve's disobedience was untied by Mary's obedience" (Catholic Dictionary, 422). In regard to these three passages it may reasonably be contended that even if these statements necessarily implied the Immaculate Conception of Mary, which they certainly do not, they would still have to be estimated against the many weighty statements which may be brought forward on the other side. (d) The prolonged controversy over the doctrine. From the earliest time when the idea of Mary's miraculous freedom from sin appears, up to the Old Catholic agreement of 1874, devout and faithful Roman Catholics have protested against the addition of this unscriptural dogma to the faith of the church. Bonaventura (Locus Theol., VII, 1) says: "All the saints who have made mention of this matter, with one mouth have asserted that the blessed Virgin was conceived in original sin." With the statement of the Old Catholic agreement we may safely sum up the ecclesiastical situation, even from the viewpoint of those who hold to the doctrinal validity of tradition. Art. X reads: "We reject the New Rom doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary, as being contrary to the tradition of the first 13 centuries, according to which Christ alone is conceived without sin."

(3) Drawn from general considerations of Christian doctrine.—The most serious objections to this offensive and gratuitous dogma are not at all specifically Protestant but, rather, broadly Christian. It is necessary at this point to assure ourselves that we understand (as many Protestants evidently do not) just what is meant by the doctrine as a doctrine. According to the accepted Roman Catholic explanation, Mary, at the supposed stage of her conception when the soul was actually infused into the body waiting for it, received the special grace of God whereby she was delivered from all stain of original sin. The point which Protestants need esp. to note is that, according to Roman Catholic ideas, this gracious act of God was performed on the basis of the foreseen merits of Christ's sacrifice. This tones down the offensiveness of the doctrine in that it does not per se imply the equality of Mary with Christ, but rather the contrary, in so far as the grace bestowed upon her was gained by anticipation from Him. Roman Catholic writers naturally emphasize this fact in recommending the doctrine to Protestant minds. None the less the offence remains. The "Immaculate Conception" necessarily implies the "immaculate life," and on the same basis of supernatural grace, else would the special miracle have occurred in vain and the fall of Adam been repeated in Mary. Hence, a full account of the doctrine would be that Mary was completely and miraculously redeemed at her conception and completely and miraculously kept from sin throughout her whole life. Apart from all questions as to the rightful place of Mary in Christian thought, this idea involves utter doctrinal confusion. It means that Mary never became a true human being and never lived a true human life. Redemption by a miraculous process begun at conception and carried on throughout the life is an utter impossibility, for the Holy Spirit does not work impersonally, and miraculous holiness which is holiness of a purely Divine character, without a free, coöperating human factor, is no human holiness at all. This dogma reads Mary out of the human family, reduces her to an image and makes her life a phantasm. Moreover, the parallels which are adduced in its support are not true parallels at all.

Our Lord's sinlessness was not mechanically guaranteed by His miraculous conception (see VIRGIN BIRTH) but was His own achievement through the Holy Spirit granted to Him and personally appropriated. The Hallowing of Children at the Font (see Catholic Dictionary, 470a), the sanctifying of those "separated from the womb" (Gal 1 15) to God's service, does not imply the miraculous guarantee of artificial sinlessness, but such a gracious influence as enables the subject freely coöperating to obtain victory over sin as a controlling principle. Actual sin and need of forgiveness is not praetermitted by such special grace.

We can only say, in conclusion, that every reason, which usually operates in a Christian mind to insure rejection of a false teaching, ought to preclude the possibility of accepting this peculiar dogma which is Scripturally baseless, historically unjustified and doctrinally unsound.

LITERATURE.—The best simple and reasonably fair-minded discussion of this dogma from the Roman Catholic viewpoint is to be found in the Catholic Dictionary already mentioned, where wide references will be found. For the Protestant view consult any authoritative church history, esp. that of Professor H. C. Sheldon where copious references to Patristic lit. will be found.

IMMANUEL, i-man'ü-el (אֱלֹהִים עִמָּנוּ, 'immanü 'el): The name occurs but 3 t, twice in the OT (Isa 7 14; 8 8), and once in the NT (Mt 1 23). It is a Heb word signifying "God is with us." The form "Emmanuel" appears in LXX (Ἐμμανουήλ, Emmanouēl).

In 735 BC Ahaz was king of Judah. The kingdom of Israel was already tributary to Assyria (2 K 15 19,20). Pekah, king of Is-

1. Isaiah rael, a bold and ambitious usurper, Rebukes and Rezin, king of Syria, formed an Ahaz alliance, the dual object of which was, first, to organize a resistance against Assyria, and second, to force Ahaz to coöperate in their designs against the common tyrant. In the event of Ahaz' refusal, they planned to depose him, and to set the son of Tabeel, a choice of their own, upon the throne of David. To this end they waged war against Judah, advancing as far as Jerus itself, but without complete success (Isa 7 1). Ahaz, a weak king, and now panic-stricken, determined to invoke the aid of Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria (2 K 16 7). This he actually did at a later stage in the war (6 9; 15 29). Such a course would involve the loss of national independence and the payment of a heavy tribute. At this period of crisis, Isaiah, gathering his disciples around him (Isa 8 16), is told to deliver a message to the king. Ahaz, though making a show of resistance against the coalition, is in reality neither depending upon the help of Jeh nor upon the courage of his people. Isaiah, in an effort to calm his fears and prevent the fatal alliance with Assyria, offers him a sign. This method is specially characteristic of this prophet. Fearing to commit himself to the policy of Divine dependence, but with a pretense at religious scruples, "Neither will I tempt Jeh," the king refuses (Isa 7 12). The prophet then chides him bitterly for his lack of faith, which, he says, not only wearies men, but God also (7 13).

He then proceeds to give him a sign from God Himself, the sign of "Immanuel" (7 14). The interpretation of this sign is not clear, even apart from its NT application to Christ. The Heb word tr<sup>d</sup> "virgin" in EV means, more correctly, "bride," in the OE sense of one who is about to become a wife, or is still a young wife. Ps 68 25 EV gives "damsels."

2. The Sign of "Immanuel"

Isaiah predicts that a young bride shall conceive and bear a son. The miracle of virgin-conception, therefore, is not implied. The use of the definite article before "virgin" (hā-'almāh) does not of itself indicate that the prophet had any particular young woman in his mind, as the Heb idiom often uses the definite article indefinitely. The fact that two other children of the prophet, like Hosea's, bore prophetic and mysterious names, invites the conjecture that the bride referred to was his own wife. The hypothesis of some critics that a woman of the harem of Ahaz became the mother of Hezekiah, and that he was the Immanuel of the prophet's thought is not feasible. Hezekiah was at least 9 years of age when the prophecy was given (2 K 16 2).

Immanuel, in the prophetic economy, evidently stands on the same level with Shear-jashub (7 3) as the embodiment of a great idea, to which Isaiah again appeals in Isa 8 8 (see ISALAH, VII).

The question as to whether the sign given to Ahaz was favorable or not presents many difficulties.

Was it a promise of good or a threat of judgment? It is evident that the prophet had first intended an omen of deliverance and blessing (7 4,7). Did the king's lack of faith alter the nature of the sign? Ver 9, "If ye will not believe," etc, implies that it might have done so. The omission of ver 16, and esp. the words "whose two kings thou abhorrest," greatly simplifies this theory, as "the land," singular, would more naturally refer to Judah than to Syria and Ephraim collectively. The omen would then become an easily interpreted threat, referring to the overthrow of Judah rather than that of her enemies. Immanuel should eat curdled milk and honey (ver 15), devastation reducing the land from an agricultural to a pastoral one. The obscure nature of the passage as it stands suggests strongly that it has suffered from interpolation. The contrary theory that the sign was a promise and not a prediction of disaster, has much to commend it, though it necessitates greater freedom with the text. The name "Immanuel" implies the faith of the young mother of the child in the early deliverance of her country, and a rebuke to the lack of that quality in Ahaz. It is certain also that Isaiah looked for the destruction of Syria and Ephraim, and that, subsequent to the Assyrian invasion, salvation should come to Judah through the remnant that had been faithful (11 11). The fact that the prophet later gave the name of Maher-shalal-hash-baz to his new-born son, a name of good omen to his country, further strengthens this position. The omission of vs 15,17 would make the sign a prophecy of the failure of the coalition. It is plain, whichever theory be accepted, that something must be eliminated from the passage to insure a consistent reading.

The question now presents itself as to what was the relation of Immanuel to the Messianic prophecies. Should the emphasis be laid upon "a virgin," the son, or the name itself? For traditional interpretation the sign lay in the virgin birth, but the uncertainty of implied virginity in the Heb noun makes this interpretation improbable. The identification of the young mother as Zion personified, and of the "son" as the future generation, is suggested by Whitehouse and other scholars. But there is no evidence that the term 'almāh was used at that time for personification. The third alternative makes Immanuel a Messiah in the wider use of the term, as anticipated by Isaiah and his contemporaries. There can be little doubt but that there existed in Judah the Messianic hope of a national saviour (2 S 7 12). Isaiah is expecting the arrival of one whose character and work shall entitle him to the great names of 9 6. In him should dwell all the fulness of God. He was to be "of the stem of Jesse," the bringer of the Golden Age. The house of David is now beset by enemies, and its reigning representative is weak in faith. The prophet therefore announces the immediate coming of the deliverer. If he had intended the virgin-conception of Christ in the distant future, the sign of "Immanuel" would have possessed no immediate significance, nor would it have been an omen to Ahaz. With regard to the Messianic idea, Mic 5 3 ("until the time that she who travaileth hath brought forth") is of importance as indicating the prevalent thought of the time. Recent evidence shows that even in Babylonia and Egypt there existed expectations of a divinely born and wonderful saviour. To this popular tradition the prophet probably appealed, his hearers being easily able to appreciate the force of oracular language that is to us obscure. There is much to confirm the view, therefore, that the prophecy is Messianic.

The use of the word as it relates to the virgin birth of Christ and the incarnation cannot be dealt with here (see PERSON OF CHRIST).

These facts, however, may be noted. The LXX (which has parthénos, "virgin") and the Alexandrian Jews interpreted the passage as referring to the virgin birth and the Messianic ministry. This interpretation does not seem to have been sufficiently prominent to explain the rise of the idea of miraculous virgin conception and the large place it has occupied in Christological thought. See VIRGIN BIRTH.

LITERATURE

In hardly any subject is it more necessary to be careful in the definition of terms and clear distinction of ideas, esp. where the Bib. doctrine is concerned, than in this of "immortality." By "immortality" is frequently meant simply the survival of the soul, or spiritual part of man, after bodily death. It is the assertion of the fact that death does not end all.

1. Preliminary—Need of Definition and Distinction

The soul survives. This is commonly what is meant when we speak of "a future life," "a future state," "a hereafter." Not, however, to dwell on the fact that many peoples have no clear conception of an immaterial "soul" in the modern sense (the Egyptians, e.g. distinguished several parts, the Ka, the Ba, etc. which survived death; often the surviving self is simply a ghostly resemblance of the earthly self, nourished with food, offerings, etc.), there is the more serious consideration that the state into which the surviving part is supposed to enter at death is anything but a state which can be described as "life," or worthy to be dignified with the name "immortality." It is a state peculiar to "death" (see DEATH); in most cases, shadowy, inert, feeble, dependent, joyless; a state to be dreaded and shrunk from, not one to be hoped for. If, on the other hand, as in the hope of immortality among the nobler heathen, it is conceived of, as for some, a state of happiness—the clog of the body being shaken off—this yields the idea, which has passed into so much of our modern thinking, of an "immortality of the soul," of an imperishableness of the spiritual part, sometimes supposed to extend backward as well as forward; an inherent indestructibility.

It will be seen as we advance, that the Bib. view is different from all of these. The soul, indeed, survives the body; but this disembodied state is never viewed as one of complete "life." For the Bible "immortality" is not merely the survival of the soul, the passing into "Sheol" or "Hades." This is not, in itself considered, "life" or happiness. The "immortality" the Bible contemplates is an immortality of the whole person—body and soul together. It implies, therefore, deliverance from the state of death. It is not a condition simply of future existence, however prolonged, but a state of blessedness, due to redemption and the possession of the "eternal life" in the soul; it includes resurrection and perfected life in both soul and body. The subject must now be considered more particularly in its different aspects.

1. The Natural Belief.—In some sort the belief in the survival of the spirit or self at death is a practically universal phenomenon. To what is it traceable? A favorite hypothesis with anthropologists is that it has its origin in dreams or visions suggesting the continued existence of the dead (cf H. Spencer, Eccles. Instit., chs i, xiv).

1. Its Origin

Before, however, a dream can suggest the survival of the soul, there must be the idea of the soul, and of this there seems a simpler explanation in the consciousness which even the savage possesses of something within him that thinks, feels and wills, in distinction from his bodily organs. At death this thinking, feeling something disappears, while the body remains. What more natural than to suppose that it persists in some other state apart from the body? (Cf Max Müller, Anthrop. Religion, 281.) Dreams, etc. may help this conviction, but need not create it. It is only as we assume such a deeper root for the belief that we can account for its universality and persistence. Even this, however, while an instinctive presumption, can hardly be called a proof of survival after death, and it does not yield an idea of "immortality" in any worthy sense. It is at most, as already said, a ghostly reduplication of the earthly life that is thus far reached.

(1) The soul spiritual.—The more philosophical arguments that are adduced for the soul's immortality (or survival) are not all of equal weight. The argument based on the metaphysical essence of the soul (see Plato's Phaedo) is not in these days felt to be satisfying. On the other hand, it can be maintained against the materialist on irrefragable grounds that the soul, or thinking spirit, in man is immaterial in Nature, and, where this is granted, there is, or can be, no proof that death, or physical dissolution, destroys this conscious spirit. The presumption is powerfully the other way. Cicero of old argued that death need not even be the suspension of its powers (cf Tusc. Disp. i.20); Butler reasons the matter from analogy (Anal., I, ch i); modern scientists like J. S. Mill (Three Essays, 201) and Professor Huxley (Life and Letters, I, 217 ff; cf William James, Ingersoll Lecture) concede that immortality cannot be disproved. The denial one hears from various sides more frequently than formerly is therefore not warranted. Still possibility is not certainty, and there is nothing as yet to show that even if the soul survives death, its new state of existence has in it anything desirable.

2. Philosophical Arguments

It was hinted that one use which the Greeks made of the metaphysical argument was to prove the indestructibility of the soul—its immortality in the sense of having no beginning and no end. This is not the Christian doctrine. The soul has no such inherent indestructibility. It is dependent on God, as everything else is, for its continued existence. Did He withdraw His sustaining power, it would cease to exist. That it does continue to exist is not doubted, but this must be argued on other grounds.

(2) Capacities of human nature.—A much more apprehensible argument for immortality—more strictly, of a future state of existence—is drawn from the rich capacities and possibilities of human nature, for which the earthly life affords so brief and inadequate a sphere of exercise. It is the characteristic of spirit that it has in it an element of infinitude, and aspires to the infinite. The best the world can give can never satisfy it. It has in it the possibility of endless progress, and ever higher satisfaction. It was this consideration which led Kant, with all his theoretical skepticism, to give immortality a place among his "doctrinal beliefs" (see his Critique of Pure Reason, Bohn's tr, 590–91), and moved J. S. Mill to speak of it as the only hope which gave adequate scope to the human faculties and feelings, "the loftier aspirations being no longer kept down by a sense of the insignificance of human life by the disastrous feeling of 'not worth while'" (Three Essays, 249). Yet when these arguments are calmly weighed, they amount to no more than a proof that man is constituted for immortality; they do not afford a guarantee that this destiny might not be forfeited, or if they yield such a guarantee for the good, they hardly do so for the wicked. The belief, in their case, must depend on other considerations.

(3) The moral argument.—It is, as Kant also felt, when we enter the moral sphere that immortality, or the continued existence of the soul, becomes a practical certainty to the earnest mind. With moral personality is bound up the idea of moral law and moral responsibility; this, in turn, necessitates the thought of the world as a moral system, and of God as moral Ruler. The world, as we know it, is certainly a scene of moral administration—of probation, of discipline, of reward and penalty—but as obviously a scene of incomplete moral administration. The tangled condition of things in this life can satisfy no one's sense of justice. Goodness is left to suffer; wickedness outwardly triumphs. The evil-doer's own conscience proclaims him answerable, and points to future judgment. There is need for a final rectification of what is wrong here. But while a future state seems thus called for, this does not of itself secure eternal existence for the wicked, nor would such existence be "immortality" in the positive sense. In view of the mystery of sin, the lamp of reason grows dim. For further light we must look to revelation.

II. The Biblical Doctrine—the OT.—The Bib. view of immortality starts from man's relation to God. Man, as made in the image

1. Starting-Point—Man's Relation to God—God (Gen 1 27), is fitted for knowledge of God, for fellowship with Him. This implies that man is more than an animal; that he has a life which transcends time. In it already lies the pledge of immortality if man is obedient.

Man's nature.—With this corresponds the account given of man's creation and original state. Man is a being composed of body and soul; both are integral parts of his personality. He was created for life, not for mortality. The warning, "In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die" (Gen 2 17), implies that if man continued obedient he would live. But this is not an immortality of the soul only. It is a life in the body (cf Gen 3 22). Its type is such cases as Enoch and Elijah (Gen 5 24; 2 K 2 11.12; cf Ps 49 15; 73 24).

The frustration of this original destiny of man comes through sin. Sin entails death (see DEATH).

2. Sin and Death—Death in its physical aspect is a separation of soul and body—a breaking up of the unity of man's personality.

In one sense, therefore, it is the destruction of the immortality which was man's original destiny. It does not, however, imply the extinction of the soul. That survives, but not in a state that can be called "life." It passes into Sheol—the sad, gloomy abode of the dead, in which there is no joy, activity, knowledge of the affairs of earth, or (in the view of Nature) remembrance of God, or praise of His goodness (on this subject, and the Heb belief in the future state generally, see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT; DEATH; SHEOL). This is not future "life"—not "immortality."

It is the part of grace and redemption to restore immortality in the true sense. Had the world been left to develop in sin, no further hope could have come to it. The picture of Sheol would have become ever darker as the idea of retribution grew stronger; it could never become

3. Grace and Redemption—the True Immortality—brighter. But God's grace intervened: "Deliver him from going down to the pit, I have found a ransom" (Job 33 24). God's mercy breaks in on the hopelessness of man's lot. He gives to man His promises; makes His covenant with man; admits man to His fellowship (Gen 3 15; 4 4; 5 24; 6 8.9; 12 1-3; 15, etc.). In this fellowship the soul was raised again to its true life even on earth. But this held in it also a hope for the future. The promises placed in the forefront as tokens of God's favors were indeed predominatingly temporal—promises for this life—but within these (the kernel within the shell) was the supreme possession of God Himself (Ps 4 6 f; 16 2). This held in it the hope of redemption and the principle of every good.

Deliverance from Sheol.—Here we reach the core of the OT hope of immortality. Such fellowship as the believer had with God could not be lost, even in Sheol; beyond that was deliverance from Sheol. In their highest moments it was this hope that sustained patriarchs, psalmists, prophets, in their outlook on the future. Doubt might cloud their minds; there might be seasons of darkness and even despair; but it was impossible in moments of strong faith to believe that God would ever really desert them. The eternal God was their dwelling-place; beneath them were everlasting arms (Dt 33 27; cf Ps 90 1). Their hope of immortality, therefore, was, in principle, the hope not merely of an "immortality of the soul," but likewise of resurrection—of complete deliverance from Sheol. Thus it is clearly in the impassioned outburst of Job (19 25-27; cf 14 13 f), and in many of the psalms. The hope always clothes itself in the form of complete deliverance from Sheol. Thus in Ps 17 14 f, the wicked have their portion "in this life," but, "As for me, I shall behold thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness" (ARV "with beholding thy form"); and in Ps 49 14 f, the wicked are "appointed as a flock for Sheol," but "God will redeem my soul from the power of Sheol; for he will receive me" (same expression as that regarding Enoch, Gen 5 24; cf Ps 73 24). It will be remembered that when Jesus expounded the declaration, "I am the God of Abraham," etc, it was as a pledge of resurrection (Mt 22 31 f). The idea comes to final expression in the declaration in Dnl of a resurrection of the just and unjust (12 2). For further development and illustration see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT.

Later Jewish thought carried out these ideas of the OT to further issues. A blessed future for 4. Later Jewish Thought—the righteous was now accepted, and was definitely connected with the idea of resurrection. The wicked remained in Sheol, now conceived of as a place of retribution. The Gentiles, too, shared this doom. See ESCHATOLOGY.

III. The Christian Hope.—In full consonance with what is revealed in part in the OT is the hope of immortality discovered in the NT.

1. Immortality through Christ—The ring of this joyful hope is heard in every part of the apostolic writings. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," says Peter, "who according to his great mercy begat us again unto a living hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, unto an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you" (1 Pet 1 3 f). Paul declares, "Our Saviour Christ Jesus, who . . . brought life and immortality [incorruption] to light through the gospel" (2 Tim 1 10). In Rom 2 7 he had spoken of those who "by patience in well-doing seek for glory and honor and incorruption, eternal life." This immortality, it is seen, is part of the eternal life bestowed through Jesus on believers. It is guaranteed by Christ's own resurrection and life in glory. The nature of this hope of the gospel may now be further analyzed.

(1) Survival of the soul.—The soul survives the body. A future state for both righteous and wicked is plainly declared by Jesus Himself. "He that believeth on me," He said to Martha, "though he die, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die" (Jn 11 25 f). To His disciples He said, "If I go and prepare a place for you, I come again, and will receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also" (Jn 14 3). Cf His words to the penitent thief: "To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise" (Lk 23 43). The survival of both righteous and wicked is implied in the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus (Lk 16 19-31). So in many other places (e.g. Mt 5 29 f; 10 28; 11 21-24; 12 41, etc.). The same is the teaching of the epp. The doctrine of a future judgment depends on and presupposes this truth (Rom 2 5-11; 2 Cor 5 10, etc.).

(2) Union with Christ in unseen world.—Death for the redeemed, though a result of sin, does not destroy the soul's relation to God and to Christ. The eternal life implanted in the soul in time blossoms in its fruition into the life and blessedness of eternity (Rom 8 10 f; Phil 1 21; Col 1 27). The soul is, indeed, in an incomplete state till the resurrection. It "waits for our adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body" (Rom 8 23). But its state, though incomplete, is still a happy one. Hades has lost its gloom, and is for it a "Paradise" (Lk 23 43). It dwells in a chamber of the Father's house (Jn 14 2 f; 17 24). It is to be, even in the unclothed state ("absent from the body"), "at home with the Lord" (2 Cor 5 8). It is for it an object of desire to be "with Christ" in that state after death (Phil 1 21). The pictures in Rev, though highly figurative, indicate a condition of great blessedness (Rev 7 9-17).

(3) The resurrection.—The fulness of the blessedness of immortality implies the resurrection. The resurrection is a cardinal article of Christ's teaching (Mt 22 29-32; Jn 5 25-29; 11 23-26). He Himself is the Lord of life, and life-giver in the resurrection (Jn 5 21, 25, 26; 11 25, "I am the resurrection, and the life"). The resurrection of believers is secured by His own resurrection. Jesus died; He rose again (see RESURRECTION). His resurrection carries with it the certainty of the resurrection of all His people. This is the great theme of 1 Cor 15. As Christ lives, they shall live also (Jn 14 19). The believers who are alive at His Parousia shall be changed (1 Cor 15 51; 1 Thess 4 17); those who are dead shall be raised first of all (1 Thess 4 16). The resurrection body shall be a body like to Christ's own (Phil 3 21)—incorruptible, glorious, powerful, spiritual, immortal (1 Cor 15 42 ff. 53 f). This is not to be confused with sameness of material particles (vs 37 f), yet there is the connection of a vital bond between the old body and the new. This is the hope of the believer, without which his redemption would not be complete.

(4) The wicked also raised.—The wicked also are raised, not, however, to glory, but for judgment (Jn 5 29; Acts 24 15; Rev 20 12-15). The same truth is implied in all passages on the last judgment. Excluded from the blessedness of the righteous, their state is described by both Jesus and His apostles as one of uttermost tribulation and anguish (e.g. Mt 25 46; Mk 9 43-50; Rom 2 8 f).

This is not "immortality" or "life," though the continued existence of the soul is implied in it (see PUNISHMENT, EVERLASTING; HELL; RETRIBUTION).

(5) Eternal life.—The condition of the blessed in their state of immortality is one of unspeakable felicity of both soul and body forever. There are, indeed, degrees of glory—this is carefully and consistently taught (Mt 25 14 f; Lk 19 12 f; 1 Cor 3 10-15; 15 41; Phil 3 10-14; 2 Tim 4 7 f; 1 Jn 2 28)—but the condition as a whole is one of perfect satisfaction, holiness and blessedness (cf Mt 13 43; 25 34; Rom 2 7, 10; Rev 22 3 ff, etc.). The blessedness of this eternal state includes such elements as the following: (1) restoration to God's image and likeness to Christ (1 Cor 15 49; 2 Cor 3 18; Eph 4 24; Col 3 10; 1 Jn 3 2); (2) perfect holiness in the possession of God's Spirit (2 Cor 7 1; Phil 1 6; Rev 21 27; 22 4, 11); (3) the unveiled vision of God's glory (Rev 22 4; cf Ps 17 15); (4) freedom from all sorrow, pain and death (Rev 21 3 f); (5) power of unwearied service (Rev 22 3).

The contrast between the Bib. view of immortality and that of heathenism and of the schools will now be obvious. It is not mere future existence; not a bare, abstract immortality of the soul; it is the result of redemption and of renewal by God's spirit; it embraces the whole personality, soul and body; it is not shared by the unholy; it includes the perfection of rational, moral and spiritual blessedness, in an environment suitable to such glorified existence. As such it is the supreme prize after which every believer is called to strive (Phil 3 13 f).

IMMUTABILITY, i-mū-ta-bil'i-ti, IMMUTABLE, i-mū-ta-b'l (ἀμετάθετος, amētd̄thetos): Occurs in He 6 17, 18 of the unchangeableness of the Divine counsel. It is the perfection of Jeh that He changes not in character, will, purpose, aim (Mal 3 6; so of Christ, He 13 8). See FAITHFULNESS; UNCHANGEABLE.

IMNA, im'na (יִמְנָא, yimnā'): A descendant of Asher (1 Ch 7 35).

IMNAH, im'na (יִמְנָה, yimnāh):

(1) Eldest son of Asher (Gen 46 17, AV "Jimnah"; Nu 26 44, AV "Jimna"; 1 Ch 7 30).

(2) A Levite of Hezekiah's time (2 Ch 31 14).

IMNITES, im'nits (יִמְנִי, yimnī): Descendants of IMNAH (q.v. [1]) (Nu 26 44, AV "Jimnites").

IMPART, im-pärt' (μεταδίδωμι, metadidōmi, "to share"): "They . . . imparted [AV "added"] nothing to me" (Gal 2 6); that is, did not propose any correction or addition to my teaching. "That I may impart unto you some spiritual gift" (Rom 1 11) expresses the apostle's hope that the Rom believers may increase in faith and love through his teaching and influence.

"To impart unto you . . . our own souls" (1 Thess 2 8) meant to spend their utmost strength and to expose their lives in their service.

IMPEDIMENT, im-ped'i-ment: Found in Mk 7 32, "had an impediment in his speech," as a tr of μογίλαλος, mogilalos, comp. of μόγος, mōgos, "toil" and λόλος, lōlos, "speech," i.e. one who speaks with difficulty. In the LXX the word is used as a tr of ἄλλος, 'illēm, "dumb" (Isa 35 6).

IMPLEAD, im-plēd' (Acts 19 38 AV, "Let them implead one another"): "Implead" means "to sue at law," hence RV "Let them accuse one another." Court days are kept, let them prosecute the suit in court and not settle matters in riot. ἐγκαλεῖν, egkaleîn, means "to call in," "to call to account."

IMPORTABLE, im-pōr'ta-b'l (δυσβάστακτος, dusbástaktos): An obsolete word, meaning "unbearable" (Lat im, "not," portabilis, "bearable") found in Pr Man, "Thine angry threatening [RV "the anger of thy threatening"] toward sinners is importable"; cf Rheims version, Mt 23 4, "heavy burdens and importable"; Chaucer ("Clerk's Tale" C.T.), "For it were importable though they wolde."

IMPORTUNITY, im-por-tū'ni-ti: Occurs only in Lk 11 8, where it is the rendering of ἀναιδέα, anaideia (WH, ἀναιδία, anaidia). This Gr word implies an element of impudent insistence rising to the point of shamelessness which the Eng. word "importunity" fails to express, thus weakening the argument of the parable, which is that if by shameless insistence a favor may be won, even from one unwilling and ungracious, still more surely will God answer the earnest prayer of His people. God's willingness to give exceeds our ability to ask. The parable teaches by way of contrast, not by parallel.

IMPOSITION, im-pō-zish'un, OF HANDS. See HANDS, IMPOSITION (LAYING ON) OF.

IMPOSSIBLE, im-pos'i-b'l (vb. ἀδυνατέω, adynatēō; adj ἀδύνατος, adínatos): "To be impossible" is the tr of adynatēō, "to be powerless," "impotent" (Mt 17 20; Lk 1 37, RV "void of power"); adínatos, "powerless," etc, is tr<sup>d</sup> "impossible" (Mt 19 26; Mk 10 27; Lk 18 27; He 6 4.18; 11 6; "impossible" in He 6 4 is in RV transferred to ver 6); anéndektos, "not to be received" or "accepted," is also tr<sup>d</sup> "impossible" (Lk 17 1). In several of these passages it is affirmed that "nothing is impossible with God," but, of course, this means nothing that is consistent with the Divine nature, e.g. (as He 6 18) it is not possible for God to lie. So, when it is said that nothing is impossible to faith, the same limitation applies and also that of the mind or will of God for us. But much more is possible to a strong faith than a weak faith realizes, or even believes.

IMPOTENT, im-pō-tent (ἀσθενέω, asthenēō, ἀδύνατος, adínatos): The vb. signifies "to be without strength," and derivatives of it are used in Jn 5 3.7 AV and Acts 4 9 to characterize the paralyzed man at Bethesda and the cripple at the Temple gate. For the same condition of the Lystra lame man the word adúnatos is used, which is synonymous. In these cases it is the weakness of disease. In this sense the word is used by Shakespeare (Love's Labor Lost, V, ii, 864; Hamlet, I, ii, 29). The impotent folk referred to in the Epistle of Jeremy (Bar 6 28) were those weak and feeble from age and want; cf "impotent and snail-paced beggary" (Richard III, IV, iii, 53).

I. Meaning and Use of the Term.—The word "imputation," according to the Scriptural usage, denotes an attributing of something to a person, or a charging of one with anything, or a setting of something to one's account. This takes place sometimes in a judicial manner, so that the thing imputed becomes a ground of reward or punishment. The word is used in AV a number of times to translate the Heb vb. hāshabh and the Gr vb. logizomai. These words, both of which occur frequently in Scripture, and which in a number of instances mean simply "to think," express the above idea. That this is the case is clear also from the other Eng. words used in AV to translate these Heb and Gr words, as, for example, "to count," "to reckon," "to esteem." Thus hāshabh is tr<sup>d</sup> in AV by the vb. "to impute" (Lev 7 18; 17 4; 2 S 19 19); by the vb. "to reckon" (2 S 4 2); by "to count," as something (Lev 25 31 EV). The vb. in 1 S 22 15 is שִׁים, šim. Similarly, logizomai is tr<sup>d</sup> by the vb. "to impute" (Rom 4 6.8.11.22.23.24; 2 Cor 5 19; Jas 2 23); by the vb. "to count" (Rom 2 26; 4 3.5); "to account" (Gal 3 6); and by the vb. "to reckon" (Rom 4 4.9.10). In RV the word used to render logizomai is the vb. "to reckon."

These synonyms of the vb. "to impute" bring out the idea of reckoning or charging to one's account. It makes no difference, so far as the meaning of imputation is concerned, who it is that imputes, whether man (1 S 22 15) or God (Ps 32 2); it makes no difference what is imputed, whether a good deed for reward (Ps 106 30f) or a bad deed for punishment (Lev 17 4); and it makes no difference whether that which is imputed is something which is personally one's own prior to the imputation, as in the case above cited, where his own good deed was imputed to Phinehas (Ps 106 30f), or something which is not personally one's own prior to the imputation, as where Paul asks that a debt not personally his own be charged to him (Philem ver 18). In all these cases the act of imputation is simply the charging of one with something. It denotes just what we mean by our ordinary use of the term. It does not change the inward state or character of the person to whom something is imputed. When, for example, we say that we impute bad motives to anyone, we do not mean that we make such a one bad; and just so in the Scripture the phrase "to impute iniquity" does not mean to make one personally bad, but simply to lay iniquity to his charge. Hence when God is said "to impute sin" to anyone, the meaning is that God accounts such a one to be a sinner, and consequently guilty and liable to punishment. Similarly, the non-imputation of sin means simply not to lay it to one's charge as a ground of punishment (Ps 32 2). In the same manner, when God is said "to impute righteousness" to a person, the meaning is that He judicially accounts such a one to be righteous and entitled to all the rewards of a righteous person (Rom 4 6.11).

II. The Threefold Use of the Term in Theology.—Three acts of imputation are given special prominence in the Scripture, and are implicated in the Scriptural doctrines of Original Sin, Atonement and Justification, though not usually expressed by the words hāshabh and logizomai. Because, however, of its "forensic" or "judicial" meaning, and possibly through its use in the Vulg to translate logizomai in Rom 4 8, the term "imputation" has been used in theology in a threefold sense to denote the judicial acts of God by which the guilt of Adam's sin is imputed to his posterity; by which the sins of Christ's people are imputed to Him; and by which the righteousness of Christ is imputed to His people. The act of imputation is precisely the same in each case. It is not meant that Adam's sin was personally the sin of his descendants, but that it was set to their account, so that they share its guilt and penalty. It is not meant that Christ shares personally in the sins of men, but that the guilt of His people's sin was set to his account, so that He bore its penalty. It is not meant that Christ's people are made personally holy or inwardly righteous by the imputation of His righteousness to them, but that His righteousness is set to their account, so that they are entitled to all the rewards of that perfect righteousness.

These doctrines have had a place in the theology of the Christian church from the earliest Christian cents., though the doctrine of the imputation of the righteousness of Christ was first fully and clearly stated at the time of and following the Reformation. The first two of these doctrines have been the possession of the entire Christian church, while the third one of them is affirmed by both the Reformed and Lutheran branches of Protestantism.

III. The Scriptural Basis of These Doctrines.—

These three doctrines have a basis in the Scripture, and underlie the Scripture doctrines of Original Sin, Atonement, and Justification.

The doctrine of the imputation of Adam's sin to his posterity is implied in the account of the Fall

1. Imputation of Adam's Sin to His Posterity—with the subsequent history of the human race as recorded in Gen and in the rest of the OT. Many ancient and modern interpreters regard this narrative as an allegorical, mythical or symbolical representation in historical form, either of a psychological fact, i.e. of something which takes place in every individual, or of certain general truths concerning sin. By some exegetes, following Kant, it has been held to depict an advance of the race in culture or ethical knowledge (Reuss; against which view of Budde, Clemen); by others it has been regarded as a symbolical representation of certain truths concerning sin (Oehler, Schultz); by others it has been regarded as historical (Delitzsch). This latter view is the one which accords with the narrative itself. It is evidently intended as historical by its author, and is so regarded by the NT writers. It is, moreover, introduced to explain, not an advance of the race, but the entrance of sin into the world, and the connection of certain penal evils with sin. It does this by showing how these evils came upon Adam as a punishment for his disobedience, and the subsequent history shows that his posterity were subjected to the same evils. It is true that the threat of punishment to Adam in case of disobedience was made to him alone, and that the penalties threatened are said to have come only upon him and Eve (Gen 3 16-19). Nevertheless, it is clear from the account of the subsequent history of the race that it actually shared in the punishments inflicted upon Adam, and that this was in consequence of his sin. This implies that in Gen 2 16 f are contained the terms of a covenant in which Adam acted as the representative of the race. If, therefore, the race shares in the penalty of Adam's sin, it must also share in his guilt or the judicial obligation to suffer punishment. And this is precisely what the theology of the entire Christian church has meant by saying that the guilt of Adam's sin was imputed to his posterity. This is in accordance with God's method of dealing with men in other recorded instances (Gen 19 15; Ex 20 5; Dt 1 37; 3 26); and the assertion of the principle of personal responsibility by Ezekiel and Jeremiah against an abuse of the principle of representative responsibility implies a recognition of the latter (Ezk 18 2,4; 33 12; Jer 31 29).

The universality of sin and death is not brought into connection with the Fall of Adam by the other OT writers. This is done, however, by Paul. In 1 Cor 15 21 f, Paul says that the death of all men has its cause in the man Adam in the same way in which the resurrection from the dead has its cause in the man Christ. The death of all men, accordingly, is not brought about by their personal sins, but has come upon all through the disobedience of Adam. Upon what ground this takes place, Paul states in the passage Rom 5 12-21. He introduces the subject of Adam's relation to the race to illustrate his doctrine of the justification of sinners on the ground of a righteousness which is not personally their own. In order to do this he takes the truth, well known to his readers, that all men are under condemnation on account of Adam's sin. The comparison is between Adam and Christ, and the specific point of the comparison is imputed sin and imputed righteousness. Hence in ver 12 Paul does not mean simply to affirm that as Adam sinned and consequently died, so men sin and die. Nor can he mean to say that just as God established a precedent in Adam's case that death should follow sin, so He acts upon this precedent in the case of all men because all sin, the real ground of the reign of death being the fact that all sin, and the formal ground being this precedent (B. Weiss); nor that the real ground is this precedent and the subordinate ground the fact that all sin (Hünefeld). Neither can Paul intend to say that all men are subject to death because they derive a corrupt nature from Adam (Fritzsche); nor that men are condemned to die because all have sinned (Pfleiderer). Paul's purpose is to illustrate his doctrine of the way in which men are delivered from sin and death by the way in which they are brought into condemnation. The main thought of the passage is that, just as men are condemned on account of the imputation to them of the guilt of Adam's sin, so they are justified on account of the imputation to them of the righteousness of Christ. Paul says that it was by one man that sin and death entered into the world, and it was by one man that death passed to all men, because all were implicated in the guilt of that one man's sin (ver 12). In proof of this the apostle cites the fact that death as a punishment was reigning during a period in which the only possible judicial ground of this fact must have been the imputation of the guilt of that one man's sin (vs 13,14). Hence there is a precise parallel between Adam and Christ. Just as men are condemned on account of Adam's disobedience, so they are justified on account of the obedience of Christ (vs 18,19). The thought of the passage is imputed sin and imputed righteousness as the ground of condemnation and of justification respectively.

That our sins are imputed to Christ is not expressly stated in the Scripture, but is implied in those passages which affirm that Christ "bore our sins," and that our iniquities were "laid upon him" by Jeh. To bear iniquity or sin, though it may sometimes mean to bear it away or remove it, is an expression often applied in Scripture to persons charged with guilt and subjected to the punishment of their own sin (Lev 5 17; 7 18; 19 8; 22 9). That the Heb vb. nāṣā' has this meaning is also indicated by its being interchanged with the vb. ṣābhal, which means "to bear as a burden" and is used to denote the bearing of the punishment of sin (Isa 53 11). In the OT sacrificial system, which according to the NT is typical of the sacrifice of

2. The Imputation of the Sins of His People to Christ

Christ, the imposition of hands on the head of the victim signified the substitution of it for the offender and the transfer of his guilt to it. This idea is brought out clearly in the case of the two goats on the great Day of Atonement (Lev 16). When, therefore, the Servant of Jeh in Isa 53 is said "to bear iniquity" (ver 11), or that "the chastisement of our peace was upon him" (ver 5), or that "Jeh hath laid [lit. "caused to fall"] on him the iniquity of us all" (ver 6), the idea expressed is that Christ bore the punishment of our sin vicariously, its guilt having been imputed to Him. The thought of the prophecy is, as Delitzsch says, that of vicarious punishment, which implies the idea of the imputation of the guilt of our sins to Christ.

The same idea underlies these expressions when they occur in the NT. When Peter wishes to hold up Christ as an example of patience in suffering, he takes up the thought of Isa, and adduces the fact that Christ "his own self bare our sins in his body upon the tree" (1 Pet 2 24). The context indicates that Peter had the prophecy of Isa 53 in mind, so that his meaning is, not that Christ carried our sins even up to the cross, but that in His death on the cross Christ bore the punishment of our sin, its guilt having been imputed to Him. The same thought is expressed by the writer of the Ep. to the He, where the contrast between the first and second advents of Christ is made to hinge upon the fact that in the first He came to be sacrificed as a sin-bearer, burdened with the guilt of the sin of others, whereas in His second coming He will appear without this burden of imputed or vicarious guilt (He 9 28). Paul also gives expression to the same thought when he says that Christ was "made to be sin on our behalf" (2 Cor 5 21), and that He became "a curse for us" (Gal 3 13). In the former passage the idea of substitution, although not expressed by the preposition huper which indicates that Christ's work was for our benefit, is nevertheless clearly implied in the thought that Christ, whose sinlessness is emphasized in the ver, is made sin, and that we sinners become righteous in Him. Paul means that Christ was made to bear the penalty of our sin and that its guilt was imputed to Him in precisely the same way in which we sinners become the righteousness of God in Him, i.e. by the imputation of His righteousness to us. The same thought is expressed in Gal 3 13, where the statement that Christ was made a curse for us means that He was made to endure the curse or penalty of the broken law. In all these passages the underlying thought is that the guilt of our sin was imputed to Christ.

The righteousness upon the ground of which God justifies the ungodly is, according to Paul, witnessed to in the OT (Rom 3 21).

3. The Imputation of the Righteousness of Christ to His People—In order to obtain the blessedness which comes from a right relation to God, the pardon or non-imputation of sin is necessary, and this takes place through the "covering" of sin (Ps 32 1.2). The nature of this covering by the vicarious bearing of the penalty of sin is made clear in Isa 53. It is, moreover, the teaching of the OT that the righteousness which God demands is not to be found among men (Ps 130 3; 143 2; Isa 64 6). Accordingly, the prophets speak of a righteousness which is not from man's works, but which is said to be in Jeh or to come from Him to His people (Isa 32 16 f; 45 23 f; 54 17; 58 8; 61 3; Jer 51 10; Hos 10 12). This idea finds its clearest expression in connection with the work of the Messiah in Jer 33 16, where Jerus is called "Jeh our righteousness" because of the coming of the Messianic king, and in Jer 23 6 where the same name is given to the Messiah to express

His significance for Israel. Although the idea of the imputation of righteousness is not explicitly asserted in these passages, the idea is not merely that the righteousness spoken of is recognized by Jeh (Cremer), but that it comes from Him, so that Jeh, through the work of the Messiah, is the source of His people's righteousness.

This idea is taken up by Paul, who makes explicit the way in which this righteousness comes to sinners, and who puts the idea of imputed righteousness at the basis of his doctrine of Justification. By the righteousness of Christ Paul means Christ's legal status, or the merit acquired by all that He did in satisfying the demands of God's law, including what has been called His active and passive obedience. Notwithstanding the fact that most of the modern expositors of Paul's doctrine have denied that he teaches the imputation of Christ's obedience, this doctrine has a basis in the apostle's teaching. Justification leads to life and final glorification (Rom 5 18; 8 30); and Paul always conceives the obtaining of life as dependent on the fulfilment of the law. If, therefore, Christ secures life for us, it can only be in accordance with this principle. Accordingly, the apostle emphasizes the element of obedience in the death of Christ, and places this act of obedience at the basis of the sinner's justification (Rom 5 18). He also represents the obedience of the cross as the culminating point of a life of obedience on Christ's part (Phil 2 8). Moreover, Paul affirms that our redemption from all the demands of the law is secured by the fact that Christ was born under law (Gal 4 4). This cannot be restricted to the fact that Christ was under the curse of the law, for He was born under law and the result of this is that we are free from all of its demands. This doctrine is also implied in the apostle's teaching that Justification is absolutely gracious, taken in connection with the fact that it leads to a complete salvation.

The importance in Paul's thought of the doctrine of the imputation of the righteousness of Christ to the believer can be seen from the fact that the question how righteousness was to be obtained occupied a central place in his religious consciousness, both before and after his conversion. The apostle's conversion by the appearance of the risen Christ determined his conception of the true way of obtaining righteousness, since the resurrection of Christ meant for Paul the condemnation of his entire past search for righteousness by works of the law.

That the imputation of the righteousness of Christ to the believer does lie at the basis of Paul's doctrine of Justification can be further seen from the fact that Justification is absolutely free and unmerited so far as the sinner is concerned (Rom 3 24; 5 15; Gal 5 4; Tit 3 7); its object being one who is ungodly (Rom 4 5); so that it is not by works (Rom 3 20.28; Gal 2 16; 3 11; 5 4; Phil 3 9); and yet that it is not a mere pardon of sin, but is a strictly "forensic" or judicial judgment, freeing the sinner from all the claims of the law, and granting him the right to eternal life. This last truth is plain because God's retributive righteousness lies at the basis of Paul's doctrine of Justification (Rom 2); is manifested in it (Rom 3 25 f); because Christ's expiatory work is its ground (Rom 3 25); and because our redemption from the curse of the law rests upon Christ's having borne it for us, and our redemption from all the demands of the law depends upon their fulfilment by Christ (Gal 3 13; 4 4). Hence the gracious character of Justification, according to Paul, does not consist in its being merely a gracious pardon without any judicial basis (Ritschl); or in God's acceptance of a subjective righteousness produced by Him in the sinner (Tobac); or in the acceptance of faith instead of a perfect righteousness (Cremer). The gracious character of Justification consists for Paul in the fact that the righteousness on the ground of which God justifies the ungodly is a righteousness which is graciously provided by God, and which Paul contrasts with his own righteousness which comes from law works (Phil 3 9). The sinner, therefore, is pardoned and accepted as a righteous person, not on account of anything in himself, but only on account of what Christ has done for him, which means that the merits of Christ's suffering and obedience are imputed to the sinner as the ground of his justification.

This truth is explicitly affirmed by Paul, who speaks of God's imputing righteousness without works, and of righteousness being imputed (Rom 4 6.11). The idea of the imputation of righteousness here is made clear by the context. The one who is declared righteous is said to be "ungodly" (4 5). Hence he is righteous only by God's imputation of righteousness to him. This is also clear from the contrast between imputation according to grace and according to debt (4 4). He who seeks righteousness by works would be justified as a reward for his works, in antithesis to which, imputation according to grace would be the charging one with a righteousness which he does not possess. Accordingly, at the basis of Justification there is a reckoning to the sinner of an objective righteousness. This same idea is also implied and asserted by Paul in the parallel which he draws between Adam and Christ (Rom 5 18 f). The apostle says that just as men are condemned on account of a sin not their own, so they are justified on account of a righteousness which is not their own. The idea of imputed sin and imputed righteousness, as was said, is the precise point of the parallelism between condemnation in Adam and justification in Christ. This is also the idea which underlies the apostle's contrast of the Old and New Covenants (2 Cor 3 9). The New Covenant is described as a "ministry of righteousness," and contrasted with the Old Covenant which is described as a "ministry of condemnation." If, therefore, this last expression does not denote a subjective condition of men under the old dispensation, but their relation to God as objects of His condemnation, righteousness must denote the opposite of this relation to the law, and must depend on God's judicial acquittal. The same truth is expressed by Paul more concretely by saying that Christ has been "made unto us righteousness from God" (1 Cor 1 30). Here the concrete mode of expression is chosen because Paul speaks also of Christ being our sanctification and redemption, so that an expression had to be chosen which would cover all of these ideas. One of the clearest statements concerning this objective righteousness is Phil 3 9. The apostle here affirms that the righteousness which the believer in Christ obtains is directly opposite to his own righteousness. This latter comes from works of the law, whereas the former comes from God and through faith in Christ. It is, therefore, objective to man, comes to him from God, is connected with the work of Christ, and is mediated by faith in Christ.

The idea clearly stated in this last passage of a righteousness which is objective to the sinner and which comes to him from God, i.e. the idea of a new legal standing given to the believer by God, explains the meaning, in most cases, of the Pauline phrase "righteousness of God." This phrase is used by Paul 9 t: Rom 1 17; 3 5.21f.25f; 10 3 (twice); 2 Cor 5 21. It denotes the Divine attribute of righteousness in Rom 3 5.25f. The customary exegesis was to regard the other instances as denoting the righteousness of a sinner which comes to him from God, in accordance with Phil 3 9. More recently Haering, following Kölbinger in general, has interpreted all these instances as denoting God's justifying action. But this interpretation is most strained in 2 Cor 5 21, where we are said to "become the righteousness of God," and in Rom 10 3-6, where the righteousness of God is identified with the righteousness which comes from faith, this latter being contrasted with man's own inward righteousness. That a righteousness of man which he receives from God is here referred to, is confirmed by the fact that the reason given for the error of the Jews in seeking a righteousness from law works is the fact that the work of Christ has made an end of this method of obtaining righteousness (Rom 10 4). This righteousness, therefore, is one of which man is the possessor. The phrase, however, cannot mean a righteousness which is valid in God's sight (Luther), although this thought is elsewhere expressed by Paul (Rom 3 20; Gal 3 11). It means a righteousness which comes from God and of which He is the author. This is not, however, by making man inwardly righteous, since all the above passages show the purely objective character of this righteousness. It is the righteousness of Phil 3 9; the righteousness which God imputes to the believer in Christ. Thus we "become the righteousness of God" in precisely the same sense in which Christ was "made to be sin" (2 Cor 5 21). Since Christ was made sin by having the guilt of our sin imputed to Him so that He bore its penalty, Paul must mean that we "become the righteousness of God" in this same objective sense through the imputation to us of the righteousness of Christ. In the same way, in Rom 10 3, the contrast between God's righteousness and the Jew's righteousness by works of the law shows that in each case righteousness denotes a legal status which comes from God by imputation. It is this same imputed righteousness which makes the gospel the power of God unto salvation (Rom 1 17), which has been revealed by the law and the prophets, which is received by faith in Christ by whose expiatory death God's retributive righteousness has been made manifest (Rom 3 21.22.25.26), and which is represented by Peter as the object of Christian faith (2 Pet 1 1).

In two passages Paul affirms that Abraham believed God and "it was imputed to him for righteousness" (Rom 4 3 AV; Gal 3 6). The old Arminian theologians, and some modern exegetes (H. Cremer) assert that Paul means that Abraham's faith was accepted by God instead of a perfect righteousness as the meritorious ground of his justification. This, however, cannot be the apostle's meaning. It is diametrically opposed to the context where Paul introduces the case of Abraham for the very purpose of proving that he was justified without any merit on his part; it is opposed to Paul's idea of the nature of faith which involves the renunciation of all claim to merit, and is a simple resting on Christ from whom all its saving efficacy is derived; and this interpretation is also opposed to Paul's doctrine of the absolutely gracious character of Justification. The apostle in these passages wishes to illustrate from the case of Abraham the gracious character of Justification, and quotes the untechnical language of Gen 15 6. His meaning is simply that Abraham was justified as a believer in God, and not as one who sought righteousness by works. See SIN; ATONEMENT; JUSTIFICATION.

IMRI, im'ri (אִמְרִי, 'imri):

- (1) A Judahite (1 Ch 9 4).
- (2) Father of Zaccur who helped to rebuild the walls of Jerus under Nehemiah (Neh 3 2).

IN: A principal thing to notice about this prep., which in AV represents about 16 Heb and as many Gr words and preps., is that, in hundreds of cases (esp. in the OT, but frequently also in the NT) in RV the rendering is changed to more exact forms ("to," "unto," "by," "upon," "at," "with," "among," "for," "throughout," etc; cf e.g. Gen 6 16; 13 8; 17 7.9.12; 18 1; Ex 8 17; Lev 1 9, etc); while, nearly as often, "in" is substituted for divergent forms of AV (e.g. Gen 2 14; 17 11; 31 54; 40 7; 49 17; Ex 8 14.24; Lev 3 17; 4 2, etc). The chief Gr prep. ἐν, en, is frequently adhered to as "in" in RV where AV has other forms ("with," "among," etc; cf "in" for "with" in John's baptism, Mt 3 11, and ||; "in the tombs" for "among the tombs," Mk 5 3). In 2 Thess 2 2, "shaken in mind" in AV is more correctly rendered in RV "shaken from [ἀπό] your mind." There are numerous such instructive changes.

IN THE LORD (ἐν Κυρίῳ, en Kurio): A favorite Pauline expression, denoting that intimate union and fellowship of the Christian with the Lord Jesus Christ which supplies the basis of all Christian relations and conduct, and the distinctive element in which the Christian life has its specific character. Cf the synonymous Pauline phrases, "in Christ," "in Christ Jesus," and the Johannine expressions, "being in Christ," "abiding in Christ." "In the Lord" denotes: (1) the motive, quality, or character of a Christian duty or virtue, as based on union with Christ, e.g. "Free to be married to whom she will; only in the Lord" (1 Cor 7 39), i.e. provided the marriage be consistent with the Christian life. Cf 1 Cor 15 58; Phil 3 1; 4 1.2.4.10; Eph 6 1.10; Col 3 18, etc; (2) the ground of Christian unity, fellowship, and brotherly salutation, e.g. Rom 16 2.8.22; 1 Cor 16 19; Col 4 7; (3) it is often practically synonymous with "Christian" (noun or adj.), "as Christians" or "as a Christian," e.g. "Salute them of the household of Narcissus, that are in the Lord," i.e. that are Christians (Rom 16 11); "I . . . the prisoner in the Lord," i.e. the Christian prisoner (Eph 4 1); cf Rom 16 13; 1 Cor 9 1.2; Eph 6 21 ("faithful minister in the Lord" = faithful Christian minister); Col 4 17 (see Grimm-Thayer, Lex. of NT, ἐν, en, I, 6).

INCARNATION, in-kār-nā'shun. See PERSON OF CHRIST.

INCENSE, in'sens (קֶטֶר, kēṭer; in Jer 44 21, קֶסֶר, kēṣer; in Mal 1 11, קָטַר, kāṭar, "In every place incense shall be offered unto my name"; the word לְבֹנָה, lḇhōnāh, tr<sup>d</sup> "incense" in several passages in Isa and Jer in AV, is properly "frankincense," and is so rendered in RV): The offering of incense, or burning of aromatic substances, is common in the religious ceremonies of nearly all nations (Egyptians, Babylonians, Assyrians, Phoenicians, etc), and it is natural to find it holding a prominent place in the tabernacle and temple-worship of Israel. The newer critical theory that incense was a late importation into the religion of Israel, and that the altar of incense described in Ex 30 1 ff is a post-exilic invention, rests on pre-suppositions which are not here admitted, and is in contradiction to the express notices of the altar of incense in 1 K 6 20.22; 7 48; 9 25; cf 2 Ch 4 19 (see discussion of the subject by Delitzsch in Luthardt's Zeitschrift, 1880, 113 ff). In the denunciation of Eli in 1 S 2 27 ff, the burning of incense is mentioned as one of the functions of the priesthood (ver 28). The "smoke" that filled the temple in Isaiah's vision (Isa 6 4) may be presumed to be the smoke of incense. The word kēṭerāh itself properly denotes "smoke." For the altar of incense see art. on that subject, and TABERNACLE and TEMPLE. The incense used in the tabernacle service—called "sweet incense" (kēṭoreth ha-sammim, Ex 25 6, etc)—was compounded according to a definite prescription of the perfumes, stacte, onycha, galbanum and pure frankincense (Ex 30 34 f), and incense not so compounded was rejected as "strange incense" (kēṭoreth zārāh, 30 9). In the offering of incense, burning coals from the altar of burnt offering were borne in a censer and put upon the altar of incense (the "golden altar" before the oracle), then the fragrant incense was sprinkled on the fire (cf Lk 1 9 f). Ample details of the rabbinical rules about incense may be seen in the art. "Incense," in DB. See CENSER.

Figuratively, incense was symbolical of ascending prayer. The multitude were praying while Zacharias offered incense (Lk 1 10, θύψαμα, thumísama), and in Rev 5 8; 8 3 f, the incense in the heavenly temple is connected and even identified (5 8) with "the prayers of the saints."

INCEST, in'sest. See CRIMES.

INCONTINENCY, in-kon'ti-nen-si (ἀκρασία, akrasia, "without control"): In 1 Cor 7 5, it evidently refers to lack of control in a particular matter, and signifies unchastity. In Mt 23 25, the Gr word is tr<sup>d</sup> in both AV and ARV by "excess."

INCORRUPTION, in-kō-rup'shun (ἀφθαρσία, aphtharsia): Occurs in 1 Cor 15 42.50.53.54, of the resurrection body, and is twice used in RV for AV "immortality" (Rom 2 7; 2 Tim 1 10 m). See IMMORTALITY.

INCREASE, in'krēs (noun), in-krēs' (vb.): Employed in the Eng. Bible both as vb. and as noun, and in both cases to represent a number of different words in the original. As a vb. it is used in the ordinary sense of the term. As a noun it is usually used of plant life, or of the herds and flocks, to denote the fruitage or the offspring; more rarely of money, to denote the interest. As examples of the different terms tr<sup>d</sup> by this word, students who read Heb or Gr may compare Dt 7 22; Prov 16 21; Job 10 16 AV; 12 23; Nu 18 30; Dt 7 13; Ezk 22 12 in the OT, and Jn 3 30; 1 Cor 3 6; Col 2 19; Eph 4 16 in the NT.

INDIA, in'di-a (יִנְדִּיָּה, hōddū; ἡ Ἰνδική, hē Indikē): The name occurs in canonical Scripture only in Est 1 1; 8 9, of the country which marked the eastern boundary of the territory of Ahasuerus. The Heb word comes from the name of the Indus, Hondu, and denotes, not the peninsula of Hindustan, but the country drained by that great river. This is the meaning also in 1 Esd 3 2; Ad Est 3 2; 16 1. Many have thought that this country is intended by Havilah in Gen 2 11 and that the Indus is the Pishon. The drivers of the elephants (1 Macc 6 37) were doubtless natives of this land. The name in 1 Macc 8 9 is certainly an error. India never formed part of the dominions of Antiochus the Great. It may possibly be a clerical error for "Ionia," as Media is possibly a mistake for Mysia. If the Israelites in early times had no direct relations with India, many characteristic Indian products seem to have found their way into Palestinian markets by way of the Arabian and Syrian trade routes, or by means of the Red Sea fleets (1 K 10 11.15; Ezk 27 15 ff, etc). Among these may be noted "horns of ivory and ebony," "cassia and calamus," almug (sandalwood), apes and peacocks.

INDIGNITIES, in-dig'ni-tiz. See PUNISHMENTS.

INDITE, in-di't: AV Ps 45 1, "My heart is inditing a good matter"; RV "My heart overfloweth with a goodly matter," is in harmony with רָחַשׁ, rāhash, "to bubble up"; cf LXX ἐξηρῶ, exēreūzato, "to pour out." "Indite" in Eng. is becoming obsolete. It may mean "to dictate," "to invite," "to compose." In the latter meaning it is used in the above passage.

INFANCY, in-fan-si, GOSPEL OF THE. See APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS.

INFANT, in-fant, BAPTISM. See BAPTISM.

INFANTICIDE, in-fan'ti-sid. See CRIMES.

INFIDEL, in-fi-del (ἄπιστος, āpistos, "unbelieving," "incredulous"): AV has this word twice: "What part hath he that believeth with an infidel?" (2 Cor 6 15); "If any provide not for his own, . . . is worse than an infidel" (1 Tim 5 8). In both passages ERV and ARV have "unbeliever" in harmony with numerous other instances of the use of the Gr āpistos. The word nowhere corresponds to the modern conception of an infidel, one who denies the existence of God, or repudiates the Christian faith; but always signifies one who has not become a believer in Christ. It was formerly so used in Eng., and some of the older VSS have it in other passages, besides these two. It is not found in the OT, but "infidelity" (incredulity) occurs in 2 Esd 7 44 [114].

WILLIAM OWEN CARVER

INFINITE, in-fin-it, INFINITUDE, in-fin'i-tūd: The word "infinite" occurs 3 t only in the text of AV (Job 22 5; Ps 147 5; Nah 3 9). 1. Scripture and once in m (Nah 2 9). In Ps 147 Use 5, "His understanding is infinite," it represents the Heb אֵין מִסְפָּר, 'ēn mišpār, "no number"; in the other passages the Heb אֵין קֶעֶץ, 'ēn kēṣ (Job 22 5, of iniquities) and אֵין קֶעֶחַ, 'ēn kēḥ (Nah 3 9, of strength of Ethiopia and Egypt; AVm 2 9, of "spoil"), meaning "no end." RV, therefore, renders in Job 22 5, "Neither is there any end to thine iniquities," and drops the marginal reference in Nah 2 9.

Ps 147 5 is thus the only passage in which the term is directly applied to God. It there correctly conveys the idea of absence of all limitation. There is nothing beyond the compass of God's understanding; or, positively, His understanding

2. Application to God embraces everything there is to know. Past, present and future; all things possible and actual; the inmost thoughts and purposes of man, as well as his outward actions, lie bare to God's knowledge (He 4 13; see OMNISCIENCE).

While, however, the term is not found, the truth that God is infinite, not only in His understanding, but in His being and all His perfec-

3. Infinity Universally Implied tions, natural and moral, is one that pervades all Scripture. It could not be otherwise, if God was unoriginated, exalted above all limits of time, space and creaturehood, and dependent only on Himself. The Bib. writers, certainly, are far from thinking in metaphysical categories, or using such terms as "self-existence," "absoluteness," "unconditioned," yet the ideas for which these terms stand were all of them attributed in their conceptions to God. They did not, e.g. conceive of God as having been born, or as having a beginning, as the Bab and Gr gods had, but thought of Him as the ever-existing One (Ps 90 1.2), and free Creator and Disposer of all that exists. This means that God has self-existence, and for the same reason that He is not bound by His own creation. He must be thought of as raised above all creaturely limits, that is, as infinite.

The anthropomorphisms of the Bible, indeed, are often exceedingly naive, as when Jeh is said to "go down" to see what is being done (Gen

4. Anthropomorphisms 11 5.7; 18 21), or to "repent" of His actions (Gen 6 6); but these representations stand in contexts which show that the authors knew God to be unlimited in time, space, knowledge and power (cf Gen 6 7, God, Creator of all; 11 8.9, universal Ruler; 18 25, universal Judge; Nu 23 19, incapable of repentance, etc). Like anthropomorphisms are found in Dt and the Prophets, where it is not doubted that the higher conceptions existed. In this infinity of God is implied His unsearchableness (Job 11 7; Ps 145 3; Rom 11 33); conversely, the latter attribute implies His infinity.

This infinitude of God is displayed in all His attributes—in His eternity, omnipresence, omniscience, omnipotence, etc—on which see

5. Infinity a Perfection Not a Quantity the separate arts. As regards the proper conception of infinity, one has chiefly to guard against figuring it under too quantitative an aspect.

Quantitative boundlessness is the natural symbol we employ to represent infinity, yet reflection will convince us that it is inadequate as applied to a spiritual magnitude. Infinitude in power, e.g. is not an infinite quantity of power, but the potentiality in God of accomplishing without limit everything that is possible to power. It is a perfection, not a quantity. Still more is this apparent in moral attributes like love, righteousness, truth, holiness. These attributes are not quantities (a quantity can never be truly infinite), but perfections; the infinity is qualitative, consisting in the absence of all defect or limitation in degree, not in amount.

The recollection of the fact now stated will free the mind from most of the perplexities that have been raised by metaphysical writers

6. Errors Based on Quantitative Conceptions as to the abstract possibility of the coexistence of infinite attributes in God (thus e.g. Mansel); the reconcilability of God's infinity with His Personality, or with the existence of a finite world; the power of the human mind to conceive infinity, etc. How, it is asked, can the idea of infinity get into our finite minds? It might as well be asked how the mind can take in the idea of the sun's distance of some 90 millions of miles from the earth, when the skull that holds the brain is only a few cubic inches in capacity. The idea of a mile is not a mile big, nor is the idea of infinity too large to be thought of by the mind of man. The essence of the power of thought is its capacity for the universal, and it cannot rest till it has apprehended the most universal idea of all—the infinite.

INFIRMITY, in-fūr'mi-ti (יָדָה, dāwāh, חֵלָה, hālāh, חֵלְהָ, maḥālāh; ἀσθένεια, asthēneia): This word is used either in the sing. or pl. (the latter only in the NT) and with somewhat varying signification. (1) As sickness or bodily disease (Jn 5 5; Mt 8 17; Lk 5 15; 8 2; 1 Tim 5 23). In the last instance the affections seem to have been dyspeptic, the discomfort of which might be relieved by alcohol, although the disease would not be cured thereby. It is probable that this condition of body produced a certain slackness in Timothy's work against which Paul several times cautions him. In Lk 7 21 RV has "diseases," which is a better rendering of the Gr nosōn, used here, than the AV "infirmities." (2) Imperfections or weaknesses of body (Rom 6 19; 2 Cor 11 30 AV; 12 5.9.10 AV; Gal 4 13). (3) Moral or spiritual weaknesses and defects (Ps 77 10; Rom 8 26; 15 1; He 4 15; 5 2; 7 28). In this sense it is often used by the classic Eng. writers, as in Milton's "the last infirmity of noble minds"; cf Caesar, IV, iii, 86. The infirmity which a man of resolution can keep under by his will (Prov 18 14) may be either moral or physical. In Lk 13 11 the woman's physical infirmity is ascribed to the influence of an evil spirit.

ALEX. MACALISTER

INFLAME, in-flām', ENFLAME, en-flām' (דָּלַק, dālāk): "To inflame" in the meaning "to excite passion" is found in Isa 5 11, "till wine inflame them." In some AV passages (e.g. Isa 57 5) we find "enflaming" with the same meaning; cf AV Sus ver 8 and Sir 28 10 AV (Sir "inflame").

INFLAMMATION, in-fla-mā'shun (דֹּלֶקֶת, dal-leketh; πυρ, rhigos): Only in Dt 28 22, was considered by Jewish writers as "burning fever," by LXX as a form of ague. Both this and typhoid fever are now, and probably were, among the commonest of the diseases of Pal. See FEVER. In Lev 13 28 AV has "inflammation" as the rendering of ḡārebeth, which LXX reads charaktēr, and for which the proper Eng. equivalent is "scar," as in RV.

INFLUENCES, in'flōō-ens-iz (מַצְרִיפוֹת, ma-ʿadhannōth): This word occurs only in Job 38 31 AV, "Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades?" RV "the cluster of the Pleiades," m "or chain, or sweet influences"; Delitzsch, Dillmann and others render "fettters," that which binds the group together; "influences," if correct, would refer to the seasons, which were believed to be regulated, so far, by the PLEIADES (q.v.). In Wisd 7 25, it is said of Wisdom that she is "a pure influence [apórrhoia, RV "effluence"] flowing from the glory of the Almighty." W. L. WALKER habit," now used only transitively, had once an intransitive meaning as well. Cf Cowper, Olney Hymns, XIV,

"Who built it, who inhabits there?"

So in 1 Ch 5 9 AV, "And eastward he inhabited unto the entering in of the wilderness" (but RV "dwelt"). We have the obsolete INHABITERS for "inhabitants" in Rev 8 13 AV (but RV "them that dwell") and Rev 12 12 AV (but omitted in RV). The rare INHABITRESS (fem.) is found only in Jer 10 17 m; "the church called the inhabitress of the gardens" (Bishop Richardson).

D. MIAL EDWARDS

INHERITANCE, in-her'i-tans (נַחֲלָה, nahālāh, "something inherited," "occupancy," "heirloom," "estate," "portion"): The word is used in its widest application in the OT Scriptures, referring not only to an estate received by a child from its parents, but also to the land received by the children of Israel as a gift from Jeh. And in the figurative and poetical sense, the expression is applied to the kingdom of God as represented in the consecrated lives of His followers. In a similar sense, the Psalmist is represented as speaking of the Lord as the portion of his inheritance. In addition to the above word, the King James Version tr<sup>s</sup> as inheritance, מִוִּרְשָׁה, mōrāshāh, "a possession," "heritage" (Dt 33 4; Ezk 33 24); יְרֻשָּׁה, y'rushshāh, "something occupied," "a patrimony," "possession" (Jgs 21 17); חֵלֶק, hēlek, "smoothness," "allotment" (Ps 16 5); κληρονομία, klēronomēō, "to inherit" (Mt 5 5, etc); κληρονόμος, klēronómos, "heir" (Mt 21 38, etc); κληρονομία, klēronomía, "heirship," "patrimony," "possession"; or κληρος, klēros, "an acquisition," "portion," "heritage," from κληρώ, klērōō, "to assign," "to allot," "to obtain an inheritance" (Mt 21 38; Lk 12 13; Acts 7 5; 20 32; 26 18; Gal 3 18; Eph 1 11.14.18; 5 5; Col 1 12; 3 24; He 1 4; 9 15; 11 8; 1 Pet 1 4).

The Pent distinguishes clearly between real and personal property, the fundamental idea regarding the former being the thought that the land is God's, given by Him to His children, the people of Israel, and hence cannot be alienated (Lev 25 23.28). In order that there might not be any respecter of persons in the division, the lot was to determine the specific piece to be owned by each family head (Nu 26 52-56; 33 54). In case, through necessity of circumstances, a homestead was sold, the title could pass only temporarily; for in the year of Jubilee every homestead must again return to the original owner or heir (Lev 25 25-34). Real estate given to the priesthood must be appraised, and could be redeemed by the payment of the appraised valuation, thus preventing the transfer of real property even in this case (Lev 27 14-25). Inheritance was controlled by the following regulations: (1) The firstborn son inherited a double portion of all the father's possession (Dt 21 15-17); (2) the daughters were entitled to an inheritance, provided there were no sons in the family (Nu 27 8); (3) in case there were no direct heirs, the brothers or more distant kinsmen were recognized (vs 9-11); in no case should an estate pass from one tribe to another. The above points were made the subject of statutory law at the instance of the daughters of Zelophehad, the entire case being clearly set forth in Nu 27, 36.

FRANK E. HIRSCH

INIQUITY, in-ik'wi-ti (יָצָו, ʾāwōn; ἀνομία, anomia): In the OT of the 11 words tr<sup>s</sup> "iniquity," by far the most common and important is ʾāwōn (about 215 t). Etymologically, it is customary to explain it as meaning lit. "crookedness," "perverseness," i.e. evil regarded as that which is not straight or upright, moral distortion (from עָנָה, 'awāh, "to bend," "make crooked," "pervert"). Driver, however (following Lagarde), maintains that two roots, distinct in Arab., have been confused in Heb., one="to bend," "pervert" (as above), and the other="to err," "go astray"; that 'awōn is derived from the latter, and consequently expresses the idea of error, deviation from the right path, rather than that of perversion (Driver, Notes on Sam, 135 n.). Whichever etymology is adopted, in actual usage it has three meanings which almost imperceptibly pass into each other: (1) iniquity, (2) guilt of iniquity, (3) punishment of iniquity. Primarily, it denotes "not an action, but the character of an action" (Oehler), and is so distinguished from "sin" (חַטָּאת). Hence we have the expression "the iniquity of my sin" (Ps 32 5). Thus the meaning glides into that of "guilt," which might often take the place of "iniquity" as the tr of 'awōn (Gen 15 16; Ex 34 7; Jer 2 22, etc.). From "guilt" it again passes into the meaning of "punishment of guilt," just as Lat piaculum may denote both guilt and its punishment. The transition is all the easier in Heb because of the Heb sense of the intimate relation of sin and suffering, e.g. Gen 4 13, "My punishment is greater than I can bear"; which is obviously to be preferred to AVm, RVm "Mine iniquity is greater than can be forgiven," for Cain is not so much expressing sorrow for his sin, as complaining of the severity of his punishment; cf 2 K 7 9 (RV "punishment," RVm "iniquity"); Isa 5 18 (where for "iniquity" we might have "punishment of iniquity," as in Lev 26 41.43, etc); Isa 40 2 ("iniquity," RVm "punishment"). The phrase "bear iniquity" is a standing expression for bearing its consequences, i.e. its penalty; generally of the sinner bearing the results of his own iniquity (Lev 17 16; 20 17.19; Nu 14 34; Ezk 44 10, etc), but sometimes of one bearing the iniquity of another vicariously, and so taking it away (e.g. Ezk 4 4 f; 18 19 f). Of special interest in the latter sense are the sufferings of the Servant of Jeh, who shall "bear the iniquities" of the people (Isa 53 11; cf ver 6).

Other words frequently tr<sup>d</sup> "iniquity" are: תָּנִי, 'awen, lit. "worthlessness," "vanity," hence "naughtiness," "mischief" (47 t in AV, esp. in the phrase "workers of iniquity," Job 4 8; Ps 5 5; 6 8; Prov 10 29, etc); 'awel and 'awlāh, lit. "perverseness" (Dt 32 4; Job 6 29 AV, etc).

In the NT "iniquity" stands for anomia=prop., "the condition of one without law," "lawlessness" (so tr<sup>d</sup> in 1 Jn 3 4, elsewhere "iniquity," e.g. Mt 7 23), a word which frequently stood for 'awōn in LXX; and adikia, lit. "unrighteousness" (e.g. Lk 13 27).

INJOIN, in-join'. See ENJOIN.

INJURIOUS, in-jōō'ri-us, in-jū'ri-us (ὕβριστος, hubristēs, "insolent"): In former usage, the word was strongly expressive of insult as well as hurtfulness. So in 1 Tim 1 13. In Rom 1 30 the same adj. is tr<sup>d</sup> "insolent" (AV "despiteful").

INJURY, in'ju-ri, in'jōō-ri. See CRIMES.

INK, ink (יִנְיָ, d'yō, from root meaning "slowly flowing," BDB, 188; מֵלָאֵב, mēlan, "black"): Any fluid substance used with pen or brush to form written characters. In this sense ink is mentioned once in the Heb Bible (Jer 36 2) and 3 t in the Gr NT (2 Cor 3 3; 2 Jn ver 12; 3 Jn ver 13), and it is implied in all references to writing on papyrus or on leather. The inference from the "blotting out" of Ex 32 33 and Nu 5 23 that the Heb ink was a lamp-black and gum, or some other dry ink, is confirmed by the general usage of antiquity, by the later Jewish prejudice against other inks (OTJC, 71 n.) and by a Jewish receipt referring to ink-tablets (Drach, "Notice sur l'encre des Hébreux," Ann. philos. chrét., 42, 45, 353). The question is, however, now being put on a wholly new basis by the study of the Elephantine Jewish documents (Meyer, Papyrusfund, 1912, 15, 21), and above all of the Harvard Ostraca from Samaria which give actual specimens of the ink in Pal in the time of Ahab (Harvard Theol. Review, Jan. 1911, 136-43). It is likely, however, that during the long period of Bible history various inks were used. The official copy of the law in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus was, according to Jos (Ant, XII, ii, 11), written in gold, and the vermilion and red paints and dyes mentioned in Jer 22 14; Ezk 23 14, and Wisd 13 14 (millo kat phukei) were probably used also for writing books or coloring incised inscriptions. See literature under WRITING; esp. Krauss, Talm. Arch. 3, 148-53; Gardthausen, Gr Pal, 1911, I, 202-17, and his bibliographical references passim.

INK-HORN, ink'hōrn (קֶסֶת = קֶסֶת, keseth = keseth, BDB, 903): This term "inkhorn" occurs 3 t in Ezk 9 (vs 2.3.11), in the phrase "writer's inkhorn upon his loins" (or "by his side"). The word is more exactly "implement case," or "writing-case"

(a) Ink-Wells and Pen-Case with Ink-Well.

(calamarium atramentarium, theca calamaria, theca libraria, grapharia). This may have been the Egypt palette (Budge, Mummy, 350-52) seen so often in the monuments of all periods, or the later form of pen-case with ink-well attached, which is a modified form adapted for ink carried in fluid form. The Egypt palette was carried characteristically over the shoulder or under the arm, neither of which methods is strictly "upon the loins." The manner of carrying, therefore, was doubtless in the girdle, as in modern oriental usage (Benzinger, Heb Archaeol., 185). A good example of the pen-case and ink-well writing-case (given also in Garucci, Darem- berg-Saglio, Gardthausen, etc) is given from the original in Birt, Die Buchrolle in der Kunst, 220, and is reproduced (a) in this article, together with (b) an Egypt palette. Whether the form of Ezekiel's case approached the palette or the ink-well type probably depends on the question of whether dry ink or fluid ink was used in Ezekiel's time (see INK). Compare Hieronymus ad loc., and for literature,

(b) Scribe's Palette.

INN (מִלּוֹן, mālōn; πανδοχείον, pandocheion, κα-τάλυμα, kataluma): The Heb word mālōn means lit. a "night resting-place," and might

1. Earliest Night Rest-ing-Places be applied to any spot where caravans (Gen 42 27; 43 21 AV), individuals (Ex 4 24; Jer 9 2), or even armies (Josh 4 3.8; 2 K 19 23; Isa 10 29) encamped for the night. In the slightly altered form m'lunāh, the same word is used of a night-watchman's lodge in a garden (Isa 1 8; 24 20, AV "cottage"). The word in itself does not imply the presence of any building, and in the case of caravans and travelers was doubtless originally, as very often at the present day, only a convenient level bit of ground near some spring, where baggage might be unloaded, animals watered and tethered, and men rest on the bare ground. Nothing in the OT suggests the occupancy of a house in such cases. The nearest approach to such an idea occurs in Jer 41 17 m, where gerūth kimhām is tr<sup>d</sup> "the lodging-place of Chimham," but the text is very doubtful and probably refers rather to sheepfolds. We cannot say when buildings were first used, but the need of shelter for caravans traveling in winter, and of protection in dangerous times and districts, would lead to their introduction at an early period in the history of trade.

It is noteworthy that all the indisputable designations of "inn" come in with the Gr period. Jos

2. Public Inns (Ant, XV, v, 1; BJ, I, xxi, 7) speaks of "public inns" under the name of katagogai, while in the Aram. Jewish writings we meet with 'ūshpīzā', from Lat hospitium, and 'akhṣanyā' from the Gr xenia; the NT designation pandocheion has passed into the Aram. pundhekā and the Arab. funduk. All these are used of public inns, and they all correspond to the modern "khan" or "caravanserai." These are to be found on the great trade routes all over the East. In their most elaborate form they have almost the strength of a fortress. They consist of a great quadrangle into which admission is gained through a broad, strong gateway. The quadrangle is inclosed on all sides by a 2-story building, the windows in the case of the lower story opening only to the interior. The upper story is reached by stairways, and has a gangway all around, giving access to the practically bare rooms which are at the disposal of travelers.

Interior of Vizir Khan, Aleppo.

There is usually a well of good water in the center of the quadrangle, and travelers as a rule bring their own food and often that of their

3. Their Evil Name animals (Jgs 19 19) with them. There are no fixed payments, and on departure, the arranging of haqq el-khan generally means a disagreeable dispute, as the innkeepers are invariably untruthful, dishonest and oppressive. They have ever been regarded as of infamous character. The Rom laws in many places recognize this. In Mish, Y'bhāmōth, xvi.7 the word of an innkeeper was doubted, and Mish, 'Abbōdhāh Zārāh, ii.4 places them in the lowest scale of degradation. The NT is quite clear in speaking of "Rahab the harlot" (He 11 31; Jas 2 25). The Tg designates her an "innkeeper," while Rashi tr<sup>s</sup> zōnāh as "a seller of kinds of food," a meaning the word will bear. Kimḥi, however, accepts both meanings. This evil repute of public inns, together with the Sem spirit of hospitality, led the Jews and the early Christians to prefer to recommend the keeping of open house for the entertainment of strangers. In the Jewish Morning Prayers, even in our day, such action is linked with great promises, and the NT repeatedly (He 13 2; 1 Pet 4 9; 3 Jn ver 5) commends hospitality. It is remarkable that both the Talm (Shab 127a) and the NT (He 13 2) quote the same passage (Gen 18 3) in recommending it.

The best-known khans in Pal are Khan Jubb-Yusuf, N. of the Lake of Galilee, Khan el-Tujjār, under the shadow of Tabor, Khan el-Lubbān (cf Jgs 21 19), and Khan Haḍrur, midway between Jerus and Jericho. This last certainly occupies the site of the inn referred to in Lk 10 34, and it is not without interest that we read in Mish, Y'bhāmōth, xvi.7, of another sick man being left at that same inn. See illustration, p. 64.

The Gr word kataluma, though implying a "loosing" for the night, seems rather to be connected with

4. Guest Chambers the idea of hospitality in a private house than in a public inn. Luke with his usual care distinguishes between these and pandocheion, and his use of the vb. kataliō (Lk 9 12; 19 7) makes his meaning clear. In the LXX, indeed, mālōn is sometimes tr<sup>d</sup> kataluma, and it appears in 1 S 9 22 for lishkāh, AV "parlour." It is the word used of the "upper room," where the Last Supper was held (Mk 14 14; Lk 22 11, "guest-chamber"), and of the place of reception in Bethlehem where Joseph and Mary failed to find quarters (Lk 2 7). It thus corresponds to the spare or upper room in a private house or in a village, i.e. to the manzil adjoining the house of the sheikh, where travelers received hospitality and where no payment was expected, except a trifle to the caretaker. In Jerus such payments were made by leaving behind the earthenware vessels that had been used, and the skins of the animals that had been slaughtered (Yōmā 12a).

Judging from the word used, and the conditions implied, we are led to believe that Joseph and Mary David; that in this they were disappointed, and had to content themselves with the next best, the elevated platform alongside the interior of the stable, and on which those having the care of the animals generally slept. It being now the season when they were in the fields (Lk 2 8), the stable would be empty and clean. There then the Lord Jesus was born and laid in the safest and most convenient place, the nearest empty manger alongside of this elevated platform. Humble though the circumstances were, the family were preserved from all the annoyance and evil associations of a public khan, and all the demands of delicacy and privacy were duly met. W. M. nikkāyōn, נִקְיָוֶן, hinnām, הִנָּאָם, haph, חָפֵף, nākī, אֲחֹס, athōs): AV and ARV have innocency in Gen 20 5; Ps 26 6; 73 13; Dnl 6 22; Hos 8 5. In Dnl the Heb is zākhū, and the innocence expressed is the absence of the guilt of disloyalty to God. In all the other places the Heb is nikkāyōn, and the innocence expressed is the absence of pollution, Hos having reference to the pollution of idolatry, and the other passages presenting the cleansing under the figure of washing hands. AV has innocent not fewer than 40 t. In one place (1 K 2 31) the Heb is hinnām, meaning "undeserved," or "without cause," and, accordingly, ARV, instead of "innocent blood . . . shed," has "blood . . . shed without cause." In another place (Job 33 9) the Heb is haph, meaning "scraped," or "polished," therefore "clean," and refers to moral purity. In all the other places the Heb is nākī, or its cognates, and the idea is doubtless the absence of pollution. In more than half the passages "innocent" is connected with blood, as "blood of the innocent," or simply "innocent blood." In some places there is the idea of the Divine acquittal, or forgiveness, as in Job 9 28: "I know that thou wilt not hold me innocent" (cf Job 10 14, where the same Heb word is used). The NT has "innocent" twice in connection with blood—"innocent blood," and "innocent of the blood" (Mt 27 4.24).

5. Birth of Christ had at first expected reception in the upper room or manzil at the house of the sheikh of Bethlehem, probably a friend and member of the house of

I. MEANING AND HISTORY OF THE TERM

II. ANALYSIS OF NARRATIVE WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO MOTIVE

1. Focus of Narrative—Residence at Nazareth
2. Corollaries from Above Facts
3. Marks of Historicity

I. Meaning and History of the Term.—The conventional, ecclesiastical name given to the slaughter by HEROD I (q.v.) of children two years old and under in Bethlehem and its environs at the time of the birth of Christ (Mt 2 16). The accepted title for this event may be traced through Augustine to Cyprian.

Irenaeus (d. 202 AD) calls these children "martyrs," and in a very beautiful passage interprets the tragedy which ended their brief lives as a gracious and tender "sending before" into His kingdom by the Lord Himself.

Cyprian (d. 258 AD) says: "That it might be manifest that they who are slain for Christ's sake are innocent, innocent infancy was put to death for his name's sake" (Ep. lv.6).

Augustine (b. 354 AD), following Cyprian, speaks of the children, formally, as "the Innocents" (Comm. on Ps 43 5).

The ecclesiastical treatment of the incident is remarkable because of the exaggeration which was indulged in as to the extent of the massacre and the number of victims. At an early date the Gr church canonized 14,000, and afterward, by a curious misinterpretation of Rev 14 1.3, the number was increased to 144,000.

According to Milman the liturgy of the Church of England retains a reminiscence of this ancient error in the use of Rev 14 on Holy Innocents' Day (see History of Christianity, I, 107, n. e). This exaggeration, of which there is no hint in the NT, is worthy of note because the most serious general argument against the historicity of the narrative is drawn from the silence of Jos. As in all probability there could not have been more than twenty children involved (cf Farrar, Life of Christ, I, 45, n.), the incident could not have bulked very largely in the series of horrors perpetrated or planned by Herod in the last months of his life (see Farrar, The Herods, 144 f).

II. Analysis of Narrative with Special Reference to Motive.—In estimating the value of such a narrative from the viewpoint of historicity, the first and most important step is to gauge the motive. Why was the story told? This question is not always easy to answer, but in the present instance there is a very simple and effective test at hand.

In Mt's infancy section (chs 1 and 2) there are five quotations from the OT which are set into the narrative of events. These five quotations

1. Focus of Narrative—represent the cardinal and outstanding points of interest. The quotations are placed thus: (1) at the Virgin Birth at Nazareth (1 23); (2) at the birth at Bethlehem (2 6); (3) at the visit to Egypt (2 15); (4) at the murder of the children (2 18); (5) at the Nazareth residence (2 23). It will be noticed at once as peculiar and significant that no quotation is attached to the visit of the Magi. This omission is the more noteworthy because in Nu 24 7; Ps 72 15; Isa 60 6, and numerous references to the ingathering of the Gentiles there are such beautiful and appropriate passages to link with the visit of the strangers from the far East. This peculiar omission, on the part of a writer so deeply interested in prophecy and its fulfillment and so keen to seize upon appropriate and suggestive harmonies, in a section constructed with a view to such harmonies, can be explained only on the ground that the visit of the Magi did not, in the writer's view of events, occupy a critical point of especial interest. Their visit is told, not for its own sake, but because of its connection with the murder of the children and the journey to Egypt. The murder of the children is of interest because it discloses the character of Herod and the perils surrounding the newborn Messiah. It also explains the visit to Egypt and the subsequent residence at Nazareth. The latter is evidently the objective point, because it is given a place by itself and marked by a quotation. Moreover, the one evidence of overstrain in the narrative is in the ambiguous and obscure statement by which the OT is brought into relationship with the Nazareth residence. The center of interest in the entire section which is concerned with Herod and the Magi is the Nazareth residence. The story is told for the express purpose of explaining why the heir of David, who was born at Bethlehem, lived at Nazareth.

This brings the narrative of Mt into striking relationship with that of Lk. The latter's concern is to show how it was that the Messiah who lived at Nazareth was born at Bethlehem. We have here one of the undigned unities which bind together these two narratives which are seemingly so divergent. That Mt says nothing about a previous residence at Nazareth and that Lk says nothing about a forced return thither may be explained, in accordance with the balance of probabilities, on the ground, either that each evangelist was ignorant of the fact omitted by himself, or that in his condensed and rapid statement he did not see fit to mention it. In any case the harmony immeasurably outweighs the discrepancy.

The fact that the focus of the entire narrative lies in the residence of Jesus at Nazareth effectually disposes of a number of current hypotheses as to its origin.

2. Corollaries from Above Facts—(1) The idea that it is merely legend told for the purpose of literary embellishment. The dovetailing of what would be the main item into the rest of the narrative and its subordination to secondary features cannot be explained on this hypothesis. The absence of adornment by available passages from the OT alone is conclusive on this point (see Allen, "Matthew," ICC, 14, 15).

(2) The idea that the story is told for the purpose of illustrating the scope of the Messiah's influence beyond Israel. Here, again, the subordinate position assigned to the story of the Magi together with the absence of OT material is conclusive. Moreover, the history of the Magi is abruptly dropped with the statement of their return home. Interest in them flags as soon as their brief connection with the movement of the history through Herod ceases. And the intensely Hebraic character of Mt's infancy section as a whole is incidental evidence pointing in the same direction (cf remarks of the writer, Birth and Infancy of Jesus Christ, 70 f).

(3) The idea that the story is told to emphasize the wonder-element in connection with the birth of Christ. The facts contradict this. In addition to the primary consideration, the subordinate position, there are others of great value. That the Magi were providentially guided to the feet of the Messiah is evidently the firm conviction of the narrator. The striking feature of the story is that with this belief in his mind he keeps so strictly within the limits of the natural order. In vs 9 and 12 only is there apparent exception. Of these the statement in ver 9 is the only one peculiar to this part of the narrative. Two things are to be remembered concerning it: It is clear that the verse cannot be interpreted apart from a clear understanding of the whole astronomical occurrence of which it forms a part.

It is also evident that ver 9 must not be interpreted apart from the context. From the viewpoint of a wonder-tale the writer makes a fatal blunder at the most critical point of his story. The popular notion that the Magi were miraculously led to the Messiah finds no support in the text. The Magi did not come to Bethlehem, but to Jerus, asking: "Where is he that is born King of the Jews?" Ver 9 comes after this statement and after the conclave called by Herod in which Bethlehem was specified. In view of all this it seems clear that the Magi were led, not miraculously, but in accordance with the genius of their own system, and that the Providential element lay in the striking coincidence of their visit and the birth of Jesus. The interest of the writer was not in the wonder-element, else, infallibly, he would have sharpened its outlines and expurgated all ambiguity as to the nature of the occurrence.

We may now glance at the positive evidence for the historicity of the event.

(1) The centering of the narrative upon the residence of Jesus at Nazareth. This not only brings Lk's Gospel in support of the center, but groups the story around a point of known interest to the first generation of believers. It is interesting to note that the residence in Egypt has independent backing of a sort. There are in existence two stories, one traced by Origen through Jews of his own day to earlier times, and the other in the Talm, which connect Jesus with Egypt and attempt to account for His miracles by reference to Egypt magic (see Plummer, "Matthew," Ex. Comm., 17, 18).

(2) The fact that the story of the Magi is told so objectively and with such personal detachment. Both Jews and early Christians had strong views both as to astrology and magic in general (see Plummer, op. cit., 15), but the author of this Gospel tells the story without emphasis and without comment and from the viewpoint of the Magi. His interest is purely historical and matter-of-fact.

(3) The portrait of Herod the Great. So far as Herod is concerned the incident is usually discussed with exclusive reference to the savagery involved. By many it is affirmed that we have here a hostile and unfair portrait. This contention could hardly be sustained even if the question turned entirely upon the point of savagery. But there is far more than savagery in the incident. (a) In the first place there is this undeniable element of inherent probability in the story. Practically all of Herod's murders, including those of his beloved wife and his sons, were perpetrated under the sway of one emotion and in obedience to a single motive. They were in practically every instance for the purpose of consolidating or perpetuating his power. He nearly destroyed his own immediate family in the half-mad jealousy that on occasion drove him to the very limits of ferocity, simply because they were accused of plotting against him. The accusations were largely false, but the suspicion doomed those accused. The murder of the Innocents was another crime of the same sort. The old king was obsessed by the fear of a claimant to his petty throne; the Messianic hope of the Jews was a perpetual secret torment, and the murder of the children, in the attempt to reach the child whose advent threatened him, was at once so original in method and so characteristic in purpose as to give an inimitable verisimilitude to the whole narrative. There are also other traits of truth. (b) Herod's prompt discovery of the visit of the Magi and their questions is in harmony with what we know of the old ruler's watchfulness and his elaborate system of espionage. (c) Characteristic also is the subtlety with which he deals with the whole situation. How striking and vivid, with all its rugged simplicity, is the story of the king's pretended interest in the quest of the strangers, the solemn conclave of Jewish leaders with himself in the rôle of earnest inquirer, his urgent request for information that he may worship also, followed by his swift anger (note that ἐθυμώθη, ethumōthē, "was wroth," ver 16, is not used elsewhere in the NT) at being deceived, and the blind but terrible stroke of his questing vengeance.

All these items are so true to the man, to the atmosphere which always surrounded him, and to the historic situation, that we are forced to conclude, either that we have veracious history more or less directly received from one who was an observer of the events described, or the work of an incomparably clever romancer. LOUIS MATTHEWS SWEET

INORDINATE, in-ōr'di-nāt' ("ill-regulated," hence "immoderate," "excessive"; Lat in, "not," ordinatus, "set in order"): Only twice in AV. In each case there is no corresponding adj. in the original, but the word was inserted by the translators as being implied in the noun. It disappears in RV: Ezk 23 11, "in her inordinate love" (RV "in her doting"); יִצְחָק, āghābhāh, "lust"; Col 3 5 "inordinate affection" (RV "passion"); πάθος, páthos, a word which in classical Gr may have either a good or a bad sense (any affection or emotion of the mind), but in the NT is used only in a bad sense (passion). D. MIAL EDWARDS

INQUIRE, in-kwīr' (אָשׁ, shā'al, "to ask," "desire"; ζητέω, zēlēō, "to seek"); A form sometimes employed with reference to the practice of divination, as where Saul "inquires of" (or "consults") the witch of Endor as to the issue of the coming battle (1 S 28 6, 7) (see DIVINATION).

In Job 10 6, "to inquire [בָּקַשׁ, bāqash] after iniquity" signifies to bring to light and punish for it, and Job asks distractedly if God's time is so short that He is in a hurry to find him guilty and to punish him as if He had only a man's few days to live.

"To inquire of Jeh" denotes the consultation of oracle, priest, prophet or Jeh Himself, as to a certain course of action or as to necessary supplies (Jgs 20 27 AV, "to ask"; 1 K 22 5; 1 S 9 9 [דָּרַשׁ, dārash]; 10 22 AV; 2 S 2 1; 5 19, 23; Ezk 36 37).

"To inquire [בָּקַשׁ, bākar] in his temple" (palace) means to find out all that constant fellowship or unbroken intercourse with God can teach (Ps 27 4).

Prov 20 25 warns against rashness in making a vow and afterward considering (bākar, "to make inquiry") as to whether it can be fulfilled or how it may be eluded.

In the AV, the tr of several Gr words: diaginōskō, "to know thoroughly" (Acts 23 15); epizēlēō, "to seek after" (Acts 19 39); suzēlēō, "to seek together" (Lk 22 23); exelázō, "to search out" (Mt 10 11). M. O. EVANS

INQUISITION, in-kwi-zish'un (דָּרַשׁ, dārash, "to follow," "diligently inquire," "question," "search" [Dt 19 18; Ps 9 12], בָּקַשׁ, bāqash, "to search out," "to strive after," "inquire" [Est 2 23]): The term refers, as indicated by these passages, first of all to a careful and diligent inquiry necessary to ascertain the truth from witnesses in a court, but may also refer to a careful examination into circumstances or conditions without official authority.

INSCRIPTION, in-skip'shun (vb. ἐπιγράφω, epigraphō, "to write upon," "inscribe"): The word occurs once in EV in Acts 17 23 of the altar at Athens with the inscription "To an Unknown God." On inscriptions in archaeology, see ARCHAEOLOGY; ASSYRIA; BABYLONIA, etc.

INSECTS, in'sekts: In EV, including the marginal notes, we find at least 23 names of insects or words referring to them: ant, bald locust, bee, beetle, cankerworm, caterpillar, creeping thing, cricket, crimson, flea, fly, gnat, grasshopper, honey, hornet, locust, louse, (lice), moth, palmer-worm, sandfly, scarlet-worm, silk-worm. These can be referred to about 12 insects, which, arranged systematically, are: Hymenoptera, ant, bee, hornet; Lepidoptera, clothes-moth, silk-worm; Siphonaptera, flea; Diptera, fly; Rhynchota, louse, scarlet-worm; Orthoptera, several kinds of grasshoppers and locusts.

The word "worm" refers not only to the scarlet-worm, but to various larvae of Lepidoptera, Coleoptera, and Diptera. "Creeping things" refers indefinitely to insects, reptiles, and beasts. In the list of 23 names given above honey and bee refer to one insect, as do crimson and scarlet. Sandfly has no place if "lice" be retained in Ex 8 16 ff. Bald locust, beetle, canker-worm, cricket, and palmer-worm probably all denote various kinds of grasshoppers and locusts. When the translators of EV had to do with two or more Heb words for which there was only one well-recognized Eng. equivalent, they seem to have been content with that alone, if the two Heb words occurred in different passages; e.g. z'bhūbh, "fly" (Eccl 10 1; Isa 7 18), and ārōbh, "fly" (Ex 8 21 ff). On the other hand, they were put to it to find equivalents for the insect names in Lev 11 22; Joel 1 4, and elsewhere. For ṣal'am (Lev 11 22) they evidently coined "bald locust," following a statement of the Talm that it had a smooth head. For gāzām and yelek they imported "palmer-worm" and "canker-worm," two old Eng. names of caterpillars, using "caterpillar" for hāsūl. The AV "beetle" for hargol is absolutely inappropriate, and the RV "cricket," while less objectionable, is probably also incorrect. The Eng. language seems to lack appropriate names for different kinds of grasshoppers and locusts, and it is difficult to suggest any names to take the places of those against which these criticisms are directed. See under the names of the respective insects. See also SCORPION and SPIDER, which are not included here because they are not strictly insects.

LITERATURE

The word "inspire" and its derivatives seem to have come into Middle Eng. from the Fr., and have been employed from the first (early in

1. Meaning the 14th cent.) in a considerable number of significations, physical and metaphorical, secular and religious. The derivatives have been multiplied and their applications extended during the procession of the years, until they have acquired a very wide and varied use. Underlying all their use, however, is the constant implication of an influence from without, producing in its object movements and effects beyond its native, or at least its ordinary powers. The noun "inspiration," although already in use in the 14th cent., seems not to occur in any but a theological sense until late in the 16th cent. The specifically theological sense of all these terms is governed, of course, by their usage in Lat theology; and this rests ultimately on their employment in the Lat Bible. In the Vulg Lat Bible the vb. inspiro (Gen 2 7; Wisd 15 11; Eccles 4 12; 2 Tim 3 16; 2 Pet 1 21) and the noun inspiratio (2 S 22 16; Job 32 8; Ps 18 15; Acts 17 25) both occur 4 or 5 t in somewhat diverse applications. In the development of a theological nomenclature, however, they have acquired (along with other less frequent applications) a technical sense with reference to the Bib. writers or the Bib. books. The Bib. books are called inspired as the Divinely determined products of inspired men; the Bib. writers are called inspired as breathed into by the Holy Spirit, so that the product of their activities transcends human powers and becomes Divinely authoritative. Inspiration is, therefore, usually defined as a supernatural influence exerted on the sacred writers by the Spirit of God, by virtue of which their writings are given Divine trustworthiness.

Meanwhile, for Eng.-speaking men, these terms have virtually ceased to be Bib. terms. They naturally passed from the Lat Vulg into the

2. Occurrences in the Bible Eng. VSS made from it (most fully into the Rheims-Douay: Job 32 8; Wisd 15 11; Eccles 4 12; 2 Tim 3 16; 2 Pet 1 21). But in the development of the Eng. Bible they have found ever-decreasing place. In the EV of the Apoc (both AV and RV) "inspired" is retained in Wisd 15 11; but in the canonical books the nominal form alone occurs in AV and that only twice: Job 32 8, "But there is a spirit in man: and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding"; and 2 Tim 3 16, "All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." RV removes the former of these instances, substituting "breath" for "inspiration"; and alters the latter so as to read: "Every scripture inspired of God is also profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction which is in righteousness," with a marginal alternative in the form of, "Every scripture is inspired of God and profitable," etc. The word "inspiration" thus disappears from the Eng. Bible, and the word "inspired" is left in it only once, and then, let it be added, by a distinct and even misleading mistranslation.

For the Gr word in this passage—θεόπνευστος, theópneustos—very distinctly does not mean "inspired of God." This phrase is rather the rendering of the Lat, divinitus inspirata, restored from the Wyclif ("Al Scripture of God ynspyríd is . . .") and Rhemish ("All Scripture inspired of God is . . .") VSS of the Vulg. The Gr word does not even mean, as AV trs it, "given by inspiration of God," although that rendering (inherited from Tindale: "All Scripture given by inspiration of God is . . .") and its successors; cf Geneva: "The whole Scripture is given by inspiration of God and is . . .") has at least to say for itself that it is a somewhat clumsy, perhaps, but not misleading, paraphrase of the Gr term in the theological language of the day. The Gr term has, however, nothing to say of inspiring or of inspiration: it speaks only of a "spiring" or "spiration." What it says of Scripture is, not that it is "breathed into by God" or is the product of the Divine "inbreathing" into its human authors, but that it is breathed out by God, "God-breathed," the product of the creative breath of God. In a word, what is declared by this fundamental passage is simply that the Scriptures are a Divine product, without any indication of how God has operated in producing them. No term could have been chosen, however, which would have more emphatically asserted the Divine production of Scripture than that which is here employed. The "breath of God" is in Scripture just the symbol of His almighty power, the bearer of His creative word. "By the word of Jeh," we read in the significant parallel of Ps 33 6, "were the heavens made, and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth." And it is particularly where the operations of God are energetic that this term (whether רִיחַ, rūḥ, or נְשָׁמָה, n'shāmāh) is employed to designate them—God's breath is the irresistible outflow of His power. When Paul declares, then, that "every scripture," or "all scripture" is the product of the Divine breath, "is God-breathed," he asserts with as much energy as he could employ that Scripture is the product of a specifically Divine operation.

(1) 2 Tim 3 16: In the passage in which Paul makes this energetic assertion of the Divine origin of Scripture he is engaged in explaining the greatness of the advantages which Timothy had enjoyed for learning the saving truth of God. He had had good teachers; and from his very infancy he had been, by his knowledge of the Scriptures, made wise unto salvation through faith in Jesus Christ. The expression, "sacred writings," here employed (ver 15), is a technical one, not found elsewhere in the NT, it is true, but occurring currently in Philo and Jos to designate that body of authoritative books which constituted the Jewish "Law." It appears here anathorously because it is set in contrast with the oral teaching which Timothy had enjoyed, as something still better: he had not only had good instructors, but also always "an open Bible," as we should say, in his hand. To enhance yet further the great advantage of the possession of these Sacred Scriptures the apostle adds now a sentence throwing their nature strongly up to view. They are of Divine origin and therefore of the highest value for all holy purposes.

There is room for some difference of opinion as to the exact construction of this declaration. Shall we render "Every Scripture" or "All Scripture"? Shall we render "Every [or all] Scripture is God-breathed and (therefore) profitable," or "Every [or all] Scripture, being God-breathed, is as well profitable"? No doubt both questions are interesting, but for the main matter now engaging our attention they are both indifferent. Whether Paul, looking back at the Sacred Scriptures he had just mentioned, makes the assertion he is about to add, of them distributively, of all their parts, or collectively, of their entire mass, is of no moment: to say that every part of these Sacred Scriptures is God-breathed and to say that the whole of these Sacred Scriptures is God-breathed, is, for the main matter, all one. Nor is the difference great between saying that they are in all their parts, or in their whole extent, God-breathed and therefore profitable, and saying that they are in all their parts, or in their whole extent, because God-breathed as well profitable. In both cases these Sacred Scriptures are declared to owe their value to their Divine origin; and in both cases this their Divine origin is energetically asserted of their entire fabric. On the whole, the preferable construction would seem to be, "Every Scripture, seeing that it is God-breathed, is as well profitable."

In that case, what the apostle asserts is that the Sacred Scriptures, in their every several passage—for it is just "passage of Scripture" which "Scripture" in this distributive use of it signifies—is the product of the creative breath of God, and, because of this its Divine origination, is of supreme value for all holy purposes.

It is to be observed that the apostle does not stop here to tell us either what particular books enter into the collection which he calls Sacred Scriptures, or by what precise operations God has produced them. Neither of these subjects entered into the matter he had at the moment in hand. It was the value of the Scriptures, and the source of that value in their Divine origin, which he required at the moment to assert; and these things he asserts, leaving to other occasions any further facts concerning them which it might be well to emphasize. It is also to be observed that the apostle does not tell us here everything for which the Scriptures are made valuable by their Divine origination. He speaks simply to the point immediately in hand, and reminds Timothy of the value which these Scriptures, by virtue of their Divine origin, have for the "man of God." Their spiritual power, as God-breathed, is all that he had occasion here to advert to. Whatever other qualities may accrue to them from their Divine origin, he leaves to other occasions to speak of.

(2) 2 Pet 1 19-21: What Paul tells us here about the Divine origin of the Scriptures is enforced and extended by a striking passage in 2 Pet (1 19-21). Peter is assuring his readers that what had been made known to them of "the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" did not rest on "cunningly devised fables." He offers them the testimony of eyewitnesses of Christ's glory. And then he intimates that they have better testimony than even that of eyewitnesses. "We have," says he, "the prophetic word" (EV, unhappily, "the word of prophecy"): and this, he says, is "more sure," and therefore should certainly be heeded. He refers, of course, to the Scriptures. Of what other "prophetic word" could he, over against the testimony of the eyewitnesses of Christ's "excellent glory" (AV) say that "we have" it, that is, it is in our hands? And he proceeds at once to speak of it plainly as "Scriptural prophecy." You do well, he says, to pay heed to the prophetic word, because we know this first, that "every prophecy of scripture . . ." It admits of more question, however, whether by this phrase he means the whole of Scripture, designated according to its character, as prophetic, that is, of Divine origin; or only that portion of Scripture which we discriminate as particularly prophetic, the immediate revelations contained in Scripture. The former is the more likely view, inasmuch as the entirety of Scripture is elsewhere conceived and spoken of as prophetic. In that case, what Peter has to say of this "every prophecy of scripture"—the exact equivalent, it will be observed, in this case of Paul's "every scripture" (2 Tim 3 16)—applies to the whole of Scripture in all its parts. What he says of it is that it does not come "of private interpretation"; that is, it is not the result of human investigation into the nature of things, the product of its writers' own thinking. This is as much as to say it is of Divine gift. Accordingly, he proceeds at once to make this plain in a supporting clause which contains both the negative and the positive declaration: "For no prophecy ever came [in 'was brought'] by the will of man, but it was as borne by the Holy Spirit that men spoke from God." In this singularly precise and pregnant statement there are several things which require to be carefully observed. There is, first of all, the emphatic denial that prophecy—that is to say, on the hypothesis upon which we are working, Scripture—owes its origin to human initiative: "No prophecy ever was brought—'came' is the word used in the EV text, with 'was brought' in RVm—by the will of man." Then, there is the equally emphatic assertion that its source lies in God: it was spoken by men, indeed, but the men who spoke it "spoke from God." And a remarkable clause is here inserted, and thrown forward in the sentence that stress may fall on it, which tells us how it could be that men, in speaking, should speak not from themselves, but from God: it was "as borne"—it is the same word which was rendered "was brought" above, and might possibly be rendered "brought" here—"by the Holy Spirit" that they spoke. Speaking thus under the determining influence of the Holy Spirit, the things they spoke were not from themselves, but from God.

Here is as direct an assertion of the Divine origin of Scripture as that of 2 Tim 3 16. But there is more here than a simple assertion of the Divine origin of Scripture. We are advanced somewhat in our understanding of how God has produced the Scriptures. It was through the instrumentality of men who "spoke from him." More specifically, it was through an operation of the Holy Ghost on these men which is described as "bearing" them. The term here used is a very specific one. It is not to be confounded with guiding, or directing, or controlling, or even leading in the full sense of that word. It goes beyond all such terms, in assigning the effect produced specifically to the active agent. What is "borne" is taken up by the "bearer," and conveyed by the "bearer's" power, not its own, to the "bearer's" goal, not its own. The men who spoke from God are here declared, therefore, to have been taken up by the Holy Spirit and brought by His power to the goal of His choosing. The things which they spoke under this operation of the Spirit were therefore His things, not theirs. And that is the reason which is assigned why "the prophetic word" is so sure. Though spoken through the instrumentality of men, it is, by virtue of the fact that these men spoke "as borne by the Holy Spirit," an immediately Divine word. It will be observed that the proximate stress is laid here, not on the spiritual value of Scripture (though that, too, is seen in the background), but on the Divine trustworthiness of Scripture. Because this is the way every prophecy of Scripture "has been brought," it affords a more sure basis of confidence than even the testimony of human eyewitnesses. Of course, if we do not understand by "the prophetic word" here the entirety of Scripture described, according to its character, as revelation, but only that element in Scripture which we call specifically prophecy, then it is directly only of that element in Scripture that these great declarations are made. In any event, however, they are made of the prophetic element in Scripture as written, which was the only form in which the readers of this Ep. possessed it, and which is the thing specifically intimated in the phrase "every prophecy of scripture." These great declarations are made, therefore, at least of large tracts of Scripture; and if the entirety of Scripture is intended by the phrase "the prophetic word," they are made of the whole of Scripture.

(3) Jn 10 34f: How far the supreme trustworthiness of Scripture, thus asserted, extends may be conveyed to us by a passage in one of Our Lord's discourses recorded by John (Jn 10 34-35). The Jews, offended by Jesus' "making himself God," were in the act to stone Him, when He defended Himself thus: "Is it not written in your law, I said, Ye are gods? If he called them gods, unto whom the word of God came (and the scripture cannot be broken), say ye of him, whom the Father sanctified [in "consecrated"] and sent unto the world, Thou blasphemest; because I said, I am the Son of God?" It may be thought that this defence is inadequate. It certainly is incomplete: Jesus made Himself God (Jn 10 33) in a far higher sense than that in which "Ye are gods" was said of those "unto whom the word of God came": He had just declared in unmistakable terms, "I and the Father are one." But it was quite sufficient for the immediate end in view—to repel the technical charge of blasphemy based on His making Himself God: it is not blasphemy to call one God in any sense in which he may fitly receive that designation; and certainly if it is not blasphemy to call such men as those spoken of in the passage of Scripture adduced gods, because of their official functions, it cannot be blasphemy to call Him God whom the Father consecrated and sent into the world. The point for us to note, however, is merely that Jesus' defence takes the form of an appeal to Scripture; and it is important to observe how He makes this appeal. In the first place, He adduces the Scriptures as law: "Is it not written in your law?" He demands. The passage of Scripture which He adduces is not written in that portion of Scripture which was more specifically called "the Law," that is to say, the Pent; nor in any portion of Scripture of formally legal contents. It is written in the Book of Pss; and in a particular psalm which is as far as possible from presenting the external characteristics of legal enactment (Ps 82 6). When Jesus adduces this passage, then, as written in the "law" of the Jews, He does it, not because it stands in this psalm, but because it is a part of Scripture at large. In other words, He here ascribes legal authority to the entirety of Scripture, in accordance with a conception common enough among the Jews (cf Jn 12 34), and finding expression in the NT occasionally, both on the lips of Jesus Himself, and in the writings of the apostles. Thus, on a later occasion (Jn 15 25), Jesus declares that it is written in the "law" of the Jews, "They hated me without a cause," a clause found in Ps 35 19. And Paul assigns passages both from the Pss and from Isa to "the Law" (1 Cor 14 21; Rom 3 19), and can write such a sentence as this (Gal 4 21 f): "Tell me, ye that desire to be under the law, do ye not hear the law? For it is written . . ." quoting from the narrative of Gen. We have seen that the entirety of Scripture was conceived as "prophecy"; we now see that the entirety of Scripture was also conceived as "law": these three terms, the law, prophecy, Scripture, were indeed, materially, strict synonyms, as our present passage itself advises us, by varying the formula of adduction in contiguous verses from "law" to "scripture." And what is thus implied in the manner in which Scripture is adduced, is immediately afterward spoken out in the most explicit language, because it forms an essential element in Our Lord's defence. It might have been enough to say simply, "Is it not written in your law?" But Our Lord, determined to drive His appeal to Scripture home, sharpens the point to the utmost by adding with the highest emphasis: "and the scripture cannot be broken." This is the reason why it is worth while to appeal to what is "written in the law," because "the scripture cannot be broken." The word "broken" here is the common one for breaking the law, or the Sabbath, or the like (Jn 5 18; 7 23; Mt 5 19), and the meaning of the declaration is that it is impossible for the Scripture to be annulled, its authority to be withstood, or denied. The movement of thought is to the effect that, because it is impossible for the Scripture—the term is perfectly general and witnesses to the unitary character of Scripture (it is all, for the purpose in hand, of a piece)—to be withstood, therefore this particular Scripture which is cited must be taken as of irrefragable authority. What we have here is, therefore, the strongest possible assertion of the indefectible authority of Scripture; precisely what is true of Scripture is that it "cannot be broken." Now, what is the particular thing in Scripture, for the confirmation of which the indefectible authority of Scripture is thus invoked? It is one of its most casual clauses—more than that, the very form of its expression in one of its most casual clauses. This means, of course, that in the Saviour's view the indefectible authority of Scripture attaches to the very form of expression of its most casual clauses. It belongs to Scripture through and through, down to its most minute particulars, that it is of indefectible authority.

It is sometimes suggested, it is true, that Our Lord's argument here is an argumentum ad hominem, and that His words, therefore, express not His own view of the authority of Scripture, but that of His Jewish opponents. It will scarcely be denied that there is a vein of satire running through Our Lord's defence: that the Jews so readily allowed that corrupt judges might properly be called "gods," but could not endure that He whom the Father had consecrated and sent into the world should call Himself Son of God, was a somewhat pungent fact to throw up into such a high light. But the argument from Scripture is not ad hominem but e concessu; Scripture was common ground with Jesus and His opponents. If proof were needed for so obvious a fact, it would be supplied by the circumstance that this is not an isolated but a representative passage. The conception of Scripture thrown up into such clear view here supplies the ground of all Jesus' appeals to Scripture, and of all the appeals of the NT writers as well. Everywhere, to Him and to them alike, an appeal to Scripture is an appeal to an indefectible authority whose determination is final; both He and they make their appeal indifferently to every part of Scripture, to every element in Scripture, to its most incidental clauses as well as to its most fundamental principles, and to the very form of its expression. This attitude toward Scripture as an authoritative document is, indeed, already intimated by their constant designation of it by the name of Scripture, the Scriptures, that is "the Document," by way of eminence; and by their customary citation of it with the simple formula, "It is written." What is written in this document admits so little of questioning that its authoritativeness required no asserting, but might safely be taken for granted. Both modes of expression belong to the constantly illustrated habitudes of Our Lord's speech. The first words He is recorded as uttering after His manifestation to Israel were an appeal to the unquestionable authority of Scripture; to Satan's temptations He opposed no other weapon than the final "It is written"! (Mt 4 4.7-10; Lk 4 4.8). And among the last words which He spoke to His disciples before He was received up was a rebuke to them for not understanding that all things "which are written in the law of Moses, and the prophets, and psalms" concerning Him—that is (ver 45) in the entire "Scriptures"—"must needs be" (very emphatic) "fulfilled" (Lk 24 44). "Thus it is written," says He (ver 46), as rendering all doubt absurd. For, as He had explained earlier upon the same day (Lk 24 25 ff), it argues only that one is "foolish and slow of heart" if he does not "believe in" (if his faith does not rest securely on, as on a firm foundation) "all" (without limit of subject-matter here) "that the prophets" (explained in ver 27 as equivalent to "all the scriptures") "have spoken."

The necessity of the fulfilment of all that is written in Scripture, which is so strongly asserted in these last instructions to His disciples, is frequently adverted to by Our Lord. He repeatedly explains of occurrences occasionally happening that they have come to pass "that the scripture might be fulfilled" (Mk 14 49; Jn 13 18; 17 12; cf 12 14; Mk 9 12.13). On the basis of Scriptural declarations, therefore, He announces with confidence that given events will certainly occur: "All ye shall be offended [lit. "scandalized"] in me this night: for it is written . . ." (Mt 26 31; Mk 14 27; cf Lk 20 17). Although holding at His command ample means of escape, He bows before on-coming calamities, for, He asks, how otherwise "should the scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be?" (Mt 26 54). It is not merely the two disciples with whom He talked on the way to Emmaus (Lk 24 25) whom He rebukes for not trusting themselves more perfectly to the teaching of Scripture. "Ye search the scriptures," he says to the Jews, in the classical passage (Jn 5 39), "because ye think that in them ye have eternal life; and these are they which bear witness of me; and ye will not come to me, that ye may have life!" These words surely were spoken more in sorrow than in scorn: there is no blame implied either for searching the Scriptures or for thinking that eternal life is to be found in Scripture; approval rather. What the Jews are blamed for is that they read with a veil lying upon their hearts which He would fain take away (2 Cor 3 15 f). "Ye search the scriptures"—that is right: and "even you" (emphatic) "think to have eternal life in them"—that is right, too. But "it is these very Scriptures" (very emphatic) "which are bearing witness" (continuous process) "of me; and" (here is the marvel!) "ye will not come to me and have life!"—that you may, that is, reach the very end you have so properly in view in searching the Scriptures. Their failure is due, not to the Scriptures but to themselves, who read the Scriptures to such little purpose.

ture had been read, not because it had been looked into too curiously, but because it had not been looked into earnestly enough, with sufficiently simple and robust trust in its every declaration. "Have ye not read even this scripture?" He demands, as He adduces Ps 118 to show that the rejection of the Messiah was already intimated in Scripture (Mk 12 10; Mt 21 42 varies the expression to the equivalent: "Did ye never read in the scriptures?"). And when the indignant Jews came to Him complaining of the Hosannas with which the children in the Temple were acclaiming Him, and demanding, "Hearst thou what these are saying?" He met them (Mt 21 16) merely with, "Yea: did ye never read, Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings thou has perfected praise?" The underlying thought of these passages is spoken out when He intimates that the source of all error in Divine things is just ignorance of the Scriptures: "Ye do err," He declares to His questioners, on an important occasion, "not knowing the scriptures" (Mt 22 29); or, as it is put, perhaps more forcibly, in interrogative form, in its || in another Gospel: "Is it not for this cause that ye err, that ye know not the scriptures?" (Mk 12 24). Clearly, he who rightly knows the Scriptures does not err. The confidence with which Jesus rested on Scripture, in its every declaration, is further illustrated in a passage like Mt 19 4. Certain Pharisees had come to Him with a question on divorce and He met them thus: "Have ye not read, that he who made them from the beginning made them male and female, and said, For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife; and the two shall become one flesh? . . . What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder." The point to be noted is the explicit reference of Gen 2 24 to God as its author: "He who made them . . . said"; "what therefore God hath joined together." Yet this passage does not give us a saying of God's recorded in Scripture, but just the word of Scripture itself, and can be treated as a declaration of God's only on the hypothesis that all Scripture is a declaration of God's. The ¶ in Mk (10 5 ff) just as truly, though not as explicitly, assigns the passage to God as its author, citing it as authoritative law and speaking of its enactment as an act of God's. And it is interesting to observe in passing that Paul, having occasion to quote the same passage (1 Cor 6 16), also explicitly quotes it as a Divine word: "For, The twain, saith he, shall become one flesh"—the "he" here, in accordance with a usage to be noted later, meaning just "God."

Thus clear is it that Jesus' occasional adduction of Scripture as an authoritative document rests on an ascription of it to God as its author. His testimony is that whatever stands written in Scripture is a word of God. Nor can we evacuate this testimony of its force on the plea that it represents Jesus only in the days of His flesh, when He may be supposed to have reflected merely the opinions of His day and generation. The view of Scripture He announces was, no doubt, the view of His day and generation as well as His own view. But there is no reason to doubt that it was held by Him, not because it was the current view, but because, in His Divine-human knowledge, He knew it to be true; for, even in His humiliation, He is the faithful and true witness. And in any event we should bear in mind that this was the view of the resurrected as well as of the humiliated Christ. It was after He had suffered and had risen again in the power of His Divine life that He pronounced those foolish and slow of heart who do not believe all that stands written in all the Scriptures (Lk 24 25); and that He laid down the simple "Thus it is written" as the sufficient ground of confident belief (Lk 24 46). Nor can we explain away Jesus' testimony to the Divine trustworthiness of Scripture by interpreting it as not His own, but that of His followers, placed on His lips in their reports of His words. Not only is it too constant, minute, intimate and in part incidental, and therefore, as it were, hidden, to admit of this interpretation; but it so pervades all our channels of information concerning Jesus' teaching as to make it certain that it comes actually from Him. It belongs not only to the Jesus of our evangelical records but as well to the Jesus of the earlier sources which underlie our evangelical records, as anyone may assure himself by observing the instances in which Jesus adduces the Scriptures as Divinely authoritative that are recorded in more than one of the Gospels (e.g. "It is written," Mt 4 4 7.10 [Lk 4 4.8.10]; Mt 11 10; [Lk 7 27]; Mt 21 13 [Lk 19 46; Mk 11 17]; Mt 26 31 [Mk 14 21]; "the scripture" or "the scriptures," Mt 19 4 [Mk 10 9]; Mt 21 42 [Mk 12 10; Lk 20 17]; Mt 22 29 [Mk 12 24; Lk 20 37]; Mt 26 56 [Mk 14 49; Lk 24 44]). These passages alone would suffice to make clear to us the testimony of Jesus to Scripture as in all its parts and declarations Divinely authoritative.

The attempt to attribute the testimony of Jesus to His followers has in its favor only the undeniable fact that the testimony of the writers

6. Similar of the NT is to precisely the same
Witness of effect as His. They, too, cursorily
Apostles speak of Scripture by that pregnant name and adduce it with the simple "It is written," with the implication that whatever stands written in it is Divinely authoritative. As Jesus' official life begins with this "It is written" (Mt 4 4), so the evangelical proclamation begins with an "Even as it is written" (Mk 1 2); and as Jesus sought the justification of His work in a solemn "Thus it is written, that the Christ should suffer, and rise again from the dead the third day"

(Lk 24 46 ff), so the apostles solemnly justified the Gospel which they preached, detail after detail, by appeal to the Scriptures, "That Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures" and "That he hath been raised on the third day according to the scriptures" (1 Cor 15 3.4; cf Acts 8 35; 17 3; 26 22, and also Rom 1 17; 3 4.10; 4 17; 11 26; 14 11; 1 Cor 1 19; 2 9; 3 19; 15 45; Gal 3 10.13; 4 22.27). Wherever they carried the gospel it was as a gospel resting on Scripture that they proclaimed it (Acts 17 2; 18 24.28); and they encouraged themselves to test its truth by the Scriptures (Acts 17 11). The holiness of life they inculcated, they based on Scriptural requirement (1 Pet 1 16), and they commended the royal law of love which they taught by Scriptural sanction (Jas 2 8). Every detail of duty was supported by them by an appeal to Scripture (Acts 23 5; Rom 12 19). The circumstances of their lives and the events occasionally occurring about them are referred to Scripture for their significance (Rom 2 26; 8 36; 9 33; 11 8; 15 9.21; 2 Cor 4 13). As Our Lord declared that whatever was written in Scripture must needs be fulfilled (Mt 26 54; Lk 22 37; 24 44), so His followers explained one of the most startling facts which had occurred in their experience by pointing out that "it was needful that the scripture should be fulfilled, which the Holy Spirit spake before by the mouth of David" (Acts 1 16). Here the ground of this constant appeal to Scripture, so that it is enough that a thing "is contained in scripture" (1 Pet 2 6) for it to be of indefectible authority, is plainly enough declared: Scripture must needs be fulfilled, for what is contained in it is the declaration of the Holy Ghost through the human author. What Scripture says, God says; and accordingly we read such remarkable declarations as these: "For the scripture saith unto Pharaoh, For this very purpose did I raise thee up" (Rom 9 17); "And the scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the Gentiles by faith, preached the gospel beforehand unto Abraham, . . . In thee shall all the nations be blessed" (Gal 3 8). These are not instances of simple personification of Scripture, which is itself a sufficiently remarkable usage (Mk 15 28; Jn 7 38.42; 19 37; Rom 4 3; 10 11; 11 2; Gal 4 30; 1 Tim 5 18; Jas 2 23; 4 5 f), vocal with the conviction expressed by James (4 5) that Scripture cannot speak in vain. They indicate a certain confusion in current speech between "Scripture" and "God," the outgrowth of a deep-seated conviction that the word of Scripture is the word of God. It was not "Scripture" that spoke to Pharaoh, or gave his great promise to Abraham, but God. But "Scripture" and "God" lay so close together in the minds of the writers of the NT that they could naturally speak of "Scripture" doing what Scripture records God as doing. It was, however, even more natural to them to speak casually of God saying what the Scriptures say; and accordingly we meet with forms of speech such as these: "Wherefore, even as the Holy Spirit saith, To-day if ye shall hear His voice," etc (He 3 7, quoting Ps 95 7); "Thou art God . . . who by the mouth of thy servant David hast said, Why did the heathen rage," etc (Acts 4 25 AV, quoting Ps 2 1); "He that raised him from the dead . . . hath spoken on this wise, I will give you . . . because he saith also in another [place] . . ." (Acts 13 34, quoting Isa 55 3 and Ps 16 10), and the like. The words put into God's mouth in each case are not words of God recorded in the Scriptures, but just Scripture words in themselves. When we take the two classes of passages together, in the one of which the Scriptures are spoken of as God, while in the other God is spoken of as if He were the Scriptures, we may perceive how close the identification of the two was in the minds of the writers of the NT.

This identification is strikingly observable in certain catenae of quotations, in which there are brought together a number of passages of Scripture closely connected with one another. The first chapter of the 7. Identification of God and Scriptures Ep. to the He supplies an example. We may begin with ver 5: "For unto which of the angels said he"—the subject being necessarily "God"—"at any time, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee?"—the citation being from Ps 2 7 and very appropriate in the mouth of God—"and again, I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son?"—from 2 S 7 14, again a declaration of God's own—"And when he again bringeth in the firstborn into the world he saith, And let all the angels of God worship him"—from Dt 32 43, LXX, or Ps 97 7, in neither of which is God the speaker—"And of the angels he saith, Who maketh his angels winds, and his ministers a flame of fire"—from Ps 104 4, where again God is not the speaker but is spoken of in the third person—"but of the Son he saith, Thy throne, O God, etc"—from Ps 45 6,7 where again God is not the speaker, but is addressed—"And, Thou, Lord, in the beginning," etc—from Ps 102 25-27, where again God is not the speaker but is addressed—"But of which of the angels hath he said at any time, Sit thou on my right hand?" etc—from Ps 110 1, in which God is the speaker. Here we have passages in which God is the speaker and passages in which God is not the speaker, but is addressed or spoken of, indiscriminately assigned to God, because they all have it in common that they are words of Scripture, and as words of Scripture are words of God. Similarly in Rom 15 9 ff we have a series of citations the first of which is introduced by "as it is written," and the next two by "again he saith," and "again," and the last by "and again, Isaiah saith," the first being from Ps 18 49; the second from Dt 32 43; the third from Ps 117 1; and the last from Isa 11 10. Only the last (the only one here assigned to the human author) is a word of God in the text of the OT.

This view of the Scriptures as a compact mass of words of God occasioned the formation of a designation for them by which this their

8. "Oracles of God" character was explicitly expressed. This designation is "the sacred oracles,"

"the oracles of God." It occurs with extraordinary frequency in Philo, who very commonly refers to Scripture as "the sacred oracles" and cites its several passages as each an "oracle." Sharing, as they do, Philo's conception of the Scriptures as, in all their parts, a word of God, the NT writers naturally also speak of them under this designation. The classical passage is Rom 3 2 (cf He 5 12; Acts 7 38). Here Paul begins an enumeration of the advantages which belonged to the chosen people above other nations; and, after declaring these advantages to have been great and numerous, he places first among them all their possession of the Scriptures: "What advantage then hath the Jew? or what is the profit of circumcision? Much every way: first of all, that they were intrusted with the oracles of God." That by "the oracles of God" here are meant just the Holy Scriptures in their entirety, conceived as a direct Divine revelation, and not any portions of them, or elements in them more esp. thought of as revelatory, is perfectly clear from the wide contemporary use of this designation in this sense by Philo, and is put beyond question by the presence in the NT of habitudes of speech which rest on and grow out of the conception of Scripture embodied in this term. From the point of view of this designation,

Scripture is thought of as the living voice of God speaking in all its parts directly to the reader; and, accordingly, it is cited by some such formula as "it is said," and this mode of citing Scripture duly occurs as an alternative to "it is written" (Lk 4 12, replacing "it is written" in Mt; He 3 15; cf Rom 4 18). It is due also to this point of view that Scripture is cited, not as what God or the Holy Spirit "said," but what He "says," the present tense emphasizing the living voice of God speaking in Scriptures to the individual soul (He 3 7; Acts 13 35; He 1 7.8.10; Rom 15 10). And esp. there is due to it the peculiar usage by which Scripture is cited by the simple "saith," without expressed subject, the subject being too well understood, when Scripture is adduced, to require stating; for who could be the speaker of the words of Scripture but God only (Rom 15 10; 1 Cor 6 16; 2 Cor 6 2; Gal 3 16; Eph 4 8; 5 14)? The analogies of this pregnant subjectless "saith" are very widespread. It was with it that the ancient Pythagoreans and Platonists and the mediaeval Aristotelians adduced each their master's teaching; it was with it that, in certain circles, the judgments of Hadrian's great jurist Salvius Julianus were cited; African stylists were even accustomed to refer by it to Sallust, their great model. There is a tendency, cropping out occasionally, in the OT, to omit the name of God as superfluous, when He, as the great logical subject always in mind, would be easily understood (cf Job 20 23; 21 17; Ps 114 2; Lam 4 22). So, too, when the NT writers quoted Scripture there was no need to say whose word it was: that lay beyond question in every mind. This usage, accordingly, is a specially striking intimation of the vivid sense which the NT writers had of the Divine origin of the Scriptures, and means that in citing them they were acutely conscious that they were citing immediate words of God. How completely the Scriptures were to them just the word of God may be illustrated by a passage like Gal 3 16: "He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ." We have seen Our Lord hanging an argument on the very words of Scripture (Jn 10 34); elsewhere His reasoning depends on the particular tense (Mt 22 32) or word (Mt 22 43) used in Scripture. Here Paul's argument rests similarly on a grammatical form. No doubt it is the grammatical form of the word which God is recorded as having spoken to Abraham that is in question. But Paul knows what grammatical form God employed in speaking to Abraham only as the Scriptures have transmitted it to him; and, as we have seen, in citing the words of God and the words of Scripture he was not accustomed to make any distinction between them. It is probably the Scriptural word as a Scriptural word, therefore, which he has here in mind: though, of course, it is possible that what he here witnesses to is rather the detailed trustworthiness of the Scriptural record than its direct divinity—if we can separate two things which apparently were not separated in Paul's mind. This much we can at least say without straining, that the designation of Scripture as "scripture" and its citation by the formula, "It is written," attest primarily its indefectible authority; the designation of it as "oracles" and the adduction of it by the formula, "It says," attest primarily its immediate divinity. Its authority rests on its divinity and its divinity expresses itself in its trustworthiness; and the NT writers in all their use of it treat it as what they declare it to be—a God-breathed document, which, because God-breathed, is through and through trustworthy in all its assertions, authoritative in all its declarations, and down to its last particular, the very word of God, His "oracles."

That the Scriptures are throughout a Divine book, created by the Divine energy and speaking in their every part with Divine authority directly to the heart of the readers, is the fundamental fact concerning them which is witnessed by Christ and the sacred writers to whom we owe the NT. But the strength and constancy with which they bear witness to this primary fact do not prevent their recognizing by the side of it that the Scriptures have come into being by the agency of men. It would be inexact to say that they recognize a human element in Scripture: they do not parcel Scripture out, assigning portions of it, or elements in it, respectively to God and man. In their view the whole of Scripture in all its parts and in all its elements, down to the least minutiae, in form of expression as well as in substance of teaching, is from God; but the whole of it has been given by God through the instrumentality of men. There is, therefore, in their view, not, indeed, a human element or ingredient in Scripture, and much less human divisions or sections of Scripture, but a human side or aspect to Scripture; and they do not fail to give full recognition to this human side or aspect. In one of the primary passages which has already been before us, their conception is given, if somewhat broad and very succinct, yet clear expression. No 'prophecy,' Peter tells us (2 Pet 1 21), 'ever came by the will of man; but as borne by the Holy Ghost, men spake from God.' Here the whole initiative is assigned to God, and such complete control of the human agents that the product is truly God's work. The men who speak in this "prophecy of scripture" speak not of themselves or out of themselves, but from "God": they speak only as they are "borne by the Holy Ghost." But it is they, after all, who speak. Scripture is the product of man, but only of man speaking from God and under such a control of the Holy Spirit as that in their speaking they are "borne" by Him. The conception obviously is that the Scriptures have been given by the instrumentality of men; and this conception finds repeated incidental expression throughout the NT.

It is this conception, for example, which is expressed when Our Lord, quoting Ps 110, declares of its words that "David himself said in the Holy Spirit" (Mk 12 36). There is a certain emphasis here on the words being David's own words, which is due to the requirements of the argument Our Lord was conducting, but which none the less sincerely represents Our Lord's conception of their origin. They are David's own words which we find in Ps 110, therefore; but they are David's own words, spoken not of his own motion merely, but "in the Holy Spirit," that is to say—we could not better paraphrase it—"as borne by the Holy Spirit." In other words, they are "God-breathed" words and therefore authoritative in a sense above what any words of David, not spoken in the Holy Spirit, could possibly be. Generalizing the matter, we may say that the words of Scripture are conceived by Our Lord and the NT writers as the words of their human authors when speaking "in the Holy Spirit," that is to say, by His initiative and under His controlling direction. The conception finds even more precise expression, perhaps, in such a statement as we find—it is Peter who is speaking and it is again a psalm which is cited—in Acts 1 16, "The Holy Spirit spake by the mouth of David." Here the Holy Spirit is adduced, of course, as the real author of what is said (and hence Peter's certainty that what is said will be fulfilled); but David's mouth is expressly designated as the instrument (it is the instrumental preposition that is used) by means of which the Holy Spirit speaks the Scripture in question. He does not speak save through David's mouth. Accordingly, in Acts 4 25, 'the Lord that made the heaven and earth,' acting by His Holy Spirit, is declared to have spoken another psalm "through the mouth of . . . David," His "servant"; and in Mt 13 35 still another psalm is adduced as "spoken through the prophet" (cf Mt 2 5). In the very act of energetically asserting the Divine origin of Scripture the human instrumentality through which it is given is constantly recognized. The NT writers have, therefore, no difficulty in assigning Scripture to its human authors, or in discovering in Scripture traits due to its human authorship. They freely quote it by such simple formulae as these: "Moses saith" (Rom 10 19); "Moses said" (Mt 22 24; Mk 7 10; Acts 3 22); "Moses writeth" (Rom 10 5); "Moses wrote" (Mk 12 19; Lk 20 28); "Isaiah . . . saith" (Rom 10 20); "Isaiah said" (Jn 12 39); "Isaiah crieth" (Rom 9 27); "Isaiah hath said before" (Rom 9 29); "said Isaiah the prophet" (Jn 1 23); "did Isaiah prophesy" (Mk 7 6; Mt 15 7); "David saith" (Lk 20 42; Acts 2 25; Rom 11 9); "David said" (Mk 12 36). It is to be noted that when thus Scripture is adduced by the names of its human authors, it is a matter of complete indifference whether the words adduced are comments of these authors or direct words of God recorded by them. As the plainest words of the human authors are assigned to God as their real author, so the most express words of God, repeated by the Scriptural writers, are cited by the names of these human writers (Mt 15 7; Mk 7 6; Rom 10 5 19 20; cf Mk 7 10 from the Decalogue). To say that "Moses" or "David says," is evidently thus only a way of saying that "Scripture says," which is the same as to say that "God says." Such modes of citing Scripture, accordingly, carry us little beyond merely connecting the name, or perhaps we may say the individuality, of the several writers with the portions of Scripture given through each. How it was given through them is left meanwhile, if not without suggestion, yet without specific explanation. We seem safe only in inferring this much: that the gift of Scripture through its human authors took place by a process much more intimate than can be expressed by the term "dictation," and that it took place in a process in which the control of the Holy Spirit was too complete and pervasive to permit the human qualities of the secondary authors in any way to condition the purity of the product as the word of God. The Scriptures, in other words, are conceived by the writers of the NT as through and through God's book, in every part expressive of His mind, given through men after a fashion which does no violence to their nature as men, and constitutes the book also men's book as well as God's, in every part expressive of the mind of its human authors.

If we attempt to get behind this broad statement and to obtain a more detailed conception of the activities by which God has given the Scriptures, we are thrown back upon somewhat general representations, supported by the analogy of the modes of God's working in other spheres of His operation. It is very desirable that we should free ourselves at the outset from influences arising from the current employment of the term "inspiration" to designate this process. This term is not a Bib. term and its etymological implications are not perfectly accordant with the Bib. conception of the modes of the Divine operation in giving the Scriptures. The Bib. writers do not conceive of the Scriptures as a human product breathed into by the Divine Spirit, and thus heightened in its qualities or endowed with new qualities; but as a Divine product produced through the instrumentality of men. They do not conceive of these men, by whose instrumentality Scripture is produced, as working upon their own initiative, though energized by God to greater effort and higher achievement, but as moved by the Divine initiative and borne by the irresistible power of the Spirit of God along ways of His choosing to ends of His appointment. The difference between the two conceptions may not appear great when the mind is fixed exclusively upon the nature of the resulting product. But they are differing conceptions, and look at the production of Scripture from distinct points of view—the human and the Divine; and the involved mental attitudes toward the origin of Scripture are very diverse. The term “inspiration” is too firmly fixed, in both theological and popular usage, as the technical designation of the action of God in giving the Scriptures, to be replaced; and we may be thankful that its native implications lie as close as they do to the Bib. conceptions. Meanwhile, however, it may be justly insisted that it shall receive its definition from the representations of Scripture, and not be permitted to impose upon our thought ideas of the origin of Scripture derived from an analysis of its own implications, etymological or historical. The Scriptural conception of the relation of the Divine Spirit to the human authors in the production of Scripture is better expressed by the figure of “bearing” than by the figure of “inbreathing”; and when our Bib. writers speak of the action of the Spirit of God in this relation as a breathing, they represent it as a “breathing out” of the Scriptures by the Spirit, and not a “breathing into” the Scriptures by Him.

So soon, however, as we seriously endeavor to form for ourselves a clear conception of the precise nature of the Divine action in this

11. General “breathing out” of the Scriptures—Problem of this “bearing” of the writers of the Origin: Scriptures to their appointed goal of God’s Part the production of a book of Divine trustworthiness and indefectible authority—we become acutely aware of a more deeply

lying and much wider problem, apart from which this one of inspiration, technically so called, cannot be profitably considered. This is the general problem of the origin of the Scriptures and the part of God in all that complex of processes by the interaction of which these books, which we call the sacred Scriptures, with all their peculiarities, and all their qualities of whatever sort, have been brought into being. For, of course, these books were not produced suddenly, by some miraculous act—handed down complete out of heaven, as the phrase goes; but, like all other products of time, are the ultimate effect of many processes coöperating through long periods. There is to be considered, for instance, the preparation of the material which forms the subject-matter of these books: in a sacred history, say, for example, to be narrated; or in a religious experience which may serve as a norm for record; or in a logical elaboration of the contents of revelation which may be placed at the service of God’s people; or in the progressive revelation of Divine truth itself, supplying their culminating contents. And there is the preparation of the men to write these books to be considered, a preparation physical, intellectual, spiritual, which must have attended them throughout their whole lives, and, indeed, must have had its beginning in their remote ancestors, and the effect of which was to bring the right men to the right places at the right times, with the right endowments, impulses, acquirements, to write just the books which were designed for them. When “inspiration,” technically so called, is superinduced on lines of preparation like these, it takes on quite a different aspect from that which it bears when it is thought of as an isolated action of the Divine Spirit operating out of all relation to historical processes. Representations are sometimes made as if, when God wished to produce sacred books which would incorporate His will—a series of letters like those of Paul, for example—He was reduced to the necessity of going down to earth and painfully scrutinizing the men He found there, seeking anxiously for the one who, on the whole, promised best for His purpose; and then violently forcing the material He wished expressed through him, against his natural bent, and with as little loss from his recalcitrant characteristics as possible. Of course, nothing of the sort took place. If God wished to give His people a series of letters like Paul’s, He prepared a Paul to write them, and the Paul He brought to the task was a Paul who spontaneously would write just such letters.

If we bear this in mind, we shall know what estimate to place upon the common representation to the effect that the human character-

12. Effect istics of the writers must, and in point of Human of fact do, condition and qualify the Qualities: writings produced by them, the im- Providential action being that, therefore, we cannot Preparation get from man a pure word of God. As light that passes through the colored glass of a cathedral window, we are told, is light from heaven, but is stained by the tints of the glass through which it passes; so any word of God which is passed through the mind and soul of a man must come out discolored by the personality through which it is given, and just to that degree ceases to be the pure word of God. But what if this personality has itself been formed by God into precisely the personality it is, for the express purpose of communicating to the word given through it just the coloring which it gives it? What if the colors of the stained-glass window have been designed by the architect for the express purpose of giving to the light that floods the cathedral precisely the tone and quality it receives from them? What if the word of God that comes to His people is framed by God into the word of God it is, precisely by means of the qualities of the men formed by Him for the purpose, through which it is given? When we think of God the Lord giving by His Spirit a body of authoritative Scriptures to His people, we must remember that He is the God of providence and of grace as well as of revelation and inspiration, and that He holds all the lines of preparation as fully under His direction as He does the specific operation which we call technically, in the narrow sense, by the name of “inspiration.” The production of the Scriptures is, in point of fact, a long process, in the course of which numerous and very varied Divine activities are involved, providential, gracious, miraculous, all of which must be taken into account in any attempt to explain the relation of God to the production of Scripture. When they are all taken into account we can no longer wonder that the resultant Scriptures are constantly spoken of as the pure word of God. We wonder, rather, that an additional operation of God—what we call specifically “inspiration,” in its technical sense—was thought necessary. Consider, for example, how a piece of sacred history—say the Book of Ch, or the great historical work, Gospel and Acts, of Luke—is brought to the writing. There is first of all the preparation of the history to be written: God the Lord leads the sequence of occurrences through the development He has designed for them that they may convey their lessons to His people: a “teleological” or “aetiological” character is inherent in the very course of events. Then He prepares a man, by birth, training, experience, gifts of grace, and, if need be, of revelation, capable of appreciating this historical development and eager to search it out, thrilling in all his being with its lessons and bent upon making them clear and effective to others. When, then, by His providence, God sets this man to work on the writing of this history, will there not be spontaneously written by him the history which it was Divinely intended should be written? Or consider how a psalmist would be prepared to put into moving verse a piece of normative religious experience: how he would be born with just the right quality of religious sensibility, of parents through whom he should receive just the right hereditary bent, and from whom he should get precisely the right religious example and training, in circumstances of life in which his religious tendencies should be developed precisely on right lines; how he would be brought through just the right experiences to quicken in him the precise emotions he would be called upon to express, and finally would be placed in precisely the exigencies which would call out their expression. Or consider the providential preparation of a writer of a didactic epistle—by means of which he should be given the intellectual breadth and acuteness, and be trained in habits of reasoning, and placed in the situations which would call out precisely the argumentative presentation of Christian truth which was required of him. When we give due place in our thoughts to the universality of the providential government of God, to the minuteness and completeness of its sway, and to its invariable efficacy, we may be inclined to ask what is needed beyond this mere providential government to secure the production of sacred books which should be in every detail absolutely accordant with the Divine will.

The answer is, Nothing is needed beyond mere providence to secure such books—provided only 13. "Inspiration" pose that these books should possess qualities which rise above the powers of men to produce, even under the most complete Divine guidance. For More than providence is guidance; and guidance "Providence" can bring one only so far as his own power can carry him. If heights are to be scaled above man's native power to achieve, then something more than guidance, however effective, is necessary. This is the reason for the superinduction, at the end of the long process of the production of Scripture, of the additional Divine operation which we call technically "inspiration." By it, the Spirit of God, flowing confluent in with the providentially and graciously determined work of men, spontaneously producing under the Divine directions the writings appointed to them, gives the product a Divine quality unattainable by human powers alone. Thus these books become not merely the word of godly men, but the immediate word of God Himself, speaking directly as such to the minds and hearts of every reader. The value of "inspiration" emerges, thus, as twofold. It gives to the books written under its "bearing" a quality which is truly superhuman; a trustworthiness, an authority, a searchingness, a profundity, a profitableness which is altogether Divine. And it speaks this Divine word immediately to each reader's heart and conscience; so that he does not require to make his way to God, painfully, perhaps even uncertainly, through the words of His servants, the human instruments in writing the Scriptures, but can listen directly to the Divine voice itself speaking immediately in the Scriptural word to him.

That the writers of the NT themselves conceive the Scriptures to have been produced thus by Divine operations extending through the increasing ages and involving a multitude of varied activities, can be made clear by simply attending to the occasional references they make to this or that step in the process. It lies, for example, on the

14. Witness face of their expositions, that they of NT looked upon the Bib. history as teleo-Writers logical. Not only do they tell us that to This "whatsoever things were written afore-time were written for our learning, that through patience and through comfort of the scriptures we might have hope" (Rom 15 4; cf Rom 4 23.24); they speak also of the course of the historical events themselves as guided for our benefit: "Now these things happened unto them by way of example"—in a typical fashion, in such a way that, as they occurred, a typical character, or predictive reference impressed itself upon them; that is to say, briefly, the history occurred as it did in order to bear a message to us—"and they were written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the ages are come" (1 Cor 10 11; cf ver 6). Accordingly, it has become a commonplace of Bib. exposition that "the history of redemption itself is a typically progressive one" (Küper), and is "in a manner impregnated with the prophetic element," so as to form a "part of a great plan which stretches from the fall of man to the first consummation of all things in glory; and, in so far as it reveals the mind of God toward man, carries a respect to the future not less than to the present" (P. Fairbairn). It lies equally on the face of the NT allusions to the subject that its writers understood that the preparation of men to become vehicles of God's message to man was not of yesterday, but had its beginnings in the very origin of their being. The call by which Paul, for example, was made an apostle of Jesus Christ was sudden and apparently without antecedents; but it is precisely this Paul who reckons this call as only one step in a long process, the beginnings of which antedated his own existence: "But when it was the good pleasure of God, who separated me, even from my mother's womb, and called me through his grace, to reveal his Son in me" (Gal 1 15.16; cf Jer 1 5; Isa 49 1.5). The recognition by the writers of the NT of the experiences of God's grace, which had been vouchsafed to them as an integral element in their fitting to be the bearers of His gospel to others, finds such pervasive expression that the only difficulty is to select from the mass the most illustrative passages. Such a statement as Paul gives in the opening verses of 2 Cor is thoroughly typical. There he represents that he has been afflicted and comforted to the end that he might "be able to comfort them that are in any affliction, through the comfort wherewith" he had himself been "comforted of God." For, he explains, "Whether we are afflicted, it is for your comfort and salvation; or whether we are comforted, it is for your comfort, which worketh in the patient enduring of the same sufferings which we also suffer" (2 Cor 1 4-6). It is beyond question, therefore, that the NT writers, when they declare the Scriptures to be the product of the Divine breath, and explain this as meaning that the writers of these Scriptures wrote them only as borne by the Holy Spirit in such a fashion that they spoke, not out of themselves, but "from God," are thinking of this operation of the Spirit only as the final act of God in the production of the Scriptures, superinduced upon a long series of processes, providential, gracious, miraculous, by which the matter of Scripture had been prepared for writing, and the men for writing it, and the writing of it had been actually brought to pass. It is this final act in the production of Scripture which is technically called "inspiration"; and inspiration is thus brought before us as, in the minds of the writers of the NT, that particular operation of God in the production of Scripture which takes effect at the very point of the writing of Scripture—understanding the term “writing” here as inclusive of all the processes of the actual composition of Scripture, the investigation of documents, the collection of facts, the excogitation of conclusions, the adaptation of exhortations as means to ends and the like—with the effect of giving to the resultant Scripture a specifically supernatural character, and constituting it a Divine, as well as human, book. Obviously the mode of operation of this Divine activity moving to this result is conceived, in full accord with the analogy of the Divine operations in other spheres of its activity, in providence and in grace alike, as confluent with the human activities operative in the case; as, in a word, of the nature of what has come to be known as “immanent action.”

It will not escape observation that thus “inspiration” is made a mode of “revelation.” We are often exhorted, to be sure, to distinguish sharply between “inspiration” and “revelation”; and the exhortation is just when “revelation” is taken in one of its narrower senses, of, say, an external manifestation of God, or of an immediate communication from God in words. But “inspiration” does not differ from “revelation” in these narrowed senses as genus from genus, but as a species of one genus differs from another. That operation of God which we call “inspiration,” that is to say, that operation of the Spirit of God by which He “bears” men in the process of composing Scripture, so that they write, not of themselves, but “from God,” is one of the modes in which God makes known to men His being, His will, His operations, His purposes. It is as distinctly a mode of revelation as any mode of revelation can be, and therefore it performs the same office which all revelation performs, that is to say, in the express words of Paul, it makes men wise, and makes them wise unto salvation. All “special” or “supernatural” revelation (which is redemptive in its very idea, and occupies a place as a substantial element in God’s redemptive processes) has precisely this for its end; and Scripture, as a mode of the redemptive revelation of God, finds its fundamental purpose just in this: if the “inspiration” by which Scripture is produced renders it trustworthy and authoritative, it renders it trustworthy and authoritative only that it may the better serve to make men wise unto salvation. Scripture is conceived, from the point of view of the writers of the NT, not merely as the record of revelations, but as itself a part of the redemptive revelation of God; not merely as the record of the redemptive acts by which God is saving the world, but as itself one of these redemptive acts, having its own part to play in the great work of establishing and building up the kingdom of God. What gives it a place among the redemptive acts of God is its Divine origination, taken in its widest sense, as inclusive of all the Divine operations, providential, gracious and expressly supernatural, by which it has been made just what it is—a body of writings able to make wise unto salvation, and profitable for making the man of God perfect. What gives it its place among the modes of revelation is, however, specifically the culminating one of these Divine operations, which we call “inspiration”; that is to say, the action of the Spirit of God in so “bearing” its human authors in their work of producing Scripture, as that in these Scriptures they speak, not out of themselves, but “from God.” It is this act by virtue of which the Scriptures may properly be called “God-breathed.”

It has been customary among a certain school of writers to speak of the Scriptures, because thus “inspired,” as a Divine-human book, and to appeal to the analogy of Our Lord’s Divine-human personality to explain their peculiar qualities as such. The expression calls attention to an important fact, and the analogy holds good a certain distance. There are human and Divine sides to Scripture, and, as we cursorily examine it, we may perceive in it, alternately, traits which suggest now the one, now the other factor in its origin. But the analogy with Our Lord’s Divine-human personality may easily be pressed beyond reason. There is no hypostatic union between the Divine and the human in Scripture; we cannot parallel the “inspiration” of the Holy Spirit and the incarnation of the Son of God. The Scriptures are merely the product of Divine and human forces working together to produce a product in the production of which the human forces work under the initiation and prevalent direction of the Divine: the person of Our Lord unites in itself Divine and human natures, each of which retains its distinctness while operating only in relation to the other. Between such diverse things there can exist only a remote analogy; and, in point of fact, the analogy in the present instance amounts to no more than that in both cases Divine and human factors are involved, though very differently. In the one they unite to constitute a Divine-human person, in the other they cooperate to perform a Divine-human work. Even so distant an analogy may enable us, however, to recognize that as, in the case of Our Lord’s person, the human nature remains truly human while yet it can never fall into sin or error because it can never act out of relation with the Divine nature into conjunction with which it has been brought; so in the case of the production of Scripture by the conjoint action of human and Divine factors, the human factors have acted as human factors and have left their mark on the product as such, and yet cannot have fallen into that error which we say it is human to fall into, because they have not acted apart from the Divine factors, by themselves, but only under their unerring guidance.

16. Scriptures a Divine-Human Book?

The NT testimony is to the Divine origin and qualities of “Scripture”; and “Scripture” to the writers of the NT was fundamentally, of course, the OT. In the primary passage, in which we are told that Writers “every” or “all Scripture” is “God-breathed,” the direct reference is to the “sacred writings” which Timothy had had in knowledge since his infancy, and these were, of course, just the sacred books of the Jews (2 Tim 3 16). What is explicit here is implicit in all the allusions to inspired Scriptures in the NT. Accordingly, it is frequently said that our entire testimony to the inspiration of Scripture concerns the OT alone. In many ways, however, this is overstated. Our present concern is not with the extent of “Scripture” but with the nature of “Scripture”; and we cannot present here the considerations which justify extending to the NT the inspiration which the NT writers attribute to the OT. It will not be out of place, however, to point out simply that the NT writers obviously themselves made this extension. They do not for an instant imagine themselves, as ministers of a new covenant, less in possession of the Spirit of God than the ministers of the old covenant: they freely recognize, indeed, that they have no sufficiency of themselves, but they know that God has made them sufficient (2 Cor 3 5.6). They prosecute their work of proclaiming the gospel, therefore, in full confidence that they speak “by the Holy Spirit” (1 Pet 1 12), to whom they attribute both the “every” or “all Scripture” is “God-breathed,” the direct reference is to the “sacred writings” which Timothy had had in knowledge since his infancy, and these were, of course, just the sacred books of the Jews (2 Tim 3 16). What is explicit here is implicit in all the allusions to inspired Scriptures in the NT. Accordingly, it is frequently said that our entire testimony to the inspiration of Scripture concerns the OT alone. In many ways, however, this is overstated. Our present concern is not with the extent of “Scripture” but with the nature of “Scripture”; and we cannot present here the considerations which justify extending to the NT the inspiration which the NT writers attribute to the OT. It will not be out of place, however, to point out simply that the NT writers obviously themselves made this extension. They do not for an instant imagine themselves, as ministers of a new covenant, less in possession of the Spirit of God than the ministers of the old covenant: they freely recognize, indeed, that they have no sufficiency of themselves, but they know that God has made them sufficient (2 Cor 3 5.6). They prosecute their work of proclaiming the gospel, therefore, in full confidence that they speak “by the Holy Spirit” (1 Pet 1 12), to whom they attribute both the matter and form of their teaching (1 Cor 2 13). They, therefore, speak with the utmost assurance of their teaching (Gal 1 7.8); and they issue commands with the completest authority (1 Thess 4 2.14; 2 Thess 3 6.12), making it, indeed, the test of whether one has the Spirit that he should recognize what they demand as commandments of God (1 Cor 14 37). It would be strange, indeed, if these high claims were made for their oral teaching and commandments exclusively. In point of fact, they are made explicitly also for their written injunctions. It was "the things" which Paul was "writing," the recognition of which as commands of the Lord, he makes the test of a Spirit-led man (1 Cor 14 37). It is his "word by this epistle," obedience to which he makes the condition of Christian communion (2 Thess 3 14). There seems involved in such an attitude toward their own teaching, oral and written, a claim on the part of the NT writers to something very much like the "inspiration" which they attribute to the writers of the OT.

And all doubt is dispelled when we observe the NT writers placing the writings of one another in the same category of "Scripture" with the

18. Inclusion of NT books of the OT. The same Paul who, in 2 Tim 3 16, declared that 'every' or 'all scripture is God-breathed' had already written in 1 Tim 5 18: "For the scripture saith, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn. And, The laborer is worthy of his hire." The first clause here is derived from Dt and the second from the Gospel of Lk, though both are cited as together constituting, or better, forming part of the "Scripture" which Paul adduces as so authoritative as by its mere citation to end all strife. Who shall say that, in the declaration of the later ep. that "all" or "every" Scripture is God-breathed, Paul did not have Lk, and, along with Lk, whatever other new books he classed with the old under the name of Scripture, in the back of his mind, along with those old books which Timothy had had in his hands from infancy? And the same Peter who declared that every 'prophecy of scripture' was the product of men who spoke "from God," being 'borne' by the Holy Ghost (2 Pet 1 21), in this same ep. (3 16), places Paul's Epp. in the category of Scripture along with whatever other books deserve that name. For Paul, says he, wrote these epp., not out of his own wisdom, but "according to the wisdom given to him," and though there are some things in them hard to be understood, yet it is only "the ignorant and unstedfast" who wrest these difficult passages—as what else could be expected of men who wrest "also the other Scriptures" (obviously the OT is meant)—"unto their own destruction"? Is it possible to say that Peter could not have had these epp. of Paul also lurking somewhere in the back of his mind, along with "the other scriptures," when he told his readers that every "prophecy of scripture" owes its origin to the prevailing operation of the Holy Ghost? What must be understood in estimating the testimony of the NT writers to the inspiration of Scripture is that "Scripture" stood in their minds as the title of a unitary body of books, throughout the gift of God through His Spirit to His people; but that this body of writings was at the same time understood to be a growing aggregate, so that what is said of it applies to the new books which were being added to it as the Spirit gave them, as fully as to the old books which had come down to them from their hoary past. It is a mere matter of detail to determine precisely what new books were thus included by them in the category "Scripture." They tell us some of them themselves. Those who received them from their hands tell us of others. And when we put the two bodies of testimony together we find that they constitute just our NT. It is no pressure of the witness of the writers of the NT to the inspiration of the Scripture, therefore, to look upon it as covering the entire body of "Scriptures," the new books which they were themselves adding to this aggregate, as well as the old books which they had received as Scripture from the fathers. Whatever can lay claim by just right to the appellation of "Scripture," as employed in its eminent sense by those writers, can by the same just right lay claim to the "inspiration" which they ascribe to this "Scripture."

BENJAMIN B. WARFIELD

INSTANT, in'stant, INSTANTLY, in'stant-li: Derivative from Lat instare. Found in Eng. with various meanings from the 15th cent. to the present time.

Instant is used once in Isa 29 5 in the sense of immediate time; elsewhere in the sense of urgent, pressing; Lk 23 23, where "were instant" is the AV tr of the vb. ἐπέκειντο, epékeinto; Rom 12 12, where it is involved in the vb. προσκαρτερέω, proskartereō; cf Acts 6 4. In 2 Tim 4 2 it stands for the expressive vb. ἐπιστήθη, epistēthi, "stand to."

Instantly (urgently, stedfastly) is the AV rendering of two different Gr phrases, σπουδαίως, spondaiōs, found in Lk 7 4; and ἐν ἐκτενείᾳ, en ekte-neia, in Acts 26 7. In both cases ARV renders "earnestly."

RUSSELL BENJAMIN MILLER

INSTRUCTION, in-struk'shun. See CATECHIST; EDUCATION; SCHOOL.

INSTRUMENT, in'stroō-ment (כְּלִי, k'li; in Gr pl. ὅπλα, hōpla, Rom 6 13): The word in the OT is used for utensils for service, chiefly in connection with the sanctuary (cf Ex 25 9; Nu 4 12.26.32; 1 K 19 21; 1 Ch 9 29; 2 Ch 4 16, AV); for weapons of war (1 S 8 12; 1 Ch 12 33.37, etc); notably for musical instruments. See MUSIC. The members of the body are described by Paul (Rom 6 13) as "instruments" to be used in the service of righteousness, as before they were in the service of unrighteousness.

INSTRUMENTS OF MUSIC (שְׁלִישִׁים, shālīshim): Thus RV and AV (1 S 18 6), RVm "triangles" or "three-stringed instruments." See Music.

INSURRECTION, in-su-rek'shun: The word in Ps 64 2 AV is changed in RV into "tumult"; in Ezr 4 19 (vb.) it represents the Aram. נָסָא, n'sā, to "lift up oneself." In the NT στάσις, stásis, is rendered "insurrection" in Mk 15 7 AV (where of the vb. "made insurrection"), but in Lk 23 19.25 "sedition." RV correctly renders "insurrection" throughout; also in Acts 24 5 "insurrections" for AV "sedition."

INTEGRITY, in-teg'ri-ti (יָחַד, tōm, יִשְׁרָיִם, tummāh): The tr of tōm, "simplicity," "soundness," "completeness," rendered also "upright," "perfection." Its original sense appears in the phrase l'tōm (1 K 22 34; 2 Ch 18 33), "A certain man drew his bow at a venture," m "Heb. in his simplicity" (cf 2 S 15 11, "in their simplicity"). It is tr<sup>d</sup> "integrity" (Gen 20 5.6; 1 K 9 4; Ps 7 8; 25 21; 26 1.11; 41 12; 78 72; Prov 19 1; 20 7), in all which places it seems to carry the meaning of simplicity, or sincerity of heart and intention, truthfulness, uprightness. In the pl. (tummim) it is one of the words on the breastplate of the high priest (Ex 28 30; Dt 33 8; Ezr 2 63; Neh 7 65), one of the sacred lots, indicating, perhaps, "innocence" or "integrity" (LXX alēthēa). See URIM AND THUMMIM. Another word tr<sup>d</sup> "integrity" is tummāh, from tāmam, "to complete," "be upright," "perfect," only in Job 2 3.9; 27 5; 31 6; Prov 11 3.

The word "integrity" does not occur in the NT, but its equivalents may be seen in "sincerity," "truth," the "pure heart," the "single eye," etc. In the above sense of simplicity of intention it is equivalent to being honest, sincere, genuine, and is fundamental to true character.

INTELLIGENCE, in-tel'i-gens (בֵּין, bīn): Occurs only once in AV as the tr of bīn, "to discriminate" (frequently tr<sup>d</sup> "to understand"), in Dnl 11 30 AV, "[he shall] have intelligence with them that forsake the holy covenant," RV renders "have regard unto them." "Intelligence" occurs in 2 Macc 3 9 AV, in the sense of information (so RV).

INTEND, in-tend', INTENT, in-tent': Early Eng. words derived from Lat and used in AV, sometimes in RV, to translate a number of different expressions of the original.

Intend is sometimes used in Eng. in the literal sense of Lat intendere, "to stretch," but in the Eng. Bible it is used only of the direction of the mind toward an object. Sometimes it is used of mere design (μελλω, mellō), Acts 5 35 AV; 20 13; or of desired action (θέλω, thelō), Lk 14 28 AV; again of a fixed purpose (βούλομαι, boulomai), Acts 5 28; 12 4; or, finally, of a declared intention (amar), Josh 22 33 AV; 2 Ch 28 13 AV.

Intent is used only of purpose, and is the tr sometimes of a conjunction (l'bha'abbār), 2 S 17 14; (l'ma'an), 2 K 10 19; (iva, hina), Eph 3 10; sometimes of an infinitive of purpose, 1 Cor 10 6; or of a preposition with pronoun (eis touto, eis touto), Acts 9 21, and sometimes of a subst. (λόγος, lógos), Acts 10 29. This variety of original expressions represented in the Eng. by single terms is an interesting illustration of the extent of interpretation embodied in our Eng. Bible.

INTERCESSION, in-ter-sesh'un (פָּגַח, pāgha', "to make intercession"; originally "to strike upon," or "against"; then in a good sense, "to assail anyone with petitions," "to urge," and when on behalf of another, "to intercede" [Ruth 1 16; Jer 7 16; 27 18; Job 21 15; Gen 23 8; Isa 53 12; Jer 36 25]. A similar idea is found in ἐντεύξις, énteuxis, used as "petition," and in the NT "intercession." The Eng. word is derived from Lat intercedo, "to come between," which strangely has the somewhat opposed meanings of "obstruct" and "to interpose on behalf of" a person, and finally "to intercede." The growth of meaning in this word in the various languages is highly suggestive. In the Gr NT we find the word in 1 Tim 2 1; 4 5; ἐντυχάνω, entugchánō, is also found in Rom 8 26-34):

The meaning of the word is determined by its use in 1 Tim 2 1, "I exhort, therefore, first of all, that supplications, prayers, intercessions, thanksgivings, be made for all men"; where the different kinds of prayers appear to be distinguished.

Considerable discussion has arisen on the exact meaning of these words. Augustine refers them to the liturgy of the Eucharist. This seems to be importing the significance of the various parts of the ceremony as observed at a time much later than the date of the passage in question. "Supplications" and "prayers" refer to general and specific petitions; "intercessions" will then have the meaning of a request concerning others.

Intercession is prayer on behalf of another, and naturally arises from the instinct of the human heart—not merely prompted by affection and interest, but recognizing that God's relation to man is not merely individual, but social. Religion thus involves man's relations to his fellow-man, just as in man's social position intercession with one on behalf of another is a common incident, becoming, in the development of society, the function of appointed officials; as in legal and courtly procedure, so in religion, the spontaneous and affectionate prayer to God on behalf of another grows into the regular and orderly service of a duly appointed priesthood. Intercession is thus to be regarded: (1) as the spontaneous act of man for his fellow-man; (2) the official act of developed sacerdotalism; (3) the perfecting of the natural movement of humanity, and the typified function of priesthood in the intercession of Christ and the Holy Spirit.

I. Man's Intercession for His Fellow-Man.—Many such prayers are recorded in Scripture. The sacrificial act of Noah may have been partly of this nature, for it is followed by a promise of God on behalf of the race and the earth at large (Gen 8 20-22). Such also is Abraham's prayer for Ishmael (Gen 17 18); Abraham's prayer for Sodom (Gen 18 23-33); Abraham for Abimelech (Gen 20 17). Jacob's blessing of Joseph's sons is of the nature of intercession (Gen 48 8-23). His dying blessing of his sons is hardly to be regarded as intercessory; it is, rather, declarative, although in the case of Joseph it approaches intercession. The absence of distinct intercessory prayer from Abraham to Moses is to be observed, and shows how intensely personal and individual the religious consciousness was still in its undeveloped quality. In Moses, however, the social element finds a further development, and is interesting as taking up the spirit of the Father of the Faithful. Moses is the creator of the national spirit. He lifts religion from its somewhat selfish character in the patriarchal life to the higher and wider plane of a national and racial fellowship.

The progressive character of the Divine leading of man is found thus in the development of the inter-

2. Inter-cessory spirit, e.g. Moses' prayer for the removal of plagues (Ex 15 25 f); for water at Rephidim (17 4); for victory over Amalek (17 8-16); prayer for the people after the golden calf (Ex 32 11-14, 21-34; 33 12 f); after the renewal of the tables of stone (34 9); at the setting forth and stopping of the Ark (Nu 10 35 f); after the burning at Taberah (Nu 11 2); for the healing of Miriam's leprosy (12 13); after the return of the spies (14 13-19); after the destruction by serpents (Nu 21 7); for direction in the case of the daughters of Zelophehad (27 5); for a successor (27 15); recital of his prayer for the people for their entrance into Canaan (Dt 3 23 f); recital of his prayer for the people after the worship of the golden calf (9 18 ff); recital of prayers for the rebellious people (Dt 9 25-29); a command to him who pays his third-year tithes to offer prayer for the nation (26 15); Moses' final blessing of the tribes (Dt 33).

This extensive series of the intercessory prayers of Moses forms a striking illustration of the growth

3. The of religion, represented by the founder of the national life of Israel. It is the history of an official, but it is also the history of a leader whose heart was filled with the intensest patriotism and regard for his fellows. None of these prayers are perfunctory. They are the vivid and passionate utterances of a man full of Divine enthusiasm and human affection. They are real prayers wrung from a great and devout soul on occasions of deep and critical importance. Apart from their importance in the history of Israel, they are a noble record of a great leader of men and servant of God.

In the history of Joshua we find only the prayer for the people after the sin of Achan (Josh 7 6-9), although the communications from God to Joshua are numerous. A faint intercessory note may be heard in Deborah's song (Jgs 5 31), though it is almost silenced by the stern and warlike tone of the poem. Gideon's prayer seems to reach something of the words of Moses (Jgs 6 13), and accords with the national and religious spirit of the great leader who helped in the formation of the religious life of his people (see Jgs 6 24), notwithstanding the evident lower plane on which he stood (Jgs 8 27), which may account partially for the apostasy after his death (Jgs 8 33 f). Manoa's prayers (Jgs 13) may be noted. (The satisfaction of Micah at securing a priest for his house, and the subsequent story, belong rather to the history of official intercession [Jgs 18; see below], as also the inquiry of the people through Phinehas at Shiloh [Jgs 20 27 f], and the people's mourning and prayer [Jgs 21 2 f].)

5. The Rise of Official Intercession

Samuel is the real successor of Moses, and in connection with his life intercession again appears more distinct and effective. Hannah's song, though chiefly of thankfulness, is not without the intercessory spirit (1 S 2 1-11). So also of Samuel's prayer at Mizpeh (1 S 7 5), and the recognition by the people of Samuel's place (1 S 7 8 f; see also 8 6, 21; 10 17-25; 12 19) (for the custom of inquiring of the Lord through a seer see 1 S 9 6-10); Samuel's prayer for Saul (1 S 15 11);

6. Samuel as an Inter-cessor in His Functions as Judge, Priest and Prophet

Saul's failure to secure inquiry of God, even through intercession (1 S 28 6); Saul's final appeal through the witch of Endor (1 S 28 7-20); David's prayer to God (2 S 7 18); David's prayer for deliverance of the people from pestilence (2 S 24 17); Solomon's prayer for wisdom to govern the people (1 K 3 5-15); Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the temple (1 K 8 12-61); Jeroboam's appeal to the man of God to pray for the healing of his hand (1 K 13 6); Elijah's prayer for the widow's son (1 K 17 20); Elijah's prayer for rain (1 K 18 42); Elisha's prayer for the widow's son (2 K 4 33); Elisha's prayer for the opening of the young man's eyes (2 K 6 17); Hezekiah's appeal to Isaiah (2 K 19 4); Hezekiah's prayer (2 K 19 14-19); Josiah's command for prayer concerning the "book that is found" (2 K 22 13). In Ch we find David's prayer for his house (1 Ch 17 16-27); David's prayer for deliverance from the plague (21 17); David's prayer for the people and for Solomon at the offering of gifts for the temple (29 10-19); Solomon's prayer at the consecration of the temple (2 Ch 6 1-42); Asa's prayer (14 11); Jehoshaphat's prayer (2 Ch 20 5-13); Hezekiah's prayer for the people who had not prepared to eat the Passover (2 Ch 30 18); Josiah's command for prayer concerning the book (34 21). In the Prophets we note Ezra's prayer (Ezr 9 5-15); Nehemiah's prayer (Neh 1 5-11); the prayer of the Levites for the nation (Neh 9 4-38).

The poetic books furnish a few examples of intercessory prayer. Job's intercession for his children (Job 1 5); Job's regret at the absence of intercession (Job 16 21); the Lord's command that Job should pray for his friends (Job 42 8). It is remarkable that the references to intercession in the Ps are few; but it must not be forgotten that the psalm is generally a lyrical expression of an intense subjective condition. This does not seem in the consciousness of Israel to have reached an altruistic development. The Ps express very powerfully the sense of obligation to God, consciousness of sin, indignation against the sin of others. Occasionally the patriotic spirit leads to prayer for Israel; but only rarely does any deep sense of interest in the welfare of others appear to possess the hearts of Israel's singers. In Ps 2 12 there is a hint of the intercessory office of the Son, which reflects, perhaps, the growth of the Messianic spirit in the mind of Israel; Ps 20 is intercessional; it is the prayer of a people for their king. In Ps 25 22 we find a prayer for the redemption of Israel, as in Ps 28 9. In Ps 35 13 the Psalmist refers to his intercession for others. But the "prayer returned into mine own bosom," and the final issue of the prayer becomes rather denunciatory than intercessional. The penitence of Ps 51 rises into a note of prayer for the city (ver 18). Sometimes (Ps 60, and perhaps Ps 67), the prayer is not individual but for the community, though even there it is hardly intercession. A common necessity makes a common prayer. In Ps 69 there is the recognition of the injury that folly and sin may do to others, and a kind of compensatory note of intercession is heard. Ps 72 is regarded by some as the royal father's prayer for his son and successor, but the reading of the title adopted by RV takes even this psalm from the category of intercession. In Asaph's Maschil (Ps 74), intercession is more distinct; it is a prayer for the sanctuary and the people in their desolation and calamity. Asaph appears to have caught something of the spirit of Moses, as in Ps 79 he again prays for the deliverance of Jerus; while a faint echo of the intercessory plea for the nation is heard in Ethan's psalm (Ps 89). It sounds faintly in Ps 106. In Ps 122 we seem to breathe a larger and more liberal spirit. It contains the appeal to pray for the peace of Jerus (ver 6), as if the later thought of Israel had begun to expand beyond the mere limits of personal penitence, or desire for deliverance, or denunciation of the enemy. In one of the Songs of Degrees (Ps 135), there is the somewhat severely ethical prayer: "Do good, O Jeh, unto those that are good." The yearning for the salvation of man as man has not yet been born. The Christ must come before the fullness of Divine love is shed abroad in the hearts even of the pious. This comparative absence of intercessory prayer from the service-book of Israel, and its collected expressions of spiritual experience, is instructive. We find continued references to those who needed prayer; but for the most part these references are descriptive of their wickedness, or denunciatory of their hostility to the Psalmist. The Book of Pss is thus a striking commentary on the growth of Israel's spiritual life. Intense as it is in its perception of God and His claim on human righteousness, it is only when the supreme revelation of Divine love and the regard for universal man has appeared in the person of Our Lord that the large and loving spirit which intercession signifies is found in the experience and expressions of the pious.

In the Wisdom books there is little, if any, reference to intercession. But they deal rather with ethical character, and often on a merely providential and utilitarian basis. It is noticeable that the only reference to pleading a cause is said to be by the Lord Himself as against the injustice of man (Prov 22 23): "Jeh will plead their [the poor's] cause." Action on behalf of others does not appear to have been very highly regarded by the current ethics of the Israelite.

8. The Wisdom Books

A kind of negative helpfulness is indicated in Prov 24 28: "Be not a witness against thy neighbor without cause"; and it is significant that the office of advocate was not known among the Jews until they had come under the authority of Rome, when, not knowing the forms of Rom law, they were obliged to secure the aid of a Rom lawyer before the courts. Such practitioners were found in the provinces (Cic. pro Coelio c. 30); Tertullus (Acts 24 1) was such an advocate.

In the prophetic books the note of intercession reappears. The prophet, though primarily a messenger from God to man, has also something of the character of the intercessor (see Isaiah's call, Isa 6).

9. The Prophets' Succession to Moses and Samuel

25, 26 exhibit the intercessory characteristics. The request of Hezekiah for the prayers of Isaiah (Isa 37 4), and the answer of the Lord implied in ver 6, recall the constantly recurring service of Moses to the people. Hezekiah himself becomes an intercessor (vs 14-21). In Jer 4 10 intercession is mingled with the words of the messenger. The sin of the people hinders such prayers as were offered on their behalf (Jer 7 16; cf 11 14; 14 11). Intercessory prayers are found in Jer 10 23 ff; 14 7 ff. 19-22. The message of Zedekiah requesting Jeremiah's help is perhaps an instance of seer-inquiry as much as intercession (Jer 21 1 f; cf 1 S 9 19). In Jer 42 4, the prophet consents to the request of Johanan to seek the Lord on behalf of the people. The Book of Lam is naturally conceived in a more constantly recurring spirit of intercession. In the prophecies Jeremiah has been the messenger of God to the people. But, after the catastrophe, in his sorrow he appeals to God for mercy upon them (Lam 2 20; 5 1.19). Ezekiel in the same way is rather the seer of visions and the prophetic representative of God. Yet at times he appeals to God for the people (Ezk 9 8; 11 13). In Dnl we find the intercession of his three friends sought for in order to secure the revelation of the king's dream (Dnl 2 17); and Daniel's prayer for Jerus and her people (Dnl 9 16-19).

In the Minor Prophets intercession rarely appears; even in the graphic pictures of Jonah, though the work itself shows the enlarging of the conception of God's relation to humanity outside of Israel, the prophet himself exhibits no tenderness and utters no pleas for the city against which he had been sent to prophesy, and receives the implied rebuke from the Lord for his want of sympathy, caring more for the perished gourd than for the vast population of Nineveh, whom the Lord, however, pitied and spared (Jon 4). Even the sublime prayer of Hab 3 has only a suggestion of intercession. Zec 6 13 relieves the general severity of the prophetic message, consisting of the threatenings of judgment, by the gleam of the promise of a royal priest whose office was partially that of an intercessor, though the picture is darkened by the character of the priesthood and the people, whose services had been selfish, without mercy and compassion (Zec 7 4.7). Now the spirit of tenderness, the larger nature, the loving heart, are to be restored to Israel (Zec 8 16-23). Other nations than Israel will share in the mercy of God. In Mal 2 7 we find the priest rebuked for the loss of his intercessory character.

How far intercession was regarded as a special duty of the priesthood it is not very easy to determine. The priestly office itself

10. The Priest and Intercession individual, and certainly in the national functions, both of the regular and the occasional ceremonies, the priest represented the individual or the community. In Joel 2 17 the priests are distinctly bidden to "weep between the porch and the altar, and let them say, Spare thy people, O Jeh." Mal 1 9 appeals to them for intercession to God, and the graphic scene in 1 Macc 7 33-38 shows the priests interceding on behalf of the people against Nicanor.

In the NT, all prayer necessarily takes a new form from its relation to Our Lord, and in this intercessory prayer shares. At the outset, 11. Intercession in those "which despitely use you" the Gospels (Mt 5 44 AV). How completely does this change the entire spirit of prayer!

We breathe a new atmosphere of the higher revelation of love. The Lord's Prayer (Mt 6 9-13) is of this character. Its initial word is social, domestic; prayer is the address of children to the Father. Even though some of the petitions are not original, yet their place in the prayer, and the general tone of the Master's teaching, exhibit the social and altruistic spirit, not so pervasive of the older dispensation. "Thy kingdom come" leads the order of petitions, with its essentially intercessory character. The forgiveness of others, which is the measure and plea of our own forgiveness, brings even those who have wronged us upon the same plane as ourselves, and if the plea be genuine, how can we refuse to pray for them? And if for our enemies, then surely for our friends. In Mt 7 11 f, the good things sought of the Father are to be interpreted as among those that if we desire from others we should do to them. And from this spirit the intercessory prayer cannot be absent. We find the spirit of intercession in the pleas of those who sought Christ's help for their friends, which He was always so quick to recognize: the centurion for his servant (Mt 8 13); the friends of the paralytic (Mt 9 2-6), where the miracle was wrought on the ground of the friends' faith. Of a similar character are the requests of the woman for her child and the Lord's response (Mt 15 28); of the man for his lunatic son (17 14-21). There is the suggestion of the intercessory spirit in the law of trespass, specifically followed by the promise of the answer to the prayer of the two or three, agreed and in fellowship (Mt 18 15-20), with the immediately attached precepts of forgiveness (vs 21-35). A remarkable instance of intercession is recorded in Mt 20 20-23, where the mother of Zebedee's sons makes a request on behalf of her children; the added expression, "worshipping him," raises the occasion into one of intercessory prayer. Our Lord's rebuke is not to the prayer, but to its unwisdom.

It is needless to review the cases in the other Gospels. But the statement of Mk 6 5 f, that Christ could not perform mighty works because of unbelief, sheds a flood of light upon one of the important conditions of successful intercession, when contrasted with the healing conditioned by the faith of others than the healed. One of the most distinct examples of intercessory prayer is that of the Lord's intercession for Peter (Lk 22 31 f), and for those who crucified Him (Lk 23 34). The place of intercession in the work of Christ is seen clearly in Our Lord's intercessory prayer (see INTERCESSION OF CHRIST), where it is commanded by definite precept and promise of acceptance. The promise of the answer to prayer in the name of Christ is very definite (Jn 16 24). Christ's high-priestly prayer is the sublimest height of prayer to God and is intercessory throughout (Jn 17); Jn 16 26 does not, as some have held, deny His intercession for His disciples; it only throws open the approach to God Himself.

Acts introduces us to the working of the fresh elements which Christ gave to life. Hence the prayers of the church become Christian prayers, involving the wider outlook on others and on the world at large which Christianity has bestowed on men. The prayer of the assembled believers upon the liberation of the apostles breathes this spirit (Acts 4 24-30). The consecrating prayer for the seven was probably intercessory (Acts 6 6; cf Acts 1 24). How pathetic is the plea of Stephen for his murderers (Acts 7 60)! How natural is intercession (Acts 8 24)! Peter at Joppa (Acts 9 40); the church making prayer without ceasing for Peter (Acts 12 5, 12); the prayer for Barnabas and Saul at Antioch (Acts 13 3); Paul and Barnabas praying for the churches (Acts 14 23); the church at Antioch commending Paul and Silas to the grace of God (Acts 15 40); Paul and the elders of Ephesus (Acts 20 36), are all examples, more or less defined, of intercessory prayer.

In the Epp. we may expect to find intercession more distinctly filled with the relation of prayer through Christ. Paul gives us many examples in his Epp.: for the Romans (Rom 1 9); the Spirit's interceding (8 27); Paul's prayer for his race (10 1); his request for prayers (15 30); the help that he found from the prayer of his friends (2 Cor 1 11); prayer for the Corinthian church (2 Cor 13 7); for the Ephesians (Eph 1 16-23; 3 14-21; see also Eph 6 18; Phil 1 3-11, 19; Col 1 3, 9; 4 3; 1 Thess 1 2; 5 23, 25; 2 Thess 1 2); a definite command that intercession be made for all men and for kings and those in authority (1 Tim 2 1, 2); his prayer for Timothy (2 Tim 1 3); for Philemon (ver 4); and prayer to be offered for the sick by the elders of the church (Jas 5 14-18; see also He 13 18-21; 1 Jn 5 14 ff).

II. Intercession Perfected in Christ's Office and in the Church.—This review of the intercession of the Scriptures prepares us for the development of a specific office of intercession, perfectly realized in Christ. We have seen Moses complying with the people's request to represent them before God. In a large and generous spirit the leader of Israel intercedes with God for his nation. It was natural that this striking example of intercessory prayer should be followed by other leaders, and that the gradually developed system of religious worship should furnish the conception of the priest, and esp. the high priest, as the intercessor for those who came to the sacrifice. This was particularly the significance of the great Day of Atonement, when after offering for himself, the high priest offered the sacrifice for the whole people. This official act, however, does not do away with the intercessory character of prayer as offered by men. We have seen how it runs through the whole history of Israel. But it is found much more distinctly in the Christian life and apparently in the practice of the Christian assembly itself. Paul continually refers to his own intercessory prayers, and seeks for a similar service on his own behalf from those to whom he writes. Intercession is thus based upon the natural tendency of the heart filled by love and a deep sympathetic sense of relation to others. Christ's intercessory prayer is the highest example and pattern of this form of prayer. His intercessions for His disciples, for His crucifiers, are recorded, and the sacred record rises to the supreme height in the prayer of Jn 17. In this prayer the following characteristics are to be found: (1) It is based upon the intimate relation of Jesus to the Father. This gives to such prayer its justification; may it be said, its right. (2) It follows the completest fulfilment of duty. It is not the mere expression of desire, even for others. It is the crown of effort on their behalf. He has revealed God to His disciples. He has given to them God's words; therefore He prays for them (Jn 17 6, 7-9). (3) It recognizes the Divine, unbroken relation to the object of the prayer: "I am no more in the world, and these are in the world, and I come to Thee. Holy Father, keep," etc (ver 11). (4) The supreme end of the prayer is salvation from the evil of the world (ver 15). (5) The wide sweep of the prayer and its chief objects—unity with God, and the presence with Christ, and the indwelling of the Divine love. The prayer is a model for all intercessory prayer. See, further, INTERCESSION OF CHRIST; PRAYERS OF CHRIST; OFFICES OF CHRIST.

III. Intercession of the Holy Spirit.—In connection with the subject of intercession, there arises a most interesting question as to whether the Holy Spirit is not presented in Scriptures as an intercessor. The text in which the doctrine seems to be taught is that of Rom 8 26 f: "In like manner the Spirit also helpeth our infirmity: for we know not how to pray as we ought; but the Spirit himself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered; and he that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because he maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God." By far the larger number of expositors have understood by the Spirit, the Holy Spirit. The older commentators, in general, refer to the Holy Spirit. Tholuck, Ewald, Philippi, Meyer, most of the Amer. theologians and Eng. commentators, as Shedd, Alford, Jowett, Wordsworth, interpret it in the same way. Lange and Olshausen refer it to the human spirit. Undoubtedly the "groanings" have led to the denial of the reference to the Holy Spirit. But the very form of the word trá "helpeth" indicates coöperation, and this must be of something other than the spirit of man himself. The undoubted difficulties of the passage, which are strongly urged by Lange (see Lange's Comm. on Rom 8 26), must be acknowledged. At the same time the statement seems to be very clear and definite. An explanation has been given that the Holy Spirit is here referred to as dwelling in us, and thus making intercession. The Divine Spirit is said to be a Spirit of supplication (Zec 12 10). The distinction which is made between the intercession of Christ in heaven in His priestly office and that of the Holy Spirit interceding within the souls of believers, referred to by Shedd (see Comm. on Rom), must be carefully used, for if pressed to its extreme it would lead to the materialization and localization of the Divine nature. Moreover, may not the intercession of Our Lord be regarded as being partially exemplified in that of the Spirit whom He has declared to be His agent and representative? If Christ dwells in believers by His Spirit, His intercession, esp. if subjective in and with their spirits, may properly be described as the intercession of the Holy Ghost. LL. D. BEVAN

INTERCESSION OF CHRIST: The general conception of Our Lord's mediatorial office is specially summed up in His intercession in which He appears in His high-priestly office, and also as interceding with the Father on behalf of that humanity whose cause He had espoused.

The function of priesthood as developed under Judaism involved the position of mediation between man and God. The priest represented man, and on man's behalf Intercession approached God; thus he offered sacrifice, interceded and gave to the offerer Viewed whom he represented the benediction Its Priestly and expression of the Divine acceptance. Aspect (For the various forms of these offerings, see special articles.) As in sacrifice, so in the work of Christ, we find the proprietary rights of the offerer in the sacrifice. For man, Christ as one with man, and yet in His own personal right, offers Himself (see Rom 5; and cf Gal 4 5 with He 2 11). There was also the transfer of guilt and its conditions, typically by laying the hand on the head of the animal, which then bore the sins of the offerer and was presented to God by the priest. The acknowledgment of sin and the surrender to God is completely fulfilled in Christ's offering of Himself, and His death (cf Lev 3 2.8.13; 16 21; with Isa 53 6; 2 Cor 5 21). Our Lord's intercessory quality in the sacrifice of Himself is not only indicated by the imputation of guilt to Him as representing the sinner, but also in the victory of His life over death, which is then given to man in God's acceptance of His representative and substitute.

In the Ep. to the He, the intercessory character of Our Lord's high-priestly office is transferred to the heavenly condition and work of Christ, where the relation of Christ's work to man's condition is regarded as being still continued in the heavenly place (see He 9 11-28). This entrance into heaven is once for all, and in the person of the high priest the way is open to the very presence of God. From one point of view (He 10 12) the priestly service of the Lord was concluded and gathered up into His kingly office (vs 13.14-18). But from another point of view, we ourselves are bidden to enter into the Holiest Place; as if in union with Christ we too become a kingly priesthood (He 10 19-22; and cf 1 Pet 2 9).

It must not be forgotten, however, that this right of entrance into the most Holy Place is one that depends entirely upon our vital union with Christ. He appears in heaven for us and we with Him, and in this sense He fulfils the second duty of His high-priestly office as intercessor, with the added conception drawn from the legal advocacy of the Rom court. The term tr<sup>d</sup> "Advocate" in 1 Jn 2 2 is παράκλητος, paraklētos, which in Jn 14 16 is tr<sup>d</sup> "Comforter." The word is of familiar use in Gr for the legal advocate or patronus who appeared on behalf of his client. Thus, in the double sense of priestly and legal representative, Our Lord is our intercessor in Heaven.

Of the modes in which Christ carries out His intercessory office, we can have no knowledge except so far as we may fairly deduce them from the phraseology and suggested ideas of Scripture. As high priest, it may surely be right for us to aid our weak faith by assuring ourselves that Our Lord pleads for us, while at the same time we must be careful not to deprave our thought concerning the glorified Lord by the metaphors and analogies of earthly relationship.

The intercessory work of Christ may thus be represented: He represents man before God in His perfect nature, His exalted office and His completed work. The Scripture word for this is (He 9 24) "to appear before the face of God for us." There is also an active intercession. This is the office of Our Lord as advocate or paraklētos. That this conveys some relation to the aid which one who has broken the law receives from an advocate cannot be overlooked, and we find Christ's intercession in this aspect brought into connection with the texts which refer to justification and its allied ideas (see Rom 8 34; 1 Jn 2 1).

In PRAYERS OF CHRIST (q.v.), the intercessory character of many of Our Lord's prayers, and esp. that of Jn 17, is considered. And it has been impossible for Christian Intercessory thought to divest itself of the idea Work from that the heavenly intercession of Christ the Stand- is of the order of prayer. It is im- point of possible for us to know; and even if Prayer Christ now prays to the Father, it can be in no way analogous to earthly prayers. The thought of some portion of Christendom distinctly combined prayer in the heavenly work of the Lord. There is danger in extreme views. Scriptural expressions must not be driven too far, and, on the other hand, they must not be emptied of all their contents. Modern Protestant teaching has, in its protest against a merely physical conception of Our Lord's state and occupation in heaven, almost sublimed reality from His intercessory work. In Lutheran teaching the intercession of Our Lord was said to be "vocal," "verbal" and "oral." It has been well remarked that such forms of prayer require flesh and blood, and naturally the teachers of the Reformed churches, for the most part, have contented themselves (as for example Hodge, Syst. Theol., II, 593) with the declaration that "the intercession of Christ includes: (1) His appearing before God in our behalf, as the sacrifice for our sins, as our high priest, on the ground of whose work we receive the remission of our sins, the gift of the Holy Spirit, and all needed good; (2) defence against the sentence of the law and the charges of Satan, who is the great accuser; (3) His offering Himself as our surety, not only that the demands of justice shall be shown to be satisfied, but that His people shall be obedient and faithful; (4) the oblation of the persons of the redeemed, sanctifying their prayers, and all their services, rendering them acceptable to God, through the savor of his own merits."

Even this expression of the elements which constitute the intercession of the Lord, cautious and spiritual as it is in its application to Christian thought and worship, must be carefully guarded from a too complete and materialistic use. Without this care, worship and devout thought may become degraded and fall into the mechanical forms by which Our Lord's position of intercessor has been reduced to very little more than an imaginative and spectacular process which goes on in some heavenly place. It must not be forgotten that the metaphorical and symbolic origin of the ideas which constitute Christ's intercession is always in danger of dominating and materializing the spiritual reality of His intercessional office. LL. D. BEVAN

INTEREST, in'tér-est (ἰσχυρῶς, neshekh, נֶשֶׁחַ, mashshā'; τόκος, tókos): The Heb word neshekh is from a root which means "to bite"; thus interest is "something bitten off." The other word, mashshā', means "lending on interest." The Gr term is from the root tiktō, "to produce" or "beget," hence interest is something begotten or produced by money. The Heb words are usually tr<sup>d</sup> "usury," but this meant the same as interest, all interest being reckoned as usury.

Long before Abraham's time money had been loaned at a fixed rate of interest in Babylonia and almost certainly in Egypt. The CH gives regulations regarding the lending and borrowing of money, the usual interest being 20 per cent. Sometimes it was only 11½ and 13½, as shown by contract tablets. In one case, if the loan was not paid in two months, 18 per cent interest would be charged.

Corn, dates, onions, etc., were loaned at interest. Thus Moses and Israel would be familiar with commercial loans and interest. In Israel there was no system of credit or commercial loans in Moses' time and after. A poor man borrowed because he was poor. The law of Moses (Ex 22 25) forbade loaning at interest. There was to be no creditor and no taker of interest among them (Lev 25 36.37). Dt permits them to lend on interest to a foreigner (Dt 23 19.20), but not to a brother Israelite. That this was considered the proper thing in Israel for centuries is seen in Ps 15 5, while Prov 28 8 implies that it was an unusual thing, interest being generally exacted and profit made. Ezekiel condemns it as a heinous sin (Ezk 18 8.13.17) and holds up the ideal of righteousness as not taking interest (22 12). Isa 24 2 implies that it was a business in that age, the lender and borrower being social types. Jeremiah implies that there was not always the best feeling between lenders and borrowers (15 10). According to Neh 5 7.10, rich Jews were lending to others and exacting heavy interest. Nehemiah condemns such conduct and forbids its continuance, citing himself as an example of lending without interest. The lenders restored 1 per cent of that exacted.

In the NT, references to interest occur in the parable of the Pounds (Lk 19 23) and of the Talents (Mt 25 27). Here the men were expected to put their master's money out at interest, and condemnation followed the failure to do so. Thus the principle of receiving interest is not condemned in the OT, only it was not to be taken from a brother Israelite. In the NT it is distinctly encouraged. See also USURY. J. J. REEVE

INTERMEDDLE, in-tēr-med'ī (אָרַב, 'ārabb, "to mix up [self] with something," "mingle in," "share," "take interest in"): The word occurs only once (Prov 14 10) in a passage descriptive of "the ultimate solitude of each man's soul at all times." "The heart knoweth its own bitterness."

"Nor even the tenderest heart, and next our own, Knows half the reasons why we smile and sigh."

(Cf 1 K 8 38.) Something there is in every sorrow which no one else can share. "And a stranger doth not intermeddle with its joy," not necessarily in an interfering or any offensive way, but simply does not share or take any interest in the other's joy.

For "intermeddleth with" (Prov 18 1 AV), RV gives "rageth against" (m "quarrelleth with").

INTERPRETATION, in-tūr-prē-tā'shun: Is a generic term and may refer to any work of literature. Referred specifically to the sacred

1. General Principles Scriptures, the science of interpretation is generally known as hermeneutics, while the practical application of the principles of this science is exegesis. In nearly all cases, interpretation has in mind the thoughts of another, and then, further, these thoughts expressed in another language than that of the interpreter. In this sense it is used in Bib. research. A person has interpreted the thoughts of another when he has in his own mind a correct reproduction or photograph of the thought as it was conceived in the mind of the original writer or speaker. It is accordingly a purely reproductive process, involving no originality of thought on the part of the interpreter. If the latter adds anything of his own it is eisegesis and not exegesis. The moment the Bible student has in his own mind what was in the mind of the author or authors of the Bib. books when these were written, he has interpreted the thought of the Scriptures.

The interpretation of any specimen of literature will depend on the character of the work under consideration. A piece of poetry and a chapter of history will not be interpreted according to the same principles or rules. Particular rules that are legitimate in the explanation of a work of fiction would be entirely out of place in dealing with a record of facts. Accordingly, the rules of the correct interpretation of the Scriptures will depend upon the character of these writings themselves, and the principles which an interpreter will employ in his interpretation of the Scriptures will be in harmony with his ideas of what the Scriptures are as to origin, character, history, etc. In the nature of the case the dogmatical stand of the interpreter will materially influence his hermeneutics and exegesis. In the legitimate sense of the term, every interpreter of the Bible is "prejudiced," i.e. is guided by certain principles which he holds antecedently to his work of interpretation. If the modern advanced critic is right in maintaining that the Bib. books do not differ in kind or character from the religious books of other ancient peoples, such as the Indians or the Persians, then the same principles that he applies in the case of the Rig Veda or the Zend Avesta he will employ also in his exposition of the Scriptures. If, on the other hand, the Bible is for him a unique collection of writings, Divinely inspired and a revelation from the source of all truth, the Bible student will hesitate long before accepting contradictions, errors, mistakes, etc., in the Scriptures.

The Scriptures are a Divine and human product combined. That the holy men of God wrote as they were moved by the Spirit is the claim of the Scriptures themselves. 2. Special Principles Just where the line of demarcation is to be drawn between the human and the Divine factors in the production of the sacred Scriptures materially affects the principles of interpreting these writings (see INSPIRATION). That the human factor was sufficiently potent to shape the form of thought in the Scriptures is evident on all hands. Paul does not write as Peter does, nor John as James; the individuality of the writer of the different books appears not only in the style, choice of words, etc., but in the whole form of thought also. There are such things as a Pauline, a Johannine and a Petrine type of Christian thought, although there is only one body of Christian truth underlying all types. In so far as the Bible is exactly like other books, it must be interpreted as we do other works of literature. The Scriptures are written in Heb and in Gr, and the principles of forms and of syntax that would apply to the explanation of other works written in these languages and under these circumstances must be applied to the OT and NT also. Again, the Bible is written for men, and its thoughts are those of mankind and not of angels or creatures of a different or higher spiritual or intellectual character; and accordingly there is no specifically Bib. logic, or rhetoric, or grammar. The laws of thought and of the interpretation of thought in these matters pertain to the Bible as they do to other writings.

But in regard to the material contents of the Scriptures, matters are different and the principles of interpretation must be different. God is the author of the Scriptures which He has given through human agencies. Hence the contents of the Scriptures, to a great extent, must be far above the ordinary concepts of the human mind. When John declares that God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son to redeem it, the interpreter does not do justice to the writer if he finds in the word "God" only the general philosophical conception of the Deity and not that God who is our Father through Christ; for it was the latter thought that was in the mind of the writer when he penned these words. Thus, too, it is a false interpretation to find in "Our Father" anything but this specifically Bib. conception of God, nor is it possible for anybody but a believing Christian to utter this prayer (Mt 6 9) in the sense which Christ, who taught it to His disciples, intended.

Again, the example of Christ and His disciples in their treatment of the OT teaches the principle that the ipse dixit of a Scriptural passage is to be interpreted as decisive as to its meaning. In the about 400 citations from the OT found in the NT, there is not one in which the mere "It is written" is not regarded as settling its meaning. Whatever may be a Bible student's theory of inspiration, the teachings and the examples of interpretation found in the Scriptures are in perfect harmony in this matter.

These latter facts, too, show that in the interpretation of the Scriptures principles must be applied that are not applicable in the explanation of other books. As God is the author of the Scriptures He may have had, and, as a matter of fact, in certain cases did have in mind more than the human agents through whom He spoke did themselves understand. The fact that, in the NT, persons like Aaron and David, institutions like the law, the sacrificial system, the priesthood and the like, are interpreted as typical of persons and things under the New Covenant shows that the true significance, e.g. of the Levitical system, can be found only when studied in the light of the NT fulfillment.

Again, the principle of parallelism, not for illustrative but for argumentative purposes, is a rule that can, in the nature of the case, be applied to the interpretation of the Scriptures alone and not elsewhere. As the Scriptures represent one body of truth, though in a kaleidoscopic variety of forms, a statement on a particular subject in one place can be accepted as in harmony with a statement on the same subject elsewhere. In short, in all of those characteristics in which the Scriptures are unlike other literary productions, the principles of interpretation of the Scriptures must also be unlike those employed in other cases.

Owing chiefly to the dogmatical basis of hermeneutics as a science, there has been a great divergence of views in the history of the

3. Historical Data church as to the proper methods of interpretation. It is one of the characteristic and instructive features of the NT writers that they absolutely refrain from the allegorical method of interpretation current in those times, particularly in the writings of Philo. Not even Gal 4 22, correctly understood, is an exception, since this, if an allegorical interpretation at all, is an argumentum ad hominem. The sober and grammatical method of interpretation in the NT writers stands out, too, in bold and creditable contrast to that of the early Christian exegetes, even of Origen. Only the Syrian fathers seemed to be an exception to the fantasies of the allegorical methods. The Middle Ages produced nothing new in this sphere; but the Reformation, with its formal principle that the Bible and the Bible alone is the rule of faith and life, made the correct grammatical interpretation of the Scriptures practically a matter of necessity. In modern times, not at all prolific in scientific discussions of hermeneutical principles and practices, the exegetical methods of different interpreters are chiefly controlled by their views as to the origin and character of the Scriptural books, particularly in regard to their inspiration.

INTERPRETATION OF TONGUES. See TONGUES, INTERPRETATION OF.

INTERROGATION, in-tēr-ō-gā'shun (ἐπερώτημα, eperōtēma): This word is not found at all in AV, and once only in ARV (1 Pet 3 21), where it replaces the word "answer" of AV. This change according to Alford and Bengel is correct. "The interrogation of a good conscience" may refer to the question asked of a convert before baptism (cf Acts 8 37), or the appeal of the convert to God (cf 1 Jn 3 20-21). The opportunity to do this was given in baptism.

INTER-TESTAMENTAL, in-tēr-tes-ta-men'tal, HISTORY AND LITERATURE. See BETWEEN THE TESTAMENTS.

INTREAT, in-trēt', INTREATY, in-trēt'i (ENTREAT): The two forms are derived from the same vb. In 1611 the spelling was indifferently "intreat" or "entreat." In editions of AV since 1760 "intreat" is used in the sense of "to beg"; "entreat" in the sense of "deal with." As examples of "intreat" see Ex 8 8, "Intreat the Lord" (gā'ak); Ruth 1 16, "Intreat me not to leave thee" (pāgha'); 2 Cor 8 4, "praying us with much intreaty" (παράκλησις, paraklēsis). In Gen 25 21 "intreat" is used to indicate the success of a petition. For entreat see Gen 12 16, "He entreated Abraham well"; Acts 27 3, "And Julius courteously entreated Paul" (φιλανθρώπως χρησάμενος, philanthrōpōs chrēsāmenos, lit. "to use in a philanthropic way"); cf also Jas 3 17, where εὐπειθής, eupethēs, lit. "easily persuaded," is tr "easy to be entreated."

RV changes all passages of AV where "intreat" is found to "entreat," with the exception of those mentioned below. The meaning of "entreat" is "to ask," "to beseech," "to supplicate": Job 19 17 reads "and my supplication to the children" (hannōthi, AV "though I intreated for the children," RVM "I make supplication"). Jer 15 11 reads, "I will cause the enemy to make supplication" (hiphga'ti), instead, AV "I will cause the enemy to entreat" (RVM "I will intercede for thee with the enemy"). 1 Tim 5 1 changes AV "intreat" to "exhort." Phil 4 3 renders AV "entreat" by "beseech."

INWARD, in'wērd, MAN: A Pauline term, nearly identical with the "hidden man of the heart" (1 Pet 3 4). The Gr original, ὁ ἑσω (also ἑσωθεν) ἀνθρώπος, ho ésō (ésōthen) anthrōpos (Rom 7 22) is lexicographically defined "the internal man," i.e. "soul," "conscience." It is the immaterial part of man—mind, spirit—in distinction from the "outward man" which "perishes" (2 Cor 4 16 AV). As the seat of spiritual influences it is the sphere in which the Holy Spirit does His renewing and saving work (Eph 3 16). The term "inward man" cannot be used interchangeably with "the new man," for it may still be "corrupt," and subject to "vanity" and "alienated from the life of God." Briefly stated, it is mind, soul, spirit—God's image in man—man's higher nature, intellectual, moral, and spiritual.

DWIGHT M. PRATT

INWARD PART: A symbolic expression in the OT represented by three Heb words: חֶדֶר, hedher, "chamber," hence inmost bowels or breast; קִרְוֹת, kīrōth, "the reins"; קֶרֶב, kerebh, "midst," "middle," hence heart. Once in the NT (ἑσώθεν, ésōthen, "from within," Lk 11 39). The viscera (heart, liver, kidneys) were supposed by the ancients to be the seat of the mind, feelings, affections: the highest organs of the psyche, "the soul." The term includes the intellect ("wisdom in the inward parts," Job 38 36); the moral nature ("inward part is very wickedness," Ps 5 9); the spiritual ("my law in their inward parts," Jer 31 33). Its adverbial equivalent in Bib. use is "inwardly." INWARD MAN (q.v.) is identical in meaning.

IOB, yōb (יֹב, yōbh; AV Job): Third son of Issachar (Gen 46 13). In || passages (Nu 26 24; 1 Ch 7 1) the name is Jashub (יָשׁוּב, yāshūbh), which the VSS in Gen also support as the correct form.

IPHDEIAH, if-dē'ya (יִפְדֵּיָה, yiphdēyāh, "Jeh redeems"; AV Iphedeiah): A descendant of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 25).

IPHTAH, if'ta (יִפְתָּח, yiphtāh; AV Jiphtah): An unidentified town in the Shephelah of Judah, named with Libnah, Ether and Ashan (Josh 15 43).

IPHTAH-EL, if'ta-el (יִפְתָּח־אֵל, yiphtah-'el; AV Jiphtah-el): The valley of Iphtah-el lay on the N. border of Zebulun (Josh 19 14.27). N.W. of the plain of el-Battāuf stands a steep hill, connected only by a low saddle with the hills on the N. The name Tell Jēfāt suggests the Jotapata of Jos (BJ, III, vi, i; vii, i, etc), and the place answers well to his description. It probably corresponds to the ancient Iphtah-el. In that case the valley is most probably that which begins at Tell Jēfāt, passes round the S. of Jebel Kaukab, and, as Wādī 'Abellīn, opens on the plain of Acre. W. EWING

IR, ir (עִיר, 'ir): A descendant of Benjamin (1 Ch 7 12), called Iri in ver 7.

IRA, i'ra (עִירָא, 'irā; Eīpas, Eīras):

(1) A person referred to in 2 S 20 26 as "priest" (so RV correctly; AV "a chief ruler," ARV "chief minister") unto David. The tr of RV is the only possible one; but, according to the text, Ira was "a Jairite," and thus of the tribe of Manassch (Nu 32 41) and not eligible to the priesthood. On the basis of the Pesh some would correct "Jairite" of 2 S 20 26 into "Jattirite," referring to Jattir, a priestly city within the territory of Judah (Josh 21 14). Others point to 2 S 8 18 m, "David's sons were priests," as an indication that in David's time some non-Levites were permitted to serve—in some sense—as priests.

(2) An "Ithrite," or (with a different pointing of the text) a "Jattirite," one of David's "thirty" (2 S 23 38 1 Ch 11 40); possibly identical with (1).

(3) Another of David's "thirty," son of Ikkesch of Tekoa (2 S 23 26; 1 Ch 11 28) and a captain of the temple guard (1 Ch 27 9). F. K. FARR

IRAD, i'rad (עִירָד, 'irād; LXX Γαῖδάδ, Gai-ddā): Grandson of Cain and son of Enoch (Gen 4 18).

IRAM, i'ram (עִירָם, 'irām; LXX variously in Gen): A "chief" of Edom (Gen 36 43 || 1 Ch 1 54).

IR-HA-HERES, ir-ha-hē'rez (עִיר הַהֲרֵס, 'ir ha-heres, according to the MT, Aq, Theodotion, LXX, AV and RV; according to some Heb MSS, Symmachus, and the Vulg, עִיר הַהֲרָס, 'ir ha-heres): A city of Egypt referred to in Isa 19 18. Jewish quarrels concerning the temple which Onias built in Egypt have most probably been responsible for the altering of the texts of some of the early MSS, and it is not now possible to determine absolutely which have been altered and which accord with the original. This difference in MSS gives rise to different opinions among authorities here to be noted. Most of the discussion of this name arises from this uncertainty and is hence rather profitless.

The starting-point of any proper discussion of Ir-ha-h is that the words are by Isaiah and that they are prophecy, predictive prophecy. They belong to that portion of the prophecies of Isa which by nearly all critics is allowed to the great prophet. Nothing but unfounded speculation or an unwillingness to admit that there is any predictive prophecy can call in question Isaiah's authorship of these words. Then the sense of the passage in which these words occur imperatively demands that they be accounted predictive prophecy. Isaiah plainly refers to the future, "shall be called"; and makes a definite statement concerning what shall take place in the future (19 18-24). The reality of predictive prophecy may be discussed by those so inclined, but that the intention of the author here was to utter predictive prophecy does not seem to be open to question. For the verification of this prediction by its fulfilment in history we shall inquire concerning: (1) the times intended: "that day"; (2) the "five cities"; (3) "Ir-ha-heres."

The prophet gives a fairly specific description of "that day." It was at least to begin when "there shall be five cities in the land of Egypt that speak the language of Canaan, and swear to Jeh of hosts" (ver 18), and "In that day shall there be an "That Day" altar to Jeh in the midst of the land of Egypt, and a pillar at the border thereof to Jeh" (ver 19). There was to be also some inroad made upon the heathenism of Egypt by the message of the Lord (vs 21 f), and about that time a deliverer should arise in Egypt (ver 20), and all this should take place before the power of the land of Assyria should pass away (vs 23 f).

The first historical fulfilment of these words is found at the period when Onias built his imitation of the Temple of Jerusalem at the place called by the Greeks Leontopolis (Tell el-Yehudiyyeh), and the worship of Jeh was set up at Elephantine, and the Jews were a great power at Alexandria and at Tahpanhes. While any of these latter three might have contained the "pillar," the "altar" would thus be either at Leontopolis or the other one of the "five cities" which cannot be named with much probability. The great deliverer would seem to be Alexander. Some think that the conversion of the Egyptians indicated in vs 21.22 is furthered, though still not completed, in the Christian invasion of the 1st cent., and again in the success of modern Christian missions in Egypt.

It will be seen that it does not follow from what has been said that Leontopolis was Ir-ha-h as some seem to think. It is not said by the

were certain that the altar was at Leontopolis. Nevertheless, Leontopolis may be Ir-ha-h. The problem is not in the first place the identification of the name, but the determination of which one of the "five cities" was destroyed. The expression "shall be called the city of destruction" seems clearly to indicate that Ir-ha-h is not a name at all, but merely a descriptive appellation of that city which should "be destroyed." It still remains to inquire whether or not this was an independent appellation, or whether, more probably, it bore some relation to the name of that city at the time at which the prophet wrote, a play upon the sound, or the significance of the name or both of these, either through resemblance or contrast. If Gesenius is right, as he seems to be, in the opinion that "in the idiom of Isa Ir-ha-h means simply 'the city that shall be destroyed,'" then the original problem of finding which one of the cities was destroyed seems to be the whole problem. Still, in the highly-wrought language of Isaiah and according to the genius of the Heb tongue, there is probably a play upon words. It is here that the consideration of the name itself properly comes in and probably guides us rightly. Speculation, by Gesenius, Duhm, Cheyne and others, has proposed various different readings of this name, some of them requiring two or three changes in the text to bring it to its present state. Speculation can always propose readings. On was sometimes called "Heres" and meant "house of the sun," which would be both tr<sup>d</sup> and transliterated into Heb ha-heres and might have 'ir ("city") prefixed. Naville, through his study of the great Harris papyrus, believed that the old Egypt city which later was called Leontopolis (Tell el-Yehudiyyeh) was immediately connected with On and called "House of Ra," also "House of the Sun." Thus this name might be both transliterated and tr<sup>d</sup> into the Heb ha-heres and have 'ir prefixed. The difference between this expression and "Ir-ha-h" which Isaiah used is only the difference between h and h. So that Ir-ha-h is most probably a predictive prophecy concerning the disaster that was to overtake one of the "five cities," with a play upon the name of the city, and that city is either On, the later Heliopolis, or the ancient sacred city about 4 miles to the N. of On, where Onias was to build his temple and which later became Leontopolis (Tell el-Yehudiyyeh). No more positive identification of Ir-ha-h is yet possible. M. G. KYLE

IRI, i'ri (יְרִי, 'irī). See IR; URIAS.

IRIJAH, i-ri'ja (יִרְיָה, yir'iyāh, "Jeh sees"): A captain at the gate of Benjamin in Jerus, who arrested Jeremiah the prophet on suspicion of intending to desert to the Chaldeans (Jer 37 13.14).

IR-NAHASH, ūr-nā'hash, ir-nā'hash (עִיר נָחָשׁ, 'ir nāhāsh): A town of Judah of which Tehinnah is called the "father," probably meaning "founder" (1 Ch 4 12). EVm suggests the tr "city of Nahash."

IRON, i'urn (בַּרְזֶל, barzel; σιδηρος, sidēros): It is generally believed that the art of separating iron from its ores and making it into useful forms was not known much earlier than 1000 BC, and that the making of brass (bronze) antedates it by many centuries, in spite of the frequent Bib. references where brass and iron occur together. This conjecture is based upon the fact that no specimen of worked iron has been found whose antiquity can be vouched for. The want of such instruments, however, can be attributed to the ease with which iron corrodes. Evidence that iron was used is found, for example, in the hieroglyphics of the tomb of Rameses III, where the blades of some of the weapons are painted blue while others are painted red, a distinction believed to be due to the fact that some were made of iron or steel and some of brass. No satisfactory proof has yet been presented that the marvelous sculpturing on the hard Egypt granite was done with tempered bronze. It seems more likely that steel tools were used. After the discovery of iron, it was evidently a long time in replacing bronze. This was probably due to the difficulties in smelting it. An old mountaineer once described to the writer the process of iron smelting as it was carried on in Mt. Lebanon in past centuries. As a boy he had watched his father, who was a smelter, operate one of the last furnaces to be fired. For each firing, many cords of wood, esp. green oak branches, were used, and several days of strenuous pumping at the eight bellows was necessary to supply the air blast. As a result a small lump of wrought iron was removed from the bottom of the furnace after cooling. The iron thus won was carried to Damascus where it was made into steel by workers who kept their methods secret. This process, which has not been worked now for years, was undoubtedly the same as was used by the ancients. It is not at all unlikely that the Lebanon iron, transformed into steel, was what was referred to as "northern iron" in Jer 15 12 (AV). In many districts the piles of slag from the ancient furnaces are still evident.

Aside from the limited supply of iron ore in Mt. Lebanon (cf Dt 8 9), probably no iron was found in Syria and Pal. It was brought from Tarshish (Ezk 27 12) and Vedan and Javan (Ezk 27 19), and probably Egypt (Dt 4 20).

The first mention of iron made in the Bible is in Gen 4 22, where Tubal-Cain is mentioned as "the forger of every cutting instrument of brass and iron." It is likely that the Jews learned the art of metallurgy from the Phoenicians (2 Ch 2 14) (see CRAFTS). Iron was used in Bib. times much as it is today. For a description of a smith at work see Eccles 38 28. Huge city gates, overlaid with strips of iron (Ps 107 16; Isa 45 2), held in place by crude square-headed nails (1 Ch 22 3), are still a familiar sight in the larger cities of Pal and Syria (Acts 12 10). Threshing instruments were made of iron (Am 1 3); so also harrows (2 S 12 31), axes (ib; 2 K 6 6; see AX), branding irons (1 Tim 4 2), and other tools (1 K 6 7). There were iron weapons (Nu 35 16; Job 20 24), armor (2 S 23 7), horns (1 K 22 11), fetters (Ps 105 18), chariots (Josh 17 16), yokes (Jer 28 14), breastplates (Rev 9 9), pens (chisels) (Job 19 24; Jer 17 1), sheets or plates (Ezk 4 3), gods (Dnl 5 4), weights (1 S 17 7), bedsteads (Dt 3 11). Iron was used extensively in building the temple. See METALS.

Figurative: "The iron furnace" is used metaphorically for affliction, chastisement (Dt 4 20; Ezk 22 18-22). Iron is also employed fig. to represent barrenness (Dt 28 23), slavery ("yoke of iron," Dt 28 48), strength ("bars of iron," Job 40 18), severity ("rod of iron," Ps 2 9), captivity (Ps 107 10), obstinacy ("iron sinew," Isa 48 4), fortitude ("iron pillar," Jer 1 18), moral deterioration (Jer 6 28), political strength (Dnl 2 33), destructive power ("iron teeth," Dnl 7 7); the certainty with which a real enemy will ever show his hatred is as the rust returning upon iron (Eccles 12 10 AV, RV "brass"); great obstacles ("walls of iron," 2 Macc 11 9). JAMES A. PATCH

IRON, i'ron (יִרְזָן, yir'ōn): One of the fenced cities in the territory of Naphtali, named with Migdal-el and En-hazor (Josh 19 38). It is represented by the modern Yārūn, a village with the ruins of a synagogue, at one time used as a monastery, fully 6 miles W. of Kedes.

IRPEEL, ūr'pē-el, ir'pē-el (יִרְפָּאֵל, yirp'āl): An unidentified city in Benjamin (Josh 18 27). It may possibly be represented by Rafāl, a ruin to the N. of el-Jib, the ancient Gibeon.

IRREVERENCE, i-rev'ēr-ens. See CRIME, CRIMES.

IRRIGATION, ir-i-gā'shun: No equivalent for this word is found in Bib. writings, although the use of irrigation for maintaining vegetable life is frequently implied (Eccl 2 5.6; Isa 58 11). To one familiar with the methods of irrigation practised in Pal, Syria and Egypt, the passage, "where thou sowedst thy seed, and wateredst it with thy foot, as a garden of herbs" (Dt 11 10), is easily explained. The water is brought in channels to the gardens, where it is distributed in turn to the different square plots bounded by banks of earth, or along the rows of growing vegetables planted on the sides of the trenches. In stony soil the breach in the canal leading to a particular plot is opened and closed with a hoe. Any obstruction in the trench is similarly removed, while in the soft, loamy soil of the coastal plain or in the Nile valley these operations can be done with the foot, a practice still commonly seen.

Egyptian Water Wheel.

The remains of the great irrigation works of the ancient Egyptians and Babylonians leave no doubt as to the extent to which they used water to redeem the deserts. In Pal and Syria there was less need (Dt 10 7; 11 11) for irrigation. Here there is an annual fall of from 30 to 40 in., coming principally during the winter. This is sufficient for the main crops. The summer supply of vegetables, as well as the fruit and mulberry trees, requires irrigation. Hardly a drop of many mountain streams is allowed to reach the sea, but is used to water the gardens of the mountain terraces and plains. This supply is now being supplemented by the introduction of thousands of pumps and oil engines for raising the water of the wells sufficiently to run it through the irrigation canals. Where a spring is small, its supply is gathered into a birket, or cistern, and then drawn off through a large outlet into the trenches, sometimes several days being required to fill the cistern. In Eccl 2 6, Solomon is made to say, "I made me pools of water, to water therefrom the forest." This passage helps to explain the uses of the so-called Pools of Solomon, S. of Jerus. In this same district are traces of the ancient terraces which were probably watered from these pools. See AGRICULTURE; GARDEN. JAMES A. PATCH

IR-SHEMESH, ūr-shē'mesh, ir-shē'mesh (עִיר שֶׁמֶשׁ, 'ir shemesh, "city of the sun"). See BETH-SHEMESH; HERES.

IRU, i'rōō (עִירָא, 'irū): Eldest son of Caleb (1 Ch 4 15); probably to be read Ir, the syllable -u being the conjunction "and" belonging to the following word.

I. Name.—This name has the double spelling, יִצְחָק, yīḥāq, and יִשְׁחָק, yīshāq ('Isaak, Isaak'), corresponding to the two forms in

1. Root, which appears the root meaning "to Forms and laugh"—a root that runs through nearly Analogues all the Sem languages. In Heb both ḡāḥak and sāḥak have their cognate nouns, and signify, in the simple stem, "to laugh," in the intensive stem, "to jest, play, dance, fondle," and the like. The noun yīḥār, meaning "fresh oil," from a root ḡāhar ("to be bright, conspicuous"), proves that nouns can be built on precisely the model of yīḥāq, which would in that case signify "the laughing one," or something similar. Yet Barth (Die Nominalbildung in den semitischen Sprachen, § 154, b and c) maintains that all proper names beginning with yōdh prefixed to the root are really pure imperfects, i.e. verbal forms with some subject to be understood if not actually present. Hence Isaac would mean "laughs": either indefinite, "one laughs," or "he laughs," viz. the one understood as the subject. There are some 50 Heb names that have a similar form with no accompanying subject. Of these sometimes the meaning of the root is quite obscure, sometimes it is appropriate to any supposable subject. Each is a problem by itself; for the interpretation of any one of them there is little help to be gained from a comparison with the others.

What subject, then, is to be understood with this imperfect vb. yūḥāq? Or is no definite subject to be supplied? (1) 'Ēl, God, may be supplied: "God laughs." Such an expression might be understood of the Divine benevolence, or of the fearful laughter of scorn for His enemies (Ps 2 4), or, euphemistically, of the Divine wrath, the "terrible glance," as of Moloch, etc (so Meyer, Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme, 255). (2) Some human person: "he laughs." So, for example, he himself, viz. the child who receives the name; or, the father; or, the brother (not the mother, which would require tīḥāq). In the light now of these possibilities we turn to the narratives of Isaac's birth and career and find the following subjects suggested: (a) father, Gen 17 17; (b) indefinite, "one laughs" (not "she laughs," see above), Gen 18 12-15; 21 6; (c) brother, Gen 21 9; (d) himself, Gen 26 8. Of these passages the last two show the vb. in the intensive stem in the signification of (c) "mock" (?), and (d) "dally." We find this same vb. in these senses in Gen 19 14 and 39 14,17, in the stories of Lot and of Joseph, and it is possible that here also in the story of Isaac it has no more connection with the name Isaac than it has there with the names Lot and Joseph. However this may be, there is obviously one interpretation of the name Isaac, which, required in two of the passages, is equally appropriate in them all, viz. that with the indefinite subject, "one laughs." Consideration of the sources to which these passages are respectively assigned by the documentary hypothesis tends only to confirm this result.

II. Family and Kindred.—The two things in Isaac's life that are deemed worthy of extensive treatment in the sacred narrative are his birth and his marriage. His significance, in fact, centers in his transmission of what went before him to what came after him. Hence, his position in his father's family, his relation to its greatest treasure, the religious birthright, and his marriage with Rebekah are the subjects that require special notice in this connection.

The birth of Isaac is represented as peculiar in these respects: the age of his parents, the purity of his lineage, the special Divine promises accompanying.

1. Birth and Place in the Family What in Abraham's life is signalized by the Divine "call" from his father's house, and what in Jacob's life is brought about by a series of providential interpositions, seems in Isaac's case to become his by his birth. His mother, who is not merely of the same stock as Abraham but actually his half-sister, is the legal wife. As her issue Isaac is qualified by the laws of inheritance recognized in their native land to become his father's heir. But Ishmael, according to those laws, has a similarly valid claim (see ABRAHAM, IV, 2), and it is only by express command that Abraham is led to abandon what was apparently both custom and personal preference, to "cast out the bondwoman and her son," and to acquiesce in the arrangement that "in Isaac shall thy seed be called."

But the birthright of Isaac was of infinitely more importance than the birthright in the family of any other wealthy man of that day. All

2. Relation to the Religious Birthright that limitless blessing with which Abraham set forth under God's leadership was promised not only to him but to his "seed"; it was limitless in time as well as in scope. To inherit it was of more consequence to Isaac than to inherit any number of servants, flocks or wells of his father's acquisition. A sense of these relative values seems to have been a part of Isaac's spiritual endowment, and this, more than anything else related of him, makes him an attractive figure on the pages of Gen.

The raising up of a "seed" to be the bearers of these promises was the prime concern of Isaac's life. Not by intermarriage with the Canaanites among whom he lived, but by marriage with one of his own people, in whom as much as in himself should be visibly embodied the separateness of the chosen family of God—thus primarily was Isaac to pass on to a generation as pure as his own the heritage of the Divine blessing. Rebekah enters the tent of Isaac as truly the chosen of God as was Abraham himself.

III. Story of Life.—Previous to his marriage Isaac's life is a part of the story of Abraham; after his marriage it merges into that of his children. It is convenient, therefore, to make his marriage the dividing-line in the narrative of his career.

A child whose coming was heralded by such signal marks of Divine favor as was Isaac's would be, even apart from other special considera-

1. Previous tions, a welcome and honored member to Marriage of the patriarchal household. The covenant-sign of circumcision (which Isaac was the first to receive at the prescribed age of 8 days), the great feast at his weaning, and the disinheritance of Ishmael in his favor, are all of them indications of the unique position that this child held, and prepare the reader to appreciate the depth of feeling involved in the sacrifice of Isaac, the story of which follows thereupon. The age of Isaac at the time of this event is not stated, but the fact that he is able to carry the wood of the offering shows that he had probably attained his full growth. The single question he asks his father and his otherwise unbroken silence combine to exhibit him in a favorable light, as thoughtful, docile and trustful. The Divine interposition to save the lad thus devoted to God constitutes him afresh the bearer of the covenant-promise and justifies its explicit renewal on this occasion. From this point onward the biographer of Isaac evidently has his marriage in view, for the two items that preceded the long 24th ch, in which Rebekah's choice and coming are rehearsed, are, first, the brief genealogical paragraph that informs the reader of the development of Nahor's family just as far as to Rebekah, and second, the ch that tells of Sarah's death and burial—an event clearly associated in the minds of all with the marriage of Isaac (see 24 3.36.67). Divine interest in the choice of her who should be the mother of the promised seed is evident in every line of the ch that dramatizes the betrothal of Isaac and Rebekah. Their first meeting is described at its close with the tender interest in such a scene natural to every descendant of the pair, and Isaac is sketched as a man of a meditative turn (ver 63) and an affectionate heart (ver 67).

The dismissal of the sons of Abraham's concubines to the "East-country" is associated with the statement that Isaac inherited all that

2. Subsequent to Marriage Abraham had; yet it has been remarked that, besides supplying them with gifts, Abraham was doing them a further kindness in thus emancipating them from continued subjection to Isaac, the future head of the clan. After Abraham's death we are expressly informed that God "blessed Isaac his son" in fulfilment of previous promise. The section entitled "the ôl'dhōth [generations] of Isaac" extends from 25 19 to 35 29. At the opening of it Isaac is dwelling at Beer-lahai-roi (25 11), then at Gerar (26 1.6) and "the valley of Gerar" (26 17), then at Beer-sheba (26 23; 28 10), all localities in the Negeb or "South-country." But after the long narrative of the fortunes of Jacob and his family, occupying many years, we find Isaac at its close living where his father Abraham had lived, at Hebron.

For 20 years Isaac and Rebekah remained childless; it was only upon the entreaty of Isaac that God granted them their twin sons. A famine was the usual signal for emigration to Egypt (cf Gen 12 10; 42 2); and Isaac also appears to have been on his way thither for the same cause, when, at Gerar, he is forbidden by God to proceed, and occasion is found therein to renew to him the covenant-promise of his inheritance: land, posterity, honor and the Divine presence (26 1-4).

But Isaac had also received from his father traditions of another sort; he too did not hesitate to say to the men of Gerar that his wife was his sister, with the same intent to save his own life, but without the same justification in fact, as in the case of Abraham's earlier stratagem. Yet even the discovery by the king of Gerar of this duplicity, and repeated quarrels about water in that dry country, did not suffice to endanger Isaac's status with the settled inhabitants, for his large household and great resources made him a valuable friend and a dangerous enemy.

The favoritism which Isaac showed for one son and Rebekah for the other culminated in the painful scene when the paternal blessing was by guile obtained for Jacob, and in the subsequent enforced absence of Jacob from his parental home. Esau, too, afforded no comfort to his father and mother, and ere long he also withdrew from his father's clan. The subsequent reconciliation of the brothers permitted them to unite at length in paying the last honors to Isaac on his decease. Isaac was buried at Hebron where his parents had been buried (Gen 49 31), and where his place of sepulture is still honored.

IV. Biblical References.—There is a great contrast between Abraham and Jacob on the one hand, and Isaac on the other, with respect to their prominence in the lit. of the nation that traced to them its descent. To be sure, when the patriarchs as a group are to be named, Isaac takes his place in the stereotyped formula of "Abraham, Isaac and Jacob," or "Israel" (so 23 t in the OT, 7 t in the NT).

But apart from this formula Isaac is referred to in the OT only as follows. During the lifetime of Jacob the names of Abraham and Isaac

1. In the OT are repeatedly linked in the same way as are all three subsequently: they form for that age the dynasty of the covenant. But several times Jacob calls Jeh the God (or, the Fear; see infra) of Isaac, because Isaac is his own immediate predecessor in this chain of the faithful. Isaac is called the "gift" of God to Abraham, in the farewell address of Joshua, just as Jacob and Esau are called God's "gifts" to Isaac (Josh 24 3 f; cf Koran, Sura 6 84). The "house of Isaac" is used by Amos as a || expression for "Israel," and "the high places of Isaac" for "the sanctuaries of Israel" (Am 7 16.9), in the same way as "Jacob" is often used elsewhere (LXX in ver 16 reads "Jacob"). Other references to Isaac are simply as to his father's son or his children's father.

He fares better in the NT. For, besides the genealogical references, Isaac's significance as the first to

2. In the NT receive circumcision on the 8th day is remembered (Acts 7 8); his position as first of the elect seed is set forth (Rom 9 7); his begetting of two sons so unlike in their relation to the promise as were Esau and Jacob is remarked (Rom 9 10); the facts of his being heir to the promise, a child of old age, and, though but one, the father of an innumerable progeny, are emphasized in He 11 (vs 9-12), which also discovers the deeper significance of his sacrifice and restoration to his father (vs 17-19; cf Jas 2 21); and in the same context is noticed the faith in God implied in Isaac's blessing of his sons. But Isaac receives more attention than anywhere else in that famous passage in Gal (4 21-31), in which Paul uses Isaac and his mother as allegorical representations of Christians who are justified by faith in the promise of God, and are the free-born heirs of all the spiritual inheritance implied in that promise. Even Isaac's persecution by Ishmael has its counterpart in the attitude of the enemies of Paul's gospel toward him and his doctrines and converts.

V. Views Other than the Historical.—Philo, the chief allegorizer of Scriptural narratives, has little to say of Isaac, whom he calls "the self-instructed nature." But modern critics have dissolved his personality by representing him as the personification of an ethnic group. "All Israel," writes Wellhausen (Prolog, 6th ed, 316), "is grouped with the people of Edom under the old name Isaac (Am 7 9.16) . . . the material here is not mythical [as in Gen 1-11] but national." And just as Israel plus Edom had little or no significance in national customs or political events, when compared on the one hand with Israel alone (=Jacob), and with Israel plus Edom plus Moab and Ammon (=Abraham) on the other hand; so likewise the figure of Isaac is colorless and his story brief, as compared with the striking figures of Jacob on the one hand and of Abraham on the other hand, and the circumstantial stories of their lives.

Other scholars will have none of this national view, because they believe Isaac to be the name of an ancient deity, the local nomen of Beersheba. Stärk, whom others have followed, proposes to interpret the phrase "the Fear of Isaac" in Gen 31 42.53 as the name of this god used by his worshippers, the Terror Isaac, Isaac the terrible god. For the sense of Isaac in that case see above under I, 2, (1). Meyer (loc. cit.) defends the transfer of the name from a god to the hero of a myth, by comparing the sacrifice of Isaac ("the only story in which Isaac plays an independent rôle") with the Gr myth of Iphigenia's sacrifice (Hesiod, Euripides, etc.), in which the by-name of a goddess (Iphigenia) identified with Artemis has passed to the intended victim rescued by Artemis from death.

The most recent critical utterances reject both the foregoing views of Isaac as in conflict with the data of Gen. Thus Gunkel (Schriften des AT, 5te Lieferung, 1910, 41) writes: "Quite clearly the names of Abraham, Isaac, and all the patriarchal women are not tribal names. . . . The interpretation of the figures of Gen as nations furnishes by no means a general key." And again: "Against the entire assumption that the principal patriarchal figures are originally gods, is above all to be noted that the names Jacob and Abraham are proved by the Bab to be personal names in current use, and at the same time that the sagas about them can in no wise be understood as echoes of original myths. Even Winckler's more than bold attempt to explain these sagas as original calendar-myths must be pronounced a complete failure." Yet Gunkel and those who share his position are careful to distinguish their own view from that of the "apologetes," and to concede no more than the bare fact that there doubtless were once upon a time persons named Abraham, Isaac, etc. For these critics Isaac is simply a name about which have crystallized cycles of folk-stories, that have their parallels in other lands and languages, but have received with a Heb name also a local coloring and significance on the lips of successive Heb story-tellers, saga-builders and finally collectors and editors; "Everyone who knows the history of sagas is sure that the saga is not able to preserve through the course of so many centuries, a true picture" of the patriarchs. #### LITERATURE

Of all Israel's celebrated prophets, Isaiah is the king. The writings which bear his name are among the profoundest in all literature. One great theme—salvation by faith—stamps them all. Isaiah is the St. Paul of the OT.

In Heb יִשְׁעִיָּה, y'sha'yāhū, and יִשְׁעִיָּה, y'sha'yāh; Gr Ἡσαΐας, Ēsaías; Lat Esaias and Isaias. His name was symbolic of his message. Like "Joshua," it means "Jeh saves," or "Jeh is salvation," or "salvation of Jeh."

Isaiah was the son of Amoz (not Amos). He seems to have belonged to a family of some rank,

2. Personal History as may be inferred from his easy access to the king (Isa 7 3), and his close intimacy with the priest (8 2). Tradition says he was the cousin of King Uzziah. He lived in Jerus and became court preacher. He was married and had two sons: Shear-jashub, his name signifying "a remnant shall return" (7 3), and Maher-shalal-hash-baz, "hasting to the spoil, hurrying to the prey," symbolic of Assyria's mad lust of conquest (8 3). Jewish tradition, based upon a false interpretation of 7 14, declares he was twice married.

In the year that King Uzziah died, Isaiah, apparently while worshipping in the temple, received a call to the prophetic office (ch 6).

3. Call He responded with noteworthy alacrity, and accepted his commission, though he knew from the outset that his task was to be one of fruitless warning and exhortation (6 9-13). Having been reared in Jerus, he was well fitted to become the political and religious counselor of the nation, but the experience which prepared him most for his important work was the vision of the majestic and thrice-holy God which he saw in the temple in the death-year of King Uzziah. There is no good reason for doubting that this was his inaugural vision, though some regard it as a vision which came to him after years of experience in preaching and as intended to deepen his spirituality. While this is the only explicit "vision" Isaiah saw, yet his entire book, from first to last, is, as the title (1 1) suggests, a "vision." His horizon, both political and spiritual, was practically unbounded. In a very true sense, as Delitzsch says, he was "the universal prophet of Israel."

For versatility of expression and brilliancy of imagery Isaiah had no superior, not even a rival.

His style marks the climax of Hebrew literary art. Both his periods and descriptions are most finished and sublime. He is a perfect artist in words. Beauty and strength are characteristic of his entire book. Epigrams and metaphors, particularly of flood, storm and sound (1 13; 5 18,22; 8 8; 10 22; 28 17,20; 30 28,30), interrogation and dialogue (6 8; 10 8,9), antithesis and alliteration (1 18; 3 24; 17 10,12), hyperbole and parable (2 7; 5 1-7; 28 23-29), even paranomasia, or play upon words (5 7; 7 9), characterize Isaiah's book as the great masterpiece of Hebrew literature. He is also famous for his richness of vocabulary and synonyms. For example, Ezekiel uses 1,535 words; Jeremiah, 1,653; the Psalmists 2,170; while Isaiah uses 2,186. Isaiah was also an orator: Jerome likened him to Demosthenes; and a poet: he frequently elaborates his messages in rhythmic or poetic style (12 1-6; 25 1-5; 26 1-12; 38 10-20; 42 1-4; 49 1-9; 50 4-9; 52 13-53 12; 60-62; 66 5-24); and in several instances slips into elegiac rhythm, e.g. in 37 22-29 there is a fine taunting poem on Sennacherib, and in 14 4-23 another on the king of Babylon. As Driver observes, "Isaiah's poetical genius is superb."

Nothing definite or historical is known concerning the prophet's end. Toward the close of the 2d cent. AD, however, there was a tradition to the effect that he suffered martyrdom in the heathen reaction which occurred under King Manassah, because of certain speeches concerning God and the Holy City which his contemporaries alleged were contrary to the law. Indeed the Jewish Mishna explicitly states that Manassah slew him. Justin Martyr also (150 AD), in his controversial dialogue with the Jew Trypho, reproaches the Jews with this accusation, "whom ye saw asunder with a wooden saw": this tradition is further confirmed by a Jewish Apocalypse of the 2d cent. AD, entitled, The Ascension of Isaiah, and by Epiphanius in his so-called Lives of the Prophets. It is barely possible that there is an allusion to his martyrdom in He 11 37, which reads, "They were stoned, they were sawn asunder," but this is by no means certain. In any case Isaiah probably survived the great catastrophe of the siege of Jerus by Sennacherib in 701 BC, and possibly also the death of Hezekiah in 699 BC; for in 2 Ch 32 32 it is stated that Isaiah wrote a biography of King Hezekiah. If so, his prophetic activity extended over a period of more than 40 years. Dr. G. A. Smith extends it to "more than 50" (Jerusalem, II, 180; cf Whitehouse, "Isaiah," New Cent. Bible, I, 72).

According to the title of his book (1 1), Isaiah prophesied during the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, kings of Judah.

6. Period He dates his inaugural vision (6 1) in Uzziah's death-year, which was approximately 740 BC. This marks, therefore, the beginning of his prophetic ministry. And we know that he was still active as late as the siege of Jerus by Sennacherib in 701 BC. Hence the minimum period of his activity as a prophet was from 740 to 701 BC. As a young man Isaiah witnessed the rapid development of Judah into a strong commercial and military state; for under Uzziah Judah attained a degree of prosperity and strength never before enjoyed since the days of Solomon. Walls, towers, fortifications, a large standing army, a port for commerce on the Red Sea, increased inland trade, tribute from the Ammonites, success in war with the Philis and the Arabians—all these became Judah's during Uzziah's long and prosperous reign of 52 years. But along with power and wealth came also avarice, oppression, religious formality and corruption. The temple revenues indeed were greatly increased, but religion and life were too frequently dissociated; the nation's progress was altogether material. During the reign of Jotham (740-736 BC), who for several years was probably associated with his father as co-regent, a new power began to appear over the eastern horizon. The Assyrians, with whom Ahab had come in contact at the battle of Karkar in 854 BC, and to whom Jehu had paid tribute in 842 BC, began to manifest anew their characteristic lust of conquest. Tiglath-pileser III, who is called "Pul" in 2 K 15 19 and reigned over Assyria from 745 to 727 BC, turned his attention westward, and in 738 BC reduced Arpad, Calno, Carchemish, Hamath and Damascus, causing them to pay tribute. His presence in the West led Pekah, king of North Israel, and Rezin, king of Damascus, to form an alliance in order to resist further encroachment on the part of Assyria. When Ahaz refused to join their confederacy they resolved to dethrone him and set in his stead the son of Tabeel upon the throne of David (2 K 16 5; Isa 7 6). The struggle which ensued is commonly known as the Syro-Ephraimitic war (734 BC)—one of the great events in Isaiah's period. Ahaz in panic sent to Tiglath-pileser for help (2 K 16 7), who of course responded with alacrity. The result was that the great Assyrian warrior sacked Gaza and carried all of Galilee and Gilead into captivity (734) and finally took Damascus (732 BC). Ahaz was forced to pay dearly for his protection and Judah was brought very low (2 K 15 29; 16 7-9; 2 Ch 28 19; Isa 7 1). The religious as well as the political effect of Ahaz's policy was decidedly baneful. To please Tiglath-pileser, Ahaz went to Damascus to join in the celebration of his victories, and while there saw a Syrian altar, a pattern of which he sent to Jerus and had a copy set up in the temple in place of the brazen altar of Solomon. Thus Ahaz, with all the influence of a king, introduced idolatry into Jerus, even causing his sons to pass through the fire (2 K 16 10-16; 2 Ch 28 3).

Hezekiah succeeded Ahaz, beginning to rule at the age of 25 and reigning 29 years (727-699 BC). Isaiah was at least 15 years his senior. The young king inherited from his father a heavy burden. The splendor of Uzziah's and Jotham's reigns was rapidly fading before the ever-menacing and avaricious Assyrians. Hezekiah began his reign with reformation. "He removed the high places, and brake the pillars, and cut down the Asherah" (2 K 18 4,22). He even invited the surviving remnant of North Israel to join in celebrating the Passover (2 Ch 30 1). But Israel's end was drawing near. Hoshea, the vacillating puppet-king of North Israel (730-722 BC), encouraged by Egypt, refused longer to pay Assyria his annual tribute (2 K 17 4); whereupon Shalmaneser IV, who had succeeded Tiglath-pileser, promptly appeared before the gates of Samaria in 724 BC, and for 3 weary years besieged the city (2 K 17 5). Finally, the city was captured by Sargon II, who succeeded Shalmaneser IV in 722 BC, and 27,292 of Israel's choicest people (according to Sargon's own description) were deported to Assyria, and colonists were brought from Babylon and other adjacent districts and placed in the cities of Samaria (2 K 17 6,24). Thus the kingdom of North Israel passed into oblivion, and Judah was left ever after quite exposed to the direct ravages, political and religious, of her Assyrio-Bab neighbors. In fact Judah herself barely escaped destruction by promising heavy tribute. This was the second great political crisis during Isaiah's ministry. Other crises were soon to follow. One was the desperate illness of King Hezekiah, who faced assured death in 714 BC. Being childless, he was seriously concerned for the future of the Davidic dynasty. He resorted to prayer, however, and God graciously extended his life 15 years (2 K 20; Isa 38). His illness occurred during the period of Babylon's independence under Merodach-baladan, the ever-ambitious, irresistible and uncompromising enemy of Assyria, who for 12 years (721-709 BC) maintained independent supremacy over Babylon. Taking advantage of Hezekiah's wonderful cure, Merodach seized the opportunity of sending an embassy to Jerus to congratulate him on his recovery (712 BC), and at the same time probably sought to form an alliance with Judah to resist Assyrian supremacy (2 K 20 12 ff; Isa 39). Nothing, however, came of the alliance, for the following year Sargon's army reappeared in Philistia in order to discipline Ashdod for conspiracy with the king of Egypt (711 BC). The greatest crisis was yet to come. Its story is as follows: Judah and her neighbors groaned more and more under the heavy exactions of Assyria. Accordingly, when Sargon was assassinated and Sennacherib came to the throne in 705 BC, rebellion broke out on all sides. Merodach-baladan, who had been expelled by Sargon in 709 BC, again took Babylon and held it for at least six months in 703 BC. Hezekiah, who was encouraged by Egypt and all Philistia, except Padi of Ekron, the puppet-king of Sargon, refused longer to pay Assyria tribute (2 K 18 7). Meanwhile a strong pro-Egypt party had sprung up in Jerus. In view of all these circumstances, Sennacherib in 701 BC marched westward with a vast army, sweeping everything before him. Tyre was invested though not taken; on the other hand, Joppa, Eltekeh, Ekron, Ashkelon, Ammon, Moab, and Edom all promptly yielded to his demands. Hezekiah was panic stricken and hastened to bring rich tribute, stripping even the temple and the palace of their treasures to do so (2 K 18 13-16). But Sennacherib was not satisfied. He overran Judah, capturing, as he tells us in his inscription, 46 walled towns and smaller villages without number, carrying 200,150 of Judah's population into captivity to Assyria, and demanding as tribute 800 talents of silver and 30 talents of gold, in all over $1,500,000; he took also, he claims, Hezekiah's daughters and palace women, seized his male and female singers, and carried away enormous spoil. But the end was not yet. Sennacherib himself, with the bulk of the army, halted in Philistia to reduce Lachish; thence he sent a strong detachment under his commander-in-chief, the Rabshakeh, to besiege Jerus (2 K 18 17-19 8; Isa 36 2-37 8). As he describes this blockade in his own inscription: "I shut up Hezekiah in Jerus like a bird in a cage." The Rabshakeh, however, failed to capture the city and returned to Sennacherib, who meanwhile had completely conquered Lachish, and was now warring against Libnah. A second expedition against Jerus was planned, but hearing that Tirhakah (at that time the commander-in-chief of Egypt's forces and only afterward "king of Ethiopia") was approaching, Sennacherib was forced to content himself with sending messengers with a letter to Hezekiah, demanding immediate surrender of the city (2 K 19 9 ff; Isa 37 9 ff). Hezekiah, however, through Isaiah's influence held out; and in due time, though Sennacherib disposed of Tirhakah's army without difficulty, his immense host in some mysterious way—by plague or otherwise—was suddenly smitten, and the great Assyrian conqueror was forced to return to Nineveh; possibly because Merodach-baladan had again appeared in Babylonia. Sennacherib never again returned to Pal, so far as we know, during the subsequent 20 years of his reign, though he did make an independent expedition into North Arabia (691-689 BC). This invasion of Judah by Sennacherib in 701 BC was the great political event in Isaiah's ministry. Had it not been for the prophet's statesmanship, Jerus might have capitulated. As it was, only a small, insignificantly small, remnant of Judah's population escaped. Isaiah had at this time been preaching 40 years. How much longer he labored is not known.

There are six general divisions of the book: (1) chs 1-12, prophecies concerning Judah and Jerus, closing with promises of restoration; (2) chs 13-23, oracles of judgment and salvation, for the most part concerning those foreign nations whose fortunes affected Judah and Jerus; (3) chs 24-27, Jeh's world-judgment in the redemption of Israel; (4) chs 28-35, a cycle of prophetic warnings against alliance with Egypt, closing with a prophecy concerning Edom and a promise of Israel's ransom; (5) chs 36-39, history, prophecy and song intermingled; serving both as an appendix to chs 1-35, and as an introduction to chs 40-66; (6) chs 40-66, prophecies of comfort and salvation, and also of the future glory awaiting Israel.

By examining in detail these several divisions we can trace better the prophet's thought. Thus, chs 1-12 unfold Judah's social sins (chs 1-6), and her political entanglements (chs 7-12); ch 1 is an introduction, in which the prophet strikes the chief notes of his entire book: viz. thoughtlessness (vs 2-9), formalism in worship (vs 10-17), pardon (vs 18-23) and judgment (vs 24-31). Chs 2-4 contain three distinct pictures of Zion: (a) her exaltation (2 2-4), (b) her present idolatry (2 5-4 1), and (c) her eventual purification (4 2-6). Ch 5 contains an arraignment of Judah and Jerus, composed of three parts: (a) a parable of Jeh's vineyard (vs 1-7); (b) a series of six woes pronounced against insatiable greed (vs 8-10), dissipation (vs 11-17), daring defiance against Jeh (vs 18.19), confusion of moral distinctions (ver 20), political self-conceit (ver 21), and misdirected heroism (vs 22.23); and (c) an announcement of imminent judgment. The Assyrian is on the way and there will be no escape (vs 24-30). Ch 6 recounts the prophet's inaugural vision and commission. It is really an apologetic, standing as it does after the prophet's denunciations of his contemporaries. When they tacitly object to his message of threatening and disaster, he is able to reply that, having pronounced "woe" upon himself in the year that King Uzziah died, he had the authority to pronounce woe upon them (6 5). Plainly Isaiah tells them that Judah's sins are well-nigh hopeless. They are becoming spiritually insensible. They have eyes but they cannot see. Only judgment can avail: "the righteous judgment of a forgotten God" awaits them. A "holy seed," however, still existed in Israel's stock (6 13).

Coming to chs 7-12, Isaiah appears in the rôle of a practical statesman. He warns Ahaz against political entanglements with Assyria. The section 7 1-9 7 is a prophecy of Immanuel, history and prediction being intermingled.

They describe the Syro-Ephraimite uprising in 736 BC, when Pekah of North Israel and Rezin of Damascus, in attempting to defend themselves against the Assyrians, demanded that Ahaz of Jerus should become their ally. But Ahaz preferred the friendship of Assyria, and refused to enter into alliance with them. And in order to defend himself, he applied to Assyria for assistance, sending ambassadors with many precious treasures, both royal and sacred, to bribe Tiglath-pileser. It was at this juncture that Isaiah, at Jeh's bidding, expostulates with Ahaz concerning the fatal step he is about to take, and as a practical statesman warns Ahaz, "the king of No-Faith," that the only path of safety lies in loyalty to Jeh and keeping clear of foreign alliances; that "God is with us" for salvation; and that no "conspiracy" can possibly be successful unless God too is against us. When, however, the prophet's message of promise and salvation finds no welcome, he commits it to his disciples, bound up and sealed for future use; assuring his hearers that unto them a child is born and unto them a son is given, in whose day the empire of David will be established upon a basis of justice and righteousness. The Messianic sion is the ground of the prophet's hope; which hope, though unprecedented, he thus early in his ministry commits, written and sealed, to his inner circle of "disciples." See, further, IMMANUEL.

The section 9 8—10 4 contains an announcement to North Israel of accumulated wrath and impending ruin, with a refrain (9 12.17.21; 10 4). Here, in an artistic poem composed of four strophes, the prophet describes the great calamities which Jeh has sent down upon North Israel but which have gone unheeded: foreign invasion (9 8-12), defeat in battle (9 13-17), anarchy (9 18-21), and impending captivity (10 1-4). Yet Jeh's judgments have gone unheeded: "For all this his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still." Divine discipline has failed; only judgment remains.

In 10 5-34, Assyria is declared to be an instrument of Jeh, the rod of Jeh's anger. Chs 11-12 predict Israel's return from exile, including a vision of the Messiah's reign of ideal peace. For Isaiah's vision of the nation's future reached far beyond mere exile. To him the downfall of Assyria was the signal for the commencement of a new era in Israel's history. Assyria has no future, her downfall is fatal; Judah has a future, her calamities are only disciplinary. An Ideal Prince will be raised up in whose advent all Nature will rejoice, even dumb animals (11 1-10). A second great exodus will take place, for the Lord will set His hand again "the second time" to recover the remnant of His people "from the four corners of the earth" (11 11.12). In that day, "Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim" (11 13). On the contrary, the reunited nation, redeemed and occupying their rightful territory (11 14-16), shall sing a hymn of thanksgiving, proclaiming the salvation of Jeh to all the earth (ch 12).

Chs 13-23 contain oracles of judgment and salvation, for the most part concerning those foreign nations whose fortunes affected Judah and Jerus. They are grouped together by the editor, as similar foreign oracles are in Jer 46-51 and Ezk 25-32. Isaiah's horizon was world-wide. First among the foreign prophecies stands the oracle concerning Babylon (13 1-14 23), in which he predicts the utter destruction of the city (13 2-22), and sings a dirge or taunt-song over her fallen king (14 4-23). The king alluded to is almost beyond doubt an Assyrian (not a Bab) monarch of the 8th cent.; the brief prophecy immediately following in 14 24-27 concerning Assyria tacitly confirms this interpretation. Another brief oracle concerning Babylon (21 1-10) describes the city's fall as imminent. Both oracles stand or fall together as genuine prophecies of Isaiah. Both seem to have been written in Jerus (13 2; 21 9.10). It cannot be said that either is absolutely unrelated in thought and language to Isaiah's age (14 13; 21 2); each foretells the doom to fall on Babylon (13 19; 21 9) at the hands of the Medes (13 17; 21 2); and each describes the Israelites as already in exile—but not necessarily all Israel.

The section 14 24-27 tells of the certain destruction of the Assyrian.

The passage 14 28-32 is an oracle concerning Philistia.

Chs 15-16 are ancient oracles against Moab, whose dirgelike meter resembles that of chs 13-14. It is composed of two separate prophecies belonging to two different periods in Isaiah's ministry (16 13.14). The three points of particular interest in the oracle are: (1) the prophet's tender sympathy for Moab in her affliction (15 5; 16 11). Isaiah mingles his own tears with those of the Moabites. As Delitzsch says, "There is no prophecy in the Book of Isa in which the heart of the prophet is so painfully moved by what his spirit beholds and his mouth must prophecy." (2) Moab's pathetic appeal for shelter from her foes; particularly the ground on which she urges it, namely, the Messianic hope that the Davidic dynasty shall always stand and be able to repulse its foes (16 5). The prophecy is an echo of 9 5-7. (3) The promise that a remnant of Moab, though small, shall be saved (16 14). Wearied of prayer to Chemosh in his high places, the prophet predicts that Moab will seek the living God (16 12).

The passage 17 1-11 is an oracle concerning Damascus and North Israel, in which Isaiah predicts the fate of the two allies—Syria and Ephraim—in the Syro-Ephraimitic war of 734 BC, with a promise that only a scanty remnant will survive (17 6). In 17 12-14, the prophet boldly announces the complete annihilation of Judah's unnamed foes—the Assyrians.

Ch 18 describes Ethiopia as in great excitement, sending ambassadors hither and thither—possibly all the way to Jerus—ostensibly seeking aid in making preparations for war. Assyria had already taken Damascus (732 BC) and Samaria (722 BC), and consequently Egypt and Ethiopia were in fear of invasion. Isaiah bids the ambassadors to return home and quietly watch Jeh thwart Assyria's self-confident attempt to subjugate Judah; and he adds that when the Ethiopians have seen God's hand in the coming deliverance of Judah and Jerus (701 BC), they will bring a present to Jeh to His abode in Mount Zion.

Ch 19, which is an oracle concerning Egypt, contains both a threat (vs 1-17) and a promise (vs 18-25), and is one of Isaiah's most remarkable foreign messages. Egypt is smitten and thereby led to abandon her idols for the worship of Jeh (vs 19-22). Still more remarkable, it is prophesied that in that day Egypt and Assyria will join with Judah in a triple alliance of common worship to Jeh and of blessing to others (vs 23-25). Isaiah's missionary outlook here is wonderful!

Ch 20 describes Sargon's march against Egypt and Ethiopia, containing a brief symbolic prediction of Assyria's victory over Egypt and Ethiopia. By donning a captive's garb for three years, Isaiah attempts to teach the citizens of Jerus that the siege of Ashdod was but a means to an end in Sargon's plan of campaign, and that it was sheer folly for the Egypt party in Jerus, who were ever urging reliance upon Egypt, to look in that direction for help. 21 11.12 is a brief oracle concerning Seir or Edom, "the only gentle utterance in the OT upon Israel's hereditary foe." Edom is in great anxiety. The prophet's answer is disappointing, though its tone is sympathetic. 21 13 ff is a brief oracle concerning Arabia. It contains a sympathetic appeal to the Temanites to give bread and water to the caravans of Dedan, who have been driven by war from their usual route of travel.

Ch 22 is concerning the foreign temper within the theocracy. It is composed of two parts: (1) an oracle "of the valley of vision," i.e. Jerus (vs 1-14); and (2) a philippic against Shebna, the comptroller of the palace. Isaiah pauses, as it were, in his series of warnings to foreign nations to rebuke the foreign temper of the frivolous inhabitants of Jerus, and in particular Shebna, a high official in the government. The reckless and God-ignoring citizens of the capital are pictured as indulging themselves in hilarious eating and drinking, when the enemy is at that very moment standing before the gates of the city. Shebna, on the other hand, seems to have been an ostentatious foreigner, perhaps a Syrian by birth, quite possibly one of the Egypt party, whose policy was antagonistic to that of Isaiah and the king. Isaiah's prediction of Shebna's fall was evidently fulfilled (36 3; 37 2).

Ch 23 is concerning Tyre. In this oracle Isaiah predicts that Tyre shall be laid waste (ver 1), her commercial glory humbled (ver 9), her colonies become independent of her (ver 10), and she herself forgotten for "seventy years" (ver 15); but "after the end of seventy years," her trade will revive, her business prosperity will return, and she will dedicate her gains in merchandise as holy to Jeh (ver 18).

The third great section of the Book of Isa embraces chs 24-27, which tell of Jeh's world-judgment, issuing in the redemption of Israel. These prophecies stand closely related to chs 13-23. They express the same tender emotion as that already observed in 15 5; 16 11, and sum up as in one grand finale the prophet's oracles to Israel's neighbors. For religious importance they stand second to none in the Book of Isa, teaching the necessity of Divine discipline and the glorious redemption awaiting the faithful in Israel. They are a spiritual commentary on the great Assyrian crisis of the 8th cent.; they are messages of salvation intended, not for declamation, but for meditation, and were probably addressed more particularly to the prophet's inner circle of "disciples" (8 16). These chapters partake of the nature of apocalypse. Strictly speaking, however, they are prophecy, not apocalypse. No one ascends into heaven or talks with an angel, as in Dnl 7 and Rev 4. They are apocalypse only in the sense that certain things are predicted as sure to come to pass. Isaiah was fond of this kind of prophecy. He frequently lifts his reader out of the sphere of mere history to paint pictures of the far-off, distant future (2 2-4; 4 2-6; 11 6-16; 30 27-33).

In ch 24 the prophet announces a general judgment of the earth (i.e. the land of Judah), and of "the city" (collective, for Judah's towns), after which will dawn a better day (vs 1-15). The prophet fancies he hears songs of deliverance, but alas! they are premature; more judgment must follow. In ch 25 the prophet transports himself to the period after the Assyrian catastrophe and, identifying himself with the redeemed, puts into their mouths songs of praise and thanksgiving for their deliverance. Vs 6-8 describe Jeh's bountiful banquet on Mount Zion to all nations, who, in keeping with 2 2-4, come up to Jerus, to celebrate "a feast of fat things," rich and marrowy. While the people are present at the banquet, Jeh graciously removes their spiritual blindness so that they behold Him as the true dispenser of life and grace. He also abolishes violent death, that is to say, war (cf 2 4), and its sad accompaniment, "tears," so that "the earth" (i.e. the land of Judah) is no longer the battlefield of the nations, but the blessed abode of the redeemed, living in peace and happiness. The prophet's aim is not political but religious.

In 26 1-19 Judah sings a song over Jerus, the impregnable city of God. The prophet, taking again his stand with the redeemed remnant of the nation, vividly portrays their thankful trust in Jeh, who has been unto them a veritable "Rock of Ages" (ver 4 m). With hope he joyfully exclaims, Let Jeh's dead ones live! Let Israel's dead bodies arise! Jeh will bring life from the dead! (ver 19). This is the first clear statement of the resurrection in the OT. But it is national and restricted to Israel (cf ver 14), and is merely Isaiah's method of expressing a hope of the return of Israel's faithful ones from captivity (cf Hos 6 2; Ezk 37 1-14; Dnl 12 2).

In 26 20-27 13 the prophet shows that Israel's chastisements are salutary. He begins by exhorting his own people, his disciples, to continue a little longer in the solitude of prayer, till God's wrath has shattered the world-powers (26 20-27 1). He next predicts that the true vineyard of Jeh will henceforth be safely guarded against the briars and thorns of foreign invasion (27 2-6). And then, after showing that Jeh's chastisements of Israel were light compared with His judgments upon other nations (27 7-11), he promises that if Israel will only repent, Jeh will spare no pains to gather "one by one" the remnant of His people from Assyria and Egypt (cf 11 11); and together they shall once more worship Jeh in the holy mountain at Jerus (27 12,13).

The prophet's fundamental standpoint in chs 24-27 is the same as that of 2 2-4 and chs 13-23. Yet the prophet not infrequently throws himself forward into the remote future, oscillating backward and forward between his own times and those of Israel's restoration. It is esp. noteworthy how he sustains himself in a long and continued transportation of himself to the period of Israel's redemption. He even studies to identify himself with the new Israel which will emerge out of the present chaos of political events. His visions of Israel's redemption carry him in ecstasy far away into the remote future, to a time when the nation's sufferings are all over; so that when he writes down what he saw in vision he describes it as a discipline that is past. For example, in 25 1-8 the prophet, transported to the end of time, celebrates in song what he saw, and describes how the fall of the world-empire is followed by the conversion of the heathen. In 26 8,9 he looks back into the past from the standpoint of the redeemed in the last days, and tells how Israel longingly waited for the manifestation of God's righteousness which has now taken place, while in 27 7-9 he places himself in the midst of the nation's sufferings, in full view of their glorious future, and portrays how Jeh's dealings with Israel have not been the punishment of wrath, but the discipline of love. This kind of apocalypse, or prophecy, indeed, was to be expected from the very beginning of the group of prophecies, which are introduced with the word "Behold!" Such a manner of introduction is peculiar to Isaiah, and of itself leads us to expect a message which is unique.

The practical religious value of these prophecies to Isaiah's own age would be very great. In a period of war and repeated foreign invasion, when but few men were left in the land (24 6,13; 26 18), and Judah's cities were laid waste and desolate (24 10,12; 25 2; 26 5; 27 10), and music and gladness were wanting (24 8), when the nation still clung to their idols (27 9) and the Assyrians' work of destruction was still incomplete, other calamities being sure to follow (24 16), it would certainly be comforting to know that forgiveness was still possible (27 9), that Jeh was still the keeper of His vineyard (27 3,4), that His judgments were to last but for a little moment (26 20), and that though His people should be scattered, He would soon carefully gather them "one by one" (27 12,13), and that in company with other nations they would feast together on Mt. Zion as Jeh's guests (25 6,7,10), and that Jerus should henceforth become the center of life and religion to all nations (24 23; 25 6; 27 13). Such faith in Jeh, such exhortations and such songs and confessions of the redeemed, seen in vision, would be a source of rich spiritual comfort to the few suffering saints in Judah and Jerus, and a guiding star to the faithful disciples of the prophet's most inner circle.

concerning Edom and a promise of Israel's ransom. As in 5 8-23, the prophet indulges in a series of six woes:

(1) Woe to drunken, scoffing politicians (ch 28). This is one of the great chapters of Isaiah's book. In the opening section (vs 1-6) the prophet points in warning to the proud drunkards of Ephraim whose crown (Samaria) is rapidly fading. He next turns to the scoffing politicians of Jerus, rebuking esp. the bibulous priests who stumble in judgment, and the staggering prophets who err in vision (vs 7-22); closing with a most instructive parable from agriculture, teaching that God's judgments are not arbitrary; that as the husbandman does not plow and harrow his fields the whole year round, so God will not punish His people forever; and as the husbandman does not thresh all kinds of grain with equal severity, no more will God discipline His people beyond their deserts (vs 23-29).

(2) Woe to formalists in religion (29 1-14). Isaiah's second woe is pronounced upon Ariel, the altar-hearth of God, i.e. Jerus, the sacrificial center of Israel's worship. David had first inaugurated the true worship of Jeh in Zion. But now Zion's worship has become wholly conventional, formal, and therefore insincere; it is learned by rote (ver 13; cf 1 10-15; Mic 6 6-8). Therefore, says Isaiah, Jeh is forced to do an extraordinary work among them, in order to bring them back to a true knowledge of Himself (ver 14).

(3) Woe to those who hide their plans from God (29 15-24). What their plans are, which they are devising in secret, the prophet does not yet disclose; but he doubtless alludes to their intrigues with the Egyptians and their purpose to break faith with the Assyrians, to whom they were bound by treaty to pay annual tribute. Isaiah bravely remonstrates with them for supposing that any policy will succeed which excludes the counsel and wisdom of the Holy One. They are but clay; He is the potter. At this point, though somewhat abruptly, Isaiah turns his face toward the Messianic future. In a very little while, he says, Lebanon, which is now overrun by Assyria's army, shall become a fruitful field, and the blind and deaf and spiritually weak shall rejoice in the Holy One of Israel.

(4) Woe to the pro-Egypt party (ch 30). Isaiah's fourth woe is directed against the rebellious politicians who stubbornly, and now openly, advocate making a league with Egypt. They have at length succeeded apparently in winning over the king to their side, and an embassy is already on its way to Egypt, bearing across the desert of the exodus rich treasures with which to purchase the friendship of their former oppressors. Isaiah now condemns what he can no longer prevent. Egypt is a Rahab "sit-still," i.e. a mythological sea-monster, menacing in mien but laggard in action. When the crisis comes, she will sit still, causing Israel only shame and confusion.

(5) Woe to those who trust in horses and chariots (chs 31-32). Isaiah's fifth woe is a still more vehement denunciation of those who trust in Egypt's horses and chariots, and disregard the Holy One of Israel. Those who do so forget that the Egyptians are but men and their horses flesh, and that mere flesh cannot avail in a conflict with spirit. Eventually Jeh means to deliver Jerus, if the children of Israel will but turn from their idolatries to Him; and in that day, Assyria will be vanquished. A new era will dawn upon Judah. Society will be regenerated. The renovation will begin at the top. Conscience also will be sharpened, and moral distinctions will no longer be confused (32 1-8). As Delitzsch puts it, "The aristocracy of birth and wealth will be replaced by an aristocracy of character." The careless and indifferent women, too, in that day will no longer menace the social welfare of the state (32 9-14); with the outpouring of Jeh's spirit an ideal commonwealth will emerge, in which social righteousness, peace, plenty and security will abound (32 15-20).

(6) Woe to the Assyrian destroyer (ch 33). Isaiah's last woe is directed against the treacherous spoiler himself, who has already laid waste the cities of Judah, and is now beginning to lay siege to Jerus (701 BC). The prophet prays, and while he prays, behold! the mighty hosts of the Assyrians are routed and the long-besieged but now triumphant inhabitants of Jerus rush out like locusts upon the spoil which the vanishing adversary has been forced to leave behind. The destroyer's plan to reduce Jerus has come to naught. The whole earth beholds the spectacle of Assyria's defeat and is filled with awe and amazement at the mighty work of Jeh. Only the righteous may henceforth dwell in Jerus. Their eyes shall behold the Messianic-king in his beauty, reigning no longer like Hezekiah over a limited and restricted territory, but over a land unbounded, whose inhabitants enjoy Jeh's peace and protection, and are free from all sin, and therefore from all sickness (vs 17-24). With this beautiful picture of the Messianic future, the prophet's woes find an appropriate conclusion. Isaiah never pronounced a woe without adding a corresponding promise.

In chs 34-35, the prophet utters a fierce cry for justice against "all the nations," but against Edom in particular. His tone is that of judgment. Edom is guilty of high crimes against Zion (34 8 f), therefore she is doomed to destruction. On the other hand, the scattered ones of Israel shall return from exile and "obtain gladness and joy, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away" (ch 35).

Chs 36-39 contain history, prophecy and song intermingled. These chapters serve both as an appendix to chs 1-35 and as an introduction to chs 40-66. In them three important historical events are narrated, in which Isaiah was a prominent factor: (1) the double attempt of Sennacherib to obtain possession of Jerus (chs 36-37); (2) Hezekiah's sickness and recovery (ch 38); (3) the embassy of Merodach-baladan (ch 39). With certain important omissions and insertions these chapters are duplicated almost verbatim in 2 K 18 13-20 19. They are introduced with the chronological note, "Now it came to pass in the fourteenth year of king Hezekiah." Various attempts have been made to solve the mystery of this date; for, if the author is alluding to the siege of 701 BC, difficulty arises, because that event occurred not in Hezekiah's "14th" but 26th year, according to the Bib. chronology of his life; or, if with some we date Hezekiah's accession to the throne of Judah as 720 BC, then the siege of 701 BC occurred, as is evident, in Hezekiah's 19th year. It is barely possible of course that "the 14th year of king Hezekiah" was the 14th of the "15 years" which were added to his life, but more probably it alludes to the 14th of his reign. On the whole it is better to take the phrase as a general chronological caption for the entire section, with special reference to ch 38, which tells of Hezekiah's sickness, which actually fell in his 14th year (714 BC), and which, coupled with Sargon's expected presence at Ashdod, was the great personal crisis of the king's life.

Sennacherib made two attempts in 701 BC to reduce Jerus: one from Lachish with an army headed by the Rabshakeh (36 2-37 8), and another from Libnah with a threat conveyed by messengers (37 9 ff). The brief section contained in 2 K 18 14-16 is omitted from between vs 1 and 2 of Isa 36, because it was not the prophet's aim at this time to recount the nation's humiliation.

Isaiah's last "word" concerning Assyria (37 21-35) is one of the prophet's grandest predictions. It is composed of three parts: (1) a taunt-song, in elegiac rhythm, on the inevitable humiliation of Sennacherib (vs 22-29); (2) a short poem in different rhythm, directed to Hezekiah, in order to encourage his faith (vs 30-32); (3) a definite prediction, in less elevated style, of the sure deliverance of Jerus (vs 33-35). Isaiah's prediction was literally fulfilled.

The section 38 9-20 contains Hezekiah's Song of Thanksgiving, in which he celebrates his recovery from some mortal sickness. It is a beautiful plaintive "writing"; omitted altogether by the author of the Book of K (cf 2 K 20). Hezekiah was sick in 714 BC. Two years later Merodach-baladan, the veteran arch-enemy of Assyria, having heard of his wonderful recovery, sent letters and a present to congratulate him. Doubtless, also, political motives prompted the recalcitrant Babylonian. But be that as it may, Hezekiah was greatly flattered by the visit of Merodach-baladan's envoys, and, in a moment of weakness, showed them all his royal treasures. This was an inexcusable blunder, as the sight of his many precious possessions would naturally excite Bab cupidity to possess Jerus. Isaiah not only solemnly condemned the king's conduct, but he announced with more than ordinary insight that the days were coming when all the accumulated resources of Jerus would be carried away to Babylon (39 3-6; cf Mic 4 10). This final prediction of judgment is the most marvelous of all Isaiah's minatory utterances, because he distinctly asserts that, not the Assyrians, who were then at the height of their power, but the Babylonians, shall be the instruments of the Divine vengeance in consummating the destruction of Jerus. There is absolutely no reason for doubting the genuineness of this prediction. In it, indeed, we have a prophetic basis for chs 40-66, which follow.

Coming now to chs 40-66, we have prophecies of comfort, salvation, and of the future glory awaiting Israel. These chapters naturally fall into three sections: (1) chs 40-48, announcing deliverance from captivity through Cyrus; (2) chs 49-57, describing the sufferings of the "Servant" of Jeh, this section ending like the former with the refrain, "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked" (57 21; cf 48 22); (3) chs 58-66, announcing the final abolition of all national distinctions and the future glory of the people of God. Ch 60 is the characteristic chapter of this section, as ch 53 is of the second, and ch 40 of the first.

Entering into greater detail, the first section (chs 40-48) demonstrates the deity of Jeh through His unique power to predict. The basis of the comfort which the prophet announces is Israel's incomparable God (ch 40). Israel's all-powerful Jeh in comparison with other gods is incomparable. In the prologue (40 1-11) he hears the four voices: (1) of grace (vs 1.2); (2) of prophecy (vs 3-5); (3) of faith (vs 6-8), and (4) of evangelism (vs 9-11). Then, after exalting the unique character of Israel's all-but-forgotten God (vs 12-26), he exhorts them not to suppose that Jeh is ignorant of, or indifferent to, Israel's misery. Israel must wait for salvation. They are clamoring for deliverance prematurely. Only wait, he repeats; for with such a God, Israel has no reason to despond (vs 27-31).

In ch 41 he declares that the supreme proof of Jeh's sole deity is His power to predict. He inquires, "Who hath raised up one from the east?" Though the hero is left unnamed, Cyrus is doubtless in the prophet's mind (cf 44 28; 45 1). He is not, however, already appearing upon the horizon of history as some fancy, but rather predicted as sure to come. The verb tenses which express completed action are perfects of certainty, and are used in precisely the same manner as those in 3 8; 5 13; 21 9. The answer to the inquiry is, "I, Jeh, the first, and with the last, I am he" (41 4). Israel is Jeh's servant. The dialogue continues; but it is no longer between Jeh and the nations, as in vs 1-7, but between Jeh and the idols (vs 21-29). Addressing the dumb idols, Jeh is represented as saying, Predict something, if you are real deities. As for myself, I am going to raise up a hero from the north who will subdue all who oppose him. And I announce my purpose now in advance "from the beginning," "beforetime," before there is the slightest ground for thinking that such a hero exists or ever will exist (ver 26), in order that the future may verify my prediction, and prove my sole deity. I, Jeh, alone know the future. In vs 25-29, the prophet even projects himself into the future and speaks from the standpoint of the fulfilment of his prediction. This, as we saw above, was a characteristic of Isaiah in chs 24-27.

In 42 1-43 13 the prophet announces also a spiritual agent of redemption, namely, Jeh's "Servant." Not only a temporal agent (Cyrus) shall be raised up to mediate Israel's redemption, which is the first step in the process of the universal salvation contemplated, but a spiritual factor. Jeh's "Servant" shall be employed in bringing the good tidings of salvation to the exiles and to the Gentiles also. In 42 1-9 the prophet describes this ideal figure and the work he will execute. The glorious future evokes a brief hymn of thanksgiving for the redemption which the prophet beholds in prospect (42 10-17). Israel has long been blind and deaf to Jeh's instructions (42 18,19), but now Jeh is determined to redeem them even at the cost of the most opulent nations of the world, that they may publish His law to all peoples (42 18-43 13).

In 13 14-44 23 forgiveness is made the pledge of deliverance. Jeh's determination to redeem Israel is all of grace. Salvation is a gift. Jeh has blotted out their transgressions for His own sake (43 25). "This passage," Dillmann observes, "marks the highest point of grace in the OT." Gods of wood and stone are nonentities. Those who manufacture idols are blind and dull of heart, and are "feeding on ashes." The section 44 9-20 is a most remorseless exposure of the folly of idolatry.

In 44 24-45 25 the prophet at length names the hero of Israel's salvation and describes his mission. He is Cyrus. He shall build Jerus and lay the foundations of the temple (44 28); he shall also subdue nations and let the exiles go free (45 1.13). He speaks of Cyrus in the most extraordinary, almost extravagant terms. He is Jeh's "shepherd" (44 28), he is also Jeh's "anointed," i.e. Messiah (45 1), "the man of my counsel" (46 11), whom Jeh has called by name, and surnamed without his ever knowing Him (45 3.4); the one "whom Jeh loveth" (48 14), whose right hand Jeh upholdeth (45 1), and who will perform all Jeh's pleasure (44 28); though but "a ravenous bird from the east" (46 11). The vividness with which the prophet speaks of Cyrus leads some to suppose that the latter is already upon the horizon. This, however, is a mistake. Scarcely would a contemporary have spoken in such terms of the real Cyrus of 538 BC. The prophet regards him (i.e. the Cyrus of his own prediction, not the Cyrus of history) as the fulfilment of predictions spoken long before. That is to say, in one and the same context, Cyrus is both predicted and treated as a proof that prediction is being fulfilled (44 24-28; 45 21). Such a phenomenon in prophecy can best be explained by supposing that the prophet projected himself into the future from an earlier age. Most extraordinary of all, in 45 14-17, the prophet soars in imagination until he sees, as a result of Cyrus' victories, the conquered nations renouncing their idols, and attracted to Jeh as the Saviour of all mankind (45 22). On any theory of origin, the predictive element in these prophecies is written large.

Chs 46-47 describe further the distinctive work of Cyrus, though Cyrus himself is but once referred to. Particular emphasis is laid on the complete collapse of the Bab religion; the prophet being apparently more concerned with the humiliation of Babylon's idols than with the fall of the city itself. Of course the destruction of the city would imply the defeat of her gods, as also the emancipation of Israel. But here again all is in the future; in fact Jeh's incomparable superiority and unique deity are proven by His power to predict "the end from the beginning" and bring His prediction to pass (46 10.11).

Ch 47 is a dirge over the downfall of the imperial city, strongly resembling the taunt-song over the king of Babylon in 14 4-21.

Ch 48 is a hortatory summary and recapitulation of the argument contained in chs 40-47, the prophet again emphasizing the following points: (1) Jeh's unique power to predict; (2) that salvation is of grace; (3) that Cyrus' advent will be the crowning proof of Jeh's abiding presence among His people; (4) that God's chastisements were only disciplinary; and (5) that even now there is hope, if they will but accept of Jeh's proffered salvation. Alas! that there is no peace or salvation for the godless (48 20-22). Thus ends the first division of Isaiah's remarkable "vision" of Israel's deliverance from captivity through Cyrus.

The second section (chs 49-57) deals with the spiritual agent of salvation, Jeh's suffering "Servant." With ch 49 the prophet leaves off attempting further to prove the sole deity of Jeh by means of prediction, and drops entirely his description of Cyrus' victories and the overthrow of Babylon, in order to set forth in greater detail the character and mission of the suffering "Servant" of Jeh. Already, in chs 40-48, he had alluded several times to this unique and somewhat enigmatical personage, speaking of him both collectively and as an individual (41 8-10; 42 1-9.18-22; 43 10; 44 1-5. 21-28; 45 4; 48 20-22); but now he defines with greater precision both his prophetic and priestly functions, his equipment for his task, his sufferings and humiliation, and also his final exaltation. Altogether in these prophecies he mentions the "Servant" some 20 t. But there are four distinctively so-called "Servant-Songs" in which the prophet seems to rise above the collective masses of all Israel to at least a personification of the pious within Israel, or better, to a unique Person embodying within himself all that is best in the Israel within Israel. They are the following: (1) 42 1-9, a poem descriptive of the Servant's gentle manner and world-wide mission; (2) 49 1-13, describing the Servant's mission and spiritual success; (3) 50 4-11, the Servant's soliloquy concerning His perfection through suffering; and (4) 52 13-53 12, the Servant's vicarious suffering and ultimate exaltation. In this last of the four "Servant-Songs" we reach the climax of the prophet's inspired symphony, the acme of Heb Messianic hope. The profoundest thoughts in the OT revelation are to be found in this section. It is a vindication of the "Servant," so clear and so true, and wrought out with such pathos and potency, that it holds first place among Messianic predictions. Polycarp called it "the golden passional of the OT." It has been realized in Jesus Christ.

Chs 58-66 describe the future glory of the people of God. Having described in chs 40-48 the temporal agent of Israel's salvation, Cyrus, and in chs 49-57 the spiritual agent of their salvation, the "Servant" of Jeh, the prophet proceeds in this last section to define the conditions on which salvation may be enjoyed. He begins, as before, with a double imperative, "Cry aloud, spare not" (cf 40 1; 49 1).

In ch 58 he discusses true fasting and faithful Sabbath observance.

In ch 59 he beseeches Israel to forsake their sins. It is their sins, he urges, which have hidden Jeh's face and retarded the nation's salvation. In vs 9 ff the prophet identifies himself with the people and leads them in their devotions. Jeh is grieved over Israel's forlorn condition, and, seeing their helplessness, He arms himself like a warrior to interfere judicially (vs 15-19). Israel shall be redeemed. With them as the nucleus of a new nation, Jeh will enter anew into covenant relation, and put His Spirit upon them, which will abide with them henceforth and forever (vs 20-21).

Chs 60-61 describe the future blessedness of Zion. The long-looked-for "light" (cf 59 9) begins to dawn: "Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of Jeh is risen upon thee" (60 1). The prophet pauses at this point to paint a picture of the redeemed community. As in 2 3.4, the Gentiles are seen flocking to Zion, which becomes the mistress of the nations. Foreigners build her walls, and her gates are kept open continually without fear of siege. The Gentiles acknowledge that Zion is the spiritual center of the world. Even Israel's oppressors regard her as "the city of Jeh," as "an eternal excellency," in which Jeh sits as its everlasting light (60 10-22).

In ch 61, which Drummond has called "the program of Christianity," the "Servant" of Jeh is again introduced, though anonymously, as the herald of salvation (vs 1-3). The gospel monologue of the "Servant" is followed by a promise of the restoration and blessedness of Jerus (vs 4-11). Thus the prophecy moves steadily forward toward its goal in Jesus Christ (cf Lk 4 18-21).

In 62 1-63 6 Zion's salvation is described as drawing near. The nations will be spectators of the great event. A new name which will better symbolize her true character shall be given to Zion, namely, Hephzi-bah, "My delight is in her"; for Jerus shall no more be called desolate. On the other hand, Zion's enemies will all be vanquished. In a brief poem of peculiar dramatic beauty (63 1-6), the prophet portrays Jeh's vengeance, as a victorious warrior, upon all those who retard Israel's deliverance. Edom in particular was Israel's insatiate foe. Hence the prophet represents Jeh's judgment of the nations as taking place on Edom's unhallowed soil. Jeh, whose mighty arm has wrought salvation, returns as victor, having slain all of Israel's foes.

In 63 7-64 12, Jeh's "servants" resort to prayer. They appeal to Jeh as the Begetter and Father of the nations (63 16; 64 8). With this thought of the fatherhood of God imbedded in his language, Isaiah had opened his very first oracle to Judah and Jerus (cf 1 2). As the prayer proceeds, the language becomes increasingly tumultuous. The people are thrown into despair because Jeh seems to have abandoned them altogether (63 19). They recognize that the condition of Jerus is desperate. "Our holy and our beautiful house, where our fathers praised thee, is burned with fire; and all our pleasant places are laid waste" (64 11). Such language, however, is the language of fervent prayer and must not be taken with rigid literalness, as 63 18 and 3 8 plainly show.

Finally, in chs 65-66, Jeh answers His people's supplications, distinguishing sharply between His own "servants" and Israel's apostates. Only His chosen "seed" shall be delivered (65 9). Those who have obdurately provoked Jeh by sacrificing in gardens (65 3; 66 17), offering libations to Fortune and Destiny (65 11), sitting among the graves to obtain oracles from the dead, and, like the Egyptians, eating swine's flesh and broth of abominable things which were supposed to possess magical properties, lodging in vaults or crypts in which heathen mysteries were celebrated (65 4), and at the same time fancying that by celebrating such heathen mysteries they are holier than others and thereby disqualified to discharge the ordinary duties of life (65 5)—such Jeh designs to punish, measuring their work into their bosom and destroying them utterly with the sword (65 7.12). On the other hand, the "servants" of Jeh shall inherit His holy mountains. They shall rejoice and sing for joy of heart, and bless themselves in the God of Amen, i.e. in the God of Truth (65 9.14.16). Jeh will create new heavens and a new earth, men will live and grow old like the patriarchs; they will possess houses and vineyards and enjoy them; for an era of idyllic peace will be ushered in with the coming of the Messianic age, in which even the natures of wild animals will be changed and the most rapacious of wild animals will live together in harmony (65 17-25). Religion will become spiritual and decentralized, mystic cults will disappear, incredulous scoffers will be silenced. Zion's population will be marvelously multiplied, and the people will be comforted and rejoice (66 1-14). Furthermore, all nations will flock to Zion to behold Jeh's glory, and from one new moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another, all flesh will come up to worship in Jerus (66 15-23).

It is evident that the Book of Isa closes, practically as it begins, with a polemic against false worship, and the alternate reward of the righteous and punishment of the wicked. The only essential difference between the prophet's earlier and later oracles is this: Isaiah, in his riper years, on the basis of nearly half a century's experience as a preacher, paints a much brighter eschatological picture than was possible in his early ministry. His picture of the Messianic age not only transcends those of his contemporaries in the 8th cent. BC, but he penetrates regions beyond the spiritual horizon of any and all OT seers. Such language as that contained in 66 1.2, in particular, anticipates the great principle enunciated by Jesus in Jn 4 24, namely, that "God is a Spirit: and they that worship him must worship in spirit and truth." To attempt to date such oracles as these on the basis of internal evidence is an absolute impossibility. Humanly speaking, one age could have produced such revelations quite as easily as another. But no age could have produced them apart from the Divine spirit.

The editorial arrangement of Isaiah's prophecies is very suggestive. In the main they stand in chronological order. That is to say,

8. Isaiah's all the dates mentioned are in strict chronological sequence; e.g. 6 1, "In the year that king Uzziah died" (740 BC); 7 1, "In the days of Ahaz" (736 BC); 14 28, "In the year that king Ahaz died" (727 BC); 20 1, "In the year that Tartan came unto Ashdod, when Sargon the king of Assyria sent him" (711 BC); 36 1, "In the 14th year of king Hezekiah" (701 BC). These points are all in strict chronological order. Taken in groups, also, Isaiah's great individual messages are likewise arranged in true historical sequence; thus, chs 1-6 for the most part belong to the last years of Jotham's reign (740-736 BC); chs 7-12, to the period of the Syro-Ephraimitic war (734 BC); ch 20, to the year of Sargon's siege of Ashdod (711 BC); chs 28-32, to the invasion of Judah by Sennacherib (701 BC); while the distinctively promiss-

sory portions (chs 40-66), as is natural, conclude the collection. In several minor instances, however, there are notable departures from a rigid chronological order. For example, ch 6, which describes the prophet's initial call to preach, follows the rebukes and denunciations of chs 1-5; but this is probably due to its being used by the prophet as an apologetic. Again, the oracles against foreign nations in chs 13-23 belong to various dates, being grouped together, in part, at least, because of their subject-matter. Likewise, chs 38-39, which give an account of Hezekiah's sickness and Merodach-baladan's embassy to him upon his recovery (714-712 BC), chronologically precede chs 36-37, which describe Sennacherib's investment of Jerus (701 BC). This chiasmic order, however, in the last instance, is due probably to the desire to make chs 36-37 (about Sennacherib, king of Assyria) an appropriate conclusion to chs 1-35 (which say much about Assyria), and, on the other hand, to make chs 38-39 (about Merodach-baladan of Babylon) a suitable introduction to chs 40-66 (which speak of Babylon).

The attempt to date Isaiah's individual messages on the basis of internal criteria alone, is a well-nigh impossible task; and yet no other kind of evidence is available. Often passages stand side by side which point in opposite directions; in fact, certain sections seem to be composed of various fragments dating from different periods, as though prophecies widely separated from each other in time had been fused together. In such cases much weight should be given to those features which point to an early origin, because of the predominatingly predictive character of Isaiah's writings.

Isaiah always had an eye upon the future. His semi-historical and biographical prophecies are naturally the easiest to date; on the other hand, the form of his Messianic and eschatological discourses is largely due to his own personal temper and psychology, rather than to the historical circumstances of the time. The following is a table of Isaiah's prophecies chronologically arranged:

The prophet's standpoint in chs 40-66 is that of Isaiah himself. For if Isaiah, before 734 BC, in passages confessedly his own, could describe Judah's cities as already "burned with fire," Zion as deserted as "a booth in a vineyard" (1 7.8), Jerus as "ruined," Judah as "fallen" (3 8), and Jeh's people as already "gone into captivity" (5 13), surely after all the destruction and devastation wrought on Judah by Assyria in the years 722, 720, 711, and 701 BC, the same prophet with the same poetic license could declare that the temple had been "trodden down" (63 18) and "burned with fire," and all Judah's pleasant places "laid waste" (64 11); and, in perfect keeping with his former promises, could add that "they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations" (61 4; cf 44 26; 58 12).

Or again, if Isaiah the son of Amoz could comfort Jerus with promises of protection when the Assyrian (734 BC) should come like an overflowing river (8 9.10; 10 24.25); and conceive a beautiful parable of comfort like that contained in 28 23-29; and insert among his warnings and exhortations of the gloomy year 702 BC so many precious promises of a brighter future which was sure to follow Sennacherib's invasion (29 17-24; 30 29-33; 31 8.9); and, in the very midst of the siege of 701 BC, conceive of such marvelous Messianic visions as those in 33 17-24 with which to dispel the dismay of his compatriots, surely the same prophet might be conceived of as seizing the opportunity to comfort those in Zion who survived the great catastrophe of 701 BC. The prophet who had done the one was prepared to do the other.

There was one circumstance of the prophet's position after 701 BC which was new, and which is too often overlooked, a circumstance which he could not have employed to anything like the same degree as an argument in enforcing his message prior to the Assyrian's overthrow and the deliverance of Jerus. It was this: the fulfilment of former predictions as proof of Jeh's deity. From such passages we obtain an idea of the prophet's true historical position (42 9; 44 8; 45 21; 46 10; 48 3). Old predictions have already been fulfilled (6 11-13; 29 8; 30 31; 31 8; 37 7.30), on the basis of which the prophet ventures to predict new and even more astounding things concerning the overthrow of Babylon by Cyrus, and Israel's deliverance through him from their captors (43 6). Isaiah's book is signally full of predictions (7 8.10 ff; 8 4.8; 9 11.12; 10 26 ff; 14 24-27; 16 14; 17 9.12-14; 20 4-6; 21 16; 22 19 ff; 23 15; 38 5), some of which, written down and sealed, were evidently committed by the prophet to his inner circle of disciples to be used and verified by them in subsequent crises (8 16). Failure to recognize this element in Isaiah's book is fatal to a true interpretation of the prophet's real message.

"For about twenty-five centuries," as A. B. Davidson observes (OT Prophecy, 1903, 244), "no one dreamt of doubting that Isaiah the son of Amoz was the author of every part of the book that goes under his name; and those who still maintain the unity of authorship are accustomed to point, with satisfaction, to the unanimity of the Christian church on the matter, till a few German scholars arose, about a century ago, and called in question the unity of this book." Tradition is unanimous in favor of the unity of the book.

(1) The history of criticism.—The critical disintegration of the book began with Koppe, who in 1780 first doubted the genuineness of ch 50. Nine years later Doederlein suspected the whole of chs 40-66. He was followed by Rosenmüller, who was the first to deny to Isaiah the prophecy against Babylon in 13 1-14 23. Eichhorn, at the beginning of the last century, further eliminated the oracle against Tyre in ch 23, and he, with Gesenius and Ewald, also denied the Isaianic origin of chs 24-27. Gesenius also ascribed to some unknown prophet chs 15 and 16. Rosenmüller then went farther, and pronounced against chs 34 and 35, and not long afterward (1840) Ewald questioned chs 12 and 33. Thus by the middle of the 19th cent. some 37 or 38 chapters were rejected as no part of Isaiah's actual writings. In 1879-80, the celebrated Leipzig professor, Franz Delitzsch, who for years previous had defended the genuineness of the entire book, finally yielded to the modern critical position, and in the new edition of his commentary published in 1889, interpreted chs 40-66, though with considerable hesitation, as coming from the close of the period of Bab exile. About the same time (1888-90), Drs. Driver and G. A. Smith gave popular impetus to similar views in Great Britain. Since 1890, the criticism of Isa has been even more trenchant and microscopic than before. Duhm, Stade, Guthe, Hackmann, Cornill and Marti on the Continent, and Cheyne, Whitehouse, Box, Glazebrook, Kennett, Gray, Peake, and others in Great Britain and America have questioned portions which hitherto were supposed to be genuine.

(2) The disintegration of "Deutero-Isaiah".—Even the unity of chs 40-66, which were supposed to be the work of the "Second" or "Deutero-Isaiah," is now given up. What prior to 1890 was supposed to be the unique product of some celebrated but anonymous seer who lived in Babylonia about 550 BC is today commonly divided and subdivided and in large part distributed among various writers from Cyrus to Simon (538-164 BC). At first it was thought sufficient to separate chs 63-66 as a later addition to "Deutero-Isaiah's" prophecies; but more recently it has become the fashion to distinguish between chs 40-55, which are claimed to have been written by "Deutero-Isaiah" in Babylonia about 549-538 BC, and chs 56-66, which are now alleged to have been composed by a "Trito-Isaiah" about 460-445 BC.

(3) Recent views.—Among the latest to investigate the problem is Professor R. H. Kennett of Cambridge, Eng., who, in his Schweich Lectures (The Composition of the Book of Isa in the Light of Hist and Archaeology, 1910, 84 ff), sums up the results of investigations as follows: (a) all of chs 3, 5, 6, 7, 20 and 31, and large portions of chs 1, 2, 4, 8, 9, 10, 14, 17, 22 and 23, may be assigned to Isaiah, the son of Amoz; (b) all of chs 13, 40 and 47, and large portions of chs 14, 21, 41, 43, 44, 45, 46 and 48, may be assigned to the time of Cyrus; (c) all of chs 15, 36, 37 and 39, and portions of chs 16 and 38, may be assigned to the period between Nebuchadnezzar and Alexander the Great, but cannot be dated precisely; (d) the passage 23 1-14 may be assigned to the time of Alexander the Great; (e) all of chs 11, 12, 19, 24-27, 29, 30, 32-35, 42, 49-66, and portions of chs 1, 2, 4, 8, 9, 10, 16, 17, 18, 23, 41, 44, 45, 48 may be assigned to the 2d cent. BC (167-140 BC).

Professor C. F. Kent, also (Sermons, Epistles, and Apocalypses of Israel's Prophets, 1910, 27 ff), makes the following critical observations on chs 40-66. He says: "The prophecies of Hagai and Zechariah . . . afford by far the best approach for the study of the difficult problems presented by Isa 40-66. . . . Chs 56-66 are generally recognized as post-exilic. . . . In Isa 56 and the following chapters there are repeated references to the temple and its service, indicating that it had already been restored. Moreover, these references are not confined to the latter part of the book. . . . The fact, on the one hand, that there are few, if any, allusions to contemporary events in these chapters, and on the other hand, that little or nothing is known of the condition and hopes of the Jews during this period (the closing years of the Bab exile) makes the dating of these prophecies possible, although far from certain. . . . Also, the assumption that the author of these chapters lived in the Bab exile is not supported by a close examination of the prophecies themselves. Possibly their author was one of the few who, like Zerubbabel, had been born in Babylon and later returned to Pal. He was also dealing with such broad and universal problems that he gives few indications of his date and place of abode; but all the evidence that is found points to Jerus as the place where he lived and wrote. . . . The prophet's interest and point of view center throughout in Jerus, and he shows himself far more familiar with conditions in Pal than in distant Babylon. Most of his illustrations are drawn from the agricultural life of Pal. His vocabulary is also that of a man dwelling in Pal, and in this respect is in marked contrast with the synonyms employed by Ezekiel, the prophet of the Bab exile."

That is to say, two of the most recent investigators of the Book of Isa reach conclusions quite at variance with the opinions advocated in 1890, when Delitzsch so reluctantly allowed that chs 40-

66 may have sprung from the period of Bab exile. Now, it is found that these last 27 chs were written after the exile, most probably in Pal, rather than in Babylonia as originally claimed, and are no longer considered addressed primarily to the suffering exiles in captivity as was formerly urged.

(4) The present state of the question.—The present state of the Isa-question is, to say the least, confusing. Those who deny the integrity of the book may be divided into two groups, which we may call moderates and radicals. Among the moderates may be included Drs. Driver, G. A. Smith, Skinner, Kirkpatrick, Koenig, A. B. Davidson, Barnes and Whitehouse. These all practically agree that the following chs and vs are not Isaiah's: 11 10-16; 12; 13 1-14 23; 15 1-16 12; 21 1-10; 24-27; 34-35; 36-39; 40-66. That is to say, some 44 chs out of the whole number, 66, were not written by Isaiah; or, approximately 800 out of 1,292 vs are not genuine. Among the radicals are Drs. Cheyne, Duhm, Hackmann, Guthe, Marti, Kennett and Gray. These all reject approximately 1,030 vs out of the total 1,292, retaining the following only as the genuine product of Isaiah and his age: 1 2-26. 29-31; 2 6-19; 3 1.5.8.9.12-17; 4 1; 5 1-14.17-29; 6; 7 1-8.22; 9 8-10 9; 10 13 14.27-32; 17 1-14; 18; 20; 22 1-22; 28 1-4.7-22; 29 1-6.9.10.13-15; 30 1-17; 31 1-4. That is, only about 262 vs out of the total 1,292 are allowed to be genuine. This is, we believe, a fair statement of the Isa-question as it exists in the hands of divisive critics today.

On the other hand there have been those who have defended and who still defend the essential unity of Isaiah's entire book, e.g. Strachey (1874), Nägelsbach (1877), Bredenkamp (1887), Douglas (1895), W. H. Cobb (1883-1908), W. H. Green (1892), Vos (1898-99), Thirtle (1907), Margoliouth (1910) and O. T. Allis (1912).

(5) Reasons for dissecting the book.—The fundamental axiom of criticism is the dictum that a prophet always spoke out of a definite historical situation to the present needs of the people among whom he lived, and that a definite historical situation shall be pointed out for each prophecy. This fundamental postulate, which on the whole is reasonable and perfectly legitimate if not overworked, underlies all modern criticism of OT prophecy. It is not possible, however, always to trace a mere snatch of sermonic discourse to a definite historical situation apart from its context. Moreover, the prophets often spoke consciously, not only to their own generation, but also to the generations to come. Isaiah in particular commanded, "Bind thou up the testimony, seal the law among my disciples" (8 16); that is, preserve my teachings for the future. Again in 30 8, he says, "Now go, . . . inscribe it in a book, that it may be for the time to come for ever and ever." And also in 42 23, "Who is there among you that will give ear to this? that will hearken and hear for the time to come?"

Certain false presuppositions often govern critics in their disintegration of the book. Only a few examples need be given by way of illustration: (a) According to some, "the conversion of the heathen" lay quite beyond the horizon of any 8th-cent. prophet; consequently, Isa 2 2-4 and all similar passages which foretell the conversion of those outside the chosen people are to be relegated to an age subsequent to Isaiah. (b) To others, "the picture of universal peace" in Isa 11 1-9 is a symptom of late date, and therefore this section and all kindred ones must be deleted. (c) To others, the thought of "universal judgment" upon "the whole earth" in 14 26 and elsewhere quite transcends Isaiah's range of thought. (d) To others still, the apocalyptic character of chs 24-27 represents a phase of Heb thought which prevailed in Israel only after Ezekiel. (e) Even to those who are considered moderates "the poetic character" of a passage like ch 12, and the references to a "return" from captivity, as in 11 11-16, and the promises and consolations such as are found in ch 33 are cited as grounds for assigning these and similar passages to a much later age. Radicals deny in toto the existence of all Messianic passages among Isaiah's own predictions, relegating all Messianic hope to a much later age.

But to deny to the Isaiah of the 8th cent. all catholicity of grace, all universalism of salvation or judgment, every highly developed Messianic ideal, every rich note of promise and comfort, all sublime faith in the sacrosanct character of Zion, as some do, is unwarrantably to create a new Isaiah of greatly reduced proportions, a mere preacher of righteousness, a statesman of not very optimistic vein, and the exponent of a cold ethical religion without the warmth and glow of the messages which are actually ascribed to the prophet of the 8th cent.

As a last resort, certain critics have appealed to 2 Ch 36 22.23 as external evidence that chs 40-66 existed as a separate collection in the Chronicler's age. But the evidence obtained from this source is so doubtful that it is well-nigh valueless. For it is not the prediction of Isa concerning Cyrus to which the Chronicler points as Jeremiah's, but the "70 years" of Bab supremacy spoken of in ver 21, which Jeremiah actually did predict (cf Jer 25 11; 29 10). On the other hand, chs 40-66 were certainly ascribed to Isaiah as early as 180 BC, for Jesus Ben-Sirach, the author of Ecclus, speaks of Isaiah as the prophet who "saw by an excellent spirit that which should come to pass at the last, and comforted them that mourned in Zion" (Ecclus 48 20 ff; cf Isa 40 1 ff). Furthermore, there is absolutely no proof that chs 1-39, or chs 40-66, or any other section of Isaiah's prophecies ever existed by themselves as an independent collection; nor is there any substantial ground for supposing that the promissory and Messianic portions have been systematically interpolated by editors long subsequent to Isaiah's own time. The earlier prophets presumably did more than merely threaten.

(6) Arguments for one Isaiah.—It is as unreasonable to expect to be able to prove the unity of Isa as to suppose that it has been disproved. Internal evidence is indecisive in either case. There are arguments, however, which corroborate a belief that there was but one Isaiah. Here are some of those which might be introduced:

(a) The circle of ideas, which are strikingly the same throughout the entire book: For example, take the characteristic name for God, which is almost peculiar to Isaiah, "the Holy One of Israel." This title for Jeh occurs in the Book of Isa a total of 25 t, and only 6 t elsewhere in the OT, one of which is a || passage in K. This unique epithet, "the Holy One of Israel," interlocks all the various portions with one another and stamps them with the personal imprimatur of him who saw the vision of the majestic God seated upon His throne, high and lifted up, and heard the angelic choirs singing: "Holy, holy, holy, is Jeh of hosts: the whole earth is full of his glory" (6 3). The presence of this Divine title in all the different sections of the book is of more value in identifying Isaiah as the author of all these prophecies than though his name had been inserted at the beginning of every chapter, for the reason that his theology—his conception of God as the Holy One—is woven into the very fiber and texture of the whole book. It occurs 12 t in chs 1-39, and 13 t in chs 40-66; and it is simply unscientific to say that the various alleged authors of the disputed portions all employed the same title through imitation (cf 1 4; 5 19.24; 10 20; 12 6; 17 7; 29 19; 30 11.12.15; 31 1; 37 23; also 41 14.16.20; 43 3.14; 45 11; 47 4; 48 17; 49 7; 54 5; 55 5; 60 9.14; elsewhere, only in 2 K 19 22; Ps 71 22; 78 41; 89 18; Jer 50 29; 51 5).

Another unique idea which occurs with considerable repetition in the Book of Isa is the thought of a "highway" (cf 11 16; 35 8; 40 3; 43 19; 49 11; 57 14; 62 10). Another characteristic idea is that of a "remnant" (cf 1 9; 10 20.21.22; 11 11.16; 14 22.30; 15 9; 16 14; 17 3; 21 17; 28 5; 37 31; 46 3; cf 65 8.9). Another striking trait of the book is the position occupied by "Zion" in the prophet's thoughts (cf 2 3; 4 5; 18 7; 24 23; 28 16; 29 8; 30 19; 31 9; 33 5.20; 34 8; 46 13; 49 14; 51 3.16; 52 1; 59 20; 60 14; 62 1.11; 66 8). Still another is the oft-repeated expression, "pangs of a woman in travail" (cf 13 8; 21 3; 26 17.18; 42 14; 54 1; 66 7). These, and many others less distinctive, psychologically stamp the book with an individuality which it is difficult to account for, if it be broken up into countless fragments and distributed, as some do, over the centuries.

(b) The literary style: As negative evidence, literary style is not a very safe argument; for, as Professor McCurdy says, "In the case of a writer of Isaiah's environments, style is not a sure criterion of authorship" (History, Prophecy and the Monuments, II, 317, n.). Yet it is certainly remarkable that the clause "for the mouth of Jeh hath spoken it" should be found 3 t in the Book of Isa, and nowhere else in the OT (cf 1 20; 40 5; 58 14). And it is noteworthy that the phrase, "streams of water," should occur twice in Isa and nowhere else (cf 30 25; 44 4 in the Heb.). And very peculiar is the tendency on the prophet's part to emphatic reduplication (cf 2 7.8; 6 3; 8 9; 24 16.23; 40 1; 43 11.25; 48 15; 51 12; 57 19; 62 10). In fact, it is not extravagant to say that Isaiah's style differs widely from that of every other OT prophet, and is as far removed as possible from that of Ezekiel and the post-exilic prophets.

(c) Historical references: Take, for example, first, the prophet's constant reference to Judah and Jerus, his country and its capital (1 7-9; 3 8; 24 19; 25 2; 40 2.9; 62 4); likewise, to the temple and its ritual of worship and sacrifice. In 1 11-15, when all was prosperous, the prophet complained that the people were profuse and formal in their ceremonies and sacrifices; in 43 23.24, on the contrary, when the country had been overrun by the Assyrian and Sennacherib had besieged the city, the prophet reminds them that they had not brought to Jeh the sheep of their burnt offerings, nor honored Him with their sacrifices; while in 66 1-3.6.20, not only is the existence of the Temple and the observance of the ritual presupposed, but those are sentenced who place their trust in the material temple, and the outward ceremonials of temple-worship. As for the "exile," the prophet's attitude to it throughout is that of both anticipation and realization. Thus, in 57 1, judgment is only threatened, not yet inflicted: "The righteous is taken away from the evil to come." That is to say, the exile is described as still future. On the other hand, in 3 8, "Jerus is ruined, and Judah is fallen," which seems to describe the exile as in the past; yet, as everybody admits, these are the words of Isaiah of the 8th cent. In 11 11.12, the prophet says, "The Lord will set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people . . . from the four corners of the earth." To interpret such a statement literally and mechanically without regard to 8th-cent. conditions, or to Isaiah's manifest attitude to the exile, leads to confusion. No prophet realized so keenly or described so vividly the destiny of the Hebrews.

(d) The predictive element: This is the strongest proof of the unity of the Book of Isa. Prediction is the very essence of prophecy (cf Dt 18 22); Isaiah was preëminently a prophet of the future. With unparalleled suddenness, he repeatedly leaps from despair to hope, from threat to promise, and from the actual to the ideal. What Professor Kent says of Deutero-Isaiah may with equal justice be said of Isaiah himself: "While in touch with his own age, the great unknown prophet lives in the atmosphere of the past and the future" (Sermons, Epistles, and Apocalypses of Israel's Prophets, 28). Isaiah spoke to his own age, but he also addressed himself to the ages to follow. His verb tenses are characteristically futures and prophetic perfects. Of his book A. B. Davidson's words are particularly true: "If any prophetic book be examined . . . it will appear that the ethical and religious teaching is always secondary, and that the essential thing in the book or discourse is the prophet's outlook into the future" (HDB, art. "Prophecy and Prophets," IV, 119).

Isaiah was exceptionally given to predicting: thus (a) before the Syro-Ephraimite war (734 BC), he predicted that within 65 years Ephraim should be broken to pieces (7 8); and that before the child Maher-shalal-hash-baz should have knowledge to cry, "My father," or "My mother," the riches of Damascus and the spoil of Samaria should be carried away (8 4; cf 7 16). These are, however, but two of numerous predictions, as shown above, among his earlier prophecies (cf 1 27.28; 2 2-4; 6 13; 10 20-23; 11 6-16; 17 14).

(b) Shortly before the downfall of Samaria in 722 BC, Isaiah predicted that Tyre should be forgotten 70 years, and that after the end of 70 years her merchandise should be holiness to Jeh (23 15 18).

(c) In like manner prior to the siege of Ashdod in 711 BC, he proclaimed that within 3 years Moab should be brought into contempt (16 14), and that within a year all the glory of Kedar should fail (21 16).

(d) And not long prior to the siege of Jerus by Sennacherib in 701 BC, he predicted that in an instant, suddenly, a multitude of Jerusalem's foes should be as dust (29 5); that yet a very little while and Lebanon should be turned into a fruitful field (29 17); and that Assyria should be dismayed and fall by the sword, but not of men (30 17.31; 31 8). And more, that for days beyond a year, the careless women of Jerus should be troubled (32 10.16-20); and that the righteous in Zion should see Jerus a quiet habitation, and return and come with singing (33 17 ff; 35 4 10); but that Sennacherib, on the contrary, should hear tidings and return without shooting an arrow into the city (37 7.26-29.33-35).

In like manner, also, after the siege of Jerus by Sennacherib in 701 BC was over, the prophet seems to have continued to predict; and, in order to demonstrate to the suffering and unbelieving remnant about him the deity of Jeh and the folly of idolatry, pointed to the predictions which he had already made in the earlier years of his ministry, and to the fact that they had been fulfilled. Thus, he says, "Who hath declared it from the beginning, that we may know? and beforetime, that we may say, He is right?" (41 21-23.26); "Behold, the former things are come to pass, and new things do I declare; before they spring forth I tell you of them" (42 9.23); "Who among them can declare this, and show us former things [i.e. things to come in the immediate future]? . . . I have declared, and I have saved, and I have showed" (43 9 12); "Who, as I, shall call, and shall declare it . . . ? And the things that are coming, and that shall come to pass, let them [the idols] declare. . . . Have I not declared unto thee of old, and showed it? And ye are my witnesses. That saith of Cyrus, He is my shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure, even saying of Jerus, She shall be built; and of the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid" (44 7.8.27.28); "It is I, Jeh, who call thee by thy name, even the God of Israel. . . . I have called thee by thy name: I have surnamed thee, though thou hast not known me. . . . Ask me of the things that are to come. . . . I have raised him [Cyrus] up in righteousness, and . . . he shall build my city, and he shall let my exiles go free" (45 3.4.11.13); "Declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times things that are not yet done; . . . calling a ravenous bird [Cyrus] from the east, the man of my counsel from a far country. . . . yea, I have spoken, I will also bring it to pass" (46 10.11); "I have declared the former things from of old, . . . and I showed them; suddenly I did them, and they came to pass. . . . I have declared it . . . from of old; before it came to pass I showed it thee; lest thou shouldst say, Mine idol hath done them" (48 3.5); "I have showed these new things from this time, even hidden things. . . . Yea, from of old thine ear was not opened. . . . Who among them hath declared these things? . . . I, even I, have spoken; yea, I have called him; . . . from the beginning I have not spoken in secret" (48 6-8.14-16). Such predictions are explicit and emphatic.

(e) Cyrus a subject of prediction: From all the above-mentioned explicit and oft-repeated predictions one thing is obvious, namely, that great emphasis is laid by the prophet on prediction throughout the entire Book of Isa. And it must be further allowed that "Cyrus" is represented by the author as predicted, from any point of view. The only question is, Does the prophet emphasize the fact that he himself is predicting the coming of Cyrus? or that former predictions concerning Cyrus are now, as the prophet writes, coming to pass before his readers' eyes? Canon Cheyne's remark upon this point is instructive. He says: "The editor, who doubtless held the later Jewish theory of prophecy, may have inferred from a number of passages, esp. 41 26; 48 3.6.14, that the first appearance of Cyrus had been predicted by an ancient prophet, and observing certain Isaianic elements in the phraseology of these chapters, may have identified the prophet with Isaiah" (Intro to the Book of Isa., 238).

Dr. G. A. Smith likewise allows that Cyrus is the fulfilment of former predictions.

He says: "Nor is it possible to argue, as some have tried to do, that the prophet is predicting these things as if they had already happened. For as part of an argument for the unique divinity of the God of Israel, Cyrus, 'alive and irresistible,' and already accredited with success, is pointed out as the unmistakable proof that former prophecies of a deliverance for Israel are already coming to pass. Cyrus, in short, is not presented as a prediction, but as a proof that a prediction is being fulfilled" (HDB, art. "Isaiah," 493). And further he says: "The chief claim, therefore, which chs 40 ff make for the God of Israel is His power to direct the history of the world in conformity to a long-predicted and faithfully followed purpose. This claim starts from the proof that Jeh has long before predicted events now happening or about to happen, with Cyrus as their center. But this is much more than a proof of isolated predictions, though these imply omniscience. It is a declaration of the unity of history sweeping to the high ends which have been already revealed to Israel—an exposition, in short, of the Omnipotence, Consistence, and Faithfulness of the Providence of the one true God" (ib., 496).

It is obvious, therefore, in any case, whether these chapters are early or late, that Cyrus is the subject of prediction. It really makes little difference at which end of history one takes his stand, whether in the 8th cent. BC with Isaiah, or in the 6th cent. BC with "Deutero-Isaiah." Cyrus, to the author of these chs, is the subject of prediction. In other words, whether indeed the author is really predicting Cyrus in advance of all apparent fulfilment, or Cyrus is the fulfilment of some ancient prediction by another, does not alter the fact that Cyrus was the subject of prediction on the part of somebody. Accordingly, as was stated at the outset, the whole question is, which does the prophet emphasize, (a) the fact that he himself is predicting? or, (b) that former predictions by someone else are now before his eyes coming to pass? The truth is, the prophet seems to live in the atmosphere of the past and the future as well as in the present, all of which are equally vivid to his prophetic mind. This is a peculiar characteristic of Isaiah. It is seen in the account he gives of his inaugural vision (ch 6), of which Delitzsch remarks that it is "like a prediction in the process of being fulfilled." The same is true of chs 24-27. There the prophet repeatedly projects himself into the future, and speaks from the standpoint of the fulfilment of his predictions. It is esp. true of chs 40-48. At one time the prophet emphasizes the fact that he is predicting, and a little later he describes his predictions as coming to pass. When, accordingly, a decision is made as to when the author predicted Cyrus, it is more natural to suppose that he was doing so long before Cyrus' actual appearance. This, in fact, is in keeping with the test of true prophecy contained in Dt 18 22: "When a prophet speaketh in the name of Jeh, if the thing follow not, nor come to pass, that is the thing which Jeh hath not spoken; the prophet hath spoken it presumptuously, thou shalt not be afraid of him." Besides, there is a similar explicit prediction in the OT, namely, that of King Josiah, who was foretold by name two centuries before he came (1 K 13 2; cf 2 K 23 15.16).

Dr. W. H. Cobb in the Journal of Bib. Literature and Exegesis, 1901, 79, pleads for a "shrinkage of Cyrus," because Cyrus figures only in chs 40-48, and is then dismissed. Dr. Thirtle, on the other hand, argues that the name "Cyrus" is a mere appellative, being originally not Kōresh (Cyrus), but hōresh ("workman," "artificer," "image-breaker"), and that 44 27.28 is a gloss (cf OT Problems, 244-64). But in opposition to these views the present writer prefers to write Cyrus large, and to allow frankly that he is the subject of extraordinary prediction. For the very point of the author's argument is, that he is predicting events which Jeh alone is capable of foretelling or bringing to pass; in other words, that prescience is the proof of Jeh's deity. Isaiah lived in an age when Jeh's secrets were first revealed privately unto His servants the prophets (cf Am 3 7). Political conditions were unsettled and kaleidoscopic, and there was every incentive to predict. That Isaiah actually uttered wonderful predictions is attested, furthermore, both by Jesus Ben-Sirach in Ecclus 48 20-25 (written c 180 BC), and by Jos in his Ant., XI, i, 1, 2 (dating from c 100 AD); and these are ancient traditions worthy of credence.

Recently, Mr. Oswald T. Allis, after a thorough and exhaustive critical investigation of "the numerico-climactic structure" of the poem in Isa 44 24-28, concludes that "the most striking and significant features of the poem favor the view that while the utterance was significant in and of itself, it was chiefly significant in view of the exceptional circumstance under which it was spoken, i.e. in view of its early date. The chronological arrangement of the poem assigns the Restoration and Cyrus to the future. The perspective of the poem, together with the abrupt change of person in the 2d strophe, argues that the future is a remote future. And finally the carefully constructed double climax attaches a significance to the definiteness of the utterance which is most easily accounted for if this future was so remote that a definite disclosure concerning it would be of extraordinary importance." And he further alleges that "it is impossible, if justice is done to the plain declarations of Scripture, to limit the prophetic horizon of the prophet Isaiah to the preëxilic period and that . . . when the form of the poem is recognized, there is every reason to assign it to a preëxilic prophet, to Isaiah, since the form of the poem is admirably calculated to emphasize the fact that Cyrus and the Restoration belong to a distant future, and to make it clear that it is just because of this fact that the definiteness of the prophecy, the mention of Cyrus by name, is so remarkable and of such unique significance" (Bib. and Theol. Studies, by the members of the Faculty of Princeton Theological Seminary, Centennial vol, 1912, 628-29).

After all, why should men object to prediction on so large a scale? Unless there is definiteness about any given prediction, and unless it transcends ordinary prognostication, there is no especial value in it. Should it be objected, however, that prediction of so minute a character is "abhorrent to reason," the answer is already at hand; it may be abhorrent to reason, but it is a handmaid to faith. Faith has to do with the future, even as prediction has to do with the future; and the OT is preeminently a book which encourages faith. There is really no valid objection to the prediction of Cyrus. For the one outstanding differentiating characteristic of Israel's religion is predictive prophecy. The Hebrews certainly predicted the coming of a Messiah. Indeed, the Hebrews were the only people of antiquity whose "Golden Age" lay in the future rather than in the past. Accordingly, to predict the coming of a Cyrus as the human agent of Israel's salvation is but the reverse side of the same prophet's picture of the Divine agent, namely, the obedient, Suffering Servant of Jeh, who would redeem Israel from its sin. Deny to Isaiah the son of Amoz the prediction concerning Cyrus, and it is but logical to go farther and to deny to him the Messianic hope which is usually associated with his name. Deny to Isaiah the son of Amoz the predictions concerning a return from captivity, and the prophecies of his book are robbed of their essential character and unique perspective. Emasculate those portions of the Book of Isa which unveil the future, and they are reduced to a mere vaticinium ex eventu, and their religious value as Divine oracles is largely lost.

ISCAH, iz'ka, is'ka (יִשְׁכָּה, yishkäh): Daughter of Haran and sister of Milcah the wife of Nahor (Gen 11 29). Tradition identifies her with Sarai, Abram's wife; but without sufficient reason.

ISCARIOT, is-kar'i-ot. See JUDAS ISCARIOT.

ISDAEL, is'dä-el (יִסְדָּאֵל, Isdäel): In 1 Esd 5 33; called "Giddel" in Ezr 2 56.

ISH (אִישׁ, 'ish): In the following Heb proper names, a prefix meaning "man of," or, collectively, "men of": Ish-bosheth, Ishhod, Ish-tob (but RV correctly "the men of Tob"). See also ESHBAAL; ESHBAN; ISCARIOT.

ISHBAAL, ish'bä-al. See ISH-BOSHETH.

ISHBAH, ish'ba (יִשְׁבָּה, yishbah): A member of the tribe of Judah, father of Eshtemoa (1 Ch 4 17).

ISHBAK, ish'bak (יִשְׁבָּק, yishbak): A name in the list of sons of Abraham by Keturah (Gen 25 2 || 1 Ch 1 32). These names probably represent tribes; the tribe of Ishbak has not been certainly identified.

ISHBI-BENOB, ish-bi-bē'nob (יִשְׁבִּי בְנוֹב, yishbi bh'nōbh): One of the four "born to the giant in Gath" who were slain by David and his men (2 S 21 15-22). Ishbi-benob was slain by Abishai, and David's life saved by the act (vs 16.17).

ISH-BOSHETH, ish-bō'sheth (אִישׁ-בֹּשֶׁת, 'ish-bōsheth, "man of shame"; יֵשׁוּבֹשֶׁת, Ieshbōshē): Called אִישׁ-בַּאֵל, 'eshba'al, "man of Baal" (1 Ch 8 33), and יִשְׁוִי, yishwī, "man of Jeh" (?), perhaps for אִישׁ-יָד, 'ish'yō (1 S 14 49). Cf ESHBAAL and ISHVI (AV "Ishui"). We probably have the right meaning of the name in Eshbaal and Ishvi, the words Baal and Jeh being frequently interchanged. The change to Ish-bosheth, "man of shame," in 2 S, where the story of his shameful murder is related, may be better explained as reference to this (see MEFIBOSHETH, whose name was also changed from Merib-baal for similar reasons), than to find here a suggestion of Baal-worship, but see HPN, 121, where the change is explained as a correction of the scribes, in consequence of prophetic protests.

One of the sons of Saul (1 Ch 8 33; 9 39; 1 S 14 49) who, when his father and brothers were slain in the battle of Gilboa (1 S 31 1 ff), was proclaimed king over Israel by Abner, the captain of Saul's host, at Mahanaim (2 S 2 8 ff). Ish-bosheth was 40 years old at this time and reigned over Israel 2 years (2 S 2 10). Judah, however, proclaimed David its king. The consequence was war (2 S 2 12 ff). The house of David prevailed against the house of Saul (2 S 3 1), but the war did not come to a close until Abner, angry on account of the rebuke he suffered from I. for his unlawful intimacy with Rizpah, Saul's concubine, joined David (2 S 3 6 ff). David's condition to return to him Michal, his wife, before peace could be made, was fulfilled by I. (2 S 3 14 f), but it was not until after Abner's death that I. seems to have given up hopes of retaining his power (2 S 4 1 ff). The shameful murder of I. by his own captains is recorded in 2 S 4 5 ff. David punished the murderers who had expected reward and buried I. in the grave of Abner at Hebron (2 S 4 12 f).

ARTHUR L. BRESLICH

ISHHOD, ish'hod (אִישְׁחֹד, 'ish'hōdh, "man of majesty"): A man of the tribe of Manasseh (1 Ch 7 18, AV "Ishod").

ISHI, ish'ī (יְשִׁי, yish'ī, "salutary"):

(1) A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2 31); the genealogy may denote his membership by blood, or only by adoption, in the tribe of Judah.

(2) A Judahite (1 Ch 4 20).

(3) A Simeonite, whose sons led 500 of their tribe against the Amalekites in Mt. Seir (1 Ch 4 42).

(4) One of the chiefs of Manasseh E. of the Jordan (1 Ch 5 24).

ISHI, ish'ī, ī'shī (יְשִׁי, yish'ī, "my husband"; LXX δ ἀνὴρ μου, ho anēr mou): The name symbolic of Jeh's relation to Israel which Hosca (2 16) declares shall be used when Baalī, "my lord," has become hateful on account of its associations with the worship of the Baals.

ISHIAH, i-shī'ya. See ISSIAH.

ISHIJAH, ī-shī'ja. See ISSIJAH.

ISHMA, ish'ma (יִשְׁמָא, yishmā, from the root yāsham, "to lie waste," therefore meaning "desolate"): A brother of Jezreel and Idbash, "the sons of the father of Etam" (1 Ch 4 3). They were brothers of Hazzeleponi.

ISHMAEL, ish'mā-el (יִשְׁמָאֵל, yishmā'ēl, "God heareth," or "God may," "shall hear"; Ἰσμαήλ, Ismaēl):

(1) The son of Abraham by Hagar, the Egypt slave of his wife Sarah. The circumstances connected with his birth reveal what seems to us to be a very strange practice. It was customary among ancient peoples to correct the natural defect of barrenness by substituting a slave woman. In our narrative, this is shown to be authorized and brought about by the legitimate wife with the understanding that the offspring of such a union should be regarded as her own: "It may be that I shall obtain children by her," lit. "that I shall be builded by her" (Gen 16 2).

The hopes of Sarah were realized, for Hagar gave birth to a son, and yet the outcome was not fully pleasing to Abraham's wife; there was one serious drawback. As soon as Hagar "saw that she had conceived," her behavior toward her mistress underwent a radical change; she was "despised in her eyes." But for the intervention of the angel of Jeh, the boy might have been born in Egypt. For, being dealt with hardly (or humbled) by Sarah, the handmaid fled toward that country. On her way she was told by the angel to return to her mistress and submit herself "under her hands." She obeyed, and the child who was to be as "a wild ass among men" was born when his father was 86 years old (Gen 16 7-16).

At the age of 13 years the boy was circumcised (Gen 17 25) in accordance with the Divine command received by Abraham: "Every

1. Birth male among you shall be circumcised" (Gen 17 10). Thus young Ishmael was made a party to the covenant into which God had entered with the lad's father. The fact that both Abraham and his son were circumcised the same day (Gen 17 26) undoubtedly adds to the importance of Ishmael's partaking of the holy rite. He was certainly made to understand how much his father loved him and how deeply he was concerned about his spiritual welfare. We may even assume that there was a time when Abraham looked upon Ishmael as the promised seed. His error was made clear to him when God promised him the birth of a son by Sarah. At first this seemed to be incredible, Abraham being 100 years of age and Sarah 90. And yet, how could he disbelieve the word of God? His cherished, though mistaken, belief about Ishmael, his doubts regarding the possibility of Sarah's motherhood, and the first faint glimmer of the real meaning of God's promise, all these thoughts found their expression in the fervid wish: "O that Ishmael might live before thee" (Gen 17 18). Gradually the truth dawned upon the patriarch that God's thoughts are not the thoughts of men, neither their ways His ways. But we have no reason to believe that this entire changing of the mental attitude of Abraham toward Ishmael reacted unfavorably on his future treatment of this son "born of the flesh" (cf Gen 21 11). If there were troubles in store for the boy likened by the angel of Jeh to a wild ass, it was, in the main, the youngster's own fault.

When Isaac was weaned, Ishmael was about 16 years of age. The weaning was made an occasion for great celebration. But it seems the

"And Sarah saw the son of Hagar the Egypt . . . mocking" (Gen 21 9). Her jealous motherly love had quickened her sense of observation and her faculty of reading the character of children. We do not know exactly what the word used in the Heb for "mocking" really means. The LXX and the Vulg render the passage: "When Sarah saw the son of Hagar . . . playing with Isaac," and St. Paul followed a later tradition when he says: "He that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit" (Gal 4 29). Lightfoot (in his notes to the Ep. to the Gal) says: "At all events the word seems to mean mocking, jeering." At any rate, the fact remains that Sarah objected to the bringing up of the son of promise together with the "mockers," and so both mother and son were banished from the tents of Abraham.

Now there came a most critical time in the life of young Ishmael. Only some bread and a bottle of water were "put on the shoulder" of Hagar by Abraham when he expelled her with her son. Aimlessly, as it seems, the two walked about in the wilderness of Beersheba. The water was soon spent, and with it went all hope and energy. The boy, being faint with thirst and tired out by his constant walking in the fierce heat of the sun, seemed to be dying. So his mother put him rapidly down in the shade of some plant. (We do not share the opinion of some writers that the narrative of Gen 21 8 ff represented Ishmael as a little boy whom his mother had carried about and finally flung in the shade of some shrub. Even if this passage is taken from a different source, it is certainly not in conflict with the rest as to the age of Ishmael.) After this last act of motherly love—what else could she do to help the boy?—she retired to a place at some distance and resignedly expected the death of her son and perhaps her own.

For the 2d time in her life, she had a marvelous experience. "God heard the voice of the lad" and comforted the unhappy mother most wonderfully. Through His angel He renewed His former promise regarding her son, and then He showed her a well of water. The lad's life was saved and, growing up, he became in time an archer. He lived in the wilderness of Paran and was married by his mother to an Egypt wife (Gen 21 21).

When Abraham died, his exiled son returned to assist his brother to bury their father (Gen 25 9).

4. His Children In the same chapter we find the names of Ishmael's 12 sons (vs 12 ff) and a brief report of his death at the age of 137 years (ver 17). According to Gen 28 9 he also had a daughter, Mahalath, whom Esau took for his wife; in Gen 36 3 her name is given as Basemath.

The character of Ishmael and his descendants (Arabian nomads or Bedouins) is very accurately and vividly depicted by the angel of Jeh: "He shall be as a wild ass among men; his hand shall be against every man, and every man's hand against him" (Gen 16 12). These nomads are, indeed, roaming the wilds of the desert, jealous of their independence, quarrelsome and adventurous. We may well think of their progenitor as of a proud, undaunted and rugged son of the desert, the very counterpart of the poor boy lying half dead from fatigue and exposure under the shrub in the wilderness of Beersheba.

The person and the history of Ishmael, the son of Abraham, "born after the flesh," is of special interest to the student of the NT because St. Paul uses him, in the Ep. to the Gal, as a type of those Jews who cling to the paternal religion in such a manner as to be unable to discern the transient character of the OT institutions, and esp. those of the Mosaic law. By doing so they could not be made to see the true meaning of the law, and instead of embracing the grace of God as the only means of fulfilling the law, they most bitterly fought the central doctrine of Christianity and even persecuted its advocates. Like Ishmael, they were born of Hagar, the handmaid or slave woman; like him, they were Abraham's sons only "after the flesh," and their ultimate fate is foreshadowed in the casting out of Hagar and her son. They could not expect to maintain the connection with the true Israel, and even in case they should acclaim Christ their Messiah they were not to be the leaders of the church or the expounders of its teachings (Gal 4 21-28).

(2) The son of Nethaniah (Jer 40 8—41 18; cf 2 K 25 23-25). It is a dreary story of jealousy and treachery which Jeremiah has recorded in chs 40, 41 of his book. After the destruction of Jerus and the deportation of the better class of Jewish citizens, it was necessary to provide for some sort of a government in the depopulated country. Public order had to be restored and maintained; the crops of the fields were endangered and had to be taken care of. It was thus only common political prudence that dictated to the king of Babylon the setting up of a governor for the remnant of Judah. He chose Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam, for the difficult position. The new officer selected for his place of residence the city of Mizpah, where he was soon joined by Jeremiah. All the captains of the Jewish country forces came to Mizpah with their men and put themselves under Gedaliah's orders (Jer 40 13). Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, the son of Elishama "of the seed royal" (2 K 25 25) was among their number—all of which must have been rather gratifying to the new governor. But he was destined to be cruelly disappointed. A traitor was among the captains that had gathered around him. Yet the governor might have prevented his dastardly scheme. Johanan, the son of Kareah, and other loyal captains warned him of the treachery of Ishmael, telling him he was induced by Baalis, the Ammonite king, to assassinate the governor. But the governor's faith in Ishmael was not to be shaken; he even looked upon Johanan's report as false and calumnious (Jer 40 16).

About 2 months after the destruction of Jerus, Ishmael was ready to strike the mortal blow. With 10 men he came to Mizpah, and there, at a banquet given in his honor, he killed Gedaliah and all the Jews and Chaldeans that were with him. He succeeded in keeping the matter secret, for, 2 days after the horrible deed, he persuaded a party of 80 pious Jews to enter the city and killed all but 10 of them, throwing their bodies into a pit. These men were coming from the ruins of the Temple with the offerings which they had intended to leave at Jerus. Now they had found out, to their great distraction, that the city was laid waste and the Temple destroyed. So they passed by Mizpah, their beards shaven, their clothes rent, and with cuts about their persons (Jer 41 5). We may, indeed, ask indignantly, Why this new atrocity? The answer may be found in the fact that Ishmael did not kill all of the men. He spared 10 of them because they promised him some hidden treasures. This shows his motive. He was a desperate man and just then carrying out a desperate undertaking. He killed those peaceful citizens because of their money, and money he needed to realize his plans. They were those of a traitor to his country, inasmuch as he intended to deport the inhabitants of Mizpah to the land of his high confederate, the king of the Ammonites. Among the captives were Jeremiah and the daughters of the Jewish king. But his efforts came to naught. When Johanan and the other captains were told of Ishmael's unheard-of actions, they immediately pursued the desperate adventurer and overtook him by the "great waters that are in Gibeon." Unfortunately, they failed to capture Ishmael; for he managed to escape with eight men to the Ammonites. See, further, GEDALIAH.

(3) A descendant of Benjamin and the son of Azel (1 Ch 8 38; cf 9 44).

(4) The father of Zebadiah who was "the ruler of the house of Judah, in all the king's [Jehoshaphat, 2 Ch 19 8] matters" (2 Ch 19 11).

(5) The son of Jehohanan, and a "captain of hundreds," who lived at the time of Jehoiada and Joash (2 Ch 23 1).

(6) One of the sons of Pashhur the priest. He was one of those men who had married foreign women and were compelled to "put away their wives" (Ezr 10 22).

ISHMAEL (יִשְׁמָאֵל, Ismā'el):

(1) AV "Ismael" (Jth 2 23), the son of Abraham by Hagar.

(2) 1 Esd 9 22 (AV, RV "Ismael"), corresponding to Ishmael in Ezr 10 22. See preceding art.

ISHMAELITES, ish'mā-el-its (יִשְׁמְעֵאֵלִים, yish-m'e'ē'lim): The supposed descendants of Ishmael, the son of Abraham and Hagar, whom Abraham sent away from him after the birth of Isaac (Gen 21 14-21). The sons of Ishmael are given in Gen 25 13, 14; they were twelve in number and gave rise to as many tribes, but the term Ishmaelite has a broader signification, as appears from Gen 37 28. 36, where it is identified with Midianite. From Gen 16 12 it may be inferred that it was applied to the Bedawin of the desert region E. of the Jordan generally, for the character there assigned to Ishmael, "His hand shall be against every man, and every man's hand against him," fits the habits of Bedawin in all ages. Such was the character of the Midianites as described in Jgs 7, who are again identified with the Ishmaelites (8 24). These references show that the Ishmaelites were not confined to the descendants of the son of Abraham and Hagar, but refer to the desert tribes in general, like "the children of the east" (Jgs 7 12).

H. PORTER

ISHMAIAH, ish-mā'ya (יִשְׁמַיָּה, yishma'yāh, "Jeh is hearing"):

(1) A man of Gibeon, chief of David's 30 great warriors, who came to him at Ziklag (1 Ch 12 4, AV "Ismaiah").

(2) Chief of the armed contingent of the tribe of Zebulun, which served David in the monthly order of the tribes (1 Ch 27 19).

ISHMEELITES, ish'mē-el-its (יִשְׁמְעֵאֵלִים, yish-m'e'ē'li). See ISHMAELITES.

ISHMERAI, ish'mē-rī (יִשְׁמֵרַי, yishm'ray, from shāmar, meaning "to hedge about," i.e. "to guard," and therefore a "guard," "protector"): A descendant of Benjamin, son of Epaal, resident of Jerus, one of the "heads of fathers' houses throughout their generations, chief men" (1 Ch 8 18).

ISHOD, i'shod, ish'od (יִשְׁדֹּד, 'ish'hōdh): AV 1 Ch 7 18 for ISHOD (q.v.).

ISHPAH, ish'pa (יִשְׁפָּה, 'yishpāh, "firm," "strong"): A man of the tribe of Benjamin, of the house of Beriah (1 Ch 8 16).

ISHPAN, ish'pan (יִשְׁפָּן, 'yishpān, lit. "he will hide"): Descendant of Benjamin, son of Shashak, one of "the chief men, heads of fathers' houses"; lived at Jerus (1 Ch 8 22).

ISH-SECHEL, ish'sē-kel (אִישׁ שְׁכֶל, 'ish sekhel, "man of discretion"): Ezra, at one time in need of ministers for the house of God, sent "unto Iddo the chief at the place Casiphia." "And according to the good hand of our God upon us they brought us a man of discretion [m "Ish-sechel"], of the sons of Mahli, the son of Levi, the son of Israel" (Ezr 8 18). This is the only reference to Ish-sechel.

ISH-TOB, ish'tob (אִישׁ טוֹב, 'ish tōbh, ARV "the men of Tob"): A place in Pal, probably a small kingdom, large enough, however, to supply at least 12,000 men of valor to the children of Ammon in their struggle against Joab, David's general (2 S 10 6.8). See ISH.

ISHUAH, ish'ū-a, ISUAH, is'ū-a (יִשְׁוֹה, 'yishwāh, lit. "he will level"). See ISHUAI; ISHVAH; ISHVI.

ISHUAI, ish'ū-i, ISHUI, ish'ū-i (יִשְׁוִי, 'yishwī, "level"). See ISHVI.

ISHVAH, ish'va (יִשְׁוֹה, 'yishwāh, "even," "level"; AV Ishuah and Isuah): Second son of Asher (Gen 46 17; 1 Ch 7 30). As only the families of his brothers Ishvi, etc, are mentioned in Nu 26 44, the supposition is that he left no issue.

ISHVI, ish'vī (יִשְׁוִי, 'yishwī, "equal"):

(1) The third son of Asher (Gen 46 17; 1 Ch 7 30), and founder of the family of the Ishvites (Nu 26 44, AV "Jesuites"), AV "Isui," "Jesui," and "Ishui."

(2) The name is also found among the sons of Saul (1 S 14 49), AV "Ishui."

ISLAND, i'land, ISLE, il ([l] אִי, 'ī, "island" or "isle"; ARV has "coast" or "coast-land" in Isa 20 6; 23 2.6; RVm has "coast-lands" in Gen 10 5; Isa 11 11; 24 15; 59 18; Jer 25 22; Ezk 39 6; Dnl 11 18; Zeph 2 11; RVm has "sea-coast" in Jer 47 4. [2] pl. אִיִּים, 'īyīm, AV "wild beasts of the islands," RV "wolves," RVm "howling creatures" [Isa 13 22; 34 14; Jer 50 39]. [3] νῆσος, nēston, "small island" [Acts 27 16]. [4] νῆσος, nēsos, "island" [Acts 13 6; 27 26; 28 1.7.9.11; Rev 1 9; 6 14; 16 20]): Except as noted above, 'ī in RV is tr'd "isle" or "island." ARVAD (q.v.), a Phoen island-city N. of Tripoli, Syria, is mentioned in Gen 10 18; 1 Ch 1 16; Ezk 27 8.11. This and Tyre were the only important islands on the coast, both of them very small. We find references to Kittim or Chittim, Cyprus (Gen 10 4; Nu 24 24; 1 Ch 1 7; Isa 23 1.12; Jer 2 10; Ezk 27 6; Dnl 11 30); to Elishah, perhaps Carthage (Gen 10 4; 1 Ch 1 7; Ezk 27 7); to "isles of the nations" (Gen 10 5; Zeph 2 11); to "isles of the sea" (Est 10 1; Isa 11 11; 24 15; Ezk 26 18); to "Tarshish and the isles" (Ps 72 10; cf Isa 66 19); to "isle [RVm "sea-coast"] of Caphtor" (Jer 47 4). Communication with these islands or distant coasts is kept up by the Tyrians (Ezk 27 3.15). The Jews were not a maritime people, and in early times their geographical knowledge was very limited. Of 32 OT passages referring to "island" or "isle," 25 are in Isa, Jer, and Ezk. In the NT, besides the passages noted above, and Patmos (Rev 1 9), various islands are mentioned by name in connection with the voyages of St. Paul, e.g. Cyprus, Crete, Lesbos, Samos, Samothrace, Chios, Melita, Sicily (Syracuse, Acts 28 12). "Jackals" is a perfectly possible tr of 'īyīm (AV "wild beasts of the islands," RV "wolves," RVm "howling creatures"). See COAST; GEOGRAPHY; JACKAL; WOLF.

ALFRED ELY DAY

ISLES OF THE GENTILES (Gen 10 5): ARV "isles [m "coast-lands"] of the nations," said of the territories of the sons of Japheth. The reference is to the coasts of the Western Mediterranean, with their islands (cf "isles of the sea," Est 10 1; Ezk 26 18, etc). See TABLE OF NATIONS.

ISMACHIAH, is-ma-ki'a (יִסְמַחְיָה, 'yismakh-yāhū, "Jeh will sustain"): One of the "overseers under the hand of Conaniah and Shimei his brother, by the appointment of Hezekiah the king, and Azariah the ruler of the house of God" (2 Ch 31 13).

ISMAEL, is'mā-el. See ISHMAEL.

ISMAERUS, is-ma-ē'rus (Ἰσμαῖρος, 'Ismāēros): AV "Omaerus" (1 Esd 9 34), corresponding to Amram in Ezr 10 34.

LITERATURE

Introductory.—The chief and best source from which we can learn who this people was and what was its history is the Bible itself, esp.

1. Sources the OT, which tells us the story of this people from its earliest beginnings.

(1) In the OT.—The origins of Israel are narrated in Gen; the establishment of the theocracy, in the other books of the Pent; the entrance into Canaan, in the Book of Josh; the period preceding the kings, in the Book of Jgs; the establishment of the monarchy and its development, in the Books of S, and the opening chapters of the Books of K, which latter report also the division into two kingdoms and the history of these down to their overthrow. The Books of Ch contain, || with the books already mentioned, a survey of the historical development from Adam down to the Bab captivity, but confine this account to the theocratic center of this history and its sphere. Connected with Ch are found the small Books of Ezr and Neh, which probably originally constituted a part of Ch, but which pass over the Exile and begin at once with the story of the Return. Then, too, these two books contain only certain episodes in the history of the Return, which were of importance for the restoration of the Jewish theocracy, so that the story found in them is anything but complete. With the 5th cent. BC the Bib. narrative closes entirely. For the succeeding centuries we have nothing but some scattered data; but for the 2d pre-Christian cent. we have a new source in the Books of the Macc, which give a connected account of the struggles and the rule of the Asmoneans, which reach, however, only from 174 to 135 BC.

The historical value of the OT books is all the greater the nearer the narrator or his sources stand in point of time to the events that are recorded; e.g. the contents of the Books of K have in general greater value as historical sources than what is reported in the Books of Ch, written at a much later period. Yet it is possible that a later chronicler could have made use of old sources which earlier narrators had failed to employ. This is the actual state of affairs in connection with a considerable number of matters reported by the Bib. chroniclers, which supplement the exceedingly meager extracts furnished by the author of the Books of K. Then, further, the books of the prophets possess an extraordinary value as historical sources for the special reason that they furnish illustrations of the historical situation and events from the lips of contemporaries. As an example we can refer to the externally flourishing condition of the kingdom of Judah under King Uzziah, concerning which the Books of K report practically nothing, but of which Ch give details which are confirmed by the testimony of Isaiah.

(2) Josephus.—A connected account of the history of Israel has been furnished by Flavius Josephus. His work entitled Jewish Antiquities, however, as far as trustworthiness is concerned, is again considerably inferior to the Books of Ch, since the later traditions of the Jews to a still greater extent influenced his account. Only in those cases in which he could make use of foreign older sources, such as the Egypt Manetho or Phoen authors, does he furnish us with valuable material. Then for the last few centuries preceding his age, he fills out a certain want. Esp. is he the best authority for the events which he himself passed through and which he reports in his work on the Jewish Wars, even if he is not free from certain personal prejudices (see JOSEPHUS, FLAVIUS). For the customs and usages of the later Jewish times the traditions deposited in the Talm are also to be considered. Much less than to Jos can any historical value be credited to the Alexandrian Jew, Philo. The foreign authors, e.g. the Gr and the Lat historians, contain data only for the story of the nations surrounding Israel, but not for the early history of Israel itself.

(3) The Monuments.—On the other hand, the early history of Israel has been wonderfully enriched in recent times through the testimonies of the monuments. In Pal itself the finds in historical data and monuments have been, up to the present time, rather meager. Yet the excavations on the sites of ancient Taanach, Megiddo, Jericho, Gezer and Samaria have brought important material to light, and we have reasons to look for further archaeological and literary finds, which may throw a clear light on many points that have remained dark and uncertain. Also in lands round about Pal, important documents (the Moabite Stone; Phoen inscriptions) have already been found. Esp. have the discovery and interpretation of the monuments found in Egypt, Assyria and Babylonia very materially advanced our knowledge of the history of Israel. Not only has the connection of the history of this people with universal history been clearly illuminated by these finds, but the history of Israel itself has gained in tangible reality. In some detail matters, traditional ideas have given way to clearer conceptions; e.g. the chronology of the OT, through Assyriological research, has been set on a safer foundation. But all in all, these archaeological discoveries have confirmed the confidence that has been placed in the Bib. historical sources.

It is true that the rules applied to profane history cannot, without modification, be applied to the historical writings of the Hebrews. The

2. Religious Bib. narrators are concerned about Character something more than the preservation of the of historical facts and data. Just as History little is it their purpose to glorify their people or their rulers, as this is done on the memorial tablets of the Egypt, the Assy, and the Bab kings. Looked at merely from the standpoint of profane history, there are many omissions in the OT historical books that are found objectionable. Sometimes whole periods are passed over or treated very briefly. Then, too, the political pragmatism, the secular connection in the movements of the nations and historical events, are often scarcely mentioned. The standpoint of the writer is the religious. This appears in the fact that this history begins with the creation of the world and reports primitive traditions concerning the origin of mankind and their earliest history in the light of the revelation of the God of Israel, and that it makes this national history a member in the general historical development of mankind. Nor was this first done by the author of the Pent in its present shape. Already the different documentary sources found combined in the Pent, namely E, J and P, depict the history of Israel according to the plan which the Creator of the world had with this people. Also, when they narrate the national vicissitudes of Israel, the writers are concerned chiefly to exhibit clearly the providential guidance of God. They give special prominence to those events in which the hand of God manifests itself, and describe with full detail the lives of those agents of whom Jeh made use in order to guide His people, such as Moses, Samuel, David, Solomon and others. But it is not the glory of these men themselves that the writers aim to describe, but rather their importance for the spiritual and religious greatness of Israel. Let us note in this connection only the extreme brevity with which the politically successful wars of David are reported in 2S; and how fragmentary are the notices in which the author of the Books of K reports the reigns of the different kings; and how briefly he refers for all the other details of these kings to books that, unfortunately, have been lost for us. But, on the other hand, how full are the details when the Bible gives us its account of the early history of a Samuel or of a David, in which the providential guidance and protection of Jeh appear in such a tangible form; or when it describes the building of the temple by Solomon, so epoch-making for the religious history of Israel, or the activity of such leading prophets as Elijah and Elisha. Much less the deeds of man than the deeds of God in the midst of His people constitute the theme of the narrators. These facts explain, too, the phenomenal impartiality, otherwise unknown in ancient literatures, with which the weaknesses and the faults of the ancestors and kings of Israel are reported by the Bib. writers, even in the case of their most revered kings, or with which even the most disgraceful defeats of the people are narrated.

It cannot indeed be denied that this religious and fundamental characteristic is not found to the same degree in all the books and sources. The oldest narratives concerning Jacob, Joseph, the Judges, David and others reveal a naïve and childlike naturalness, while in the Books of Ch only those things have been admitted which are in harmony with the regular cultus. The stories of a Samson, Jephthah, Abimelech, Barak, and others impress us often as the myths or stories of old heroes, such as we find in the traditions of other nations. But the author of the Book of Jgs, who wrote the introduction to the work, describes the whole story from the standpoint of edification. And when closely examined, it is found that the religious element is not lacking, even in the primitive and naïve OT narrative. This factor was, from the outset, a unique characteristic of the people and its history. To this factor Israel owed its individuality and existence as a separate people among the nations. But in course of time it became more and more conscious of its mission of being the people of Jeh on earth, and it learned to understand its entire history from this viewpoint. Accordingly, any account of Israel's history must pay special attention to its religious development. For the significance of this history lies for us in this, that it constitutes the preparation for the highest revelation in Christ Jesus. In its innermost heart and kernel it is the history of the redemption of mankind. This it is that gives to this history its phenomenal character. The persons and the events that constitute this history must not be measured by the standards of everyday life. If in this history we find the providential activities of the living God operative in a unique way, this need not strike us as strange, since also the full fruit of this historical development, namely the appearance of Jesus Christ, transcends by far the ordinary course of human history. On the other hand, this history of Israel is not to be regarded as a purely isolated factor. Modern researches have shown how intimately this history was interwoven with that of other nations. Already, between the religious forms of the OT and those of other Sem peoples, there have been found many relations. Religious expressions and forms of worship among the Israelites often show in language and in cultus a similarity to those of the ancient Canaanites, the Phoenicians, the Syrians, the Babylonians, and the Egyptians. But it is a mistake to believe that the history and the religion of Israel are merely an offsprung of the Bab. As the Israelites clung tenaciously to their national life, even when they were surrounded by powerful nations, or were even scattered among these nations, as in the Exile, thus too their religion, at least in its official representatives, has been able at all times to preserve a very high originality and independence under the influence of the Divine Spirit, who had filled it.

1. Origins of Israel in Pre-Mosaic Times.—The Israelites knew at all times that Canaan was not their original home, but that their

1. Original Home ancestors had immigrated into this land. What was their earlier and earliest home? Tradition states that they immigrated from Haran in the upper Euphrates valley. But it is claimed that they came to Haran from Ur of the Chaldees, i.e. from a city in Southern Babylonia, now called Mugheir. This city of Ur, now well known from Bab inscriptions, was certainly not the original home of the ancestors of Israel. They rather belonged to a purely Sem tribe, which had found its way from Northern Arabia into these districts. A striking confirmation of this view is found in a mural picture on the rock-tombs of Benihasan in Upper Egypt. The foreigners, of whom pictures are here given (from the time of the XIIth Dynasty), called Amu, namely Bedouins from Northern Arabia or from the Sinai peninsula, show such indisputable Jewish physiognomies that they must have been closely related to the stock of Abraham. Then, too, the leader of the caravan, Ebsha'a (Abishua), has a name formed just like that of Abraham. When, in later times, Moses fled to the country of the Midianites, he doubtless was welcomed by such tribal relatives.

The Israelites at all times laid stress on their ethnographical connection with other nations.

2. Ethnographical Origin They knew that they were intimately related to a group of peoples who have the name of Hebrews. But they traced their origin still farther back to the tribal founder, Shem. Linguistics and ethnology confirm, in general, the closer connection between the Sem tribes mentioned in Gen 10 21 ff. Undeniable is this connection in the cases of Assur, Aram, and the different Arabian tribes. A narrower group of Semites is called Hebrews. This term is used in Gen in a wider sense of the word than is the case in later times, when it was employed as a synonym for Israel. According to its etymology, the word signified "those beyond," those who live on the other side of the river or have come over from the other side. The river meant is not the Jordan, but the Euphrates. About the same time that the ancestors of Israel were immigrating into Canaan and Egypt, other tribes also emigrated westward and were called, by the Canaanites and by the Egyptians, 'ibhrim. This term is identical with Habiri, found in the Am Tab, in which complaint is made about the inroads of such tribes. The Israelites cannot have been meant here, but related tribes are. Possibly the Egypt Apriu is the same word.

The Israelites declared that they were descended from a particular family. On account of the patriarchal character of their old tribal life, it is not a matter of doubt that, as a fact, the tribe did grow out of a single family. The tribal father, Abraham, was without a doubt the head of the small tribe, which through its large family of children developed into different tribes. Only we must not forget that such a tribe could rapidly be enlarged by receiving into it also serfs and clients (cf Gen 14 14). These last-mentioned also regarded the head of the tribe as their father and considered themselves as his "sons," without really being his descendants. Possibly the tribe that immigrated first to Haran and from there to Canaan was already more numerous than would seem to be the case according to tradition, which takes into consideration only the leading personalities. Secondly, we must remember that the Israelites, because of their patriarchal life, had become accustomed to clothe all the relations of nations to nations in the scheme of the family. In this way such genealogies of nations as are found in Gen 10 and 11 originated. Here peoples, cities and countries have also been placed in the genealogies, without the author himself thinking of individual persons in this connection, who had borne the names, e.g. of Mizraim (Egypt), Cush (Ethiopia), etc. and were actually sons of Ham. The purpose of the genealogy in this form is to express only the closer or more remote relationship or connection to a group of nations. Gen 25 1 ff also is a telling example, showing how independently these groups are united. A new wife (Keturah) does not at this place fit into the family history of Abraham. But the writer still wants to make mention of an Arabian group, which was also related to Israel by blood, but in fact stood more distant from the Israelites than did the Ishmaelites. Out of this systematic further development of the living tradition, however, one difficulty arises. It is not in all places easy, indeed not always possible, to draw the line between what is reliable tradition and what is a freer continuation. But it is a misinterpretation of the historical situation, when the entire history of the patriarchs is declared to be incredible, and when in such sharply defined personalities as Abraham, Jacob, Joseph, and others, only personifications of tribes are found, the later history of which tribes is said to be embodied in the lives of these men; e.g. the name Abraham cannot have been the impersonal name of a tribe or of a god. It is found as the name of a person on old Bab tablets (Aburamu); but originally in the nomadic tribe was doubtless pronounced 'abhi rām, i.e. "My father [God] is exalted." The same is true of the name Jacob (really Jakob-el); cf Joseph (Joseph-el), Ishmael, and others, which find their analogies in old Arabian names.

(1) Patriarchal conditions—Gen 14.—Further, the conditions of life which are presupposed in the history of the Patriarchs are in perfect agreement with those which from the Am Tab we learn existed in Canaan. While formerly it was maintained that it would have been impossible for a single tribe to force its way into Canaan at that time when the country was thickly populated, it is now known that at that very time when the ancestors of the Israelites entered, similar tribes also found their way into the land, sometimes in a peaceable way, sometimes by force. Egypt for the time being had control of the land, but its supremacy was at no place very strong. And the 'ibhrīm, as did others who forced their way into the country, caused the inhabitants much trouble. Esp. does Gen 14, the only episode in which a piece of universal history finds its way into the story of the tribal ancestors, turn out to be a document of great value, which reflects beautifully the condition of affairs in Asia. Such expeditions for conquest in the direction of the Mediterranean lands were undertaken at an early period by Bab rulers, Sargon I of Akkad and his son Naram Sin. The latter undertook an expedition to the land of Magan along the exact way of the expedition described in Gen 14, this taking place in the days of Amraphel, i.e. Hammurabi. The fact that the latter was himself under an Elamitic superior is in perfect agreement with the story of the inscriptions, according to which the famous Hammurabi of Babylon had first freed himself from the supremacy of Elam. The fact that Hammurabi, according to accepted chronology, ruled shortly after the year 2000 BC, is also in agreement with Bib. chronology, which places Abraham in this very time. These expeditions into the country Martu, as the Babylonians call Syria, had for their purpose chiefly to secure booty and to levy tribute. That the allied kings themselves took part in this expedition is not probable. These were punitive expeditions undertaken with a small force.

This ch 14 of Gen seems to be a translation of an old cuneiform tablet. As a rule the stories of the patriarchal age for a long time were handed down orally, and naturally were modified to a certain extent. Then, too, scholars have long since discovered different sources, out of which the story in its present form has been compiled. This fact explains some irregularities in the story: e.g. the chronological data of the document P, which arranges its contents systematically, do not always harmonize with the order of events as reported by the other two leading documents, E and J, the first of which is perhaps the Ephraimite and the second the Judaic version of the story. But, under all circumstances, much greater than the difference are the agreements of the sources. They contain the same picture of this period, which certainly has not been modified to glorify the participants. It is easily seen that the situation of the fathers, when they were strangers in the land, was anything but comfortable. A poetical or perfectly fictitious popular account would have told altogether different deeds of heroism of the founder of the people. The weaknesses and the faults of the fathers and mothers in the patriarchal families are not passed over in silence. But the fact that Jeh, whom they trusted at all times, helped them through and did not suffer them to be destroyed, but in them laid the foundation for the future of His people, is the golden cord that runs through the whole history. And in this the difference between the individual characters finds a sharp expression; e.g. Abraham's magnanimity and tender feeling of honor in reference to his advantage in worldly matters find their expression in narratives which are ascribed to altogether different sources, as Gen 13 8 ff (J); 14 22 ff (special source); 23 7 ff (P). In what an altogether different way Jacob insists upon his advantage! This consistency in the way in which the different characters are portrayed must awaken confidence in the historical character of the narratives. Then, too, the harmony with Egypt manners and customs in the story of Joseph, even in its minutest details, as these have been emphasized particularly by the Egyptologist Ebers, speaks for this historical trustworthiness.

(2) Ideas of God.—Further, the conception of God as held by these fathers was still of a primitive character, but it contains the elements of the later religious development (see ISRAEL, RELIGION OF).

(3) Descent into Egypt.—During a long period of famine the sons of Jacob, through Divine providence, which made use of Joseph as an instrument, found refuge in Egypt, in the marshes of which country along the lower Nile Sem tribes had not seldom had their temporary abodes. The land of Goshen in the N.E. part of the Delta, Ed. Naville (The Shrine of Saft-el-Henneh and the Land of Goshen, London, 1887) has shown to be the region about Phakusa (Saft-el-Henneh). These regions had at that time not yet been made a part of the strictly organized and governed country of Egypt, and could accordingly still be left to such nomadic tribes. For the sons of Jacob were still wandering shepherds, even if they did, here and there, after the manner of such tribes, change to agricultural pursuits (Gen 26 12). If, as is probable, at that time a dynasty of Sem Hyksos was ruling in lower Egypt, it is all the more easily understood that kindred tribes of this character were fond of settling along these border districts. On account of the fertility of the amply watered districts, men and animals could increase rapidly, and the virile tribe could, in the course of a few centuries, grow into a powerful nation. One portion of the tribes pastured their flocks back and forth on the prairies; another built houses for themselves among the Egyptians and engaged in agricultural pursuits and in gardening (Nu 11 5). Egypt arts and trades also found their way among this people, as also doubtless the art of writing, at least in the case of certain individuals. In this way their sojourning in this country became a fruitful factor in the education of the people. This stay explains in part the fact that the Israelites at all times were more receptive of culture and were more capable than their kinsmen, the Edomites, Ammonites and Moabites, and others in this respect. Moses, like Joseph, had learned all the mysteries of Egypt wisdom. On the other hand, the sojourn in this old, civilized country was a danger to the religion of the people of Israel. According to the testimony of Josh 24 14; Ezk 20 7 ff; 23 8, 19, they adopted many heathen customs from their neighbors. It was salutary for them, that the memory of this sojourn was embittered for them by hard oppression.

II. Nationality under Moses.—It is reported in Ex 1 8 that a new Pharaoh ascended the throne, who knew nothing of Joseph. This doubtless means that a new dynasty in Egypt came into power, which adopted a new policy in the treatment of the Sem neighbors. The expulsion of the Hyksos had preceded this, and the opposition to the Semites had become more acute. The new government developed a strong tendency to expansion in the direction of the N.E. Under these circumstances it is not surprising that the laws of the empire were vigorously enforced in these border districts and that an end was made to the liberties of the unwelcome shepherd tribes. This led to constantly increasing measures of severity. In this way the people became more and more unhappy and finally were forced to emigrate.

(1) Chronology.—It is still the current conviction that the Pharaoh of the oppression was Rameses II, a king who was extraordinarily ambitious of building, whose long reign is by Eduard Meyer placed as late as 1310 to 1244 BC. His son Merenptah would then be the Pharaoh of the Exodus. But on this supposition, Bib. chronology not only becomes involved in serious difficulties, since then the time of the Judges must be cut down to unduly small proportions, but certain definite data also speak in favor of an earlier date for the Exodus of Israel. Merenptah boasts in an inscription that on an expedition to Syria he destroyed the men of Israel (which name occurs here for the first time on an Egypt monument). And even the father of Rameses II, namely Seti, mentions Asher among those whom he conquered in Northern Pal, that is, in the district afterward occupied by this tribe. These data justify the view that the Exodus already took place in the time of the XVIIIth Dynasty, a thing in itself probable, since the energetic rulers of this dynasty naturally have inaugurated a new method of treating this province. The oppression of Israel would then, perhaps, be the work of Thothmes III (according to Meyer, 1501–1447 BC), and the Exodus would take place under his successor, Amenophis II. In harmony with this is the claim of Manetho, who declares that the "Levers," in whom we recognize the Israelites (see below), were expelled by King Amenophis.

The length of the sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt, according to Gen 15 13 (P), was in round numbers 400 years; more exactly, according to Ex 12 40 f (P), 430 years. But the last-mentioned passage in LXX reads, "the sojourn of the sons of Jacob, when they lived in Egypt and in the land of Canaan." (The same reading is found in the Sam text, only that the land of Canaan precedes that of Egypt.) Since, according to this source (P), the Patriarchs lived 215 years in Canaan, the sojourn in Egypt would be reduced also 215 years. This is the way in which the synagogue reckons (cf Gal 3 17), as also Jos (Ant, II, xv, 2). In favor of this shorter period appeal is made to the genealogical lists, which, however, because they are incomplete, cannot decide the matter. In favor of a longer duration of this sojourn we can appeal, not only to Gen 15 13 (LXX has the same!), but also to the large number of those who left Egypt according to Nu 1 and 26 (P), even if the number of 600,000 men there mentioned, which would presuppose a nation of about two million souls, is based on a later calculation and gives us an impossible conception of the Exodus.

(2) Moses.—While no account has been preserved concerning the sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt, the history of the Exodus itself, which signifies the birth of Israel as a nation, is fully reported. In this crisis Moses is the prophetic mediator through whom the wonderful deed of God is accomplished. All the deeds of God, when interpreted by this prophet, become revelations for the people. Moses himself had no other authority or power than that which was secured for him through his office as the organ of God. He was the human instrument to bring about the synthesis between Israel and Jeh for all times. He had, in doing this, indeed proclaimed the old God of the fathers, but under the new, or at any rate hitherto to the people unknown, name of Jeh, which is a characteristic mark of the Mosaic revelations to such an extent, that the more accurate narrators (E and P) begin to make use of this name only from this period of time on. In the name of this absolute sovereign, God, Moses claims liberty for Israel, since this people was Jeh's firstborn (Ex 4 22). The contest which Moses carries on in the name of this God with Pharaoh becomes more and more a struggle between this God and the gods of Egypt, whose earthly representative Pharaoh is. The plagues which come over Egypt are all founded on the natural conditions of the country, but they occur in such extraordinary strength and rapidity at Moses' prediction, and even appear at his command, that they convince the people, and finally Pharaoh himself, of the omnipotence of this God on the soil of this country. In the same way the act of deliverance at the Red Sea can be explained as the cooperation of natural causes, namely wind and tide. But the fact that these elementary forces, just at this critical time, proved so serviceable to the people of God and destructive to their enemies, shows unmistakably the miraculous activity of God. This the Israelites experienced still further on the journey through the desert, when they were entirely dependent on Divine leadership and care. The outcome of these experiences, and at the same time its grandest demonstration, was the conclusion of the covenant at Mt. Sinai. From this time on Jeh was Israel's God and Israel was the people of Jeh. This God claimed to be the only and absolute ruler over the tribes that were now inwardly united into one nation. From this resulted as a matter of course, that Moses as the recognized organ of this God was not only the authority, who was to decide in all disputes concerning right, but also the one from whom a new and complete order of legal enactments proceeded. Moses became the lawgiver of Israel.

Even if the history of the origin of the OT covenant is unique in character, it is nevertheless profitable to take note of an analogy which is found in a related people and which is adapted to make much in Israel's history clearer. Mohammed also, after he had at the critical point of his career persuaded his followers to migrate from their homes, soon after, in Medina, concluded a covenant, according to which he, as the recognized speaker of Allah, claimed for himself the right to decide in all disputes. He, too, in his capacity as the prophet of God, was consulted as an infallible authority in all questions pertaining to the cultus, the civil and the criminal laws, as also in matters pertaining to politics and to war. And his decisions and judgments, uttered in the name of Allah, were written down and afterward collected. This Koran, too, became the basis of sacred law. And by causing the hitherto divided and antagonistic tribes to subject themselves to Allah, Mohammed united these his followers into a religious communion and in this way, too, into a national body. Mohammed has indeed copied the prophecy of earlier times, but the work of Moses was original in character and truly inspired by God.

The historical character of the exodus out of Egypt cannot be a matter of doubt, though some

2. Historical Character of the Exodus—suspect that the entire nation did not take part in the march through the Red Sea, but that certain tribes had before this already migrated toward the East. We must not forget that the song of victory in Ex 15 does not mention a word about Pharaoh's being himself destroyed in going through the Sea. It is only the late Ps 136 15 that presupposes this as a certainty. That an entire nation cannot emigrate in a single night cannot be maintained in view of the fact that the inhabitants of the same Wādī-Tumilāt, through which Israel marched, so late as the last century, emigrated in a single night and for similar reasons (cf Sayce, Monuments, 249).

(1) Egyptian version of the Exodus.—The fact that the Egypt monuments report nothing of this episode, so disgraceful to that people, is a matter of course, in view of the official character of these accounts and of their policy of passing over in absolute silence all disagreeable facts. And yet in the popular tradition of the people, which Manetho has handed down, there has been preserved some evidence of this event. It is indeed true that what this author reports about the Hyksos (see above) does not belong here, as this people is not, as Jos thinks, identical with the Israelites. However (CAp, I, xxvi, 5 ff), he narrates a story which may easily be the tradition concerning the exodus of the children of Israel as changed by popular use. King Amenophis, we are told, wanted to see the gods. A seer, who bore the same name, promised that his wish would be gratified under the condition that the country would be cleansed of lepers and all others that were unclean; and it is said that he accordingly drove 80,000 such persons into the stone quarries E. of the Nile. As the seer was afraid that these measures would be displeasing to the gods and bring upon the land a subjection of 13 years to the supremacy of foreigners, he gave up to these lepers the former city of the Hyksos, Avaris by name. Here they appointed a priest by the name of Osarsiph, later called Moses, as their chief, who gave them a special body of laws and in these did not spare the sacred animals. He also carried on war against the Egyptians, the Hyksos helping him, and he even governed Egypt for 13 years, after which he and his followers were driven out into Syria. Similar stories are found in Chaeremon, Lysimachus, and others (CAp, I, xxxii, 36; cf Tacitus, Hist. v.3-5). When we remember that it is nonsense to permit lepers to work in stone quarries and that the Egyptians also otherwise call the Semites Aatu, i.e. "plague," then this story must be regarded as referring to such a non-Egypt nation. Hecataeus of Abdera has a report of this matter which is much more like the Bib. story, to the effect, namely, that a plague which had broken out in Egypt led the people to believe that the gods were angry at the Egyptians because they had neglected the religious cultus; for which reason they expelled all foreigners. A part of these is said to have migrated under the leadership of Moses to Judaea and there to have founded the city of Jerus (cf Diodorus Siculus xl.3; cf xxxvi.1).

(2) Geographical matters.—The Red Sea, through which the Israelites went under the leadership of Moses, is without a doubt the northern extension of this body of water, which in former times reached farther inland than the present Gulf of Suez; cf Edouard Naville, The Store-City of Pithom and the Route of the Exodus, 1885; and The Route of the Exodus, 1891. This savant is entitled to the credit of having identified the station Sukkoth on the basis of the monuments; it is the modern Tell-Mashûta and identical with Pithom, which was the name of the sanctuary at that place. Later the city was called Heroôpolis. The route accordingly went through the modern Wādī-Tumilāt to the modern Bitter Sea, N. of Suez. It is a more difficult task to trace the route geographically on the other side of the Sea. For it is a question whether "the Mountain of Jeh," which formed the goal of the journey, is to be located on the Sinai peninsula, or in the land of the Edomites, or even on the western coast of Arabia. A. H. Sayce and others reject the traditional location of Sinai on the peninsula named after this mountain, and declare that the Israelites marched directly eastward toward the Gulf of Akaba. The reasons for this are found in the work of Sayce, The Verdict of the Monuments, 263 ff. But even if on this supposition a number of difficulties fall away, there nevertheless are many arguments in favor of the traditional location of Sinai, esp. the grandeur of the chain itself, for which a rival worth mentioning has not been discovered in the land of the Edomites or in Northwestern Arabia. The Sinai traveler, E. H. Palmer, has also shown how splendidly the surroundings of the Sinai chain, esp. the Jebel Musa with the Ras Sufsafeh, is adapted for the purpose of concluding a covenant.

(3) The wilderness sojourn.—The duration of the sojourn in the "desert" is everywhere (as in Am 5 25) given as 40 years. In harmony with this is the fact that only a few of those who had come out of Egypt lived to enter Canaan. The greater part of these 40 years the Israelites seem to have spent at Kadesh. At any rate, there was a sanctuary at that place, at which Moses administered justice, while the different tribes probably were scattered over the prairies and over the tillable districts. The central sanctuary, which Moses established, was the Tabernacle, which contained the Ark of the Covenant, the sanctissimum. This sacred ark with the cherubim above it represents the throne of God, who is thought to be enthroned above the cherubim. The ark itself is, as it were, His footstool. As in Egypt sanctuaries not infrequently the most sacred laws are deposited beneath the feet of the statue of the gods, thus the sacred fundamental laws of God (the Decalogue), on two tablets, were deposited in this ark. This Ark of the Covenant presupposes an invisible God, who cannot be represented by any image. The other laws and ordinances of Moses covered the entire public and private legislation, given whenever the need for these made it necessary to determine such matters. In giving these laws Moses connected his system with the old traditional principles already current among the tribes. This fact is confirmed by the legal CH, which contains remarkable parallels, esp. to Ex 20—23 19. But Moses has elevated the old traditional laws of the tribes and has given them a more humane character. By putting every enactment in the light of the religion of Jeh, and by eliminating everything not in harmony with this religion, he has raised the people spiritually and morally to a higher plane.

Among the people, the undercurrents of superstition and of immorality were indeed still strong. At the outset Moses had much to contend with in the opposition of the badly mixed mass of the people. And the fact that he was able for the period of 40 years to hold the leadership of this stubborn people without military force is a phenomenal work, which shows at all hands the wonderful co-operation of Jeh Himself. However, he did not indeed succeed in raising the entire people to the plane of his knowledge of God and of his faith in God. This generation had to die in the wilderness, because it lacked the sanctified courage to take possession of the land of promise. But the foundation had been laid for the theocracy, which must not in any way be identified with a hierarchy.

(4) Entrance into Canaan.—It was Joshua, the successor of Moses, who was enabled to finish the work and to take possession of the land. Not far from Jericho he led the people over the Jordan and captured this city, which had been considered impregnable. After that, with his national army, he conquered the Canaanitish inhabitants in several decisive battles, near Gibeon and at the waters of

"ISRAEL" STELE IN MUSEUM AT CAIRO

Merom, and then went back and encamped at Gilgal on the Jordan. After this he advanced with his tribe of Ephraim into the heart of the land, while the southern tribes on their part forced their way into the districts assigned to them. Without reasons this account has been attacked as unreliable, and critics have thought that originally the different tribes, at their own initiative, either peaceably or by force, had occupied their land. But it is entirely natural to suppose that the inhabitants of the country who had allied themselves to resist this occupation by Israel, had first to be made submissive through several decisive defeats, before they would permit the entrance of the tribes of Israel, which entrance accordingly often took place without a serious struggle. That the occupation of the land was not complete is shown in detail in Jgs 1. Also in those districts in which Israel had gained the upper hand, they generally did not wage the war of annihilation that Moses had commanded, but were content with making the Canaanites, by the side of whom they settled, bondmen and subjects. This relation could, in later time, easily be reversed, esp. in those cases in which the original inhabitants of the country were in the majority. Then, too, it must be remembered that the latter enjoyed a higher state of civilization than the Israelites. It was accordingly an easy matter for the Israelites to adopt the customs and the ideas of the Canaanites. But if this were done, their religion was also endangered. Together with the sacred "holy places" (bāmōth) of the original inhabitants, the altars and the sanctuaries there found also came into possession of the Israelites. Among these there were some that had been sacred to the ancestors of Israel, and with which old memories were associated. As a consequence, it readily occurred that Israel appropriated also old symbols and religious ceremonies, and even the Baals and the Astartes themselves, however little this could be united in principle with the service of Jeh. But if the Israelites lost their unique religion, then their connection with the kindred tribes and their national independence were soon matters of history. They were readily absorbed by the Canaanites.

III. Period of the Judges.—In such a period of weakened national and religious life, it could easily happen that Israel would again lose

1. General Character of Period the supremacy that it had won by the sword. It was possible that the Canaanites could again bring into their power larger parts of the land.

Also energetic and pushing nomadic tribes, such as the Ammonites, the Moabites, or other warlike peoples, such as the Philis, could bring the country under subjection, as actually did occur in the period of the Judges. The Book of Jgs reports a number of such instances of the subjection of Israel, which did not extend over the whole land, and in part occurred in different sections of the country at the same time. Judah and Simeon, the two tribes in the south, as a rule took no part in these contests, and had their own battles to fight; and the same is true of the tribes E. of the Jordan, among whom Northern Manasseh and Ephraim were in closest alliance. After a longer or shorter period of oppression, there followed in each case a revival of the national spirit against such oppression. And in all these cases the popular hero who became the liberator appealed to the religious consciousness that formed a bond of union between all the Israelitish tribes and their common God Jeh. In however wild a manner the youthful vigor of the people may have found its expression on these occasions, they are nevertheless conscious of the fact that they are waging a holy war, which in every case also ended with the victory over the heathen spirit and false worship that had found their way into Israel. The most precious historical monument from these times is the song of Deborah (Jgs 5), which, like a mirror, reflects faithfully the conditions of affairs, and the thoughts of that age.

Jgs 17–21 belong to the beginning of this period. The first of these old stories narrates the emigration of a large portion of the tribe of Dan to the extreme north of the country and the origin of idolatry in that region (chs 17, 18). But the second story, too, both in form and contents, is, at least in part, very old and its historical value is amply protected against the attacks of modern critics by Hos 9 9; 10 9. This story reports a holy war of revenge against the tribe of Benjamin, which was unwilling to render satisfaction for a nefarious crime that had been committed at Gibeah in its territory. In the feeling of close solidarity and of high responsibility which appears in connection with the punishment of this crime, we still see the influence of the periods of Moses and Joshua.

First it is narrated of a king of Aram-naharaim that he had oppressed Israel for a period of 8 years (Jgs 3 8). This probably means a the Kenazite, belonging to a tribe that was related to Judah, who delivered Israel. A second liberator was the Benjamite Ehud, who delivered the southeastern portion of the country from the servitude of Eglon, the king of the Moabites, by putting the latter to death (Jgs 3 12 ff.). On a greater scale was the decisive battle against the Canaanitish kings in the north, when these had formed an alliance and had subjected Israel for a period of 20 years. At the appeal of Deborah, Barak conquered Sisera, the hostile king and leader of a mighty army of chariots, in the plain of Kishon (Jgs 4, 5). In the same region the battle of Gideon was fought with the plundering Bedouin swarms of the Midianites, who had repeatedly oppressed Israel (chs 6–8). Abimelech, an unworthy son of the God-fearing hero, after the death of his father, had established a local kingdom in Shechem, which stood for only a short time and came to a disgraceful end. Little more than the names are known to us of Tola, of the tribe of Issachar, and of Jair, in Gilead (10 1 ff.). More fully is the story of Jephthah told, who delivered the country from the Ammonites coming from the east (ch 11), with which was also connected a struggle with the jealous Ephraimites (ch 12); and still more fully are the details reported of the personal contests of the Nazirite Samson, belonging to the tribe of Dan, against the Philis making their inroads from the south, and who for many years proved to be the most dangerous enemies of Israel.

All these heroes, and a few others not so well known, are called judges, and it is regularly reported how long each of these "judged" Israel. They were not officials in the usual sense of the term, but were liberators of the people, who, at the inspiration of Jeh, gave the signal for a holy war. After the victory they, as men of Jeh, then enjoyed distinction, at least in their own tribes; and in so far as it was through their doing that the people had been freed, they were the highest authorities in political, legal, and probably, too, in religious questions. They are called judges in conscious contradistinction from the kingly power, which in Israel was recognized as the exclusive prerogative of Jeh, so that Gideon declined it as improper when the people wanted to make him king (8 22 f.). The people recognized the Spirit of Jeh in the fierce energy which came over these men and impelled them to arouse their people out of their disgraceful lethargy. For this reason, too, they could afterward be trusted in making their judicial decisions in harmony with the mind and the Spirit of God, as this had been done already by the prophetess Deborah in the time of oppression. Yet, at least in the case of Samson (notwithstanding 16 31), it is not probable that he ever was engaged in the administration of justice. It is not even reported of him that he fought at the head of the people, but he carried on his contests with the Philis in behalf of himself individually, even if, as one consecrated of God, he were a witness for the power of God.

The chronology of the period of the Judges exhibits some peculiar difficulties. If we add together the data that are given in succession in the Book of Jgs, we get from Jgs 3 8—16 31, 410 years altogether. But this number is too large to make it harmonize with the 480 years mentioned in 1 K 6 1. Jewish tradition (e.g. Šēdher 'Olām) accordingly does not include the years of oppression in this sum, but makes them a part of the period of the individual judges. In this way about 111 years are eliminated. But evidently the redactor of the Book of Jgs did not share this view. Modern critics are of the opinion that the writer has dovetailed two chronological methods, one of which counted on the basis of periods of forty years each, while the other was more exact and contained odd numbers. In this way we can shorten this period as does the Šēdher 'Olām. At any rate, it is justifiable, and is suggested by 10 7, to regard the oppression by the Ammonites (10 8 ff) and the oppression by the Philis (13 1 ff) as contemporaneous. And other events, too, which in the course of the narrative are related as following each other, may have taken place at the same time or in a somewhat different sequence, as the author used different sources for the different events. But for this very reason his story deserves to be credited as historical. Such characters as Deborah, Jephthah, Ehud, Gideon, Abimelech and Samson are described as tangible historical realities. Even if, in the case of the last-mentioned, oral tradition has added decorative details to the figure, yet Samson cannot possibly be a mere mythological character, but must have been a national hero characteristic of this period, in whom are represented the abundance of physical and mental peculiarities characteristic of the youthful nation, as also their good-natured indifference and carelessness over against their treacherous enemies.

The lack of a central political power made itself felt all the more in the period of the Judges, since, because of the scattered condition of the people in the country that had been so minutely parceled out, and because of the weakening of the religious enthusiasm of the preceding age, the deeper unity of heart and mind was absent. It is indeed incorrect to imagine that at this time there was a total lack of governmental authority. A patriarchal organization had been in force from the beginning. The father of the family was the lawful head of those belonging to him; and a larger clan was again subject to an "elder," with far-reaching rights in the administration of law, but also with the duty to protect his subordinates, and in case of want to support them. Unfortunately we are nowhere informed how these elders were chosen or whether their offices were hereditary. Only a very few passages, such as Isa 3 6 f, throw a certain light on the subject. This institution of the elders Moses had already found established and had developed farther (Ex 18 13 ff). It was retained in all the periods of Israel's history. When the people began to live together in larger centers, as a natural consequence bodies of such city elders were established. The tribes, too, had "elders" at their head. But for a united action of the whole nation this arrangement did not suffice; and esp. in the case of war the people of Israel felt that they were at a disadvantage compared with their enemies, who had kings to lead them. For this reason the desire for a king steadily grew in Israel. The dictators of the period of the Judges satisfied their needs only for the time being.

IV. The Kingdom: Israel-Judah.—In the time when the Israelites were oppressed by the Philis the need of a king was esp. felt. As Samson had come to his death in servitude, the people themselves thus, at the close of this period of glorious victories, were under the supremacy of a warlike race, which had only in recent times settled on the western coast of Pal, and from this base was forcing its conquests into the heart of the country.

After the most disastrous defeats, during which even the Ark of the Covenant was lost, there arose for the people, indeed, a father and a deliverer in the person of Samuel, who saved them during the most critical period. What his activity meant for the uplift of the people cannot be estimated too highly. He was, above all, during peace the faithful watchman of the most sacred possessions of Israel, a prophet such as the people had not seen since the days of Moses; and he doubtless was the founder of those colonies of prophetic disciples who were in later times so influential in the development of a theocratical spirit in Israel. He guarded the whole nation also with all his power, by giving to them laws and cultivating piety in the land.

But as Samuel, too, became old and the people concluded for good reasons that his rule would have no worthy successors, their voice could no longer be silenced, and they demanded a king. Samuel tried in vain to persuade the people to desist from their demand, which to him seemed to be an evidence of distrust in the providence of Jeh, but was himself compelled, by inspiration of God, to submit to their wishes and anoint the new king, whom Jeh pointed out to him. It is indeed maintained by the critics that there are several accounts extant in S concerning the selection of Saul to the kingdom, and that these accounts differ in this, that the one regards the kingdom as a blessing and the other as a curse. The first view, which is said to be the older, is claimed to be found in 1 S 9 1–10 16, and 11; while the second is said to be in 8; 10 17–27; 11 12–14. Whatever may be the facts in regard to these sources, this is beyond any doubt, that Samuel, the last real theocratic leader, established the kingdom. But just as little can the fact be doubted, that he took this step with inner reluctance, since in his eyes this innovation meant the discarding of the ideals of the people to which he himself had remained true during his lifetime. The demand of the people was the outgrowth of worldly motives, but Jeh brought it about, that the "Anointed of Jeh" signified an advance in the history of the kingdom of God.

Saul himself, at first, in a vigorous and efficient manner, solved the immediate problems and overcame the enemies of his people. But he soon began to conceive of his kingdom after the manner of heathen kingdoms and did not subject himself to Jeh and His appointed representative. There soon arose an open conflict between him and Samuel; and the fact that the Spirit of God had departed from him appears in his melancholy state of mind, which urged him on to constantly increasing deeds of violence. That under these circumstances God's blessing also departed from him is proved by the collapse of his life's work in his final failures against the Philis.

In contrast with this, David, his successor, the greatest king that Israel ever had, had a correct conception of this royal office, and even in his most brilliant successes did not forget that he was called to rule only as "the servant of Jeh" (by which name he, next to Moses, is called oftenest in the Bible). As a gifted ruler, he strengthened his kingdom from within, which, considering the heterogeneous character of the people, was not an easy matter, and extended it without by overpowering jealous neighbors. In this way it was he who became the real founder of a powerful kingdom. The conquest of Jerus and its selection as the capital city also are an evidence of his political wisdom. It is indeed true that he, too, had his personal failings and that he made many mistakes, which caused him political troubles, even down to his old age. But his humility at all times made him strong enough again to subject himself to the hand of Jeh, and this humility was based on the attitude of his spirit toward Jeh, which shows itself in his Pss. In this way he really came to be a connecting link between God and his people, and upon this foundation the prophets built further, who prophesied a still closer union of the two under a son of David.

While Saul was a Benjamite, David was of the tribe of Judah, and was for a short time the king of this tribe in Hebron, before the other tribes, becoming tired of the misrule of a descendant of Saul, also voluntarily chose him as their king. He soon after this established as the center of his new kingdom the city of Jerus, which really was situated on the territory that had been assigned to Benjamin; and he also set this city apart as the religious center of the people by transferring the Ark of the Covenant to this place. In this way David, through his wisdom and his popular bravery, succeeded in uniting the tribes more firmly under his supremacy, and esp. did he bring the tribe of Judah, which down to this time had been more for itself, into closer connection with the others. Israel under David became a prominent kingdom. This position of power was, as a matter of fact, distasteful to their neighbors round about. The Philis tried to destroy the ambitious kingdom, but were themselves repeatedly and definitely overpowered. But other neighboring people, too, who, notwithstanding the fact that David did not assume an offensive attitude toward them, assumed a hostile attitude toward him, came to feel his superiority. Particularly severe and tedious was the war against the allied Ammonites and Syrians; and although the Edomites, too, regarded this as a favorable time for attacking Israel, this struggle also ended in a complete triumph for David. The surrounding countries became subject to him from the Mediterranean Sea to Hamath (2 S 8 9), and from the territory of the Lebanon, the inhabitants of which assumed a friendly attitude, to the borders of Egypt, which also recognized the new rule.

Solomon, the son of David, developed inwardly the powerful kingdom which he had inherited. To his father he seemed to be the right man for this because of his peaceful temperament and his high mental abilities. He justified the hopes placed in him. Out of love to Jeh he built the temple on Mt. Zion, regulated the affairs of state and the administration of justice, and by commercial treaties with the Phoenicians (King Hiram) brought about great prosperity in the land. His was the "golden" period in Israel. The culture and civilization, too, of the people were materially advanced by Solomon as he widened their horizon and introduced the literature of Proverbs, which had up to this time been more extensively cultivated by the neighboring people (Edom, Arabia, Egypt). He even developed this literature into a higher type. On the other hand, the brilliant reign of Solomon brought serious dangers to the new kingdom. His liberal-mindedness in the treatment of his foreign wives, in permitting them to retain their heathen worship, probably because he thought that in the end it was the same Divinity which these women worshipped under a different form, endangered the theocracy with its serious cultus and its strict morality. Through this conduct the king necessarily forfeited the sympathy of the most pious Israelites. At the same time, his love for magnificent structures surpassed the measure which was regarded as correct for the "Anointed of Jeh." Then, too, his efforts, in themselves justifiable, to establish a more perfect organization of the monarchy, produced a great deal of dissatisfaction. Solomon did not understand, as did his father, how to respect the inherited liberty-loving tendencies of his people. The heavy services and taxation, to which the people were compelled to submit, were deeply felt, most of all by the Ephraimites, who at times had exhibited a jealous spirit, and could not forget their lost hegemony.

So long, indeed, as the wise Solomon and his advisers were at the helm, the various rebellious tendencies could not make themselves

5. Division of the Kingdom felt. But after his death the catastrophe came. His son, Rehoboam, at the Diet in Shechem, at which the Ephraimites placed before him a kind of capitulation before his coronation, showed that he did not at all understand the situation. His domineering attitude brought things to a head, and he must have been glad that at least the tribe of Judah remained faithful to him. The northern tribes chose for their king Jeroboam (I), who before this had already taken part in rebellious agitations, as the kingdom had been predicted to him by the prophet Ahijah (1 K 11 2 ff). Israel was torn into two parts.

With this rupture the powerful kingdom established by David had reached its end. In regard to this flourishing period in Israel's

6. Sources of the History of the Kingdom history we are, on the whole, well informed through the sources. Esp. in 2 S 9-20 and 1 K 2, 3, we have a narrator who must have been a contemporary of the events recorded.

Klostermann surmises that this may have been Ahimaaz, the son of Zadok (2 S 15 27); while Duhm, Budde, Sellin and others believe it to have been the priest Abiathar. Less unity is in evidence in the first Book of S, containing the history of the youth of David, which evidently was often described. The Books of Ch have only secondary value for the life of David. These books narrate in full detail the story of the preparations made by David for the erection of the temple and of his organization of the Levites. In regard to the reign of Solomon, the Books of K report more fully. Concerning the later kings, they generally give only meager extracts from more complete sources, which excerpts, however, have been shown to be reliable. The interest which the narrator has in telling his story is the religious. Esp. does he carefully note the fact as to the relation of the different kings to the cultus. Special sources have been used in compiling the detailed stories of the great prophets Elijah and Elisha, which are inserted in the history of the two kingdoms. On the other hand, the Books of Ch pass over entirely all reference to the work of the prophets of the Northern Kingdom, as they ignore the entire history of the Ephraimite kingdom since the interest of these books is centered on the sanctuary in Jerus. Also in the case of the Judaeon history, the much older Books of K deserve the precedence. Yet we owe to the writer of Ch a number of contributions to this history, esp. where he has made a fuller use of the sources than has been done by the author of the Books of K. The suspicion that everything which Ch contains, beyond what is to be found in K, is unhistorical, has turned out to be groundless. Thus, e.g., it would be impossible to understand the earlier prophecies of Isaiah under Jotham at all, if it did not appear from Ch to what prosperity and influence the people of Jerus had by that time again attained. For it is only Ch that give us an account of the flourishing reign of his predecessor Uzziah, who is treated but briefly in K.

The chronology of the earlier portions of the period of the Kings is dependent on the date of the division of the kingdom. This date

7. Chronological Matters

can be decided on the basis of the careful chronological data of the Books of K, which do not indeed agree in all particulars, but are to be adjusted by the Assyrian chronology. If we, with Kamp-hausen, Oettli and Kittel, regard the year 937 BC as the time of the division of the kingdom, then Solomon ruled from 977 to 937; David, from 1017 to 977. The length of the reign of Saul is not known, as the text of 1 S 13 1 is defective. It is very probable that we can credit him with about twenty years, according to Jos (Ant. X, viii, 4), i.e. from about 1037–1017. In this case David transferred the seat of government to Jerus about the year 1010, and the completion of the erection of the temple of Solomon took place in 966. But this basal date of 937 is not accepted as correct by all scholars. Klostermann places the date of the rupture of the kingdom in the year 978; Koehler, in 973. For later chronological data, Assyrian sources are an important factor. The Assyrians were accustomed to call each year after the name of an official (limu), and eponym lists are extant for 228 years. In these reference is made to an eclipse of the sun, which astronomically has been settled as having taken place on July 15, 763. We have in this list then the period from 893 to 666. On this basis, it is made possible to determine the exact dates of the different military expeditions of the Assyrian rulers and their conflicts with the kings of Judah and Israel, on the presupposition, however, that the Assyrian inscriptions here used really speak of these kings, which in a number of cases is denied. Valuable help for determining the chronology of this period is the fall of Samaria in the year 722 and the expedition of Sennacherib against Jerus in 701, and then the fall of Jerus in 587 and 586. The distribution of the years between these dates to the individual kings is in places doubtful, as the numbers in the text are possibly corrupt, and in the synchronistic data of the Books of K mistakes may have been made.

V. Period of the Separated Kingdoms.—The two separated kingdoms differed materially. The kingdom of Ephraim was the more

1. Contrasts powerful of the two. It embraced, according to an inaccurate usage of the words, 10 tribes; and to this kingdom the vassals, such as Moab, as a rule remained subject, until they emancipated themselves. But, on the other hand, this Northern Kingdom was less firm spiritually. Even the resident city of the king changed frequently, until Omri founded the city of Samaria, which was well adapted for this purpose. The dynasties, too, were only of short duration. It occurred but rarely that one family was able to maintain its supremacy on the throne through several generations. A revolutionary character remained fixed in this kingdom and became its permanent weakness. On the other hand, the smaller and often overpowered kingdom of Judah, which faithfully adhered to the royal line of David, passed through dangerous crises and had many unworthy rulers. But the legitimate royal house, which had been selected by Jeh, constituted spiritually a firm bond, which kept the people united, as is seen, e.g., by a glance at the addresses of Isaiah, who is thoroughly filled with the conviction of the importance of the house of David, no matter how unworthy the king who happened to rule might appear to him. In a religious respect, also, the arbitrary break with Zion proved to be fatal for the Northern Kingdom.

Jeroboam.—It is true that faithful prophets of Jeh, such as the Abijah of Shiloh mentioned above, and Shemaiah (1 K 12 22 ff), proclaimed that the fateful division of the kingdom was a Divinely intended judgment from Jeh. But they soon were compelled to reach the conclusion that Jeroboam did not regard himself as a servant of Jeh, but as a sovereign who, through his own power and through the favor of the people, had secured the rule, and hence could arbitrarily decide all matters in reference to the cultus and the sacred sanctuaries of the people. According to his own will, and for political reasons, he established the new national sanctuary at Bethel, and another at Dan. At both shrines he caused Jeh to be worshipped under the image of a calf, which was to constitute a paganizing opposition to the Ark of the Covenant on Mt. Zion, even if it was the idea that Jeh, the God of the Covenant, was to be worshipped in these new images. In doing this, the king followed ancient national customs, which had broken with the purity of the Mosaic religion (concerning image-worship in Dan we have heard before. See GOLDEN CALF). His sojourn in Egypt, too, where he had lived as a fugitive, had doubtless furnished the king incentives in this direction. He created a priesthood that was submissive to his wishes, and disregarded the opposition of the few prophets who protested against the policy of the king. His successors, too, walked "in the ways of Jeroboam." The independent prophets, however, did not die out, but, rather, prophecy developed its greatest activity in this very Northern Kingdom. As a rule, in its work it stood in opposition to the government, but at times it succeeded in gaining the recognition of the rulers.

2. The Successive Reigns

Omri.—The earliest times of the divided kingdoms are, from a political point of view, characterized by the fact that the kingdoms on the Euphrates and the Tigris, namely Assyria and Babylon, still had enough to do with themselves, and did not yet make any inroads into the Mediterranean lands; but, rather, it was the Syrians who first caused a good deal of trouble to the Northern Kingdom. Jeroboam did not succeed in founding a dynasty. Already his son Nadab was eliminated by a usurper Baasha. The latter's son too, Elah, was murdered, after a reign of two years. It was not, however, his murderer Zimri, or Tibni, who strove to secure the kingdom for himself, but Omri who became king (1 K 16), and who also attained to such prominence abroad that the cuneiform inscriptions for a long time after call Israel "the land of Omri." His ability as a ruler was seen in the fact that the establishment of Samaria as the capital city was his work. The inscription on the Mesha stone reports that he also established the sovereignty of Israel vigorously on the east side of the Jordan.

Ahab.—His son Ahab, too, was an energetic and brave ruler, who succeeded in gaining a number of victories over the Syrians, who were now beginning to assume the offensive in a determined manner. Then, too, he was politic enough to win over to his interests the kingdom of Judah, with which his predecessors had lived in almost constant warfare. In this policy he succeeded, because the noble and large-hearted king Jehoshaphat was more receptive to such fraternal relations than was good for him. An expedition jointly undertaken by these two kings against Syria brought Jehoshaphat into extreme danger and ended with the death of Ahab.

Ahab's fate was his wife Jezebel, the daughter of the Phoen king Ethbaal (Ithobal, according to Jos, Ant, VIII, xiii, 2 and Cap, I, 18), who had been a priest of Astarte. This intermarriage with a fanatical heathen family brought untold and endless misfortune over all Israel. This bold and scheming woman planned nothing less than the overthrow of the religion of Jeh, and the substitution for it of the Baal and the Astarte cultus. As a first step she succeeded in having the king tolerate this religion. The leading temple in the new resident city, Samaria, was dedicated to the Baal cultus. Already this introduction of a strange and lascivious ethnic religion was a great danger to the religion and the morals of the people. Hosts of Baal priests, ecstatic dervishes, traversed the country. Soon the queen undertook to persecute the faithful worshippers of Jeh. The fact that these men protested against the tolerance of this foreign false religion was interpreted as disobedience on their part to the king. Many faithful prophets were put to death. At this critical period, when the existence of the religion of Jeh was at stake, the prophet Elijah, the Tishbite, appeared on the stage, and through a bitter struggle reestablished the worship of Jeh. However, the fateful influence that this woman exerted was thereby not yet destroyed. It extended to Judah also.

Rehoboam.—In the kingdom of Judah, apart from the apostasy of different tribes, which left him only the vigorous tribe of Judah and portions of Benjamin, Dan, Simeon, and Levi, Rehoboam experienced also other calamities, namely, a destructive invasion and tribute imposition by King Shishak of Egypt (Egyp Sheshonk, founder of the XXII<sup>d</sup> Dynasty; 1 K 14 25 f; cf 2 Ch 12 2 ff). While under Solomon the relations of Israel to the Egyp court had in the beginning been very friendly, this was changed when a new dynasty came to the throne. After Jeroboam had failed in his first revolutionary project, he had found refuge at the court of Shishak (1 K 11 40). It is possible that Jeroboam made the Egyp king lustful for the treasures of Jerus. The Egyptians did not, as a matter of fact, stop at the Ephraimitic boundaries, but in part also invaded the territory of Jeroboam; but their chief objective was Jerus, from which they carried away the treasures that had been gathered by Solomon. On the temple wall of Karnak this Pharaoh has inscribed the story of this victory and booty. From the names of the cities found in this inscription, we learn that this expedition extended as far as Megiddo and Taanach.

Abijah.—Rehoboam was succeeded by his son Abijah, or Abijahu, according to Ch (the Abijam of K is hardly correct). He ruled only 3 years. But even during this short reign he was compelled to engage in a severe struggle with Jeroboam (1 K 15 6; see details in 2 Ch 13).

Asa.—In every respect the reign of the God-fearing Asa, who sought to destroy the heathenism that had found its way into the cultus, was more fortunate. He also experienced Jeh's wonderful help when the Cushite Zerah made an incursion into his land (2 Ch 14 8 ff), i.e. probably Osorkon I, who, however, did not belong to an Ethiopian dynasty. Possibly he is called an Ethiopian because he came into the country with Nubian troops. Less honorable was his conduct in the conflict with Baasha. When he was sorely pressed by the latter he bought, through the payment of a large tribute, the assistance of the Syrian king, Ben-hadad I, who up to this time had been an ally of Baasha. This bribing of foreigners to fight against their own covenant people, which was afterward often repeated, was rebuked by a bold prophet in the presence of the pious king, but the prophet was compelled to suffer abuse for his open testimony (2 Ch 16 7 ff).

Jehoshaphat.—A much more noble conduct characterized the dealings of Jehoshaphat in relation to the Northern Kingdom. His fault was that he entered too fully into the selfish offers of friendship made by Ahab. The worst step was that, in order to confirm his covenant, he took for his son Jehoram as wife, Athaliah, the daughter of Jezebel. Jehoshaphat was a chivalrous ally, who also joined Ahab's son, Jehoram, in a dangerous war against the Moabites; as this people under their king Mesha had made themselves free from Israel and had taken the offensive against them. For the inner affairs of the kingdom his reign was more fortunate. He was a God-fearing and an energetic prince, who did much to elevate the people in a material and a religious way and perfected its political organization. Nor did he fail to secure some noteworthy successes. However, the fact that the warning words of the prophets who rebuked him because of his alliance with the half-heathenish house of Omri were not the fanatical exaggerations of pessimistic seers, appears at once after his death.

Jehoram.—His son Jehoram, after the manner of oriental despots, at once caused his brothers to be put to death, of which doubtless his wife Athaliah was the cause. This woman transplanted the policy of Jezebel to Judah, and was scheming for the downfall of the house of David and its sanctuary. Under Jehoram the power of Judah accordingly began to sink rapidly. Edom became independent. The Philis and the Arabians sacked Jerus. Even the royal princes, with the exception of Ahaziah, the youngest son of Athaliah, were expelled. When the latter ascended the throne she had the absolute power in her hands.

Jehu.—During this time the judgment over the house of Omri was fast approaching. The avenger came in the person of the impetuous Jehu, who had been anointed king by one of the disciples of Elisha in the camp of Ramoth in Gilead. According to 1 K 19 16, the order had already been given to Elijah to raise this man to the throne; but the compliance with this command appears to have been delayed. As soon as Jehu became aware that he was entrusted with this mission, he hastened to Jezreel, where Ahaziah, king of Judah, was just paying a visit to Jehoram, and slew them both. With heartless severity he extended this slaughter, not only to all the members of the house of Omri, together with Jezebel, but also to those numerous members of the Davidic royal house who fell into his hands. He likewise destroyed the adherents of Baal, whom he had invited to their death in their sanctuary at Samaria. Deserved as this judgment upon the house of Jeroboam was (2 K 10 30), which Jehu, according to higher command, carried out, he did this in an unholy mind and with hardness and ambitious purpose. The puritanical Rechabites had sanctioned his action; but as more and more the true character of Jehu began to reveal itself, he lost the sympathies of the pious, and Hosea announced to his house the vengeance for his bloody crimes at Jezreel (Hos 1 4).

The Assyrians.—In Jehu's reign occurred the inroads toward the W. on the part of the Assyrians. This people already in the time of Ahab, under their king, Shalmaneser II, had forced their way as far as Karkar on the Orontes, and had there fought a battle in 854 with the Syrians and their allies, among whom Ahab is also mentioned, with 2,000 chariots and 10,000 soldiers. If this is really Ahab, the king of Israel, which is denied by some, then he, at that time, fought against Assyria in conjunction with the Syrians, who otherwise had been so bitterly attacked by him. The Assyrians boast of this victory, but seem to have won it at a heavy price, as they did not press on farther westward. When in 842 Shalmaneser came a second time, Jehu was certainly not among the allies of the Syrians. The Assyrians do not seem, on this occasion, to have been opposed by so powerful a league, and were able to attack the Syrians whom they conquered at Sanfru (Hermon, Anti-Lebanon) in a much more determined manner. They laid siege to Damascus and laid waste the surrounding country. The Hauran and Bashan were made a desert. In their march of victory they pressed forward as far as the Mediterranean. Phoenicia and other countries brought tribute. Among these nations Shalmaneser expressly mentions Jahua ("Jehu, the son of Omri" [!]), who was compelled to deliver up gold and silver bars and other valuable possessions. But this expensive homage on the part of Jehu did not help much. Shalmaneser came only once more (839) into this neighborhood. After this the Assyrians did not appear again for a period of 35 years. All the more vigorously did the Syrians and other neighboring people make onslaughts on Israel. How fearfully they devastated Israel appears from Am 1.

Jehoahaz.—Under his son Jehoahaz the weakness of Israel became still greater. In his helplessness, the Lord finally sent him a deliverer (2 K 13 3 ff). This deliverer was none other than the Assy king, Adad-nirari III (812-783), who, through a military incursion, had secured anew his supremacy over Western Asia, and had besieged the king of Damascus and had forced him to pay an immense tribute. In this way Israel, which had voluntarily rendered submission to him, was relieved of its embarrassment by the weakening of Syria.

Jehoash, the son of Jehoahaz, experienced more favorable conditions. He also conquered Amaziah, the king of Judah; and his son, Jeroboam II, even succeeded in restoring the old boundaries of the kingdom, as the prophet Jonah had predicted (2 K 14 24 ff). His reign was the last flourishing period of the kingdom of Ephraim. See, further, ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.

Athaliah.—The kingdom of Judah, in the meanwhile, had passed through severe crises. The most severe was caused by that Athaliah, who, after the murder of her son Ahaziah by Jehu, had secured absolute control in Jerus, and had abused this power in order to root out the family of David. Only one son of the king, Joash, escaped with his life. He, a boy of one year, was hidden in the temple by a relative, where the high priest Jehoiada, who belonged to the party opposed to the heathen-minded queen, concealed him for a period of 6 years. When the boy was 7 years old Jehoiada, at a well-timed moment, proclaimed him king. His elevation to the throne, in connection with which event the terrible Athaliah was put to death, introduced at the same time an energetic reaction against the heathendom that had found its way even into Judah, and which the queen had in every way favored.

Joash was predestined to be a theocratic king. And, in reality, in the beginning of his reign of 40 years, he went hand in hand with the priests and the prophets of Jeh. After Jehoiada's death, however, he tolerated idolatrous worship among the princes (2 Ch 24 17 ff), and by doing so came into conflict with the faithful prophet Zechariah, the son of his benefactor Jehoiada, who rebuked him for his wrong, and was even stoned. A just punishment for this guilt was recognized in the misfortune which overtook the king and his country. The Syrian king, Hazael, when he was engaged in an expedition against Gath, also took possession of Jerus and made it pay tribute, after having apparently inflicted a severe defeat on the people of Judah, on which occasion many princes fell in the battle and Joash himself was severely wounded. Toward the end of his reign there was also much dissatisfaction among his subjects, and some of his courtiers finally murdered him (2 K 12 20 f).

Amaziah.—However, his son Amaziah, who now ascended the throne, punished the murderers. The king was successful in war against the Edomites. This made him bold. He ventured to meet Joash, the king of Israel, in battle and was defeated and captured. The people of Judah suffered the deepest humiliation. A large portion of the walls of Jerus was torn down (2 K 14 11 ff). Amaziah did not feel himself safe even in his own capital city, because of the dissatisfaction of his own subjects, and he fled to Lachish. Here he was murdered. So deep had Judah fallen, while Jeroboam II succeeded in raising his kingdom to an unthought-of power.

Uzziah.—But for Judah a turn for the better soon set in under Uzziah, the same as Azariah in K, the son of Amaziah, who enjoyed a long and prosperous reign.

Prosperous as Israel outwardly appeared to be during the reigns of these two kings, Jeroboam II and

3. The Literary Prophets

Uzziah, the religious and moral conditions of the people were just as little satisfactory. This is the testimony of the prophets Amos and Hosea, as also of Isaiah and Micah, who not much later began their active ministry in Judah. It is indeed true that these were not the first prophets to put into written form some of their prophetic utterances. The prophecies of Obadiah and Joel are by many put at an earlier date, namely Obadiah under Jehoram in Judah, and Joel under Joash in Judah. At any rate, the discourses of the prophets from this time on constitute an important contemporaneous historical source. They illustrate esp. the spiritual condition of the nation. Throughout these writings complaints are made concerning the heathen superstitions and the godless cultus of the people, and esp. the corruption in the administration of the laws, oppression of the poor and the helpless by the rich and the powerful, and pride and luxury of all kinds. In all these things the prophets see a terrible apostasy on Israel's part. But also the foreign policy of the different kings, who sought help, now of the one and then of the other of the world-powers (Egypt, Assyria), and tried to buy the favor of these nations, the prophets regarded as adultery with foreign nations and as infidelity toward Jeh. As a punishment they announced, since all other misfortunes sent upon them had been of no avail, an invasion through a conqueror, whom Amos and Hosea always indicate shall be Assyria, and also deportations of the people into a heathen land, and an end of the Jewish state. Improbable as these threats may have seemed to the self-satisfied inhabitants of Samaria, they were speedily realized.

Successors of Jeroboam II.—After the death of Jeroboam, the strength of the Northern Kingdom collapsed. His son Zechariah was able to maintain the throne for only 6 months, and his murderer Shallum only one month. The general Menahem, who put him out of the way, maintained himself as king for 10 years, but only by paying a heavy tribute to the Assyrian ruler Pul, i.e. Tiglath-pileser III, who ruled from 745-727 (cf 2 K 15 19 f).

Pekah.—His son Pekahiah, on the other hand, soon fell by the hands of the murderer Pekah (2 K 15 25), who allied himself with Syria against Judah. The latter, however, invited the Assyrians to come into the country; and these, entering in the year 734 BC, put an end to the reign of this usurper, although he was actually put to death as late as 730 BC.

Hoshea.—The last king of the Northern Kingdom, Hoshea (730-722 BC), had the Assyrians to thank for his throne; but he did not keep his fidelity as a vassal very long. As soon as Tiglath-pileser was dead, he tried to throw off the Assyrian yoke. But his successor Shalmaneser IV (727-723 BC), who already in the first year of his reign had again subdued the rebellious king Elulaios of Syria, soon compelled Hoshea also to submit to his authority. Two years later Hoshea again joined a conspiracy with the Phoenicians against Assyria, in which they even counted on the help of the Egyptian king, who in the Bible is called So or Seve (Egyptian name is Shabaka). Now the Assyrians lost all patience. They at once came with their armies. Hoshea seems to have voluntarily submitted to the power of the Great King, who then made him a captive. The people, however, continued the struggle. Samaria, the capital city, was besieged, but did not fall until the 3d year (722 BC) into the hands of the enemy. Shalmaneser, in the meanwhile, had died and Sargon II had become his successor. The city was indeed not destroyed, but a large portion of the inhabitants, esp. the leaders, were deported and transplanted to Northern Mesopotamia and to Media. Sargon states that the number of deported Israelites was 27,290. Prominent persons from other cities were also doubtless to be included in those deported. On the other hand, the Assyrian king settled Bab and Syrian prisoners of war in Samaria (721 BC), and in the year 715 BC, Arabs also. But the country, to a great extent, continued in a state of desolation, so that Esarhaddon (680-668 BC) and Ashurbanipal (667-626 BC) sent new colonists there, the last mentioned sending them from Babylonia, Persia and Media (cf 2 K 17 24 ff). In these verses the Bab city of Cuthah is several times mentioned, on account of which city the Jews afterward called the Samaritans Cuthites. This report also makes mention of the religious syncretism, which of necessity resulted from the mixture of the people. But we must be careful not to place at too small figures the number of Israelites who remained in the country. It is a great exaggeration when it is claimed, as it is by Friedrich Delitzsch, that the great bulk of the inhabitants of the country of Samaria, or even of Galilee, was from this time on Babylonian.

Uzziah and Jotham.—The kingdom of Judah, however, outlived the danger from Assyria. As King Uzziah later in his life suffered from leprosy, he had Jotham as a co-regent during this period. The earliest discourses of Isaiah, which belong to this period (Isa 2-4, 5), show that in Jerus the people were at that time still enjoying the fruits and prosperity of a long period of peace. But immediately after the death of Jotham, when the youthful Ahaz began to rule, the onslaught of the allied Syrians and Ephraimites took place under Rezin, or better Rezon, and Pekah. This alliance purposed to put an end to the Davidic reign in Jerus, probably for the purpose of making this people, too, a member of the league against the dangerous Assyrians. The good-sized army of Judah seems to have fallen a victim to the superior power of the allies before the situation described in Isa 7 could be realized, in which the siege of the city is described as already imminent. The Edomites also at that time advanced against Judah. Elath, the harbor city on the Red Sea, from which Uzziah, too, as had been done by Solomon long before, sent out trading vessels, at that time came into their power. For 2 K 16 6 probably speaks of Edom and not of Aram (cf 2 Ch 28 17). In his anxiety, Ahaz, notwithstanding the advice of Isaiah to the contrary, then appealed to the king of Assyria, and the latter actually put in his appearance in 734 BC and overcame the power of Syria and Ephraim, as we have seen above. However, the intervention of this world-power brought no benefit to Judah. Without this disgraceful appeal to a heathen ruler, Jeh, according to the promise of Isaiah, would have protected Jerus, if Ahaz had only believed. And the Assyrians did not prevent the Philis and the Edomites from falling upon Judah. The Assyrians themselves soon came to be the greatest danger threatening Judah. Ahaz, however, was an unstable character in religious affairs, and he copied heathen forms of worship, and even sacrificed his son to the angry sun-god, in order to gain his favor. The tribute that the people had to pay to Assyria was already a heavy burden on this little kingdom.

Hezekiah.—His noble and God-fearing son, Hezekiah (724-696 BC), was also compelled to suffer from the consequences of this misgovernment. The temptation was great to enter into an alliance with his neighbors and the Egyptians, so strong in cavalry, for the purpose of ridding Judah of the burdensome yoke of the Assyrians. In vain did Isaiah warn against such unworthy self-help. At the advice of the ministers of Hezekiah, and because of the trust put in Egypt, the tribute was finally refused to the Assyrians. Hezekiah also sought to establish closer connections with Merodach-baladan, the king of Babylon and the enemy of the Assyrians, when the latter, after a dangerous sickness of the king, had sent messengers to Jerus in order to congratulate him on the restoration of his health. This story, found in 2 K 20, belongs chronologically before 2 K 18 13 ff, and, more accurately, in the 14th year of Hezekiah mentioned in 18 13. However, the expedition of Sennacherib which is mistakenly placed in that year, took place several years later: according to the Assyrian monuments, in the year 701 BC.

Sennacherib.—In the year 702 BC Sennacherib, with a powerful army, marched over the Lebanon and subdued the rebellious Phoenicians, and marched along the seacoast to Philistia. The inhabitants of Ekron had sent their king, Padi, who sympathized with the Assyrians, to Hezekiah. Sennacherib came to punish Ekron and Ascalon. But he was particularly anxious to overpower Judah, which country his troops devastated and depopulated. Now Hezekiah recognized his danger, and offered to submit to Sennacherib. The latter accepted his submission conditionally on the payment of a burdensome tribute, which Hezekiah delivered faithfully (2 K 18 14-16). Then Sennacherib was no longer satisfied with the tribute alone, but sent troops who were to despoil Jerus. Isaiah, who surely had not sanctioned the falling away from the Assyrian supremacy and had prophesied that the inhabitants of Jerus would suffer a severe punishment, from that moment, when the conqueror had maliciously broken his word, spoke words of comfort and advised against giving up the city, no matter how desperate the situation seemed to be (Isa 37 1 ff). The city was then not given up, and Sennacherib, on account of a number of things that occurred, and finally because of a pestilence which broke out in his army, was compelled to retreat. He did not return to Jerus, and later met his death by violent hands. This deliverance of Jerus through the miraculous providence of God was the greatest triumph of the prophet Isaiah. Within his kingdom Hezekiah ruled successfully. He also purified the cultus from the heathen influences that had forced their way into it, and was a predecessor of Josiah in the abolition of the sacrifices on the high places, which had been corrupted by these influences.

Manasseh.—Unfortunately, his son Manasseh was little worthy of succeeding him. He, in every way, favored the idolatry which all along had been growing secretly. He inaugurated bloody persecutions of the faithful prophets of Jeh. According to a tradition, which it must be confessed is not supported by undoubted testimony, Isaiah also, now an old man, became a victim of these persecutions. Images and altars were openly erected to Baal and Astarte. Even in the temple-house on Mt. Zion, an image of Astarte was standing. As a result of this ethnic cultus, immorality and sensuality found their way among the people. At the same time the terrible service of Moloch, in the valley of Hinnom, demanded the sacrifice of children, and even a son of the king was given over to this worship. The Book of Ch, indeed, tells the story of a terrible affliction that Manasseh suffered, namely that an Assyrian general dragged him in chains to Babylon for having violated his promises to them, but that he was soon released. This is not at all incredible. He seems to have taken part in a rebellion, which the brother of the Assyrian king, who was also vice-king in Babylon, had inaugurated. This sad experience may have forced Manasseh to a certain kind of repentance, at least, so that he desisted from his worst sacrileges. But his son Amon continued the old ways of his father, until after a brief reign he was put to death.

Josiah.—Much more promising was his young son Josiah, who now, only 8 years old, came to the throne. It is quite possible that, in view of such frequent changes in the disposition of the successors to the throne, his mother may have had great influence on his character. Concerning Josiah, see 2 K 22 1 ff. With increasing clearness and consistency, he proceeded to the work of religious reformation. A special impetus to this was given by the finding of an old law book in the temple, the publication of which for the first time revealed the fearful apostasy of the times. The finding of this book in the temple, as narrated in 2 K 22 3 ff, took place in connection with the restoration of that building on a larger scale, which at that time had been undertaken. And very probably Edouard Naville is right in believing, on the basis of Egyptian analogies, that this document had been imbedded in the foundation walls of the building. Whether this had been done already in the days of Solomon is not determined by this fact. From the orders of Josiah we can conclude that the book which was found was Dt, which lays special stress on the fact that there shall be a central place for the cultus, and also contains such threats as those must have been which frightened Josiah. But under no circumstances was Dt a lawbook that had first been written at this time, or a fabrication of the priest Hilkiah and his helpers. It would rather have been possible that the discovered old law was rewritten in changed form after its discovery and had been adapted to the language of the times. The people were obliged to obey the newly discovered law and were instructed in it.

Jeremiah.—The prophet Jeremiah also, who a few years before this had been called to the prophetic office, according to certain data in the text, participated in this proclamation of the law of the covenant throughout the land. This change for the better did not change the tendency of his prophetic discourses, from what these had been from the beginning. He continued to be the accuser and the prophet of judgment, who declared that the destruction of the city and of the temple was near at hand. He looked too deeply into the inner corruption of his people to be misled by the external transformation that was the result of a command of the ruler. And only too soon did the course of events justify his prediction. With the person of the God-fearing Josiah, the devotion of the people to the law was also buried and the old curse everywhere broke out again.

The Chaldeans.—In a formal way Jeremiah was probably influenced by the incursions of the Scythians, which occurred during his youth, and who about this time marched from the plain of Jezreel toward Egypt (cf Herodotus i.103 ff); which event also made a gloomy impression on his contemporary Ezekiel, as appears from his vision of Gog in the land of Magog. However, we are not to suppose that Jeremiah, when describing the enemy coming from the north, whom he saw from the time of his call to the prophetic office, meant merely this band of freebooters. The prophet had in mind a world-power after the type of the Assyrians, who always came from the north into Canaan. The Assyrians indeed were in process of disintegration, and Nineveh fell under the attacks of the Medes and the Persians in the year 607-606 BC. The heir of the Assyrian power was not Egypt, which was also striving for universal supremacy, but was the Babylonian, or rather, more accurately, the Chaldean dynasty of Nabopolassar, whose son Nebuchadnezzar had overpowered the Egyptians at Carchemish in 605 BC. From this time on Jeremiah had pointed out the Chaldeans and Nebuchadnezzar, who soon afterward became their king, as the agents to carry out the judgment on Jerus.

Already a few years before this Judah's good star had gone down on the horizon. When Pharaoh-necho II came to Pal by the sea route, in order to march northeast through the plain of Jezreel, to give the final and fatal blow to the sinking kingdom of the Assyrians, King Josiah opposed him on the plain of Megiddo, probably because of his obligations as a vassal to the king of Assyria. In the battle of Megiddo (609 BC), Josiah was mortally wounded. No greater calamity could have befallen Judah than the death of this king, who was deeply mourned by all well-meaning people, and who was the last of the house of David that was a credit to it.

The successors of Josiah.—By popular election the choice now fell on Jehoahaz, a younger son of Josiah, called by Jeremiah (22 11) Shallum. But he found no favor with Necho, who took him prisoner in his camp at Riblah and carried him to Egypt (2 K 23 30 ff). The Egyptian king himself selected Jehoikim, hitherto called Eliakim, an older son of Josiah, who had been ignored by the people, to be king in Jerus, a prince untrue to Jeh, conceited, luxury-loving and hard-hearted, who, in addition, through his perfidious policy, brought calamity upon the land. He formed a conspiracy against Nebuchadnezzar, to whom he had begun to pay tribute in the 5th year of his reign, and in this way brought it about that the Syrians, the Moabites and the Ammonites, who had taken sides with the Assyrians, devastated the land of Judah, and that finally the king of Babylon himself came to Jerus to take revenge. It is not clear what was the end of this king. According to 2 Ch

36 6, compared with 2 K 24 6, he seems to have died while yet in Jerus, and after he had already fallen into the hands of his enemies. His son Jehoiahin did not experience a much better fate. After ruling three months he was taken to Babylon, where he was a prisoner for 37 years, until he was pardoned (2K 24 8 ff; 26 27 ff). Together with Jehoiahin, the best portion of the inhabitants of Jerus, about 10,000 men, esp. the smiths and the builders, were deported.

Zedekiah, the last king of Judah.—Once more the Babylonians set up a king in Jerus in the person of Zedekiah, an uncle of Jehoiahin, and accordingly a son of Josiah, called Mattaniah, who afterward was called Zedekiah. He governed for twelve years (597–586 BC), and by his life, morally and religiously corrupt, sealed the fate of the house and of the kingdom of David. The better class among the leading and prominent people had been banished. As a result, the courtiers of the king urged him to try once again some treacherous schemes against the Bab rulers and to join Egypt in a conspiracy against them. However earnestly Jeremiah and Ezekiel warned against this policy, Zedekiah nevertheless constantly yielded to his evil advisers and to the warlike patriotic party, who were determined to win back in battle the independence of the country. While he at first, through an embassy, had assured the Great King of his loyalty (Jer 29 3), and still in the 4th year of his reign had personally visited in Babylon as a mark of his fidelity (Jer 51 59), he was induced in the 9th year of his reign to make an alliance with the Egyptians against the Babylonians and to refuse to render obedience to the latter. Nebuchadnezzar soon came and surrounded the city. At the announcement that an Egypt army was approaching, the siege was again raised for a short time. But the hope placed by Zedekiah on his ally failed him. The Babylonians began again to starve out the city. After a siege of 18 months, resistance proved futile. The king tried secretly to break through the circle of besiegers, but in doing so was taken prisoner, was blinded by the Bab king and taken to Babylon. The majority of the prominent men and state officials, who were taken to the encampment of the conqueror in Riblah, were put to death. The conquered city of Jerus, esp. its walls and towers, together with the temple, were totally destroyed. Nearly all the inhabitants who could be captured after the slaughter were dragged into captivity, and only people of the lower classes were left behind in order to cultivate the land (2 K 25 11). Gedaliah, a noble-minded aristocrat, was appointed governor of the city, and took up his residence in Mizpah. At this place it seemed that a new kernel of the people was being gathered. Jeremiah also went there. However, after two months this good beginning came to an end. Gedaliah was slain by Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah, an anti-Chaldaean, a fanatical and revengeful descendant of the house of David. The murderer acted in coöperation with certain Ammonitish associates and fled to the king of Ammon. The Jews in later times considered the murder of Gedaliah as an especially great national calamity, and fasted on the anniversary of this crime. And as the people also feared the revenge of the Babylonians, many migrated to Egypt, compelling Jeremiah, now an old man, to accompany them, although he prophesied to them that no good would come of this scheme. They first stayed at the border city Tahpanhes, near Pelusium, and then scattered over Upper and Lower Egypt.

VI. Time of the Babylonian Exile.—The inhabitants of Judah, who had been deported by Nebuchadnezzar at different times, were settled by him in Babylonia, e.g. at the river Chebar (Ezk

1 1), near the city of Nippur. From Hilprecht's excavations of this city, it has been learned that this river, or branch of the Euphrates

1. Influence river, is to be found at this place, and of the is not to be confounded with the river which have been found at Nippur, show that a large Jewish colony lived at that place. Of the fate of these banished Jews for a period of 50 years, we hear almost nothing. But it is possible to learn what their condition was in exile from the Book of Ezk and the 2d part of Isa. Land was assigned to them here, and they were permitted to build houses for themselves (Jer 29 5 ff), and could travel around this district without restraint. They were not prisoners in the narrow sense of the word. They soon, through diligence and skill in trade, attained to considerable wealth, so that most of them, after the lapse of half a century, were perfectly satisfied and felt no desire to return home. For the spiritual development of the people the exile proved to be a period of great importance. In the first place, they were separated from their native soil, and in this way from many temptations of heathenism and idolatry, and the like. The terrible judgment that had come over Jerus had proved that the prophets had been right, who had for a long time, but in vain, preached genuine repentance. This did not prove to be without fruit (cf Zec 1 6). While living in the heathen land, they naturally became acquainted with heathendom in a more crass form. But even if many of the Jews were defiled by it, in general the relations of the Israelites toward the idol-worshipping Babylonians were antagonistic, and they became all the more zealous in the observance of those religious rites which could be practised in a foreign land, such as rest on the Sabbath day, the use of meats, circumcision, and others. But with marked zeal the people turned to the spiritual storehouse of their traditions, namely their sacred literature. They collected the laws, the history, the hymns, and treasured them. It was also a noteworthy progress that such prophets as Ezekiel, Jeremiah and Daniel received prophetic visions while on heathen soil. The people also learned that the heathen, in the midst of whom they lived, became receptive of the higher truths of Israel's religion. Esp. does the 2d part of Isa, chs 40–66, show that they began to understand the missionary calling of Israel among the nations of the world.

The Book of Dnl reports how a God-fearing and law-abiding Jew, through his prophecies, attained to prominent positions of influence at the courts of different rulers. From the Book of Ezk we learn that the prophets and the elders cared for the spiritual wants of the people, and that they held meetings, at which indeed it was not permitted to offer sacrifices, but at which the word of Jeh was proclaimed. Here we find the beginnings of what afterward was the synagogue-system.

A remarkable picture of the Jewish diaspora in Upper Egypt is furnished by recently discovered papyri at Elephantine. From these it

3. Elephantine appears that in the 6th cent. BC, not only a large and flourishing Jewish colony was to be found at this place,

Papyri but also that they had erected here a fine temple to Jeh where they brought their sacrifices to which they had been accustomed at home. In an Aram. letter, still preserved and dating from the year 411 BC, and which is addressed to the governor Bagohi, in Judaea, these Jews complain that their temple in Yēb (Elephantine, near Syene) had been destroyed in the same year. It also states that this temple had been spared on one occasion by Cambyes, who was in Egypt from 525 to 521 BC. The answer of Bagohi also has been preserved, and he directs that the temple is to be built again and that meal offerings and incense are again to be introduced. Probably intentionally, mention in this letter is made only of the unbloody sacrifices, while in the first letter burnt sacrifices also are named. The sacrifices of animals by the Jews would probably have aroused too much the anger of the devotees of the divine ram, which was worshipped at Syene. Up to the present time we knew only of the much later temple of the high priest Onias IV at Leontopolis (160 BC). Cf Jos, Ani, XII, iii, 1-3; BJ, VII, x, 2, 3.

VII. Return from the Exile and the Restoration.

—In the meanwhile there was a new readjustment of political supremacy among the world-

1. Career of Cyrus powers. The Pers king, Koresh (Cyrus), first made himself free from the supremacy of Media which, after the capture of the city Ecbatana, became a part of his own kingdom (549 BC). At that time Nabonidus was the king in Babylon (555-538 BC), who was not displeased at the collapse of the kingdom of the Medes, but soon learned that the new ruler turned out to be a greater danger to himself, as Cyrus subjugated, one after the other, the smaller kingdoms in the north. But Nabonidus was too unwarlike to meet Cyrus. He confined himself to sending his son with an army to the northern boundaries of his kingdom. On the other hand, the king of the Lydians, Croesus, who was related by marriage to King Astyages, who had been subdued by Cyrus, began a war with Cyrus, after he had formed an alliance with Egypt and Sparta. In the year 546 BC, he crossed the river Halys. Cyrus approached from the Tigris, and in doing so already entered Bab territory, conquered Croesus, took his capital city Sardis, and put an end to the kingdom of Lydia. The pious Israelites in captivity, under the tutelage of Deutero-Isaiah, watched these events with the greatest of interest. For the prophet taught them from the beginning to see in this king "the deliverer," who was the instrument of Jeh for the return of the Israelites out of captivity, and of whom the prophets had predicted. And this expectation was fulfilled with remarkable rapidity. The victorious and aggressive king of Persia could now no longer be permanently checked, even by the Babylonians. It was in vain that King Nabonidus had caused the images of the gods from many of his cities to be taken to Babylon, in order to make the capital city invincible. This city opened its doors to the Pers commander Ugbaru (Gobryas) in 538 BC, and a few months later Cyrus himself entered the city. This king, however, was mild and conciliatory in his treatment of the people and the city. He did not destroy the city, but commanded only that a portion of the walls should be razed. However, the city gradually, in the course of time, became ruins.

Cyrus also won the good will and favor of the subjugated nations by respecting their religions. He returned to their shrines the idols of Nabonidus, that had been taken away. But he was particularly considerate of the Jews, who doubtless had complained to him of their fate and had made known to him their prophecies regarding him as the coming deliverer.

In the very first year of his reign over Babylon he issued an edict (2 Ch 36 22 f; Ezr 1 1 ff) that

2. First Return under Zerubbabel permitted the Jews to return home, with the command that they should again erect their temple. For this purpose he directed that the temple-vessels, which Nebuchadnezzar had taken away with him, should be returned to them, and commanded that those Israelites who voluntarily remained in Babylon should contribute money for the restoration of the temple. At the head of those to be returned stood Sheshbazzar, who is probably identical with Zerubbabel, although this is denied by some scholars; and also the high priest, Joshua, a grandson of the high priest, Seraiah, who had been put to death by Nebuchadnezzar. They were accompanied by only a small part of those in exile, that is by 42,360 men and women and children, male and female servants, esp. from the tribes of Judah, Benjamin and Levi, but of the last-mentioned tribes more priests than other Levites. After several months they safely arrived in Pal, probably 537 BC. Some of them settled down in Jerus, and others in surrounding cities and villages. They erected the altar for burnt sacrifices, so that they were again able in the 7th month to sacrifice on it.

Building the temple.—The cornerstone of the temple was also solemnly laid at that time in the 2d year of the Return (Ezr 3 8 ff). But the erection of the temple must have been interrupted in a short time, since it was not until the 2d year of Darius (520 BC), at the urgent appeal of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, that the work of building was energetically prosecuted. For this reason many scholars deny this cornerstone-laying in the year 536 BC. However, it still remains thinkable that several attempts were made at this work, since the young colony had many difficulties to contend with. Then, too, the memoirs of Ezra and Nehemiah, which have been worked over by the author of Ch, report the history of these times only in parts. The historical value of these literary sources has been confirmed by those Aram. papyri found in Upper Egypt.

In the year 516 BC, after 4 years of building, the temple was completed and dedicated. After

3. Ezra and Nehemiah this we have no information for a period of 58 years. Then we learn that Ezra, the scribe, in the 7th year of Artaxerxes I (458 BC), came with a new caravan of about 1,500 men with women and children from Babylon to the Holy Land. He had secured from the king the command to establish again in the land of the Jews the law, in which he was a prominent expert, and he tried to do this by earnest admonitions and instructive discourses addressed to the people. The acme of the activity of Ezra was the meeting of the people described in Neh 8-10 on the Feast of the Tabernacles, on which occasion the entire nation solemnly came under obligation to observe the law. According to the present position of these chapters this act took place in 444 BC; but it is probable that it happened before the arrival of Nehemiah, whose name would accordingly have to be eliminated in 8 9. This pericope would then belong to the memoirs of Ezra and not to those of Nehemiah. After some years there came to help Ezra in his work, Nehemiah, a pious Jew, who was a cupbearer to the king, and at his own request was granted leave of absence in order to help the city of Jerus, which he had heard was in dire straits. Its walls were in ruins, as the neighboring nations had been able to hinder their rebuilding, and even those walls of the city that had been hastily restored, had again been pulled down. Nehemiah came in the year 445-444 BC from Shushan to Jerus and at once went energetically to work at rebuilding the walls. Notwithstanding all oppositions and intrigues of malicious neighbors, the work was successfully brought to a close.

The hostile agitations, in so far as they were not caused by widespread envy and hatred of the Jews among the neighboring peoples, had a religious ground. Those who returned, as the people of Jeh, held themselves aloof from the peoples living round about them, esp. from the mixed peoples of Samaria. Samaria was the breeding-place for this hostility against Jerus. The governor at that place, Sanballat, was the head of this hostile league. The Jews had declined to permit the Samaritans to coöperate in the erection of the temple and would have no religious communion with them. The Samaritans had taken serious offence at this, and they accordingly did all they could to prevent the building of the walls in Jerus, which would be a hindrance to their having access to the temple. But Nehemiah's trust in God and his energy overcame this obstacle. The policy of exclusiveness, which Ezra and Nehemiah on this occasion and at other times followed out, evinces a more narrow mind than the preëxilic prophets had shown. In the refusal of intermarriage with the people living around them they went beyond the Mosaic law, for they even demanded that those marriages, which the Israelites had already contracted with foreign women, should be dissolved. But this exclusiveness was the outcome of legal conscientiousness, and at this period it was probably necessary for the self-preservation of the people of Jeh.

Malachi.—From the prophecies of Malachi, who was almost a contemporary of the two mentioned, it can be seen that the marriages with the foreign women had also brought with them a loosening of even the most sacred family ties (Mal 2 14 f). After an absence of 12 years, Nehemiah again returned to Shushan to the court; and when he later returned to Jerus he was compelled once more to inaugurate a stringent policy against the lawlessness which was violating the sanctity of the temple and of the Sabbath commandment. He also expelled a certain Manasseh, a grandson of the high priest, who had married a daughter of Sanballat. This Manasseh, according to Jos (Ant. XI, viii, 2), erected the sanctuary on Mt. Gerizim, and established the priesthood at that place. This is no doubt correct. These accounts of Jos are often combined without cause with the times of Alexander the Great, although they transpired about 110 years earlier.

The history of the Jews in the last decades of the Pers rule is little known. Under Artaxerxes III (Ochus), they were compelled to suffer much, when they took part in a rebellion of the Phoenicians and Cyprians. Many Jews were at that time banished to Hyrcania on the southern coast of the Caspian Sea. The Pers general, Bagoses, came to Jerus and forced his way even into the temple (Jos, Ant. XI, vii, 1). He undertook to install as high priest, in the place of John (Jochanan), his brother Joshua (Jesus). The latter, however, was slain by the former in the temple. For the first time the office of the high priest appears as more of a political position, something that it never was in the pre-exilic times, and according to the law was not to be.

VIII. The Jews under Alexander and His Successors.—As the Jews were then tired of the rule of the priests, they were not dissatisfied

1. Spread of Hellenism with the victorious career of Alexander the Great. He appears to have assumed a friendly attitude toward them, even if the story reported by Jos (Ant. XI, viii, 4) is scarcely historical. The successors of Alexander were also, as a rule, tolerant in religious matters. But for political and geographical reasons, Pal suffered severely in these times, as it lay between Syria and Egypt, and was an object of attack on the part of both the leading ruling families in this period, the Ptolemies in Egypt and the Seleucidae in Syria. At the same time Hellenism, which had been so powerfully advanced by Alexander as a factor of civilization and culture, penetrated the land of Israel also. Gr culture and language spread soon in Pal and in many places was supreme. The more strict adherents of Judaism recognized in this a danger to the Mosaic order of life and religion, and all the more zealously they now adhered to the traditional ordinances. These were called the hāsīdīm, or the Pious (Ἀσιδαῖοι, Hasidaioi, 1 Macc 2 42; 7 13; 2 Macc 14 6). The world-transforming Hellenistic type of thought spread esp. among the aristocrats and the politically prominent, and even found adherents among the priests, while the hāsīdīm belonged to the less conspicuous ranks of the people.

A struggle for life and death was caused between these two tendencies by the Syrian king, Antiochus IV (Epiphanes), into whose hands the sovereignty of Pal had fallen. He undertook nothing less than to root out the hated Jewish religion. In the year 168 BC he commanded that the temple of Jeh in Jerus should be dedicated to the Olympian Jupiter and forbade most stringently the observance of the Sabbath and circumcision. A large portion of the people did not resist his oppression, but adapted themselves to this tyrannical heathendom. Others suffered and died as martyrs. Finally in the year 167 BC a priest, Mattathias, gave the signal for a determined resistance, at the head of which stood his brave sons, the Hasmoneans, or Maccabees. First his son Judas undertook the leadership of the faithful. He succeeded in freeing Jerus from the Syrians. He restored the temple on Mt. Zion. The temple was dedicated anew and was given over to the old cultus. After a number of victorious campaigns, Judas Maccabaeus died the death of a hero in 161 BC. His brother, Jonathan, who took his place at the head of the movement, tried to secure the independence of the land rather through deliberate planning than through military power. He assumed, in addition to his secular power, also the high-priestly dignity. After his death by violence in 143 BC, he was succeeded by his brother Simon as the bearer of this double honor. The Hasmoneans, however, rapidly became worldly minded and lost the sympathies of the hāsīdīm. The son of Simon, John Hyrcanus (135–106 BC), broke entirely with the Pious, and his family, after his death, came to an end in disgraceful struggles for power. The rule of the land fell into the hands of Herod, a tyrant of Idumaeen origin, who was supported by the Romans. From 37 BC he was the recognized king of Judah. See ASMONEANS; MACCABEES.

2. The Hasmoneans

IX. The Romans.—After the death of Herod (4 BC), the kingdom, according to his last will, was to be divided among his three sons.

1. Division of Territory Archelaus received Judaea; Antipas, Galilee and Peraea; Philip, the border lands in the north. However, Archelaus was soon deposed by the Romans (6 AD), and Judaea was made a part of the province of Syria, but was put under a special Roman procurator, who resided in Caesarea. These procurators (of whom the best known was Pontius Pilate, 26–36 AD), had no other object than to plunder the land and the people.

In this way a conflict was gradually generated between the people and their oppressors, which ended with the destruction of Jerus by

2. Destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans the Romans in 70 AD. As early as 40 AD this rupture almost took place, when the Syrian legate Petronius, at the command of Caligula, undertook to place a statue of the emperor in the temple of Jerus. On this occasion

King Agrippa I, who was again ruling the whole territory of Herod, succeeded in adjusting the conflict. His son Agrippa II was given a much smaller kingdom (40–100 AD). He, too, sought to prevent the people from undertaking a struggle with the Romans, but in vain. By his unscrupulous treatment of the people, the procurator Gessius Florus drove the Jews into an insurrection. The party of the Zealots gained the upper hand. Florus was compelled to leave Jerus (66 AD). Even the good-sized army which Cestius Gallus commanded could not get control of the city, but was completely overpowered by the Jews on its retreat at Beth-horon. Now the entire country rose in rebellion. The Romans, under the leadership of Vespasian, advanced with considerable power and first conquered Galilee, then under Jos (67 AD). In Jerus, in the meanwhile, different parties of the Jews were still fighting each other. Titus, the son of Vespasian, took the chief command after Vespasian had already conquered the E. Jordan country and the western coast, but had hastened to Rome in order to become emperor. Titus completely surrounded the city a few days before the Passover festival in the year 70. On the northern side the Romans first broke through the first and newest city wall, and after that the second. The third offered a longer resistance, and at the same time famine wrought havoc in Jerus. At last the battle raged about the temple, during which this structure went up in flames. According to the full description by Jos (BJ, VI, iv, 3 ff), Titus tried to prevent the destruction of the temple; according to Sulpicius Severus (Chron. II, 20), however, this destruction was just what he wanted. A few fortified places yet maintained themselves after the fall of Jerus, e.g. Machaerus in the E. Jordan country, but they could not hold out very long.

Later insurrection of Bar-Cochba.—Once again the natural ambition for independence burst out in the insurrection of Bar-Cochba (132–35 AD). Pious teachers of the law, esp. Rabbi Akiba, had enkindled this fire, in order to rid the country of the rule of the Gentiles. However, notwithstanding some temporary successes, this insurrection was hopeless. Both the city and the country were desolated by the enraged Romans still more fearfully, and were depopulated still more than in 70. From that time Jerus was lost to the Jews. They lived on without a country of their own, without any political organization, without a sanctuary, in the Diaspora among the nations.

The spiritual and religious life of the Jews during the period preceding the dissolution of the state was determined particularly by the legalistic character of their ideals and their opposition to Hellenism. Their religion had become formalistic to a great extent since their return from the exile. The greatest emphasis was laid on obedience to the traditional ordinances, and these latter were chiefly expositions of ceremonial usurpers.

Appearance of Jesus Christ.—The crown of the history of Israel-Judah was the appearance of Jesus Christ. Looked at superficially, it may indeed appear as though His person and His life had but little affected the development of the national history of Israel. However, more closely viewed, we shall see that this entire history has its goal in Him and finds its realization in Him. After full fruit had developed out of this stock, the latter withered and died. He was to be the bearer of salvation for all mankind.

LITERATURE.—The earliest historian of Israel was the Jew, Flavius Josephus, in the 1st Christian cent. His example found few followers in the early church, and we mention only the Chronicle of Sulpicius Severus. The subject is handled theologically by Augustine in his De Civitate Dei. It was only in the 17th cent. that a keen interest was awakened in this subject. Cf esp. James Usher, Annales Veteris et Novi Testamenti, London, 1605; J. B. Bousset, Discours sur l'histoire universelle, Paris, 1681; Humphrey Prideaux, The Old and the New Testament Connected in the History of the Jews and Neighboring Nations, 2 vols, London, 1716; S. Shukford, The Sacred and Profane History of the World Connected, London, 1727, this work treating the subject apologetically against the Deists. Cf also J. Saurin, Discours historiques, Amsterdam, 1720. Cocceius and his school systematized this history on the basis of their theological tenets, e.g. Gurtler, Systema theol. prophetica, Frankfurt, 1724. More systematic is the work of Vittinga, Hypothesis historiarum et chronologiae sacrae, Frankfurt, 1708. The Lutheran church furnished the excellent work of Franz Budde, Historia Eccles. Veteris Testamenti, Jena, 1715. In the 18th cent., Bengel's school furnished some good histories of Israel, such as M. F. Roos's Einleitung in die bibl. Geschichte, 1700. More popular is the work of J.

J. Hess. The best Catholic work from this time is J. Jahn's Archaeologie, 1802; while the Rationalistic period furnished Lorenz Bauer's Geschichte der hebr. Nation, 1800. In the 19th cent. the rationalistic and the conservative tendencies run parallel, and a new impulse was given to the study of this history by the phenomenal archaeological finds in Egypt and in Assyria and Babylon. Critical reconstruction of Israel's history characterizes the works of Reuss, Graf, Kuenen, Wellhausen. Other works of prominence are the Geschichte des Volkes Gottes, by Ewald; Kurtz, Geschichte des alten Bundes (these are trad); Hitzig, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, with critical tendency. The work of August Koehler, Lehrbuch der biblischen Geschichte, AT, is positive, while Wellhausen's Geschichte Israels is a classic of the advanced school. Other works mostly critical are the histories of Renan, Kuenen, Stade, Winckler, Piepenbring, Cornill, Guthe, Cheyne, and others. Kittel's Geschichte der Hebräer (trad) is more moderate in tone. For the NT the richest storehouse is Schürer's Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi (trad); Hausrath's Neutestamentliche Zeitgeschichte is also good. From the Jewish standpoint this history has been treated by S. Friedländer, Geschichte des Israel-Volkes; and J. M. Jost, Geschichte der Israeliten; Moritz Raphall, Post-biblical History of the Jews from the Close of the OT till the Destruction of the Second Temple, in the Year 70.

Among English works may be especially mentioned Milman's History of the Jews and Stanley's, Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church, with smaller works by Ottley and others.

American works on the subject from the critical point of view are a History of the Heb People, by Kent, and a History of the Jewish People by Kent and Riggs in the "Historical Series for Bible Students," published by Messrs. Scribner. Cf also McCurdy, History, Prophecy and the Monuments; Toy, Judaism and Christianity; H. P. Smith, OT History.

LITERATURE

I. The First Period.—The circumstances leading up to the foundation of the Northern Kingdom of Israel, or the Kingdom of the Ten

1. The Two Tribes, have been detailed under the Kingdoms heading KINGDOM OF JUDAH. From a secular point of view it would be more natural to regard the latter as an offshoot from the former, rather than the converse. But not only is the kingdom of Judah of paramount importance in respect of both religion and literature, but its government also was in the hands of a single dynasty, whereas that of the Northern Kingdom changed hands no less than 8 t, during the two and a half cents. of its existence. Moreover, the Southern Kingdom lasted about twice as long as the other.

No sooner had Jeroboam I been elected the first ruler of the newly founded state than he set about managing its affairs with the energy

2. The 1st Dynasty for which he was distinguished (1 K 11 28). To complete the disruption he established a sanctuary in opposition to that of Jerus (Hos 8 14), with its own order of priests (2 Ch 11 14; 13 9), and founded two capital cities, Shechem on the W. and Peniel on the E. of the Jordan (1 K 12 25). Peace seems to have been maintained between the rival governments during the 17 years' reign of Rehoboam, but on the accession of his son Abijah war broke out (1 K 15 6,7; 2 Ch 13 3 ff). Shortly afterward Jeroboam died and was succeeded by his son Nadab, who was a year later assassinated, and the Ist Dynasty came to an end, after an existence of 23 years, being limited, in fact, to a single reign.

The turn of the tribe of Issachar came next. They had not yet given a ruler to Israel; they could claim none of the judges, but they

3. The IId had taken their part at the assembling Dynasty of the tribes under Deborah and Barak of Naphtali. Baasha began his reign of 24 years by extirpating the house of his predecessor (1 K 15 29), just as the 'Abbāsids annihilated the Umeiyads. The capital was now Tirzah (1 K 14 17; Cant 6 4), a site not yet identified. His Judaeian contemporary was Asa (q.v.), who, like his father Abijah, called in the aid of the Syrians against the Northern Kingdom. Baasha was unequal to the double contest and was forced to evacuate the ground he had gained. His son Elah was assassinated after a reign of a year, as he himself had assassinated the son of the founder of the preceding dynasty, and his entire family and adherents were massacred (1 K 16 11).

The name of the assassin was Zimri, an officer of the charioteers, of unknown origin and tribe. But the kingship was always elective, and

4. Civil War the army chose Omri, the commander-in-chief, who besieged and took Tirzah, Zimri setting the palace on fire by his own hand and perishing in the flames. A second pretender, Tibni, a name found in Phoenician and Assyrian, of unknown origin, sprang up. He was quickly disposed of, and security of government was reestablished.

II. Period of the Syrian Wars.—The founder of the new dynasty was Omri. By this time the

1. The IIIId united whole that the distinctions of Dynasty tribe were forgotten. We do not know to what tribe Omri and his successors belonged.

With Omri the political sphere of action of Israel became wider than it had been before, and its internal affairs more settled. His civil code was in force long after his dynasty was extinct, and was adopted in the Southern Kingdom (Mic 6 16). The capital city, the site of which he chose, has remained a place of human habitation till the present day. Within the last few years, remains of his building have been recovered, showing a great advance in that art from those believed to go back to Rehoboam and Solomon. He was, however, unfortunate in his relations with Syria, having lost some towns and been forced to grant certain trading concessions to his northern neighbors (1 K 20 34). But he was so great a king that long after his death the Kingdom of the Ten Tribes was known to the Assyrians as "the house of Omri."

Contemporarily with this dynasty, there occurred a revival of the Phoen power, which exerted a powerful influence upon the Israelite kings

2. World- and people, and at the same time the Politics Assyrians once more began to interfere with Syrian politics. The Northern Kingdom now began to play a part in the game of world-politics. There was peace with Judah, and alliance with Phoenicia was cemented by the marriage of Ahab, it seems after his father's death, with Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal (1 K 16 31). This led to the erection of a temple in Samaria in which the Tyrian Baal was worshipped, while side by side with it the worship of Jeh was carried on as before. It seems as if the people had fallen back from the pure monotheism of Moses and David into what is known as henotheism. Against this relapse Elijah protested with final success. Ahab was a wise and skilful soldier, without rashness, but also without decision. He defeated a Syrian coalition in two campaigns (1 K 20) and imposed on

Ben-hadad the same conditions which the latter had imposed on Omri. With the close of the reign of Asa in Judah, war ceased between the two Israelite kingdoms and the two kings for the first time became friends and fought side by side (1 K 22). In the reign of Ahab we note the beginning of decay in the state in regard to personal liberty and equal justice. The tragedy of Naboth's vineyard would not have happened but for the influence of Tyrian ideas, any more than in the case of the famous windmill which stands by the palace of Sans Souci at Potsdam. A further improvement in the art of building took place in this reign. The palace of Ahab, which has recently been recovered by the excavations carried on by the Harvard University Expedition under Dr. G. A. Reisner, shows a marked advance in fineness of workmanship upon that of Omri.

The object of Ben-hadad's attack upon Ahab seems to have been to compel him to join a league founded to resist the encroachments of

3. Battle Assyria upon the countries bordering of Karkar upon the Mediterranean. The confederates, who were led by Ben-hadad, and of whom Ahab was one, were defeated by Shalmaneser II in the battle of Karkar. The date is known from the inscriptions to have been the year 854-853. It is the first quite certain date in Heb history, and from it the earlier dates must be reckoned by working backward. Ahab seems to have seized the moment of Syria's weakness to exact by force the fulfilment of their agreement on the part of Ben-hadad (1 K 22).

On the other hand, the king of Moab, Mesha, appears to have turned the same disaster to account by throwing off his allegiance to ### 4. Loss of Israel, which dated from the time of Territory David, but had apparently lapsed until it was enforced anew by Omri (MS, II. 4 ff, but l. 8 makes Omri's reign + half Ahab's=40 years). Ahab's son and successor Jehoram (omitting Ahaziah, who is chiefly notable as a devotee of Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron), with the aid of Jehoshaphat and his vassal, the king of Edom, attempted to recover his rights, but in vain (2 K 3). It may have been in consequence of the failure of this expedition that the Syrians again besieged Samaria and reduced it to great straits (2 K 6 24; 7), but the date is uncertain. Jehoram replied with a counter-attack upon the E. of the Jordan.

It was no doubt owing to his connection with the king of Judah that Jehoram so far modified the worship and ritual as to remove the ### 5. Reform worst innovations which had come to of Religion prevail in the Northern Kingdom (2 K 3 1-3). But these half-measures did not satisfy the demands of the time, and in the revolution which followed both he and his dynasty were swept away. The dynasty had lasted, according to the Bib. account, less than half a century.

The religious reformation, or rather revolution, which swept away almost entirely both royal houses, bears a good deal of resemblance to the Wahhābī rising in Arabia at the beginning of the 18th cent. It took its origin from prophetism (1 K 19 16), and was supported by the Rechabite Jonadab. The object of the movement headed by Jehu was nominally to revenge the prophets of Jeh put to death by order of Jezebel, but in reality it was much wider and aimed at nothing less than rooting out the Baal-worship altogether, and enforcing a return to the primitive faith and worship. Just as the Wahhābīs went back to Mohammed's doctrine, as contained in the Kor'an and the Tradition, and as the Rechabites preserved the simplicity of the early desert life, so Jehu went back to the state of things

6. Revolution the Wahhābī rising in Arabia at the beginning of the 18th cent. It took its origin from prophetism (1 K 19 16), and was supported by the Rechabite Jonadab. The object of the movement headed by Jehu was nominally to revenge the prophets of Jeh put to death by order of Jezebel, but in reality it was much wider and aimed at nothing less than rooting out the Baal-worship altogether, and enforcing a return to the primitive faith and worship. Just as the Wahhābīs went back to Mohammed's doctrine, as contained in the Kor'an and the Tradition, and as the Rechabites preserved the simplicity of the early desert life, so Jehu went back to the state of things as they were at the foundation of the Northern Kingdom under Jeroboam I.

Jehu's reforms were carried out to the letter, and the whole dynasty of Omri, which was responsible for the innovations, was annihilated like its predecessors. The religious fervor, however, soon subsided, and Jehu's reign ended in disaster. Hazael, whose armies had been exterminated by the forces of Assyria, turned his attention to the eastern territory of Israel. In the turbulent land of Gilead, the home of Elijah, disappointed in its hopes of Jehu, he quickly established his supremacy (2 K 10 32 ff.). Jehu also appreciated the significance of the victories of Assyria, and was wise enough to send tribute to Shalmaneser II. This was in the year 842. Under his son and successor Jehoahaz the fortunes of Israel continued to decline, until Hazael imposed upon it the most humiliating conditions (Am 1 3-5; 2 K 13 1 ff.).

Toward the end of the reign of Jehoahaz, however, the tide began to turn, under the leadership of a military genius whose name has not

8. Renewed been recorded (2 K 13 5); and the Prosperity improvement continued, after the death of Hazael, under his son Jehoash (Joash), who even besieged and plundered Jerus (2 K 14 8 ff.). But it was not until the long reign of Jeroboam II, son of Jehoash, that the frontiers of Israel, were, for the first time since the beginning of the kingdom, restored to their ideal limits. Even Damascus and Hamath were subdued (2 K 14 28). But the prosperity was superficial. Jeroboam II stood at the head of a military oligarchy, who crushed the great mass of the people under them. The tribune of the plebs at this time was Amos of Tekoa. His Cassandra-like utterances soon fulfilled themselves. The dynasty, which had been founded in blood and had lasted some 90 years, on the accession of Jeroboam's son Zachariah gave place to 12 years of anarchy.

Zachariah was almost immediately assassinated by Shallum, who within a month was in turn assassinated by Menahem, a soldier of the

9. Anarchy tribe of Gad, stationed in Tirzah, to avenge the death of his master. The low social condition of Israel at this time is depicted in the pages of Hos. The atrocities perpetrated by the soldiers of Menahem are mentioned by Jos (Ant, IX, xi, 1).

III. Decline and Fall.—Meantime Pul or Pulu had founded the second Assyrian empire under the name of Tiglath-pileser III. Before

1. Loss of conquering Babylonia, he broke the power of the Hittites in the W., and made himself master of the routes leading to the Phoen seaports. As the eclipse of the Assyrian power had allowed the expansion of Israel under Jeroboam II, so its revival now crushed the independence of the nation forever. Menahem bought stability for his throne by the payment of an immense bribe of 1,000 talents of silver, or $2,000,000, reckoning the silver talent at $2,000. The money was raised by means of an assessment of 50 talents each upon all the men of known wealth. The payment of this tribute is mentioned on the Assyrian monuments, the date being 738.

Menahem reigned 10 years. His son Pekahiah was, soon after his accession, assassinated by one of his own captains, Pekah, son of

2. Decline Remaliah, who established himself, with the help of some Gilcadites, as king. He formed an alliance with Rezin of Damascus against Israel, defeating Ahaz in two pitched battles, taking numerous captives, and even reaching the walls of Jerus. The result was disastrous to both allies. Ahaz called in the aid of the Assyrians. Tiglath-pileser put an end to the kingdom of Damascus, and deported the inhabitants of Northern and Eastern Pal. The kingdom of Israel was reduced to the dimensions of the later province of Samaria. Pekah himself was assassinated by Hoshea, who became king under the tutelage of the Assyrian overlord. The depopulated provinces were filled with colonists from the conquered countries of the East. The year is 734.

Hoshea was never an independent king, but the mere vassal of Assyria. He was foolish enough to withhold the annual tribute, and to turn to Egypt for succor. Meanwhile,

3. Extinction Tiglath-pileser III had been succeeded by Shalmaneser IV. This king laid siege to Samaria, but died during the siege. The city was taken by his successor Sargon, who had seized the throne, toward the end of the year 722.

The Northern Kingdom had lasted 240 years, which fall into three periods of about 80 years each,

4. Summary the middle period being the period of the Syrian wars. As it was fully formed when it broke off from the Southern Kingdom, its history shows no development or evolution, but is made up of undulations of prosperity and of decline. It was at its best immediately after its foundation, and again under Jeroboam II. It was strong under Baasha, Omri and Ahab, but generally weak under the other kings. Every change of dynasty meant a period of anarchy, when the country was at the mercy of every invader. The fortunes of Israel depended entirely on those of Assyria. When Assyria was weak, Israel was strong. Given the advance of Assyria, the destruction of Israel was certain. This was necessary and was clearly foreseen by Hosea (9 3, etc.). The wonder is that the little state, surrounded by such powerful neighbors, lasted as long as it did. #### LITERATURE

I. Introduction.—In former times it was the rule to draw out of the OT its religious contents only for dogmatic purposes, without making any distinction between the different books. These writings were all regarded as the documents of the Divine revelation which had been given to this people alone and not to others. At the present time the first inquiry in the study of these books deals historically with the religious development of the Israelites. This religion was not of a strictly uniform nature, but is characterized by a development and a growth, and in the centuries which are covered by the OT books it has passed through many changes. Then, too, in the different periods of this development there were various religious trends among the people and very different degrees in the extent of their religious knowledge. The common people were at times still entangled in crude heathen ideas, while the bearers of a higher Divine light ranked vastly above them. And even in those times, when these enlightened teachers secured full recognition, there occurred relapses into lower forms of religion on the part of the masses, esp. because the influence of the nations surrounding Israel at all times made itself felt in the religious life and thoughts of the latter. And even when the correct teachings were accepted by the people, a malformation of the entire religion could readily occur through a petrification of the religious life. It is the business of the science of the history of religion to furnish a correct picture of this development, which in this article can be done only in the form of a sketch.

One of the recent results of the science of the history of religion is the knowledge that the religion of Israel itself, and not merely the corruptions of this religion, stood in a much closer connection with other religions than had in former times been supposed. The wealth of new data from the history of oriental nations lately secured has shown that it is not correct to regard the religion of Israel as an isolated phenomenon, but that considerable light is thrown upon it from analogous facts from surrounding regions. Of especial importance in this respect is the study of Assy and Bab antiquities, with their rich and illustrative monuments, and, by the side of these, also those of Egypt; and, further, although these are indeed much smaller in number, the inscriptions and monuments of a number of peoples situated much nearer to Israel and ethnologically more closely connected with them, such as the Moabites, Arameans, Arabians, Canaanites, Phoenicians, and others. For later times, Parsiism is an esp. important factor.

These antiquities have shown that between the religion of Israel and the religions of these nations there existed such close connections that a relationship between them cannot be denied. It is indeed true that these similarities are mostly of a formal nature, but they nevertheless point to similar conceptions of the Divine Being and of the relation of man to this Being. We find such connecting links in the cultus, in the traditions concerning the creation of the world, concerning the earliest history of mankind, etc; further, in the conception of what is legally right and of the customs of life; in the ideas concerning death and the world beyond; concerning the souls of men and the supernatural spiritual world, and elsewhere. These analogies and related connections have appeared so pronounced to some savants, especially Assyriologists, that they are willing to find in the religion of the Israelites and Jews only a reflection of the Bab, or of what they call the "religion of the ancient Orient." But over against this claim, a closer and deeper investigation shows that a higher world of thought and ideals at all times permeates the Israelitish religion and gives to it a unique character and a Divine truth, which is lacking in all other religions and which made Israel's religion capable of becoming the basis of that highest Divine revelation which through Christ came forth from it. We will here briefly sketch the progress of the development of this religion, and then formulate a summary of those characteristics which distinguish it from the other religions.

II. Historical Outline.—(1) The traditional view.

—The sources for this period are meager. Yet what has been reported concerning the religion of the period of the Patriarchs is enough to give us a picture of their conception of the Deity. And this picture is more deserving of acceptance than is the representation of the matter by the traditional dogmatics of the church and also that of those modern scholars who are under the spell of the evolutionary idea, and who undertake to prove in the Bib. history of Israel the complete development from the lowest type of fetishism and animism to the heights of ethical monotheism. The views of the old church teachers were to the effect that the doctrine concerning the one true God had been communicated by God to Adam in its purity and perfection, and by him had been handed through an unbroken chain of true confessors of the faith (Seth, Noah, etc), down to Abraham. But this view does not find confirmation in the Bib. record. On the contrary, in Josh 24 2.15, it is even expressly stated of the ancestors of Abraham that they had worshipped strange gods in Chaldaea. And the ancestors of the people, Abraham, Jacob, and others, do not appear on the stage of history with a teachable creed, but themselves first learn to know gradually, in the school of life, the God whom they serve, after He has made Himself known to them in extraordinary manifestations. Abraham does not yet know that Jeh does not demand any human sacrifices. Jacob still has the narrow view, that the place where he has slept is the entrance portal to heaven (Gen 28 16.17). Omnipresence and omniscience are not yet attributes which they associate with their idea of the Divinity. They still stand on a simple-minded and primitive stage, as far as their knowledge of the living God is concerned.

(2) The modern view.—Over against this, modern scholars describe pre-Mosaic Israel as yet entirely entangled in Sem heathen ideas, and even regard the religion of the people in general, in the post-Mosaic period down to the 8th cent. BC, as little better than this, since in their opinion the Jeh-religion had not thoroughly permeated the ranks of the common people, and had practically remained the possession of the men, while the women had continued to cultivate the ancient customs and views. W. R. Smith and Wellhausen have pointed to customs and ideas of the pre-Islamic Arabs, and S.I. Curtiss to such in the modern life of oriental tribes, which are claimed to have been the property of the most ancient Sem heathen tribes, and these scholars use these as the key for the ancient Israelitic rites and customs. But even if much light is thrown from these sources on the forms of life and cultus as depicted by the Scriptures, much caution must be exercised in the use made of this material. In the first place, neither those Arabs of the 6th cent. AD, nor their successors of today, can be regarded as "primitive Semites." In the second place, it is a question, even if in the earliest period of Israel such customs are actually found, what they really signified for the tribe of Abraham. We are here not speaking of a prehistoric religion, but of the religion of that tribe that came originally from Ur of the Chaldees, and migrated first by way of Haran to Canaan, and then to Egypt. In this tribe such primitive customs, perhaps, had long been spiritualized. For these Hebrews cannot be regarded as being as uncivilized as are the New Zealanders, or the Indians of North America, or those Bedouins who have never left the desert; for they had lived in Babylonia for a long period, even if, while there, they had withdrawn themselves as much as possible from the more cultured life of the cities. The patriarchs were in touch with the civilization of the Babylonians. We do not, indeed, want to lay special stress on the fact that they lived in Ur and in Haran, two cities of the moon-god, the worship of which divinity shows monotheistic tendencies. But the history of the family of Abraham, e.g. his relation to Sarah and Hagar, shows indisputable influence of Bab legal ideas. Probably, too, the traditions concerning the beginnings of history, such as the Creation, the Deluge, and the like, were brought from Babylon to Canaan by the tribe of Abraham.

(3) A higher conception of the Deity; 'ilu, 'el.—But this tribe had come to Babylonia from Northern Arabia. It is a very important fact that the oldest Arabian inscriptions, namely the Minaean and the Sabaeen, lead us to conclude that these tribes entertained a relatively high conception of the Deity, as has been shown by Professor Fritz Hommel. The oldest Arabian proper names are not found combined with names of all kinds of gods, but with the simple 'ilu, 'el, or God, or with 'ilī, "my God." Then, too, God is often circumscribed by the nouns expressing relationship, such as 'ābhī, "my father," or 'āht, "my brother," or 'ammī, "my uncle," and others, which express an intimate relationship between man and his God. Corresponding to these are also the old Sem proper names in Canaan, as also the name Abraham, i.e. 'Abhī-rām, "my father is exalted," or Ishmael, and many others. We accordingly must believe that the ancestors of Abraham immigrated into Babylonia with a comparatively highly developed religion and with a uniform conception of God. Here their faith may have been unfavorably influenced, and it is not impossible that the religious disagreement between the patriarch and his neighbors may have been a reason for his migration. Abraham himself is regarded by the Canaanites as a "friend of God," who stands in an intimate relationship with his God, and he is accordingly to be regarded, not merely as a secular, but also as a religious tribal head, an Imām, a prophetic personality.

(4) Totemism; animism, etc.—Still less is it correct to ascribe to this tribe the lowest religious stage possible, namely that of fetishism or of totemism (worship of demons or worship of animals) and the like. Some think they find evidences of the worship of animals in Israel. The fact that some Israelites were regarded as descendants of Leah ("wild cow" [?]), others of Rachel ("mother sheep"), is claimed to refer to the fact that these animals were totems of the tribe, i.e. were worshipped as ancestors. But for this claim there is no scintilla of proof. These names of women, esp. in the case of a nomadic tribe, can be explained in a much more simple way. The calves that appear in later times as images of Jeh are just as little a proof for the claim that calves were worshipped by the ancestors of Israel as divinities. We read nothing of such an image before the sojourn in Egypt, and after that time this image was always regarded symbolically. The fact, again, that from the days of Moses, and without a doubt earlier than this, certain animals were not allowed to be eaten, does not justify the conclusion which Professor B. Stade and others have drawn from it, viz. that these animals were in olden times regarded as divine (tabu), and for that reason were not permitted to be eaten, and only afterward were avoided as "unclean." The list of unclean animals in Lev 11 and Dt 14 speaks for an altogether different reason for regarding them as unclean. It is not at all thinkable that these many, and as a rule unclean and low class of animals, were at one time accorded divine honor, while the higher and cleaner class had been excluded from this distinction. We have accordingly no reason for finding animal worship here. On the other hand, it is self-evident, in the case of such an old nomadic tribe, that man stood in a more familiar relationship to his animals, and for this reason the slaughter of these was a more significant matter than was afterward the case. This was done only on extraordinary occasions, and it readily was accorded a religious consecration. See also TOTEMISM.

The idea is also emphatically to be rejected, that in the pre-Mosaic period mere animism prevailed in Israel—the worship of spirits and of demons. It has been tried in vain to show that in the most primitive period of Israel's religion the worship of ancestors occupied a prominent place. As Professor Emil Kautzsch has emphasized, the arguments which have been drawn from the mourning customs of the Israelites in favor of this claim (as this is done by F. Schwally, Das Leben nach dem Tode, nach den Vorstellungen des alten Israel und des Judentums, Giessen, 1892) are altogether inadequate, as is also the appeal to the marriage with a deceased wife's sister, as though the purpose of the institution was to secure for the deceased who had died without issue somebody who would attend to his worship. Because of the strongly developed mundane character of the religious life in Israel, it is natural that it was regarded as a calamity if there was no issue who kept alive the memory of the departed in the tribe. But even if the argument from the mourning customs of Israel were more convincing than is actually the case, and that gifts, such as food, oil, and the like, were placed in the tomb of the departed, as was often done by the Canaanites, yet this would be in the ancient Israelite religion a matter of subordinate importance, which could readily be explained on the ground of natural feelings. It could never be made to appear plausible that all religions had grown out of such a cultus. If the teraphim are to be regarded as having been originally images of ancestors, which is quite plausible, then they would indeed represent a continuous ancestral cultus, as the people evidently kept these images in their houses in order to attract to themselves blessings, to avert misfortunes and to secure oracles. But these dolls, modeled after the form of human beings, already in the period of the Patriarchs were regarded as a foreign element and in contradiction to the more earnest religious sentiments (cf Gen 31 19; 35 2.4).

That Israel, like all ancient peoples, did at one time pass through an "animistic" stage of religious development could best be proved, if at all, from their conception of the soul. Among the purifications those are esp. necessary which are demanded by the presence of a dead body in the same room with the living, as the living are defiled by the soul of the deceased in leaving the body (Nu 19 14). Even the uncovered vessels are defiled by his soul-substance (19 15). This, however, is a biological conception, which has nothing to do with the conception of the Deity.

Or are those perhaps right, who think that the primitive Israelites had accepted animism in this sense, that they did not as yet worship any actual divinities, but only a multitude of spirits or demons, be these ghosts of departed human beings or the spirits of Nature, local numina? In favor of this last-mentioned view, appeal is made to this fact, that in the ancient Sem world local divinities with very circumscribed spheres of power are very often to be met with, esp. at springs, trees, oases, at which a demon or divinity is regarded as having his abode, who is described as the ba'al or master in this place; cf such local names as Baal-tamar, Baal-hermon, and others. Such local spirits would then be the 'ēlōhīm, out of which would grow more mighty divinities of whole cities and countries. To these it would be necessary yet to add those spirits which were worshipped by individual tribes, partly spirits of ancestors, who also could have grown into higher divinities, while the rest of the mass of deities, good and bad, had to content themselves with a lower rank.

As against this, we must above all consider the fact that in ancient Israel the demons played a very subordinate rôle. The contrast in this regard with Babylonia is phenomenal. It is probably the case that at all periods in Israel there existed a belief in unclean spirits, who perhaps lived in the desert (cf the שְׂרִימ, s'irim), or in the demoniacs, and could otherwise, too, do much harm. But they are not described as having much influence on man's life. How few indications of such a view can be found and how little most of these indications prove we can see in the work of H. Duhm, Die bösen Geister im AT, Tübingen, 1906. After the Bab exile, and still more after the longer sojourn of the Israelites in Babylon, their imagination was to a much greater degree than before saturated by the faith in spirits. Then the closer study of such Sem b'ālim teaches us that they were not originally conceived in such a narrow sense. They are very often of a solar nature, celestial powers who have their abode at a particular place, and there produce fertility, but in this special function represent a general power of Nature. The same is the case with the tribal divinities. These are by no means merely the personifications of the small power of a particular tribe, but claim to be absolute beings, which shows that they are regarded as higher divinities which the tribe has appropriated and adapted to its own political ideas. We accordingly have no right to think that such a divinity was to be regarded as really confined to a particular hill, or even to a certain stone or tree where it was worshipped. The rock or stone or tree divinities of the ancient Arabs are celestial powers, who have only taken their abode at these places, even if popular superstition did actually identify them with such stones or trees.

It is therefore a misconception of the actual state of affairs when the conclusion is drawn that stone-worship is meant when Jacob erects a stone monument, the maṣṣēbhāh at Bethel, and anoints it with oil, and when this is understood to be a low type of fetishism. Stones are to the present day, for the wandering tribes, the signs by which important localities, esp. sacred places, are designated. The symbolical significance of such stones may be quite different, as also the relation which a divinity is thought to sustain to such a stone monument. For this reason, too, the judgment of the Bible concerning such objects is quite different. Only then, when they are symbols of idolatry, as the hammō-nīm, i.e. representations of the sun-god, ba'al hammān, are they everywhere rejected in the OT. In the same way a mighty tree, esp. if it is found near a spring of water, is in the Orient, by its very nature, a proof of the life-producing God. Such a tree naturally suggests that it is a place where divine life can be felt. Trees that have been made sacred by manifestations of the divinities or have been consecrated by the memory of a great personality, esp. the oak, the terebinth, the palm, were regarded as favorite places beneath which the divinity was sought. Only in that case, as was indeed common in Canaan, when the unhallowed powers of Nature were here adored, was this custom reprehensible in the eyes of the prophets. The 'āshērīm, too, are of a decidedly heathen character, as these trunks of trees were symbols of the goddess Ashera. Further, it was a favorite custom to worship the divinities on the high places, for the reason that they were regarded as in or attached to the heavens. Only because of the heathen worship which was practised on these bāmōth were they, in later times, so hateful to the prophets.

(5) Conception of God.—In answer to the question, what ideas the patriarchs, the pre-Mosaic leaders of the people of Israel, entertained concerning God, attention must first of all be drawn to the fact that God spoke to some of these personally, be this in one form of manifestation or in another. These men heard the word of God with their own ears, and that, too, in the most important moments of their lives. In the case of Abraham, these revelations are fundamental for him and for his people. The prophetic factor, which goes through the entire history of Israel and constitutes the life-principle that fills its religion and causes its further development, is at the very first beginnings the source whence the knowledge of God is taken. This presupposes a personal God; and, as a matter of fact, a fixed personality is demanded by the character of such a God. His "I" impresses itself upon man with absolute power and demands his service entirely. This "I" constantly remains the same, and everywhere evinces the same power, be this in Haran or in Canaan or in Egypt, and whether it manifests itself to Abraham or to Isaac or to Jacob. This oneness is not formulated as a didactic proposition, but as a living reality: only this God existed for His adherents. These appeal to Him at all times with equal success. The manifestations of this God may be of a different kind at different times. He is even entertained, on one occasion, as a personal guest by His friend Abraham, together with two companions (Gen 18 1 ff). On another occasion (Gen 15 17) Abraham beholds Him in symbolical form as a burning and fiery furnace (probably to be regarded as similar to the movable altar discovered by Sellin in Taanach). But these are to be regarded as special favors shown by God. In general it was the rule that God could not be seen without the beholder suffering death. Then, too, the conviction is very old, that what man sees in the case of such theophanies cannot have been God Himself, but that He had manifested Himself through a subordinate agent, an angel (this is particularly the case in the document E in Gen). This angel, however, has no significance in himself, but is only the creature-veil, out of which God Himself speaks in the first person. In the most elementary manner this formal limitation of God appears in Gen 11 5, where He goes to the trouble of descending from heaven in order to look at something on earth; and in 18 21, when He desires to go to Sodom personally, in order to convince Himself that what He has intended to send upon this city is also the right thing. It is indeed possible to find in the first instance some traits of irony, and possibly in the second case the epic details may have added something. However, God is no longer spoken of in such a human way in the post-Mosaic times. This shows that the document J at this place contains material that is very old. All the more is it to be noted what exalted conceptions of God prevail already in these narratives. He dwells in heaven (11 5; 19 24), something that has without reason been claimed not to have been the idea entertained in the older period. He is the God of the world, who exercises supremacy over all the nations. He rules with justice, checks pride, avenges injustice, and that, too, not only in a summary manner on whole countries, but also in such a way that He takes into consideration every individual and saves the one just man out of the midst of the mass of sinners (18 25; 19). In short, He is already the true God, although yet incompletely and primitively grasped in His attributes.

This God, ruling with omnipotent power in Nature and history, has entered into a special relationship with the tribe of Abraham. He has become the Covenant-God of the patriarch, according to the testimony of the old document J in Gen 15. We accordingly find here already the consciousness that that God who rules over the world has entered into a special relationship with one small nation or tribe. This fact appears also in this, that Abram (Gen 14) acknowledges the highest God of the priest-king Melchizedek (Gen 14 20 ff) as his God, as the founder of heaven and of earth, and identifies Him with his own Covenant-God Jeh.

(6) Cultus.—As far as the cultus is concerned, it can be stated that at this period it was still of a simple, but solemn and dignified character. The people preferred to worship their God at such places where He had manifested Himself, usually on a high place, on which an altar had been erected. There were no images of the Divinity extant. As the word מִזְבֵּחַ, mizbēah, "altar," shows, the sacrifices were usually bloody. Human sacrifice had already in the days of Abraham been overcome by the substitution of an animal, although in older times it may have been practised, perhaps, as the sacrifice of the firstborn; and in later times, too, through the influence of the example of heathen nations, it may have found its way into Israel now and then. Both larger and smaller animals were sacrificed, as also fowls. The idea that prevailed in this connection was that God, too, enjoyed the food which served man as his sustenance, although God, in a finer way, experienced as a pleasure only the scent of the sacrifices, as this ascended in the flame and the smoke (Gen 8 21). But the main thing was the blood as the substratum of the soul. The fruits of the field, esp. the first-fruits, were also offered. Of liquid offerings, it is probable that in primitive times water was often brought, as this was often a costly possession; and in Canaan, oil, which the inhabitants of this country employed extensively in their sacrifices (Jgs 9 9, something that is confirmed also by recent excavations); also wine (Jgs 9 13). As the ancient burnt or whole sacrifices (Gen 8 20) give expression to reverence, thankfulness, the prayer for protection or the granting of certain favors, the people from the very beginning also instituted sacrificial feasts, which gave expression to the covenant with God, the communion with the Covenant-God. In this act the sacrifice was divided between God and those who sacrificed. The latter ate and drank joyously before God after the parts dedicated to Him had been sacrificed, and esp. after the blood had been poured around the altar. The idea that this was the original form of the sacrifice and that gift-sacrifices were introduced only at a later period when agriculture had been introduced is not confirmed by historical evidences. That man felt himself impelled, by bringing to his God gifts of the best things he possessed, to express his dependence and gratitude, is too natural not to have been from the beginning a favorite expression of religious feeling. In connection with the sacrifices the name of God was solemnly called upon. J even says that this was the name Jeh (Gen 4 25), while E and P tell us that this name came into use only through Moses.

According to P (Gen 17 10 ff), circumcision was already introduced by Abraham in his tribe as the sign of the covenant. There are good reasons why the introduction of this custom is not like that of so many other ceremonies attributed to Moses. The custom was without doubt of an older origin. From whatever source it may have been derived in its earlier ethnological stage, for the Israelites circumcision is an act of purification and of consecration for connection with the congregation of Jeh. A special priesthood, however, did not yet exist in this period, as the head of the family and of the tribe exercised the priestly functions and rights (cf Gen 35 1 ff), although the peoples inhabiting Canaan at that time had priests (Gen 14 18).

(1) The covenant-idea.—Israel claims that its existence as a nation and its special relation to Jeh begins with its exodus from Egypt and with the conclusion of the covenant at Mt. Sinai (cf Am 3 2; 9 7).

2. The Mosaic Covenant with Jehovah As the preparation for this relation goes back to one individual, viz. Abraham, thus it is Moses through whom God delivered His people from bondage and received them into His covenant (see concerning Moses as a prophet and mediator of the covenant, ISRAEL, HISTORY OF). It is a matter of the highest significance for the religion of Israel that the relation of this people to Jeh was not one which existed by the nature of things, as was the case with the other oriental tribal and national religions, but that it was the outgrowth of a historical event, in which their God had united Himself with them. The conception of a covenant, upon which Jeh entered as a matter of free choice and will, and to which the people voluntarily gave their assent, is not an idea of later date in the religious history of Israel, which grew out of the prophetic thoughts of the 8th and 7th cents. BC, as has been claimed, but is found, as has been made prominent by Professor Fr. Giesebrecht (Die Geschichtlichkeit des Sinaiabundes, 1900), already in the oldest accounts of the conclusion of the covenant (E, J), and must be ascribed to the Mosaic age. This includes the fact, too, that this covenant, which unites Jeh with Israel, could not be of an indissoluble character, but that the covenant was based on certain conditions. The superficial opinion of the people might often cause them to forget this. But the prophets could, in later times, base their proclamations on this fact. Further, the thought is made very prominent that this covenant imposed ethical duties. While the divinities of other nations, Egypt, Bab, Phoen, demanded primarily that their devotees should erect temples in their honor and should bring them an abundance of sacrifices, in Israel the exalted and ethical commandment is found in the forefront. The covenant relation to the God Israel can legitimately be found only where the relation to one's fellow-man is normal and God-pleasing (Decalogue).

(2) The Covenant-God, Jehovah.—The special revelation which Moses received is characterized by the word Jehovah (Yahweh) as a name for God. This name, according to the well-authenticated report of Ex 6 3 (P), which is supported also by E, had not been "known" to the fathers. This does not necessarily mean that nothing had been known of this name. Bab prayers often speak of an "unknown god," and in doing this refer to a god with whom those who prayed had not stood in personal relation. The God of the fathers appeared to Moses, but under a name which was not familiar to the fathers nor was recognized by them. In agreement with this is the fact that only from the time of Moses proper names compounded with some abbreviation of Jeh, such as Jah, Jahu, Jeho, are found, but soon after this they became very common. Accordingly, it would be possible that such names were in scattered cases found also before the days of Moses among the tribes of Israel, and it is not impossible that this name was familiar to other nations. The Midianites esp., who lived originally at Mt. Sinai, have been mentioned in this connection, and also the Kenites (Stade, Budde), some scholars appealing for this claim to the influence which, according to Ex 18, Jethro had on the institutions of Moses. However, the matters mentioned here refer only to legal procedure (cf vs 14 ff). We nowhere hear that Moses took over the Jeh-worship from this tribe. On the contrary, Jethro begins only at this time (Ex 18 11) to worship Jeh, the God of Moses, and the common sacrificial meal, according to ver 12, did not take place in the presence of Jeh, but, accommodating it to the guest, in the presence of Elohim. Then we nowhere hear that the Kenites, who lived together with the Israelites, ever had any special prominence in the service of Jeh, as was the case, e.g., with the Median Magi, who had charge of the priesthood among the Persians, or with the Etruscans among the Romans, who examined the entrails. Yet the Kenites would necessarily have enjoyed special authority in the Jeh-cultus, if their tribal God had become the national God of Israel. The only thing that can be cited in favor of an Arabian origin of the name of Jeh is the Arab. word-form, hauwāh, hāyāh. On the other hand, a number of facts indicate that Ja or Jau as a name for God was common in Syria, Philistia and Babylonia; cf Joram, son of the king of Hamath (2 S 8 10), and Jaubidi, the king of this city, who was removed by Sargon. In these cases, however, Israelitish influences may have been felt. Friedrich Delitzsch claims to have discovered the names Jahve-ilu and Jahum-ilu on inscriptions as early as the times of Hammurabi. But his readings are sharply attacked. However this may be, the name God as proclaimed by Moses was not only something new for Israel, but was also announced by him (possibly also with a new pronunciation, Yahweh instead of Yahu) with a new signification. At any rate, the explanation in Ex 3 14 (E), "I AM THAT I AM," for doubting which we have no valid reasons, indicates a depth in the conception of God which far surpasses the current conceptions of the Syrian and the Bab pantheon. It would, perhaps, be easier to find analogous thoughts in Egypt speculations. But this absolute God of Moses is not the idea of speculative priests, but is a popular God who claims to control all public as well as private life.

(3) Monotheism of Moses.—Attempts have been made to deny the monotheistic character of this God, and some have thought that the term "monolatry" would suffice to express this stage in man's knowledge of God, since the existence of other gods was not denied, but rather was presupposed (cf passages like Ex 15 11), and it was only forbidden to worship any god in addition to Jeh (20 3). However, this distinction is fundamental, and separates, in kind, the religion of Moses from that of the surrounding nations. For among these latter, the worship of more than one divine being at the same time was the rule. The gods of the Phoenicians, the Aramaeans, and the Babylonians are, like those of the Egyptians, beings that spontaneously increase in number. They are divided into male and female groups of two, while in Heb there is not even a word extant for goddess, and the idea of a female companion-being to Jeh is an impossibility. Then, too, it is characteristic of the ethnic god that he is multiplied into many b'ālīm, and does not feel it as a limitation or restriction when kindred divinities are associated with him. However, the Jeh of Moses does not suffer another being at His side, for the very reason that He claims to be the absolute God. Passages like Ex 15 11, too, purpose chiefly only to express His unique character; but if He is without any equals among the gods, then He is the only one who can claim to be God; and it is in the end only the logical dogmatic formulation of the facts in the case when we are told in Dt, "Jeh he is God; there is none besides him" (4 35.39; 6 4; cf Ps 18 32). This does not exclude the fact that also in later times, when monotheism had been intelligently accepted, mention is still made of the gods of the heathen as of real powers (cf, e.g. Jer 49 1). This was rather the empirical method of expression, which found its objective basis in the fact that the heathen world was still in possession of some real spiritual power. Most of all, the popular faith or the superstition of the people could often regard the gods of the other nations as ruling in the same way as Jeh did in Israel (cf, e.g. 2 Ch 28 23). But the idea that the faithful worshippers of Jeh after the days of Moses ever recognized as equal and of the same rank with their own God the gods of the heathen must be most emphatically denied, as also the claim that these Israelites assigned to Jeh only restricted powers over a small territory. This surely would have been in flat contradiction to the well-known history of the Mosaic period, in which Jeh had demonstrated His superiority over the famous gods of Egypt in so glorious a manner. Cf on this point James Robertson, Early Religion, 4th ed, 297 ff (against Stade).

(4) Impossibility of representing Jeh by an image.

—The 2d principle which the Mosaic Decalogue establishes is that Jeh cannot be represented by any image. In this doctrine, too, there is a conscious contrast to the nations round about Israel (in addition to Ex 20 4, cf Dt 5 8; also Ex 24 17). That in the last-mentioned passage only molten images are forbidden, while those hewn of stone or made of wood might be permitted, is an arbitrary claim, which is already refuted by the fact that the Mosaic sanctuary did not contain any image of Jeh. The Ark of the Covenant was indeed a visible symbol of the presence of God, but it is a kind of throne of Him who sits enthroned invisibly above the cherubim, as has been shown above, and accordingly does not admit of any representation of God by means of an image. This continued to be the case in connection with the central sanctuary, with the exception of such aberrations as are already found in Ex 32 and which are regarded as a violation of the Covenant, also at the time when the sanctuary was stationed at Shiloh. The fact that at certain local cults Jeh-images were worshipped is to be attributed to the influence of heathen surroundings (cf on this point J. Robertson, loc. cit., 215 ff).

(5) Ethical character of the God of Moses.—A further attribute of the God of Moses, which exalts Him far above the ethnic divinities of the surrounding peoples, is His ethical character. This appears in the fact that His principles inculcate fundamental ethical duties and His agents are chiefly occupied with the administration of legal justice. Moses himself became the lawgiver of Israel. The spirit of this legislation is deeply ethical. Only we must not forget that Moses cannot have originated these ordinances and laws and created them as something absolutely new, but that he was compelled to build on the basis of the accepted legal customs of the people. But he purified these legal usages, which he found in use among the people, through the spirit of his knowledge of God, protected as much as possible the poor, the weak, the enslaved, and elevated the female sex, as is shown by a comparison with related Bab laws (CH). Then, too, we must not forget that the people were comparatively uneducated, and esp. that a number of crude classes had joined themselves to the people at that time, who had to be stringently handled if their corrupt customs were not to infect the whole nation. The humane and philanthropic spirit of the Mosaic legislation appears particularly pronounced in Dt, which, however, represents a later reproduction of the Mosaic system, but is entirely the outcome of Mosaic principles. Most embarrassing for our Christian feeling is the hardness of the Mosaic ordinances in reference to the heathen Canaanites, who were mercilessly to be rooted out (Dt 7 2; 20 16 f). Here there prevails a conception of God, which is found also among the Moabites, whose King Mesha, on his famous monument, boasts that he had slain all the inhabitants of the city of Kiriath-jearim as "a spectacle to Chemosh, the god of Moab." According to Dt 7 2 ff, the explanation of this hardness is to be found in the fact that such a treatment was regarded as a Divine judgment upon the worshippers of idols, and served at the same time as a preventive against the infection of idolatry.

(6) The theocracy.—The vital principle of the organization which Moses gave to his people, Jos (Câp, II, 16) has aptly called a theocracy, because the lawgiver has subordinated all relations of life to the government of his God. It is entirely incorrect when Wellhausen denies that there is a difference between theocracy and hierarchy. Not the priesthood, but Jeh alone, is to rule all things in Israel, and Jeh had many other organs or agents besides the priests, esp. the prophets, who not rarely, as the representatives of the sovereign God, sharply opposed themselves to the priests. The theocratical principle, however, finds its expression in this, that public and private life, civil and criminal law, military and political matters were all controlled by religious principles.

(7) The Mosaic cultus.—As a matter of course, Moses also arranged the cultus. He created a holy shrine, the tabernacle, which contained the Ark of the Covenant, and in its general arrangements became the model of the sanctuary or temple built in later times. He appointed sacred seasons, in doing which he connected these with previously customary festival days, but he gave sharper directions concerning the Sabbath and gave to the old festival of spring a new historical significance as the Passover. Moses further appointed for this sanctuary a priestly family, and at the same time ordained that the tribe to which this family belonged should assume the guardianship of the sanctuary. The lines separating the rights of the priests and of the Levites have often been changed since his time, but the fundamental distinctions in this respect go back to Moses. In the same way Moses has also, as a matter of course, put the sacred rites, the celebrations of the sacrifices, the religious institutions and ceremonies, into forms suitable to that God whom he proclaimed. This does not mean that all the priestly laws, as they are now found recorded in the Pent, were word for word dictated by him. The priests were empowered to pronounce Tôrâh, i.e. Divine instruction, on this subject, and did this in accordance with the directions received through Moses. Most of these instructions were at first handed down orally, until they were put into written form in a large collection. But in the priestly ordinances, too, there is no lack of traces to show that these date from the period of Moses and must at an early time have been put into written form.

(1) Decay of religion in Canaan.—Upon the intense religious feeling produced by the exodus from Egypt and the events at Mt. Sinai, there followed a relapse, in connection with which it appears that in this Mosaic generation the cruder tendencies were still too pronounced to endure the great trial of faith demanded by the conquest of the land of Canaan.

In the same way, the heroic struggles of Joshua, carried on under the directions of Jeh and resulting in the conquest of the country, were followed by a reaction. The zeal for battle weakened; the work of conquest was left unfinished; the people arranged to make themselves at home in the land before it had really been won; peace was concluded with the inhabitants. This decay of theocratic zeal and the occupation of the land by the side of and among the Canaanites had a direful influence on the Jeh-religion as it had been taught the people by Moses. The people adopted the sanctuaries of the country as their own, instead of rooting them out entirely. They took part in the festivals of their neighbors and adopted their customs of worship, including those that were baneful. The local Baals, in whose honor harvest and autumn festivals were celebrated as thanksgiving for their having given the products of the earth, were in many places worshipped by the Israelites. The possibility of interpreting the name Baal in both a good and bad sense favored the excuse that in doing this the people were honoring Jeh, whom in olden times they also unhesitatingly called their Baal, as their Lord and the master of the land and of the people. By the side of the Jeh-altars they placed the Asherah, the sacred tree, really as a symbol of the goddess of this name; and the stone pillars (hammânîm), which the original inhabitants had erected near their sanctuaries, were also held in honor, while the heathen ideas associated with them thereby found their way into the religious consciousness of the people. Sorcery, necromancy, and similar superstitions crept in. And since, even as it was, a good deal of superstition had continued to survive among the people, there came into existence, in the period of the Judges, a type of popular religion that was tinged by a pronounced heathenism and had but little in common with the theocratical principles of Moses, although the people had no intention of discarding the God of Moses. Characteristic of this religious syncretism during the time of the Judges was the rise of the worship of images dedicated to Jeh in Dan (Jgs 17 and 18) and probably also at Ophrah (8 27), as also human sacrifices (ch 11).

(2) The theocratic kingdom.—But during this period pronounced reactions to the true worship of Jeh were not lacking. The heroes who appeared on the arena as liberators from the yoke of the oppressors recalled the people to Jeh, as was done likewise by the prophets and prophetesses. Samuel, the greatest among this class, was at the same time a prophet and reformer. He again brought the people together and tried to free them from the contamination of heathenism, in accordance with the Mosaic ordinances, and at the same time prepared for a new future by the establishment of colonies of prophets and by the establishment of the kingdom. This latter innovation seemed to be at variance with the principles of a strict theocracy. It is the merit of Samuel that he created the theocratic kingdom, by which the anointed of Jeh himself was to become an important agent of the supreme rule of Jeh. It is indeed true that the first king, Saul, did not realize this ideal, but his successor, David, appreciated it all the more. And even if David was far from realizing the ideal of a theocratic king, he nevertheless continued to be the model which prophecy tried to attain, viz. a king who was personally and most intimately connected with Jeh, and who, as the servant of Jeh, was to realize entirely in his own person the mission of the people to become the servants of Jeh, and was thus to furnish the guaranty for the harmony between Israel and their God, and bring rich and unalloyed blessings upon the land.

(3) Religious ideals of the Psalms since David.—In this way the covenant-relation became a personal one through "the anointed one of Jeh." In general, religion in Israel became more personal in character in the days of the earlier kings. Before this time the collective relation to God prevailed. Only as a member of the tribe or of the nation was the individual connected with Jeh, which fact does not exclude the idea that this God, for the very reason that He rules according to ethical principles, also regards the individual and grants him His special protection and requites to him good or evil according to his deeds. The Heb hymns or "psalms," which David originated, give evidence of a more intimate association of the individual with his God.

The very oldest of these psalms, a number of which point to David as their author, are not liturgical congregational hymns, but were originally individual prayer-songs, which emanated from personal experiences, but were, in later times, employed for congregational use. The prejudice, that only in later times such expressions of personal piety could be expected, is refuted by analogous cases among other nations, esp. by the much more ancient penitential and petitionary prayers of the Babylonians, in which, as a rule, the wants of the individual and not those of the nation constitute the contents. These Bab penitential prayers show that among this people, too, the feeling of guilt as the cause of misfortune was very vivid, and that they regarded repentance and confession as necessary in order to secure the forgiveness of the gods. However, the more exalted character of the Israelitish conception of God appears in a most pronounced way in this comparison, since the Babylonian feels his way in an uncertain manner in order to discover what god or goddess he may have offended, and not rarely tries to draw out the sympathy of the one divinity over against the wrath of another. But much more can this difference be seen in this, that the heathen singer is concerned only to get rid of the evil or the misfortune that oppresses him. The communion with his god whose favor he seeks to regain is in itself of no value for him. In David's case the matter is altogether different, as he knows that he is bound to Jeh by a covenant of love (Ps 18 2), and his heart delights in this communion, more than it does in all earthly possessions (Ps 4 8); and this is even more so in the case of the author of Ps 73 25-26. Such words would, for good reasons, be unthinkable in the case of a Bab psalmist.

In the times of those earliest kings of Israel, which, externally, constituted the most flourishing period in their history, unless tradition is entirely at fault, the spiritual world of thought also was enriched by the Wisdom literature of the Proverbs, the earliest examples of which date back to Solomon.

(4) Wisdom literature since Solomon.—This hokhmāh, or Wisdom literature, is marked by the peculiarity that it ignores the special providential guidance of Israel and their extraordinary relation to their God, and confines itself more to the general revelation of God in Nature and in the history of mankind, but in doing this regards the fear of God as the beginning of wisdom, and at all times has the practical purpose of exhorting to a moral and God-pleasing life. The idea that this cosmopolitan tendency is to be attributed to Gr influences, and accordingly betrays a later period as the time of its origin, is to be rejected, as far as Prov and Job are concerned. The many passages in Prov that speak of conduct over against the king show a preëxilic origin. The universalistic character of this literature must be explained on other grounds. It resulted from this, that this proverb-wisdom is not the sole, exclusive property of Israel and was not first cultivated among them, but was derived from abroad. The Edomites were esp. conspicuous in this respect, as the Book of Job shows, in which the Israelitish author introduces as speakers masters of this art from this tribe and others adjoining it. We can also compare the superscriptions in Prov 30 1; 31 1, in which groups of proverbs from Arabian principalities are introduced. Accordingly, this wisdom was regarded as a common possession of Israel and of their neighbors. This is probably the reason why the authors of this class of literature refrain from national reference and reminiscences. That the liberal-minded Solomon was the one to introduce this proverb-wisdom, or at any rate cultivated it with special favor, is in itself probable, and is confirmed by the fact that the Queen of Sheba (South Arabia) came to Jerus in order to listen to his wisdom. But this also presupposes that in her country a similar class of wisdom was cultivated. This was also the case in Egypt in very early antiquity, and in Egypt literature we have collections of proverbs that remind us of the proverbs of Solomon (cf Transactions of the Third International Congress of the History of Religions, Oxford, 1908, I, 284 ff; see WISDOM).

(5) The sanctuary on Mt. Zion.—The kingdom of David and of Solomon not only externally marks the highest development of the history of Israel, but intellectually, too, prepared the soil out of which henceforth the religious life of the nation drew its sustenance. It was esp. under David a significant matter, that at this time the higher spiritual powers were in harmony with the political. This found its expression in the Divine election of David and his seed, which was confirmed by prophetic testament (2 S 7). Hand in hand with this went the selection of Mt. Zion as the dwelling-place of Jeh. David, from the beginning, was desirous of establishing here the theocratic center of the people, as he had shown by transferring the Ark of the Covenant to Jerus. In the same way Solomon, by the erection of the Temple, sought to strengthen and suitably equip this central seat. As a matter of course, the sacred shrines throughout the land did not thereby at once lose their significance. But the erection of the sanctuary in Jerus was not at all intended to establish a "royal chapel" for the king, as Wellhausen has termed this structure, but it claimed the inheritance of the tabernacle in Shiloh, and the prophets sanctioned this claim.

(6) Religion in the Kingdom of Ephraim.—The division of the kingdom after the death of Solomon which, as it was, had not been too large, proved politically disastrous. It also entailed a retrogression in religious matters. The centralizing tendencies of the preceding reigns were thwarted. Jeroboam erected other sacred shrines; esp. did he make Bethel a "king's sanctuary" (Am 7 13). At the same time he encouraged religious syncretism. It is true that the gold-covered images of heifers (by the prophets, in derision, called "calves") were intended only to represent the Covenant-God Jeh. However, this representation in the form of images, an idea which the king no doubt had brought back with him from his sojourn in Egypt, was a concession to the corrupt religious instincts in the nation, and gave to the Ephraimitic worship an inferior character in comparison with the service in the Temple in Jerus, where no images were to be found. But in other respects, too, the arbitrary conduct of the king in the arrangement of the cultus proved to be a potent factor in the Northern Kingdom from the beginning. The opposition of independent prophets was suppressed with all power. Nevertheless, the prophetic agitation continued to be a potent spiritual factor, which the kings themselves could not afford to ignore.

This proved to be the case particularly when the dynasty of Omri, who established a new capital city, Samaria, openly favored the introduction of Phoen idolatry. Ahab's wife, Jezebel, even succeeded in having a magnificent temple erected in the new capital to her native Baal, and in crushing the opposition of the prophets who were faithful to Jeh. It now became a question of life and death, so far as the religion of Jeh was concerned. The struggle involved not only certain old heathen customs in the religion of the masses, dating back to the occupation of Canaan, but it was the case of an invasion of a foreign and heathen god, with a clearly defined purpose. His voluptuous worship was not at all in harmony with the serious character of the Mosaic religion, and it seriously menaced, in a people naturally inclined to sensuality, the rule of the stringent and holy God of Mt. Sinai. The tricky and energetic queen was already certain that she had attained her purpose, when an opponent arose in the person of Elijah, who put all her efforts to naught.

(7) Elijah and Elisha.—In his struggle with the priests of Baal, who deposed themselves after the manner of modern devishes, we notice particularly the exalted and dignified conception of God in 1 K 18. When in this chapter Jeh and Baal are contrasted, the idea of Elijah is by no means that these gods have in their own territory the same rights as Jeh in Canaan and Israel. Elijah mocks this Baal because he is no God at all (18 21), and the whole worship of the priests convinces him that they are not serving a real and true God, but only the product of their imagination (18 27). This is monotheism, and certainly not of a kind that has only recently been acquired and been first set up by Elijah, but one that came down from the days of Moses. Elijah proves himself to be a witness and an advocate of the God of Sinai, who has been betrayed in a treacherous manner. The fact that he inflicts a dire and fateful punishment on the idolatrous priests of Baal is also in perfect agreement with the old, stringent, Mosaic, legal code. Only such severity could atone for the fearful crime against the God of the country and of the covenant, and could save the people from apostasy. However, the theophany at Mt. Sinai (1 K 19 11 ff) shows clearly that not His external and fearful power, but His calm and deep character was felt by Elijah to be the distinguishing mark of his God. His successor, Elisha, after the storm had cleared the religious atmosphere in the country, in the performance of his prophetic duties was able again to show forth more emphatically the fatherly care and the helpful, healing love of his God.

In general, the political retrogression of the nation and the opposition of those in power, which the prophets and the faithful worshippers of Jeh in later times were compelled to experience often enough, served greatly to intensify and to spiritualize their religion. The unfortunate situation of the present, and the weaknesses and failures in the actual state of the theocracy, directed their eyes to the future. The people began to study the wonderful ways of God in dealing with His people, and they began to look to the end of these dealings. A proof of this is found in the comprehensive accounts contained in the old history of the covenant-people as recorded in the Pentateuchal documents E and J, which were composed during this period. Whether these extend beyond and later than the period of Joshua or not, can remain an open question. In any case, there existed written accounts also concerning the times of the Judges, and concerning the history of Samuel, David and Solomon, which in part were written down soon after the events they record, and which, because of their phenomenal impartiality, point to an exceptionally high prophetic watchtower from which the ways of God with His people were observed.

(1) The writing prophets.—The spiritual development of the deeper Israelitish religion was the business of the prophets. At the

4. Development of Israel's Religion from the 8th Cent. BC to the Exile latest, from the 8th cent. BC, and probably from the middle of the 9th, we have in written form their utterances and discourses. Larger collections of such prophecies were certainly left by Amos and Hosea. These prophets stood entirely on the basis of the revelations which by Moses had been made the foundation of Israel's religion. But in contrast to the superficial and mistaken idea of the covenant of Jeh entertained by their contemporaries, these prophets make clear the true intentions of this covenant, and at the same time, through their new inspiration, advance the religious knowledge of the people.

(2) Their opposition to the cultus.—This appears particularly in their rejection of the external and unspiritual cultus of their age. Over against the false worship of God, which thinks to satisfy God by the offering of sacrifices, they proclaim the true worship, which consists above all things in the fulfilment of the duties of the law and of love toward their fellow-men. They denounce as a violation of the covenant not only idolatry, the worship of strange gods, and the heathen symbols and customs which, in the course of time, had crept into the service of Jeh, but they declare also that the religion which is based solely on the offering of sacrifices is worthless, since God, who is in no way dependent on any services rendered by men, does not care for such sacrifices, but is concerned about this, that His commands be observed, and that these consist above all things in righteousness, uprightness in the dealings of man with man, and in mercy on the poor, the weak, the defenceless, who cannot secure justice for themselves. (Cf., e.g., 1 S 15 22; Hos 6 6; Isa 1 11 ff; Jer 7 21 ff, and other passages equally pointed. See on this subject, J. Robertson, Early Religion, etc., 440 ff.) Such a transfer of the center of religion from the cultus to practical ethical life has no analogy whatever in other Sem and ancient religions. Yet it is not something absolutely new, but is a principle that has developed out of the foundation laid by Moses, while it is in most pronounced contrast to the common religious sentiments of mankind. The prophetic utterances that condemn the unthinking and the unconsecrated cultus must not be misunderstood, as though Isaiah, Jeremiah and others had been modern spiritualists, who rejected all external forms of worship. In this case they would have ceased to be members of their own people and children of their own times. What they absolutely reject is only the false trust put in an opus operatum, i.e. a mechanical performance of religious rites, which had been substituted for the real and heartfelt exercise of religion. Then, too, we are not justified in drawing from passages such as Jer 7 22 the conclusion that at this time there did not yet exist in written form a Mosaic sacrificial code. Such a code is found even in the Book of the Covenant, recognized by critics as an older Pent document (Ex 20-23, 34), and the fact that the Sabbath commandment is found in the Decalogue does not prevent Isaiah from writing what he has penned in 1 13.14. That at this period, already, there were extant many written ordinances is demanded by Hos 8 12, and the connection shows that cultus-ordinances are meant. We must accordingly take the prophet's method of expression into consideration, which delights in absolute contrasts in cases where we would speak relatively. But this is not intended to weaken the boldness of the prophetic thoughts, which purpose to express sharp opposition to the religious ideas current at that time.

(3) Their preaching of the judgment.—The conception of God and Divine things on the part of the prophets was the logical development of the revelations in the days of Moses, and after that time, concerning the nature and the activity of God. The God of the prophets is entirely a personal and living God, i.e. He enters into the life of man. His holiness is exaltation above Nature and the most pronounced antagonism to all things unclean, to sin. Sin is severely dealt with by God, esp., as has already been mentioned, the sin of showing no love and no mercy to one's neighbor. Because they are saturated with this conviction of the absolute holiness of God, the preëxilic prophets proclaim to their people more than anything else the judgment which shall bring with it the dissolution of both kingdoms and the destruction of Samaria and of Jerus, together with its temple. First, its destruction is proclaimed to the Northern Kingdom; later on to the Southern. In doing this, these inspired men testify that Jeh is not inseparably bound to His people. Rather He Himself calls the destroyer to come, since all the nations of the world are at His command.

(4) Their Messianic promises.—However, the prophets never conclude purely negatively, but they always see on the horizon some rays of hope, which promise to a "remnant" of the people better times. A "day of Jeh" is coming, when He will make His final settlement with the nations, after they have carried out His judgment on His people. Then, after the destruction of the gentle world, He will establish His rule over the world. This fundamental thought, which appears again and again with constantly increasing clearness, often takes the form that a future king out of the house of David, in whom the idea of the "anointed of Jeh" has been perfectly realized, will first establish in Judah-Israel a pure rule of God, and then also gain the supremacy of the world. Some critics have claimed that all of these Messianic and eschatological predictions date from the post-exilic period. In recent years a reaction against this view has set in, based on the belief that in Egypt and Babylonia also similar expectations are found at an early period. These promises, when they are more clearly examined, are found to be so intimately connected with the other prophecies of Isaiah, Hosea, and others, that to separate them would be an act of violence. In their most magnificent character, these pictures of the future are found in Isa, while in Jer their realization and spiritualization have progressed farther.

(5) Reformations.—While the prophets are characterized by higher religious ideas and ideals, the religion of the masses was still strongly honey-combed with cruder and even heathen elements. Yet there were not totally wanting among the common people those who listened to these prophetic teachers. And esp. in Judaea there were times when, favored by pious kings, this stricter and purer party obtained the upper hand. This was particularly the case under the kings Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, and Josiah. During the reigns of these kings the cultus was reformed. Hezekiah and Josiah attacked particularly the local sanctuaries and their heathen worship (called bāmōth), and concentrated the sacrificial cultus in Jerus. In doing this they were guided by the faithful priests and prophets and by the ancient Mosaic directions. Josiah, who, more thoroughly than others, fought against the disintegration of the Jeh-cultus, found his best help in the newly discovered Book of the Law (Dt). That the sacrifices should be made at one place had been, as we saw, an old Mosaic arrangement. However, Moses had foreseen that local altars would be erected at places where special revelations had been received from Jeh (Ex 20 24-25). In this way the numerous altars at Bethel, on Carmel, and elsewhere could claim a certain justification, only they were not entitled to the same rank as the central sanctuary, where the Ark of the Covenant stood and where the sons of Aaron performed their priestly functions. Dt demands more stringently that all real sacrificial acts shall be transferred to this central point. This rule Josiah carried out strictly. The suppression of the current sacrifices on high places by the fall of the Northern Kingdom aided in effecting the collapse of such shrines, while the sanctuary in Jerus, because it was delivered from the attack of the Assyrians, won a still greater recognition.

(6) Destruction of Jerusalem.—However, immediately after the death of Josiah, the apostasy from Jeh again set in. The people thought that they had been deserted by Him, and they now more than before sought refuge in an appeal to a mixture of gods derived from Babylonia, Egypt, Persia and elsewhere. Ezk 8 and 9 describe this syncretism which made itself felt even in the temple-house in Jerus. The people were incapable of being made better and were ripe for destruction. The temple, too, which it was thought by many could not be taken, was doomed to be destroyed from its very foundations.

(1) Spiritual purification through the Exile.—

A mighty change in the religion of Israel was occasioned by the deportation of the 5. The wealthier and better educated Jews Babylonian to Babylon and their sojourn there for Exile a period of about 50 years, and by the still longer stay of a large portion of the exiles in this country. The nation was thus cut off from the roots of the native heathendom in Pal and also from the external organization of the theocracy. This brought about a purification and a spiritualization, which proved to be a great benefit for later times, when the political manifestation of their religious life had ceased, and the personal element came more into the foreground. Jeremiah and Ezekiel emphasize, each in his own way, the value of this religion for the individual. A spiritual communion came into being during the Exile, which found its bond of union in the word of Jeh, and which insisted on serving God without a temple and external sacrificial cultus (which, however, was still found among the exiles in Egypt). Separated from their homes, they collected all the more diligently the sacred memories and traditions, to which Ezekiel's plans for the temple belong. Their sacred literature, the Tōrah or Law, the prophetic books, the historical writings, the Ps, and other literature were collected, and in this way preparations were made for the following period.

(2) Relations to the gentile world.—The most earnest classes of Jews, at least, absolutely declined to have anything to do with the Bab religion and worship. They saw here the worship of images in its most repulsive and sensual form, and they also learned its absolute impotency when the haughty Chaldaean empire was overthrown. Deutero-Isaiah (Isa 40-66) shows that the Israelites now become more conscious than ever of the great value of their own religion with its Creator of heaven and earth over against this variegated Pantheon of changeable gods in forms of wood and metal images. From this time on, the glory of the Creator of the universe and His revelation in the works of Nature were lauded and magnified with a new zeal and more emphatically than ever before. This same prophet, however, proclaims also the new fact of the mission-call of Israel among the nations of the world. This people, he declares, is to become the instrument of Jeh to make the Gentiles His spiritual subjects. But as this people in its present condition is little fit for this great service, he sees with his prophetic eye a perfect "Servant of Jeh," who carries out this mission, a personal, visible "Servant of Jeh," who establishes the rule of God upon earth, by becoming, in the first place, for Israel a second Moses and Joshua, but who then, too, wins over the heathen nations by this message. He accordingly takes the place of the prophesied future Son of David. However, He is not a personal ruler, but carries out His work through mere spiritual power and in lowliness and weakness. Indeed, His suffering and death become the atonement to wipe out the guilt of His people (Isa 53). We can see in this further development of the deepening and spiritualization of the eschatological hopes how strongly the unaccustomed misfortunes and surroundings of the exiles had influenced them. Notwithstanding all their antagonism to the aberrations of the heathen world, the Israelites yet learned that among the Gentiles there was also some receptivity for the higher truths. The worshippers of Jeh felt themselves more akin to the Persians than to the Babylonians, as the former served without images a god which was conceived as one and as an exalted divine being. Thoughts taken from Parsiism are also found in the later literature of Israel, although it is not the case that the idea of Satan was first taken from this source. The doctrine of the resurrection of the dead for the judgment also can be gained from OT premises. However, the religion of the Babylonians was not without influence on that of the Jews. It is indeed out of the question that it was only during the Exile that the Jews took over the accounts of the Creation and the Deluge and others similar to the Bab, as these are found in Gen 1-11. But the development of the angelology shows the evidences of later Bab and Pers influences. And esp. does demonology play a more important rôle in post-exilic times than ever before, particularly about the beginnings of the Christian era. Magic art, too, entered largely into the faith of later Judaism, and it can be shown that both of these came from Bab sources.

(1) Life under the law.—The people which returned from the Exile was a purified congregation of Jeh, willing to serve Him. They

6. The aimed to reestablish the theocracy.
Post-exilic This latter had not, indeed, because Religion of the loss of the political independence of the people, the same importance as formerly, but the religious cultus and the religious life of the people were all the more stringently observed. The post-exilic period is characterized by religious legalism. The people were exceedingly zealous in observing the old ordinances, and tried to find righteousness in the correctness with which the Mosaic law was observed, as this was now demanded by the teachers of this law. The prophet of the Exile, Ezekiel, had taken the lead in this particular, and had laid great emphasis on the formal ordinances, although in connection with this he also insisted upon real moral earnestness. But it was an easy matter that in the course of time an external work-righteousness and petrification of true religion should arise. Yet the later prophets, Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi, even if they do ascribe a greater importance to external matters than the preexilic prophets did, show that they are the spiritual heirs of these earlier seers. They teach a healthy ethical and sanctifying type of practical religion and continue to proclaim the hopes for an expansion and spiritualization of the Kingdom of God. The leaders of these times, Zerub-babel, Ezra, Nehemiah, show a pronouncedly antagonistic attitude toward the neighboring nations and also toward those inhabitants of the country who did not live under the law. However, their intolerance, esp. toward the Samaritans, can be readily understood from the principle of the self-preservation of the people of Jeh.

The law came to be the subject of the most careful study, and the teachers of the law collected, even to the minutest details, the oral traditions with reference to its meaning and to the proper observance of the different demands, so that already before the time of Christ they were in possession of an extensive tradition, which was afterward put down in written form in the Mish. The writing of history was also carefully cultivated. The Books of Ch show from what viewpoint they described the past; the temple and the cultus were the center of interest. In the same way the psalm-poetry, esp. the temple-song, flourished again. These later hymns are pretty and regular, but no longer show the bold spirit of the older pss. In many cases, older songs are made use of in these later hymns in a new way. Of the proverb-literature of the later post-exilic times, the Wisd of Jesus Sirach, or Ecclus, is an instructive example. Notwithstanding its great similarity to the old Prov, the prevailing and leading points of view have become different in character. The conception of Wisd has assumed a specifically Jewish and theocratic character.

(2) Hellenism.—But the Jewish exclusiveness found a dangerous opponent, esp. from the days of Alexander the Great, in the new Hellenism. Hellenistic language, culture, customs and world-ideas overwhelmed Pal also. While the Pious (hâšîdhîm) all the more anxiously fortified themselves behind their ordinances, the worldly-minded gave themselves up fully to the influence that came from without. In the first half of the 2d cent. BC there arose, as a consequence, a bloody struggle against the inroads of this heathendom, when Antiochus Epiphanes undertook to suppress the religion of the Jews, and when the Asmoneans began their holy war against him.

(3) Pharisees and Sadducees.—But within the people of Israel itself there were found two parties, one strict and the other lax in the observance of the law. The leaders of the former were the highly popular Pharisees, who, according to their name, were the "Separatists," separated from the common and lawless masses. They tried to surpass each other in their zeal for the traditional ordinances and pious observances. However, among them it was also possible to find real piety, although in the NT records, where they are described as taking a hostile attitude toward the higher and the highest form of Divine revelation, they appear at their worst. Their rivals, the Sadducees, were less fanatical in their observance of the demands of the law and more willing to compromise with the spirit of the times. To this party belonged many of the more prominent priests. But this party evinced less real religious life than did the Pharisees.

(4) Essenes.—Then, too, in the time of Jesus, there were not lacking indications of the influence of foreign religions, as is apparent in the case of the Essenes. This party advocated dualistic ideas, as these are later found among the Mandaeans.

(5) Positive connections between Judaism and Hellenism.—In Alexandria a friendly exchange of ideas between Hellenism and Judaism was brought about. Here the OT was tr<sup>d</sup> into the Gr. This tr, known as the Septuagint (LXX), shows as yet but few signs of the Gr spirit; rather, a pronounced influence of legal and ritualistic Judaism. On the other hand, apologetical opposition to Hellenism appears to a more marked degree, among others, in the apocryphal work known as "Wisd of Solomon," in which we find a positive defence of wisdom as the principle of revelation over against the Epicurean world-wisdom of Hellenism. In doing this, the book leans on Platonism and Stoicism. The hokhmāh, or wisdom of the old Jewish lit., has been Hellenized. Philo goes still farther in adapting Judaism to Gr taste and to humanism. A more liberal conception of inspiration also appears in the reception of contemporaneous literary products into the OT Canon, even of some books which had originally been written in the Gr language. The means observed in adapting national Hebraism to Hellenistic universalism was the allegorical method of interpretation, which Philo practised extensively and which then passed over to the Christian church Fathers of the Alexandrian school. This school constitutes the opposite extreme to the rabbinical, which clung most tenaciously to the letter of the sacred texts.

(6) Apocalyptic literature.—A unique phenomenon at the close of the Bib. and in the earliest post-Bib. period is, finally, the APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE (q.v.). Since the days of the Maccabees we find the custom in certain Jewish circles, by using the old prophecies and adapting them to the events of the times, of drawing up a systematic picture of the future. The authorship of these writings was usually ascribed to one of the ancient saints, e.g. to Enoch, or Abraham, or Moses, or Elijah, or Solomon, or Baruch, or Ezra, or others. The model of these Apocalypses is the Book of Dnl, which, on the basis of older visions, in the times of the oppression by Antiochus Epiphanes, pictures, in grand simplicity, the development of the history of the world down to the final triumph of the Kingdom of God over the kingdoms of the world.

III. Conclusion.—When we consider this whole development, it cannot be denied that the religion of Israel passed through many changes. It grew and purified and spiritualized itself out of its own inherent strength; but it also suffered many relapses, when hindering and corrupting influence gained the upper hand. But it received from without not only degenerating influences, but also much that inspired and developed its growth. Its original and native strength also shows itself in this, that without losing its real character it was able to appropriate to itself elements of truth from without and assimilate these.

If we ask what the specific and unique character of this religion was, by which it was distinguished from all other religions of antiquity,

1. The Living and Holy God and by reason of which it alone was capable of producing from itself the highest revelation in Christ, it must be answered that its uniqueness lies, most of all, in its conception of God and of Divine things, and of God's relation to the world. The term "monotheism" but inadequately expresses this peculiarity; for monotheistic tendencies are found also in other nations, and in Israel monotheism often shows itself in a strongly corrupted form. The advantage of Israel lies in its close contact with the living God. From the beginning of Israel's history a strictly personal God gave testimony of Himself to different personalities with a decision which demanded absolute submission; and, in addition, this was a holy God, who elevated mankind above Nature and above themselves, a God who stood in the most absolute contrast to all that was impure or sinful, but at the same time was wonderful in His grace and His mercy to the sinner. This direct revelation of God to specially chosen bearers of the Divine truth goes through the entire history of Israel. Through this factor this religion was being constantly purified and unfolded further. The Israelites learned to conceive God in a more spiritual, correct, and universal manner, the more they advanced in experience and culture. But this God did not thereby become a mere abstract being, separated from mankind, as was the case with so many nations. He always continued to be a living God who takes an active part in the lives of men. We need notice only those prophets who describe the greatness of God in the grandest way, such as Hosea, Isaiah, Deutero-Isaiah, who depict also the personal life of God in the boldest way through anthropomorphisms.

In agreement with this, too, we find that this religion demands the personal subjection of men to God. As was the case with all the

2. Relation of Man to This God religions of antiquity, that of the OT, too, was originally rather a tribal and a national religion than one of the individual. This brought with it the demand for the external observance of the tribal customs in the name of religion. However, the traditional customs and legal ordinances had already been sifted and purified by Moses. And, as a matter of necessity, in a religion of such a pronounced personal nature, the personal relation of the individual to God must become more and more a matter of importance. This idea became deeper and more spiritual in the course of time and developed into a pure love for God. It did not prevent this religion from becoming petrified, even during the Exile, when the doctrines and the cultus were most correctly observed. But the vital kernels found embedded in the revelation of God constantly proved their power of rejuvenation. And at that very time when the petrified legalism of Pharisaism attained its most pronounced development, the most perfect fruit of this religion came forth from the old stem of the history of Israel, namely Christ, who unfolded Judaism and converted it into the religion of salvation for the entire world.

LITERATURE.—Of the lit. on the religion of Israel we may yet make particular mention of the following: The textbooks on OT Theology by Oehler, 1891 (also ET), of Dillmann, 1895. The Kuenen-Wellhausen school is represented by Kuenen, De Godsdienst van Israel, 1869 (also ET); Stade, Biblisch Theologie des AT, 1905; Marti, Theologie des AT, 1903; Smend, Lehrbuch der AT Religionsgeschichte, 1899; cf also the works of Robertson Smith, esp. his lectures on The Religion of the Semites. Against this radical school, see, in addition to the work of Dillmann, James Robertson, Early Religion of Israel, 1893. On the subject of Semitism in general, S. I. Curtiss, Ursemitische Religion im Volksleben des heutigen Orients, 1903 (also ET); Baethgen, Beiträge zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte, 1880; M. J. Lagrange, Études sur les religions sémitiques, 1904. The relation of Israel to the Assyrian and Bab religions is discussed by Hugo Winckler in several works; cf also Fritz Hommel, Alttestamentliche Ueberlieferungen, 1897 (also ET); Sayce, The Higher Criticism and the Verdict of the Monuments, 1895; Alfred Jeremias, Das AT im Lichte des alten Orients, 1906; a good brief summary is found in Sellin, Die AT Religion im Rahmen der andern Altorientalischen, 1908. Full details are given in Kautsch, "Religion of Israel," in HDB, extra vol. 1904. For the last centuries before Christ see particularly, Schröter, Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi, 1907 (also ET). The modern Jewish standpoint is represented by Montefiore, Lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion as Illustrated by the History of the Ancient Hebrews, 1892.

ISRAELITE, iz'rā-el-it, ISRAELITISH, iz'rā-el-it-ish: Belonging to the tribes of ISRAEL (q.v.). Occurs 4 t in the NT: of Nathanael (Jn 1 47); used by Paul (Rom 9 4; 11 1; 2 Cor 11 22).

ISSACHAR, is'a-kār (יִשָּׂשכָר, yissā[s]khār; LXX, Swete Ἰσασάαρ, Issachār; Tisch., Issachar, so also in the NT, Treg. and WH):

(1) The 9th son of Jacob, the 5th borne to him by Leah (Gen 30 17 f). His birth is in this passage connected with the strange story of Reuben and his mandrakes, and the name given him is apparently conceived as derived from 'ish sakhār, "a hired workman." There is a play upon the name in this sense in Gen 49 15, "He bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant under taskwork." Wellhausen (Text der Buch.

1. The Name Sam., 95) thinks that the second element of the name may denote a deity; and Sokar, an Egypt god, has been suggested. The name in that case would mean "worshipper of Sokar." Practically nothing is preserved of the personal history of this patriarch beyond his share in the common actions of the sons of Jacob. Four sons were born to him before Jacob's family removed to Egypt (Gen 46 13). In that land he died and was buried.

At Sinai the tribe numbered 54,000 men of war over 20 years of age (Nu 1 29). At the end of the wanderings the numbers had grown to 64,300 (Nu 26 25). In the days of David, the Chronicler puts the figures at 87,000 (1 Ch 7 5). See NUMBERS.

2. The Tribe The place of Issachar in the desert-march was with the standard of the tribe of Judah (along with Zebulun) on the E. side of the tabernacle (Nu 2 5), this group forming the van of the host (10 14f). The rabbis say that this standard was of 3 colors, sardine, topaz and carbuncle, on which were inscribed the names of the 3 tribes, bearing the figure of a lion's whelp (Tg, pseudo. Jon. on Nu 2 3). The captain of the tribe was Nethanel ben-Zuar (Nu 1 8, etc). Later this place was held by Igal ben-Joseph, the tribal representative among the spies (Nu 13 7). The prince chosen from Issachar to assist in the division of the land was Paltiel ben-Azzan (34 26). The position of I. at the strange ceremony near Shechem was on Mt. Gerizim, "to bless the people" (Dt 27 12).

Sixteen cities of Issachar are mentioned in Josh 19 17 ff, but the only indications of boundaries are

3. The Tribal Territory We gather elsewhere that the territory of this tribe marched on the N. with Zebulun and Naphtali (19 11.33); on the W. with Manasseh and possibly Asher (17 10); and on the S. with Manasseh (ver 11). It does not seem to have had any point of contact with the sea. The portion of Issachar, therefore, included the plain of Esdraelon, Tabor, the hill of Moreh, and the slopes E. to the Jordan. The fortresses along the S. edge of the plain were held by Manasseh. Tola, a man of Issachar, held Shamir, a stronghold in Mt. Ephraim (Jgs 10 1). To Manasseh was given Beth-shean with her "towns" (Josh 17 11). No reliable line can be drawn for the S. border. The district thus indicated was small; but it embraced some of the most fruitful land in Pal. By the very riches of the soil Issachar was tempted. "He saw a resting-place that it was good, and the land that it was pleasant; and he bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant under taskwork" (Gen 49 15). "The mountain" in Dt 33 19 may possibly be Tabor, on which, most likely, there was an ancient sanctuary and place of pilgrimage. This would certainly be associated with a market, in which Issachar and Zebulun, the adjoining tribes, would be able to enrich themselves by trade with the pilgrims from afar. Issachar took part in the battle with Sisera (Jgs 5 15). To Israel Issachar gave one judge, Tola (Jgs 10 1), and two kings, Baasha and his son (1 K 15 27, etc).

Of the 200 "heads" of the men of Issachar who came to David at Hebron it is said that they were "men that had understanding of the times, to know what Israel ought to do" (1 Ch 12 32). According to the

Tg, this meant that they knew how to ascertain the periods of the sun and moon, the intercalation of months, the dates of solemn feasts, and could interpret the signs of the times. A company from Issachar came to the celebration of the Passover when it was restored by Hezekiah (2 Ch 30 18). Issachar has a portion assigned to him in Ezekiel's ideal division of the land (48 25); and he appears also in the list in Rev (7 7).

(2) A Korahite doorkeeper, the 7th son of Obed-edom (1 Ch 26 5). W. EWING

ISSHIAH, is-shī'a (יִשְׁחִיָּה, yishshīyāhū, "Jeh exists"; AV Ishiah):

(1) Mentioned among David's heroes, a great-grandson of Tola (1 Ch 7 3).

(2) Mentioned among the men who came to David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12 6; AV "Jesiah").

(3) A member of the priesthood of the house of Rehabiah (1 Ch 24 21; AV "Jesiah").

(4) Another Levitical priest of the house of Uzziel (1 Ch 23 20; 24 25).

ISSHIJAH, is-shī'ja (יִשְׁחִיָּה, yishshīyāh, "Jeh lends"; AV Ishijah): A man of the household of Harim, named among those who, at Ezra's command, were induced to put away their "strange wives" (Ezr 10 31). Also called "Ascas" (1 Esd 9 32).

ISSUE, ish'û:

(1) (מִוְלָדָה, mōledeth, יִשְׁעֵי, se'ēsā'im; σπέρμα, spérma, "s.e.d"): Offspring, descendants (Gen 49 6; Isa 22 24; Mt 22 25 AV).

(2) (זֵרָה, zirmāh; יָצָא, yācā' [vb.]; ῥύσις, rhúsīs): A gushing of fluid (semen, Ezk 23 20; water, 47 8; blood, Lk 8 43). See next article.

ISSUE (OF BLOOD) (זֵרָה, zōbh, זָרַב, zābh; ῥύσις, rhúsīs, αἰμόρροος, haimórrhoos): When used as a description of a bodily affection the word signifies: (1) A discharge, the consequence of uncleanness and sin (Lev 15 2 ff; Nu 5 2). As such it was one of the judgments which were to afflict the family of Joab (2 S 3 29); (2) a hemorrhage, either natural (Lev 12 7, where the word used is mākōr, lit. a "fountain"), or the consequence of disease (Mt 9 20; Mk 5 25; Lk 8 43).

ISSUES, ish'ûz (יִשְׁעֵי, tōsā'ōth, lit. "out-goings"): (1) Ways of escape (Ps 68 20 AV); (2) free moral choices (Prov 4 23).

ISTALCURUS, is-tal-kū'rus (Ἰσταλκούρος, Ist-talkouros): 1 Esd 8 40, corresponding to Zabbud in Ezr 8 14. In Swete's text the name is Istakalkos.

ISUAH, is'û-a. See ISHVAH.

ISUI, is'û-i. See ISHVI.

ISVAH, is'va. See ISHVAH.

ITALA, it'a-la, VERSION. See LATIN VERSION, THE OLD; VULGATE.

ITALIAN, it-al'yan, BAND. See BAND.

ITALY, it'a-li (Ἰταλία, Italia): At first confined as a name to the extreme southern part of the Italian peninsula in the region now called Calabria, whence its application was gradually extended. In Gr usage of the 5th cent. BC, the name was applied to the coasts as far as Metapontum and Posidonia, being synonymous with Oenotria. The Oenotrians are represented as having assumed the name of Italians (Itali) from a legendary ruler Italus (Dionysius, i.12.35; Vergil, Aen. i.533). The extension of Rom authority seems to have given this name an ever-widening application, since it was used to designate their allies generally. As early as the time of Polybius the name Italy was sometimes employed as an appellation for all the country between the two seas (Tyrrhenian and Adriatic) and from the foot of the Alps to the Sicilian Straits (Polyb. i.6; ii.14; iii.39.54), although Cisalpine Gaul was not placed on a footing of complete equality with the peninsula as regards administration until shortly after the death of Julius Caesar. From the time of Augustus the term was used in practically its modern sense (Nissen, Italische Landeskunde, I, 57-87).

The name Italy occurs 3 t in the NT: Acts 18 2, Aquila "lately come from Italy," because of the expulsion of the Jews from Rome under Claudius; Acts 27 1, the decision that Paul be sent to Italy; He 13 24, salutation from those "of Italy." The adj. form is found in the appellation, "Italian band" (cohors Italica, Acts 10 1).

The history of ancient Italy, in so far as it falls within the scope of the present work, is treated under ROME (q.v.). GEORGE H. ALLEN

ITCH (יִצְחָק, hārcs; ψώρα, psōra): Only in Dt 28 27, where it probably refers to the parasitic skin disease of that name which is very common in Pal. It is due to a small mite, Sarcoptes scabiei, which makes burrows in the skin and sometimes causes extensive crusts or scabs, attended with a severe itching. It is very easily communicated from person to person by contact, and can be cured only by destruction of the parasite. This disease disqualified its victims for the priesthood (Lev 21 20).

ITHAI, ith'ā-i. See ITTAL.

ITHAMAR, ith'a-inar (אִתְחָמָר, 'ithāmār, "land" or "island of palms": Gesenius; or "father of Tamar," אִתְ, 'i, being perhaps for אִתְ, 'ābhī: Cook in EB—though both derivations are uncertain): The 4th son of Aaron (Ex 6 23; 28 1; 1 Ch 6 3), Eleazar being the 3d, Nadab and Abihu the 1st and 2d. While Nadab and Abihu were prematurely cut off for offering strange fire before the Lord (Lev 10 12; Nu 3 4; 26 61), and Eleazar was appointed chief of the tribe of Levi (Ex 6 23.25) and ultimately succeeded Aaron (Ex 28 1), Ithamar was made the treasurer of the offerings for the Tabernacle (Ex 38 21), and superintendent of the Gershonites and Merarites in the service of the Tabernacle (Nu 4 28.33). In the time of Eli the high-priesthood had come to be in his family, but how, and whether before Eli's day or first in Eli's person, is not told and need not be conjectured. W. R. Smith in EB (art. "Eli"), on the strength of 1 S 2 27.28, holds that the priesthood was originally in Eli's line; but the words "the house of thy father" do not necessarily mean only the house of Ithamar, but may, and most probably do, refer to Aaron and his descendants, of whom Ithamar was one. Nor does the cutting off of Eli's family from the priesthood and the setting in their place of "a faithful priest," who should do everything according to Jeh's will and walk before Jeh's anointed forever, find its complete fulfilment in the deposition of Abiathar or Ahimelech, his son, and the installation of Zadok in the time of Solomon (1 K 2 35; 1 Ch 29 22; see ZADOK). A descendant of Ithamar, Daniel by name, is mentioned among the exiles who returned from Babylon (Ezr 8 2). T. WHITELAW

ITHIEL, ith'i-el (אִתְיֵאל, 'ithi'el, "God is"):

(1) A son of Jeshaiiah of the tribe of Benjamin, mentioned among the inhabitants of Jerus in Nehemiah's day (Neh 11 7).

(2) The name is perhaps also found in the oracle of Agur (Prov 30 1). See ITHIEL and UCAL.

ITHIEL AND UCAL (אִתְיֵאל וְעָכָל, 'ithi'el w'ukhāl): Names of the two men to whom Agur the son of Jakeh spoke his words (Prov 30 1). The purport of introducing these persons is strange and obscure; the margin proposes therefore, by the use of a different pointing, to read the verse, "The man said, I have wearied myself, O God, I have wearied myself, O God, and am consumed," thus doing away with the proper names; a reading which corresponds not inaptly with the tone of the succeeding verses. See AGUR; PROVERBS, BOOK OF, II, 6. JOHN FRANKLIN GENUNG

ITHLAH, ith'la (יִתְלָה, yithlāh; AV Jethlah): An unidentified town in the territory of Dan, named with Aijalon and Elon (Josh 19 42).

ITHMAH, ith'mā (יִתְמָה, yithmāh, "purity"): A citizen of the country of the Moabites, David's deadly enemies, yet mentioned as one of the king's heroes (1 Ch 11 46).

ITHNAN, ith'nan (יִתְנָן, yithnān): A town in the S. of Judah mentioned along with Hazor and Ziph (Josh 15 23), apparently the "Ethnan" of Jerome (Onom 118 13). Not identified.

ITHRA, ith'ra (יִתְרָה, yithrā, "abundance"): The father of Amasa, commanding general in the rebel army of Absalom. It seems that his mother was Abigail, a sister or half-sister of King David (1 Ch 2 17). She is called the sister of Zeruiah, Joab's mother (2 S 17 25). In this same passage Ithra is called an "Israelite," but in 1 Ch 2 17; 1 K 2 5.32, we read: "Jether the Ishmaelite."

ITHRAN, ith'ran (יִתְרָן, yithrān, "excellent"): (1) A descendant of Seir the Horite, son of Dishon (Gen 36 26; 1 Ch 1 41).

(2) One of the sons of Zophah of the tribe of Asher (1 Ch 7 37).

ITHREAM, ith'rē-am (יִתְרֵאִם, yithrē'am, "residue of the people"): The 6th son born to David at Hebron. His mother's name was Eglah (2 S 3 5; 1 Ch 3 3).

ITHRITE, ith'rit (יִתְרִי, yithrī, "excellence," "preeminence"): A family in Israel, whose home was Kiriath-jearim (1 Ch 2 53). Among the 37 heroes of David, two are mentioned who belonged to this family, Ira and Gareb (2 S 23 38; 1 Ch 11 40).

ITTAH-KAZIN, it-a-kā-zin (יִתְחָזִין, 'ittāh kāzīn): Josh 19 13 AV for Eth-kazin. Ittah is correctly Eth with Hē locale, meaning "toward Eth."

ITTAL, it'ā-i, it'i (אִתַּל, 'ittay, אִתַּי, 'ithay):

(1) A Gittite or native of Gath, one of David's chief captains and most faithful friends during the rebellion of Absalom (2 S 15 11-22; 18 2.4.12). The narrative reveals David's chivalrous and unselfish spirit in time of trouble, as well as the most self-sacrificing loyalty on the part of Ittai. He seems to have but recently left his native city and joined David's army through personal attachment to the king. David rapidly promoted him. Hearing of Absalom's rebellion and approach to Jerus, he flees with David. The latter remonstrates, urges him to go back and join Absalom, as he is a foreigner and in exile. His interests are in the capital and with the king; there is no reason why he should be a fugitive and perhaps suffer the loss of everything; it would be better for him, with his band of men, to put himself and them at the service of Absalom, the new king. "Mercy and truth be with thee," says David in his magnanimity. Ittai, with a double oath, absolutely refuses to go back, but will stand by David until the last. Remonstrance being useless, the monarch orders him across the river, doubtless glad that he had such a doughty warrior and faithful friend by his side. On mustering his hosts to meet Absalom, David makes Ittai a chief captain with the intrepid Joab and Abishai. He doubtless did his part in the battle, and as nothing more is said of him it is possible that he fell in the fight.

(2) A Benjamite, one of David's 30 mighty men (2 S 23 29; 1 Ch 11 31, "Ithai").

ITURAEA, it-û-rê'a ('Itoupaia, Itourata): The term occurs only once in Scripture, in the definition of Philip's territory: Ita Itouratas kai

1. The Trachontidos chôras, which AV renders: "of Ituraea and of the region of Adjective Trachonitis," and RV: "the region of Ituraea and Trachonitis" (Lk 3 1).

Sir W. M. Ramsay has given reasons for the belief that this word was certainly never used as a noun by any writer before the time of Eusebius (Expos, 1894, IX, 51 ff, 143 ff, 288 ff). It must be taken as an adj. indicating the country occupied by the Ituraeans.

The descent of the Ituraeans must probably be traced to Jetur, son of Ishmael (Gen 25 15), whose progeny were clearly numbered among the Arabian nomads. According to

2. The Eupolemus (c 150 BC), quoted by Eusebius (Praep. Evang. IX, 30), they were associated with the Nabataeans, Moabites and Ammonites against whom David warred on the E. of the Jordan. They are often mentioned by Lat writers; their skill in archery seems greatly to have impressed the Romans. They were skilful archers (Caesar, Bell. Afr. 20); a lawless (Strabo, xvi.2.10) and predatory people (Cicero, Philipp. ii.112). In the Lat inscriptions Ituraean soldiers have Syrian names (HJP, I, ii, 326). They would therefore be the most northerly of the confederates opposed to David (supra), and their country may naturally be sought in the neighbor-

3. Indica- hood of Mt. Hermon. There is tions of nothing to show when they moved Their from the desert to this district. Aristobolus made war against the Ituraeans, compelled many of them to be circumcised, and added a great part of their territory to Judaea, 140 BC (Ant. XIII, xi, 3). Dio Cassius calls Lysanias "king of the Ituraeans" (xlix.32), and from him Zenodorus leased land which included Ullatha and Paneas, 25 BC. The capital of Lysanias was Chalcis, and he ruled over the land from Damascus to the sea. Jos speaks of Soemus as a tetrarch in Lebanon (Vita, 11); while Tacitus calls him governor of the Ituraeans (Ann. xii.23). The country of Zenodorus, lying between Trachonitis and Galilee, and including Paneas and Ullatha, Augustus bestowed on Herod, 20 BC (Ant. XV, x, 3). In defining the tetrarchy of Philip, Jos names Batanea, Trachonitis and Auranitis, but says nothing of the Ituraeans (Ant. XVII, xi, 4; BJ, II, vi, 3). Paneas and Ullatha were doubtless included, and this may have been Ituraean territory (HJP, I, ii, 333). It seems probable, therefore, that the Ituraeans dwelt mainly in the mountains, and in the broad valley of Coele-Syria; but they may also have occupied the district to the S.E. of Hermon, the modern Jedûr. It is not possible to define more closely the Ituraean country; indeed it is not clear whether St. Luke intended to indicate two separate parts of the dominion of Philip, or used names which to some extent overlapped.

It has been suggested that the name Jedûr may be derived from the Heb כִּדְרָא, ḵîḏrâ, and so be equivalent to Ituraea. But the derivation is impossible. W. EWING

IVORY, í'vô-ri ([1] יָשֵׁן, shên, "tooth" [tr<sup>d</sup> "ivory," 1 K 10 18; 22 39; 2 Ch 9 17; Ps 45 8; Cant 5 14; 7 4; Ezk 27 6.15; Am 3 15; 6 4]; [2] יָשֵׁן, shenhabbim; LXX ὀδόντες ἐλεφάντινοι, odóntes elephántinoi, "elephants' teeth" [1 K 10 22; 2 Ch 9 21]; [3] ἑλεφάντινος, elephántinos, "of ivory" [Rev 18 12]): Shên occurs often, meaning "tooth" of man or beast. In the passages cited it is tr<sup>d</sup> in EV "ivory" (cf "crag," 1 S 14 4.5; "cliff," Job 39 28 bis; "flesh-hook of three teeth," 1 S 2 13). Shenhabbim is thought to be a contracted form of shen hâ-ibbim, i.e. hâ, the art., and ibbim, pl. of ibbâh or ibbâ'; cf Egypt ab, ebu, "elephant," and of Lat ebur, "ivory" (see Liddell and Scott, s.v. éléphas). On the other hand, it may be a question whether ibm is not a sing. form connected with the Arab. fil, "elephant." If the word for "elephant" is not contained in shenhabbim, it occurs nowhere in the Heb Bible.

Ivory was probably obtained, as now, mainly from the African elephant. It was rare and expensive. It is mentioned in connection with the magnificence of Solomon (1 K 10 18 22), being brought by the ships of Tarshish (2 Ch 9 17.21). An "ivory house" of Ahab is mentioned in 1 K 22

Elephants' Tusks Brought to Thothmes III.

39. It is mentioned among the luxuries of Israel in the denunciations of Amos (3 15; 6 4). It occurs in the figurative language of Ps 45 8; Cant 5 14; 7 4. It is used for ornamentation of the ships of the Tyrians (Ezk 27 6), who obtain it with ebony through the men of Dedan (ver 15). It is among the merchandise of Babylon (Rev 18 12).

We do not learn of the use of elephants in war until a few centuries before the Christian era. In 1 Macc 8 6, there is a reference to the defeat of Antiochus the Great, "having an hundred and twenty elephants," by Scipio Africanus in 190 BC. 1 Macc 1 17 speaks of the invasion of Egypt by Antiochus Epiphanes with an army in which there were elephants. 1 Macc 6 28-47 has a detailed account of a battle between Antiochus Eupator and Judas Maccabaeus at Bethsura (Beth-zur). There were 32 elephants. Upon the "beasts" (θηρία, théria) there were "strong towers of wood"; "There were also upon every one two and thirty strong men, that fought upon them, beside the Indian that ruled him."

In Job 40 15, AVm has for "behemoth," "the elephant, as some think." ALFRED ELY DAY

IVORY, TOWER OF (מִגְדַּל הַיָּשֵׁן, mighdal ha-shên): In Cant 7 4 the neck of Shulammitte is compared in whiteness and stateliness to a (or the) tower of ivory. The def. art. may suggest that the comparison is with some actual tower in or near Jerus; but more probably the language is simply a figure.

IVVAH, í'v'a (יִבְיָה, yivvâh; 'Αβὰ, Abâ [= Avd], 'Αυά, Avâ, 2 K 18 34, Οὐδοῖ, Oudoi, 2 K 19 13, apparently due to a misreading): The name is wanting in the MT and LXX of Isa 36 19.

Ivvah was a city apparently conquered by the Assyrians, and is mentioned by them, in the vs quoted, with Hamath and Arpad, Sepharvaim and Hena. It has been assimilated with the Avva of 2 K 17 24 as one of the places whence Sargon brought captives to Samaria, and identified with Hit on the Euphrates, between Anah and Ramadih, but this seems improbable, as is also the suggestion that it is Emma, the modern 'Imm, between Antioch and Aleppo. Hommel (Expos T, April, 1898, 330) upholds the view that Hena and Ivvah, or, as he prefers to read, Avvah, are not places at all, but the names of the two chief gods of Hamath, Arpad and Sepharvaim. This would be consistent with 2 K 18 34; but 19 13: "Where is the king . . . of Sepharvaim, of Hena, and Ivvah?" and 17 31, where the gods of Sepharvaim are stated to be Adrammelech and Anammelech, raise serious difficulties. In all probability, the identification of Ivvah depends upon the correct localization of the twofold Sepharvaim, of which Hena and Ivvah may have been the names. The identification of Sepharvaim with the Bab Sip(p)ar is now practically abandoned. See SEPHARVAIM.

IVY, i'vi (κισσός, kissós): The only mention of the word in all the sacred writings is in 2 Macc 6 7 in connection with the oppression of the Jews by Antiochus Epiphanes: "On the day of the king's birth every month they were brought by bitter constraint to eat of the sacrifices; and when the feast of Bacchus (Dionysus) was kept, the Jews were compelled to go in procession to Dionysus, carrying ivy," this plant (Hedera helix) being sacred to the Gr god of wine and of the culture of the vine (cf Eur. Bacchae, passim). It was of ivy or of pine that the "corruptible crown" of the famous Isthmian games was made (1 Cor 9 25).

IYAR, i-yar' See IYYAR.

IYE-ABARIM, i-yē-ab'a-rim (עֵי הַקְּבָרִים, 'iyē hā-'ābhārīm, "the heaps of the Abarim"; AV ije-abarim; in Nu 21 11 LXX reads B, Χαλγλεῖ, Chalglei): A place in the journeyings of Israel named after Oboth, said to be "in the wilderness which is before Moab, toward the sunrising" (Nu 21 11), "in the border of Moab" (33 44). The indications of position here given are not sufficient to guide to any identification, and, so far, nothing has been discovered in the district to help us. Called simply "Iyim" (AV "Iim") in Nu 33 45.

IYIM, i'yim (עֵי, 'iyīm, "heaps"—the form of which, עֵי, 'iyē, is the constr.):

(1) A short form of the name Iye-abarim (Nu 33 45).

JAAKAN, jā'a-kān. See BEEROTH-BENE-JAAKAN.

JAAKOBAH, jā-a-kō'ba, jā-ak'o-ba (יַעֲקֹבָה, ya'ākōbhāh, for meaning cf JACOB, I, 1, 2): 1 Ch 4 36, a Simeonite prince.

JAALA, jā'a-la, jā-ā'la (יַעֲלָה, ya'ālā', meaning unknown, Neh 7 58) and JAALAH (יַעֲלָה, ya-ālāh, "mountain goat" [?], Ezr 2 56): The name of a family of returned exiles, "children of Solomon's servants"="Jeeli" in 1 Esd 5 33.

JAALAM, jā'a-lam: AV for JALAM (q.v.).

(2) A town in the territory of Judah (Josh 15 29; EV wrongly "Iim"). It lay in the extreme S., "toward the border of Edom." It is not identified.

IYYAR, i-yār' (יָאָר, 'iyār; יָאָר, Iār): The 2d month of the Jewish year, corresponding to May. It is not mentioned in the Bible. See CALENDAR.

IZEHAR, iz'ē-hār, i'zē-hār (Nu 3 19 AV). See IZHAR.

IZHAR, iz'hār (יִזְחָר, yizhār, "the shining one"):

(1) The father of Korah (Nu 16 1), descended from a Kohathite Levite of this name, whose descendants formed a family, in the tribe of Levi (Ex 6 18.21; Nu 3 19.27; 1 Ch 6 18.38).

(2) A descendant of Judah, whose mother's name was Helah. ARVm gives the name Zohar (1 Ch 4 7).

IZHARITES, iz'har-its (יִזְחָרִית, yizhārī): The descendants of Izhar, son of Kohath, and grandson of Levi (Nu 3 19.27). In David's reign some of these were "over the treasures of the house of Jeh" (1 Ch 26 23), others "were for the outward business over Israel, for officers and judges" (ib, ver 29).

IZLIAH, iz-lī'a (יִזְלִיָּה, yizlī'āh, "Jeh delivers"; AV JEZLIAH): A son of Elpaal, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 18).

IZRAHIAH, iz-ra-hī'a (יִזְרַחְיָה, yizrah'yāh, "Jeh appears, or shines"):

(1) A descendant of Issachar, grandson of Tola, only son of Uzzi (1 Ch 7 3).

(2) The leader of the singing at the purification of the people, on the occasion of Nehemiah's reformation; here rendered "Jezrahiah" (Neh 12 42).

IZRAHITE, iz'ra-hīt (יִזְרָחִי, yizrāhī, "rising, shining"): Shamhuth, the captain of the 5th monthly course (1 Ch 27 8), is called an "Izra-hite." The name may be derived from the town or family of Izrah, but more likely is a corruption of the word "Zerahite," descendant of Zerah of Judah.

IZRI, iz'rī (יִזְרִי, yizrī, "creator," "former"): A man of the "sons of Jeduthun," leader of the fourth band of musicians, who served in the sanctuary (1 Ch 25 11). Identical with Zeri (ver 3).

IZZIAH, iz-i'a (יִזְזִיָּה, yizzī'yāh, "Jeh unites"; AV Jeziiah): One of the faithful Jews who put away their foreign wives. He belonged to the family of Parosh (Ezr 10 25; 1 Esd 9 26, "Ied-dias").

J

JAANAI, jā'a-nī: AV for JANAI (q.v.).

JAAR, jā'ar (יַעַר, ya'ar, "forest" or "wood"): Is only once taken as a proper name (Ps 132 6 RVm), "We found it in the field of Jaar." It may be a shortened form of the name Kiriath-jearim, where the ark had rested 20 years. See KIRIATH-JEARIM.

JAARE-OREGIM, jā'a-rē-ōr'ē-jim, -ōr'e-gim (יַעֲרֵי אֲרָגִים, ya'ārē'ōr'ghīm): In 2 S 21 19, given as the name of a Bethlehemite, father of Elhanan, who is said to have slain Goliath the Gittite (cf

JABESH-GILEAD, jā'bes'h-gil'ad (יָבֵשׁ גִּלְעָד, yābhēsh gil'ād; or simply יָבֵשׁ, yābhish, "dry"): A city E. of the Jordan, in the deliverance of which from Nahash the Ammonite Saul's military prowess was first displayed (1 S 11 1ff). At an earlier time the inhabitants failed to share with their brethren in taking vengeance upon Benjamin. This laxity was terribly punished, only 400 virgins being spared alive, who afterward became wives to the Benjamites (Jgs 21). The gratitude of the inhabitants to Saul was affectingly proved after the disaster to that monarch on Gilboa (1 S 31). David, hearing of their deed, sent an approving message, and sought to win their loyalty to himself (2 S 2 4 ff). Robinson (BR, III, 39) thought it might be represented by ed-Deir, about 6 miles from Pella (Fāhīl), on the southern bank of Wādy Yābis. The distance from Pella agrees with the statement of Onom (s.v.). Others (Oliphant, Land of Gilead, 277 f; Merrill, East of Jordan, 430, etc) would identify it with the ruins of Meriamin, about 3 miles S.E. of Pella, on the N. of Wādy Yābis. The site remains in doubt; but the ancient name still lingers in that of the valley, the stream from which enters the Jordan fully 9 miles S.E. of Beisān. W. EWING

JABEZ, jā'bez (יָבֵז, ya'bēz, "sorrow" ["height"]):

(1) Place: An unidentified town probably in the territory of Judah, occupied by scribes (1 Ch 2 55). For an ingenious reconstruction of the passage see EB, s.v.

(2) Person: The head of a family of Judah, noted for his "honorable" character, though "his mother bare him with sorrow" (1 Ch 4 9.10), ya'bēz being interpreted as if it stood for ya'ēbh, "he causes pain." The same play upon words recurs in his prayer, "that it be not to my sorrow!" His request was granted, "and the sorrow implied by his ominous name was averted by prayer" (Dummelow, in loc.).

JABIN, jā'bin (יָבִין, yābhīn, "one who is intelligent," "discerning." The word may have been a hereditary royal title among the northern Canaanites. Cf the familiar usage of par'ōh melek miq-rayim):

(1) "The king of Hazor," the leading city in Northern Pal, who led an alliance against Joshua. He was defeated at the waters of Merom, his city was taken and he was slain (Josh 11 1-9).

(2) "The king of Canaan, that reigned [or had reigned] in Hazor." It is not clear whether he dwelt in Hazor or Harosheth, the home of Sisera, the captain of his host at the time of the story narrated in Jgs. He oppressed Israel in the days preceding the victory of Deborah and Barak. To the Israelites he must have been but a shadowy figure as compared with his powerful captain, Sisera, for the song makes no mention of him and there is nothing to indicate that he even took part in the battle that freed Israel (Jgs 4 2.7.17.23.24 bis; Ps 83 9.10). ELLA DAVIS ISAACS

JABNEEL, jab'nē-el, JABNEH, jab'ne (יָבְנֵה, yabhnē'el, "God is builder": LXX Δεβνά, Lebná, Swete reads Lemná, Apoc Ἰαμνία, Iamunia, Ἰαμνεία, Iamneia):

(1) A town on the northern border of the land assigned to Judah, near the western sea, mentioned in connection with Ekron (Josh 15 11). The place is now represented by the modern village of Yebna which stands upon a hill a little to the S. of the Nahr Rubin, about 12 or 13 miles S. of Jaffa, on the road from there to Askalon, and about 4 miles from the sea. It had a port, now called Mina Rubin, a short distance S. of the mouth of the river, some remains of which still exist. Its harbor was superior to that of Jaffa (PEFS, 1875, 167-68). It does not occur in the Heb text of the OT except in the passage mentioned, but it appears under the form "Jabneh" (יָבְנֵה, yabhnēh) in 2 Ch 26 6, as is evident from the mention of Gath and Ashdod in connection with it. LXX reads Γεμνά (Gemná, Jabneh) where the Heb reads יָבְנֵה, wā-yāmmāh, "even unto the sea," in Josh 15 46, where Ekron and Ashdod and other cities and villages are mentioned as belonging to Judah's inheritance. Jos (Ant, V, i, 22) assigns it to the tribe of Dan. We have no mention of its being captured by Joshua or occupied by Judah until the reign of Uzziah who captured it and demolished its wall, in connection with his war upon the Philis (2 Ch 26 6). The position of J. was strong and was the scene of many contests, both in the period of the monarchy and that of the Maccabees. It is mentioned frequently in the account of the wars of the latter with the Syrians. It was garrisoned by the Seleucid kings, and served as a base for raiding the territory of Judah. When Judas Maccabaeus defeated Gorgias and the Syrians he pursued them to the plains of J., but did not take the fortress (1 Macc 4 15). Gorgias was there attacked by the Jewish generals Joseph and Azarias, contrary to Judas' orders, who were repulsed with loss (5 56-60; Jos, Ant, XII, viii, 6). Apollonius occupied it for King Demetrius (1 Macc 10 69); and Cendebeus for Antiochus, and from there harassed the Jews (15 40). Judas burned the port and navy of J. (2 Macc 12 8-9). It was taken by Simon in 142 BC (Jos, Ant, XIII, vi, 7; BJ, I, ii, 2), together with Gazara and Joppa, but was restored to its inhabitants by Pompey in 62 BC (Ant, XIV, iv, 4), and was rebuilt by Gabinius in 57 BC (BJ, I, viii, 4). It was restored to the Jews by Augustus in 30 AD. Herod gave it to his sister Salome and she bequeathed it to Julia, the wife of Augustus (Ant, XVIII, ii, 2; BJ, II, ix, 1). The town and region were prosperous in Rom times, and when Jerus was besieged by Titus the Sanhedrin removed to J., and it afterward became the seat of a great rabbinical school (Milman, Hist Jews, II, 411-12), but was suppressed in the persecution under Hadrian. Antonius allowed it to be revived, but it was again suppressed because of hostile language on the part of the rabbis (ib, 451-52). The Crusaders built there the castle of Ibelin, supposing it to be the site of Gath. It was occupied by the Saracens, and various inscriptions in Arab. of the 13th and 14th cents. have been found there (SWP, II, 441-42).

(2) A town of Naphtali mentioned in Josh 19 33, and supposed to be the site of the modern Yemma, S.W. of the sea of Galilee (SWP, I, 365). It is the Kefr Yama of the Talm. H. PORTER

JACAN, jā'kan (יָכָן, ya'kān, meaning not known; AV Jachan): A chief of a family descended from Gad (1 Ch 5 13).

JACHIN, jā'kin (יָכִין, yākhīn, "he will establish"):

(1) The 4th son of Simeon (Gen 46 10; Ex 6 15; Nu 26 12). In 1 Ch 4 24 his name is given as "Jarib" (cf AVm, RVm). "Jachinites," the patronymic of the family, occurs in Nu 26 12.

(2) Head of the 21st course of priests in the time of David (1 Ch 24 17). It is used as a family name in 1 Ch 9 10, and as such also in Neh 11 10, where some of the course are included in the list of those who, having returned from Babylon, willingly accepted the decision of the lot, and abandoned their rural retreats to become citizens and guardians of Jerus (vs 1 f). JAMES CRICHTON

JACHIN, jā'kin, AND BOAZ (יָכִין, yākhīn, "he shall establish"; יָבֹז, bō'az, "in it is strength," 1 K 7 15-22; 2 K 25 16.17; 2 Ch 3 15-17; Jer 52 17): These were the names of the two bronze pillars that stood before the temple of Solomon. They were not used in supporting the building; their appearance, therefore, must have been solely due to moral and symbolic reasons. What these are it is not easy to say. The pillars were not altar pillars with hearths at their top, as supposed by W. R. Smith (Religion of the Semites, 191, 468); rather they were "pillars of witness," as was the pillar that witnessed the contract between Jacob and Laban (Gen 31 52). A difficulty arises about the height of the pillars. The writers in K and Jer affirm that the pillars before the porch were 18 cubits high apiece (1 K 7 15; Jer 52 21), while the Chronicler states that they were 35 cubits (2 Ch 3 15). Various methods have been suggested of reconciling this discrepancy, but it is more probable that there is a corruption in the Chronicler's number. On the construction of the pillars and their capitals, see TEMPLE. At the final capture of Jerus they were broken up and the metal of which they were composed was sent to Babylon (2 K 25 13, 16). In Ezekiel's ideal temple the two pillars are represented by pillars of wood (40 49).

JACKAL, jak'ol:

(1) תַּנִּינִים, tannīm, "jackals," AV "dragons"; cf Arab. تَيْيَان, tīyān, "wolf"; and cf תַּנְיִן, tannīn, Arab. تَنِين, tinnīn, "sea monster" or "monster." ERV "dragon" (Job 7 12 m; Ps 74 13; 148 7; Isa 27 1; 51 9; Jer 51 34), "serpent" (Ex 7 9.10.12; Dt 32 33; Ps 91 13), AV "whale" (Gen 1 21; Job 7 12); but תַּנִּינִים, tannīm, "jackals," AV "sea monsters" (Lam 4 3), "jackal's well," AV "dragon well" (Neh 2 13), and tannīm, "monster," AV and ERV "dragon" (Ezk 29 3; 32 2).

(2) אַיִים, 'ayīm, "wolves," AV "wild beasts of the islands"; cf אִי, 'i, pl. אִיִּים, 'ayīm, "island"; also אַיָּה, 'ayyāh, "a cry," אָוָה, 'āwāh, "to cry," "to howl"; Arab. عَوَى, 'auwa, "to bark" (of dogs, wolves, or jackals); ابن آوى, 'ibn 'āwa, colloquially وَارِي, wāwī, "jackal."

(3) בְּיָיִם, ḥayīm, "wild beasts of the desert."

(4) אֲחִיָּם, 'ohīm, "doleful creatures."

"Jackals" occurs as a tr of tannīm, AV "dragons," in Job 30 29; Ps 44 19; Isa 13 22; 34 13; 35 7; 43 20; Jer 9 11; 10 22; 14 6; 49 33; 51 37; of the fem. pl. form tannōth in Mal 1 3, and of tannīn in Neh 2 13 and Lam 4 3. Tannīm is variously referred to a root meaning "to howl," and to a root meaning "to stretch out," trop. "to run swiftly, i.e. with outstretched neck and limb extended" (Ges.). Either derivation would suit "wolf" equally as well as "jackal." The expression in Jer 10 22, "to make the cities of Judah a desolation, a dwelling-place of jackals," seems, however, esp. appropriate of jackals. The same is true of Isa 34 13; Jer 9 11; 49 33, and 51 37.

The jackal (from Pers shaghāl), Canis aureus, is found about the Mediterranean except in Western Europe. It ranges southward to Abyssinia, and eastward, in Southern Asia, to farther India. It is smaller than a large dog, has a moderately bushy tail, and is reddish brown with dark shadings above. It is cowardly and nocturnal. Like the fox, it is destructive to poultry, grapes, and vegetables, but is less fastidious, and readily devours the remains of others' feasts. Jackals generally go about in small companies. Their peculiar howl may frequently be heard in the evening and at any time in the night. It begins with a high-pitched, long-drawn-out cry.

This is repeated two or three times, each time in a higher key than before. Finally there are several short, loud, yelping barks. Often when one raises the cry others join in. Jackals are not infrequently confounded with foxes. They breed freely with dogs.

Jackal (Canis aureus).

While tannīm is the only word tr'd "jackal" in EV, the words 'iyīm, ḥayīm, and 'ohīm deserve attention. They, as well as tannīm, evidently refer to wild creatures inhabiting desert places, but it is difficult to say for what animal each of the words stands. All four (together with b'nōth ya'ānāh and s'irīm) are found in Isa 13 21.22: "But wild beasts of the desert [ḥayīm] shall lie there; and their houses shall be full of doleful creatures ['ohīm]; and ostriches [b'nōth ya'ānāh] shall dwell there, and wild goats [s'irīm] shall dance there. And wolves ['iyīm] shall cry in their castles, and jackals [tannīm] in the pleasant palaces."

In AV 'iyīm (Isa 13 22; 34 14; Jer 50 39) is tr'd "wild beasts of the islands" (cf 'iyīm, "islands"). AV has merely the transliteration 'im, RV "wolves." RVm "howling creatures." Gesenius suggests the jackal, which is certainly a howler. While the wolf has a blood-curdling howl, it is much more rarely heard than the jackal.

Ḥayīm (Ps 72 9; 74 14; Isa 13 21; 23 13; 34 14; Jer 50 39) has been considered akin to ḥayāh, "drought," (cf 'ereḥ ḥayāh, "a dry land" [Ps 63 1]), and is tr'd in RV as follows: Ps 72 9, "they that dwell in the wilderness"; 74 14, "the people inhabiting the wilderness"; Isa 23 13, "them that dwell in the wilderness." RVm "the beasts of the wilderness"; Isa 13 21; 34 14; Jer 50 39, "wild beasts of the desert." There would be some difficulty in referring ḥayīm in Ps 72 9 to beasts rather than to men, but that is not the case in Ps 74 14 and Isa 23 13. "Wild cats" have been suggested.

'Ohīm, "doleful creatures," perhaps onomatopoeic, occurs only in Isa 13 21. The tr "owls" has been suggested, and is not unsuitable to the context.

It is not impossible that tannīm and 'iyīm may be different names of the jackals. 'Iyīm, ḥayīm, and tannīm occur together also in Isa 34 13.14, and 'iyīm and ḥayīm in Jer 50 39. Their similarity in sound may have much to do with their collocation. The recognized word for "wolf," z'ēbh (cf Arab. dhī'b), occurs 7 t in the OT. See DRAGON; WOLF; ZOÖLOGY.

ALFRED ELY DAY

JACKAL'S WELL (עֵיִן הַתַּנִּינִים, 'ēn ha-tannīn; LXX has πηγή τῶν συκῶν, pēgē tōn sukōn, "fountain of the figs"; AV dragon well): A well or spring in the valley of Hinnom between the "Gate of the Gai" and the Dung Gate (Neh 2 13). No such source exists in the Wādī er Rabābī (see HINNOM) today, although it is very probable that a well sunk to the rock in the lower parts of this valley might strike a certain amount of water trickling down the valley-bottom. G. A. Smith suggests (Jerus, I, ch iv) that this source may have arisen as the result of an earthquake, hence the name "dragon," and have subsequently disappeared; but it is at least as likely that it received its name from the jackals which haunted this valley, as the pariah dogs do today, to consume the dead bodies which were thrown there. See HINNO; JACKAL.

I. Name.—יַעֲקֹב (5 תַּעֲקִיב), ya'ākōbh; 'Iakōb, Iakōb, like in form a vb. in the Kāl impf., 3d masc. sing. Like some 50 other Heb names of this same form, it has no subject for the vb. expressed. But there are a number of independent indications that Jacob belongs to that large class of names consisting of a vb. with some Divine name or title (in this case 'El) as the subject, from which the common abbreviated form is derived by omitting the subject. (a) In Bab documents of the period of the Patriarchs, there occur such personal names as Ja-ku-bi, Ja-ku-uh-lu (the former doubtless an abbreviation of the latter), and Aq-bu-ū (cf Aq-bi-a-hu), according to Hilprecht a syncretized form for A-qu(?) -bu(-ū), like Aq-bi-ili alongside of A-qa-bi-ili; all of which may be associated with the same root יַעֲקֹב, 'ākabh, as appears in Jacob (see H. Ranke, Early Bab Personal Names, 1905, with annotations by Professor Hilprecht as editor, esp. pp. 67, 113, 98 and 4). (b) In the list of places in Pal conquered by the Pharaoh Thutmose III appears a certain J'qb'r, which in Egypt characters represents the Sem letters יַעֲקֹב־הַל, ya'ākōbh-hal, and which therefore seems to show that in the earlier half of the 15th cent. BC (so Petrie, Breasted) there was a place (not a tribe; see W. M. Müller, Asien und Europa, 162 ff) in Central Pal that bore a name in some way connected with "Jacob." Moreover, a Pharaoh of the Hyksos period bears a name that looks like ya'ākōbh-ēl (Spiegelberg, Orientalische Literaturzeitung, VII, 130). (c) In the Jewish tractate Pirkē 'Abhōth, iii 1, we read of a Jew named 'Akabhyah, which is a name composed of the same verbal root as that in Jacob, together with the Divine name Yāhū (i.e. Jeh) in its common abbreviated form. It should be noted that the personal names 'Akkūbh and Yā'ākōbhāh (accent on penult) also occur in the OT, the former borne by no less than 4 different persons; also that in the Palmyrene inscriptions we find a person named יַעֲקֹב, a name in which this same vb. יַעֲקֹב is preceded by the name of the god 'Ate, just as in 'Akabhyāh it is followed by the name Yāhū.

Such being the form and distribution of the name, it remains to inquire: What do we know of its etymology and what were the associations it conveyed to the Heb ear?

2. Etymology and Associations—The vb. in all its usages is capable of deduction, by simple association of ideas, from the noun "heel." "To heel" might mean: (a) "to take hold of by the heel" (so probably Hos 12 3; cf Gen 27 36); (b) "to follow with evil intent," "to supplant" or in general "to deceive" (so Gen 27 36; Jer 9 4, where the parallel, "go about with slanders," is interesting because the word so tr'd is akin to the noun "foot," as "supplant" is to "heel"); (c) "to follow with good intent," whether as a slave (cf our Eng. "to heel," of a dog) for service, or as a guard for protection, hence "to guard" (so in Ethiopic), "to keep guard over" and thus "to restrain" (so Job 37 4); (d) "to follow," "to succeed," "to take the place of another" (so Arab., and the Heb noun יַעֲקֹב, 'ēkōbh, "consequence," "recompense," whether of reward or punishment).

Among these four significations, which most commends itself as the original intent in the use of this vb. to form a proper name? The answer to this question depends upon the degree of strength with which the Divine name was felt to be the subject of the vb. As Jacob-el, the simplest interpretation of the name is undoubtedly, as Baethgen urges (Beiträge zur sem. Religionsgeschichte, 158), "God rewardeth" ((d) above), like Nathanael, "God hath given," etc. But we have already seen that centuries before the time when Jacob is said to have been born, this name was shortened by dropping the Divine subject; and in this shortened form it would be more likely to call up in the minds of all Semites who used it, associations with the primary, physical notion of its root ((a) above). Hence there is no ground to deny that even in the patriarchal period, this familiar personal name Jacob lay ready at hand—a name ready made, as it were—for this child, in view of the peculiar circumstances of its birth; we may say, indeed, one could not escape the use of it. (A parallel case, perhaps, is Gen 38 28,30, Zerah; cf Zerahiah.) The associations of this root in everyday use in Jacob's family to mean "to supplant" led to the fresh realization of its appropriateness to his character and conduct when he was grown ((b) above). This construction does not interfere with a connection between the patriarch Jacob and the "Jacob-els" referred to above (under 1, (b)), should that connection on other grounds appear probable. Such a longer form was perhaps for every "Jacob" an alternative form of his name, and under certain circumstances may have been used by or of even the patriarch Jacob.

II. Place in the Patriarchal Succession.—In the dynasty of the "heirs of the promise," Jacob takes his place, first, as the successor of

1. As Son of Isaac. In Isaac's life the most significant and significant single fact had been his marriage with Rebekah instead of with a woman of Canaan. Jacob therefore represents the first generation of those who are determinately separate from their environment. Abraham and his household were immigrants in Canaan; Jacob and Esau were natives of Canaan in the second generation, yet had not a drop of Canaanitish blood in their veins. Their birth was delayed till 20 years after the marriage of their parents. Rebekah's barrenness had certainly the same effect, and probably the same purpose, as that of Sarah: it drove Isaac to Divine aid, demanded of him as it had of Abraham that "faith and patience" through which they "inherited the promises" (He 6 12), and made the children of this pair also the evident gift of God's grace, so that Isaac was the better able "by faith" to "bless Jacob and Esau even concerning things to come" (He 11 20).

These twin brothers therefore share thus far the same relation to their parents and to what their parents transmit to them. But here the likeness ceases. "Being not yet born, neither having done anything good or bad, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth, it was said unto (Rebecca), The elder shall serve the younger" (Rom 9 11,12). In the Gen-narrative, without any doctrinal assertions either adduced to explain it, or deduced from it, the fact is nevertheless made as clear as it is in Mal or Rom, that Esau is rejected, and Jacob is chosen as a link in the chain of inheritance that receives and transmits the promise.

With Jacob the last person is reached who, for his own generation, thus sums up in a single individual "the seed" of promise. He becomes the father of 12 sons, who are the progenitors of the tribes of the "peculiar people." It is for this reason that this people bears his name, and not that of his father Isaac or that of his grandfather Abraham. The "children of Israel," the "house of Jacob," are the totality of the seed of the promise. The Edomites too are children of Isaac. Ishmaelites equally with Israelites boast of descent from Abraham. But the twelve tribes that called themselves "Israel" were all descendants of Jacob, and were the only descendants of Jacob on the agnatic principle of family-constitution.

III. Biography.—The life of a wanderer (Dt 26 5 RVm) such as Jacob was, may often be best divided on the geographical principle. Jacob's career falls into the four distinct periods: that of his residence with Isaac in Canaan, that of his residence with Laban in Aram, that of his independent life in Canaan and that of his migration to Egypt.

Jacob's birth was remarkable in respect of (a) its delay for 20 years as noted above, (b) that condition of his mother which led to the

1. With Isaac in Canaan Divine oracle concerning his future greatness and supremacy, and (c) the unusual phenomenon that gave him his name: "he holds by the heel"

(see above, I, 2). Unlike his twin brother, Jacob seems to have been free from any physical peculiarities; his smoothness (Gen 27 11) is only predicated of him in contrast to Esau's hairiness. These brothers, as they developed, grew apart in tastes and habits. Jacob, like his father in his quiet manner of life and (for that reason perhaps) the companion and favorite of his mother, found early the opportunity to obtain Esau's sworn renunciation of his right of primogeniture, by taking advantage of his habits, his impulsiveness and his fundamental indifference to the higher things of the family, the things of the future (25 32). It was not until long afterward that the companion-scene to this first "supplanting" (27 36) was enacted. Both sons meanwhile are to be thought of simply as members of Isaac's following, during all the period of his successive sojourns in Gerar, the Valley of Gerar and Beersheba (ch 26). Within this period, when the brothers were 40 years of age, occurred Esau's marriage with two Hittite women. Jacob, remembering his own mother's origin, bided his time to find the woman who should be the mother of his children. The question whether she should be brought to him, as Rebekah was to Isaac, or he should go to find her, was settled at last by a family feud that only his absence could heal. This feud was occasioned by the fraud that Jacob at Rebekah's behest practised upon his father and brother, when these two were minded to nullify the clearly revealed purpose of the oracle (25 23) and the sanctions of a solemn oath (25 33). Isaac's partiality for Esau arose perhaps as much from Esau's resemblance to the active, impulsive nature of his mother, as from the sensual gratification afforded Isaac by the savory dishes his son's hunting supplied. At any rate, this partiality defeated itself because it overreached itself. The wife, who had learned to be eyes and ears for a husband's failing senses, detected the secret scheme, counter-plotted with as much skill as unscrupulousness, and while she obtained the paternal blessing for her favorite son, fell nevertheless under the painful necessity of choosing between losing him through his brother's revenge or losing him by absence from home. She chose, of course, the latter alternative, and herself brought about Jacob's departure, by pleading to Isaac the necessity for obtaining a woman as Jacob's wife of a sort different from the Canaanitish women that Esau had married. Thus ends the first portion of Jacob's life.

It is no young man that sets out thus to escape a brother's vengeance, and perhaps to find a wife at length among his mother's kindred.

2. To Aram and Back It was long before this that Esau at the age of forty had married the Hittite women (cf 26 34 with 27 46).

Yet to one who had hitherto spent his life subordinate to his father, indulged by his mother, in awe of a brother's physical superiority, and "dwelling in tents, a quiet [domestic] man" (25 27), this journey of 500 or 600 miles, with no one to guide, counsel or defend, was as new an experience as if he had really been the stripling that he is sometimes represented to have been. All the most significant chapters in life awaited him: self-determination, love, marriage, fatherhood, domestic provision and administration, adjustment of his relations with men, and above all a personal and independent religious experience.

Of these things, all were to come to him in the 20 years of absence from Canaan, and the last was to come first; for the dream of Jacob at Beth-el was of course but the opening scene in the long drama of God's direct dealing with Jacob. Yet it was the determinative scene, for God in His latest and fullest manifestation to Jacob was just "the God of Beth-el" (35 7; 48 3; 49 24).

With the arrival at Haran came love at once, though not for 7 years the consummation of that love. Its strength is naively indicated by the writer in two ways: impliedly in the sudden output of physical power at the well-side (29 10), and expressly in the patient years of toil for Rachel's sake, which "seemed unto him but a few days for the love he had to her" (29 20). Jacob is not primarily to be blamed for the polygamy that brought trouble into his home-life and sowed the seeds of division and jealousy in the nation of the future. Although much of Israel's history can be summed up in the rivalry of Leah and Rachel—Judah and Joseph—yet it was not Jacob's choice but Laban's fraud that introduced this cause of schism. At the end of his 7 years' labor Jacob received as wife not Rachel but Leah, on the belated plea that to give the younger daughter before the elder was not the custom of the country. This was the first of the "ten times" that Laban "changed the wages" of Jacob (31 7, 41). Rachel became Jacob's wife 7 days after Leah, and for this second wife he "served 7 other years." During these 7 years were born most of the sons and daughters (37 35) that formed the actual family, the nucleus of that large caravan that Jacob took back with him to Canaan. Dinah is the only daughter named; 30 21 is obviously in preparation for the story of ch 34 (see esp. 34 31). Four sons of Leah were the oldest: Reuben, with the right of primogeniture, Simeon, Levi and Judah. Next came the 4 sons of Bilhah and Zilpah, the personal slaves of the two wives (cf ABRAHAM, IV, 2); the two pairs of sons were probably of about the same age (cf order in ch 49). Leah's 5th and 6th sons were separated by an interval of uncertain length from her older group. And Joseph, the youngest son born in Haran, was Rachel's first child, equally beloved by his mother, and by his father for her sake (33 2; cf 44 20), as well as because he was the youngest of the eleven (37 3).

Jacob's years of service for his wives were followed by 6 years of service rendered for a stipulated wage. Laban's cunning in limiting the amount of this wage in a variety of ways was matched by Jacob's cunning in devising means to overreach his uncle, so that the penniless wanderer of 20 years before becomes the wealthy proprietor of countless cattle and of the hosts of slaves necessary for their care (32 10). At the same time the apology of Jacob for his conduct during this entire period of residence in Haran is spirited (31 36–42); it is apparently unanswerable by Laban (ver 43); and it is confirmed, both by the evident concurrence of Leah and Rachel (vs 14–16), and by indications in the narrative that the justice (not merely the partiality) of God gave to each party his due recompense: to Jacob the rich returns of skilful, patient industry; to Laban rebuke and warning (vs 5–13. 24, 29, 42).

The manner of Jacob's departure from Haran was determined by the strained relations between his uncle and himself. His motive in going, however, is represented as being fundamentally the desire to terminate an absence from his father's country that had already grown too long (31 30; cf 30 25)—a desire which in fact presented itself to him in the form of a revelation of God's own purpose and command (31 3). Unhappily, his clear record was stained by the act of another than himself, who nevertheless, as a member of his family, entailed thus upon him the burden of responsibility. Rachel, like Laban her father, was devoted to the superstition that manifested itself in the keeping and consulting of ṭrāphīm, a custom which, whether more nearly akin to fetishism, totemism, or ancestor-worship, was felt to be incompatible with the worship of the one true God. (Note that the "teraphim" of 31 19.34 f are the same as the "gods" of vs 30.32 and, apparently, of 35 2.4.) This theft furnished Laban with a pretext for pursuit. What he meant to do he probably knew but imperfectly himself. Coercion of some sort he would doubtless have brought to bear upon Jacob and his caravan, had he not recognized in a dream the God whom Jacob worshipped, and heard Him utter a word of warning against the use of violence. Laban failed to find his stolen gods, for his daughter was as crafty and ready-witted as he. The whole adventure ended in a formal reconciliation, with the usual sacrificial and memorial token (31 43–55).

After Laban, Esau. One danger is no sooner escaped than a worse threatens. Yet between them lies the pledge of Divine presence and protection in the vision of God's host at Mahanaim: just a simple statement, with none of the fanciful detail that popular story-telling loves, but the sober record of a tradition to which the supernatural was matter of fact. Even the longer passage that preserves the occurrence at Peniel is conceived in the same spirit. What the revelation of the host of God had not sufficed to teach this faithless, anxious, scheming patriarch, that God sought to teach him in the night-struggle, with its ineffaceable physical memorial of a human impotence that can compass no more than to cling to Divine omnipotence (32 22–32). The devices of crafty Jacob to disarm an offended and supposedly implacable brother proved as useless as that bootless wrestling of the night before; Esau's peculiar disposition was not of Jacob's making, but of God's, and to it alone Jacob owed his safety. The practical wisdom of Jacob dictated his insistence upon bringing to a speedy termination the proposed association with his changeable brother, amid the difficulties of a journey that could not be shared by such divergent social and racial elements as Esau's armed host and Jacob's caravan, without discontent on the one side and disaster on the other. The brothers part, not to meet again until they meet to bury their father at Hebron (35 29).

Before Jacob's arrival in the S. of Canaan where his father yet lived and where his own youth had been spent, he passed through a period of wandering in Central Pal, somewhat similar to that narrated of his grandfather Abraham. To any such nomad, wandering slowly from Aram toward Egypt, a period of residence in the region of Mt. Ephraim was a natural chapter in his book of travels. Jacob's longer stops, recorded for us, were (1) at Succoth, E. of the Jordan near Peniel, (2) at Shechem and (3) at Beth-el.

Nothing worthy of record occurred at Succoth, but the stay at Shechem was eventful. Gen 34, which tells the story of Dinah's seduction and her brother's revenge, throws as much light upon the relations of Jacob and the Canaanites, as does ch 14 or ch 23 upon Abraham's relations, or ch 26 upon Isaac's relations, with such settled inhabitants of the land. There is a strange blending of moral and immoral elements in Jacob and his family as portrayed in this contretemps. There is the persistent tradition of separateness from the Canaanites bequeathed from Abraham's day (ch 24), together with a growing family consciousness and sense of superiority (34 7.14.31). And at the same time there is indifference to their unique moral station among the envining tribes, shown in Dinah's social relations with them (ver 1), in the treachery and cruelty of Simeon and Levi (vs 25–29), and in Jacob's greater concern for the security of his possessions than for the preservation of his good name (ver 30).

It was this concern for the safety of the family and its wealth that achieved the end which dread of social absorption would apparently never have achieved—the termination of a long residence where there was moral danger for all. For a second time Jacob had fairly to be driven to Beth-el. Safety from his foes was again a gift of God (35 5), and in a renewal of the old forgotten ideals of consecration (vs 2–8), he and all his following move from the painful associations of Shechem to the hallowed associations of Beth-el. Here were renewed the various phases of all God's earlier communications to this patriarch and to his fathers before him. The new name of Israel, hitherto so ill deserved, is henceforth to find realization in his life; his fathers' God is to be his God; his seed is to inherit the land of promise, and is to be no mean tribe, but a group of peoples with kings to rule over them like the nations round about (35 9–12). No wonder that Jacob here raises anew his monument of stone—emblem of the "Stone of Israel" (49 24)—and stamps forever, by this public act, upon ancient Luz (35 6), the name of Beth-el which he had privately given it years before (28 19).

Losses and griefs characterized the family life of the patriarch at this period. The death of his mother's Syrian nurse at Beth-el (35 8; cf 24 59) was followed by the death of his beloved wife Rachel at Ephrath (35 19; 48 7) in bringing forth the youngest of his 12 sons, Benjamin. At about the same time the eldest of the 12, Reuben, forfeited the honor of his station in the family by an act that showed all too clearly the effect of recent association with Canaanites (35 22). Finally, death claimed Jacob's aged father, whose latest years had been robbed of the companionship, not only of this son, but also of the son whom his partiality had all but made a fratricide; at Isaac's grave in Hebron the ill-matched brothers met once more, thenceforth to go their separate ways, both in their personal careers and in their descendants' history (35 29).

Jacob now is by right of patriarchal custom head of all the family. He too takes up his residence at Hebron (37 14), and the story of the family fortunes is now pursued under the new title of "the generations of Jacob" (37 2). True, most of this story revolves about Joseph, the youngest of the family save Benjamin; yet the occurrence of passages like ch 38, devoted exclusively to Judah's affairs, or 46 8–27, the enumeration of Jacob's entire family through its secondary ramifications, or ch 49, the blessing of Jacob on all his sons—all these prove that Jacob, not Joseph, is the true center of the narrative until his death. As long as he lives he is the real head of his house, and not merely a superannuated veteran like Isaac. Not only Joseph, the boy of 17 (37 2), but also the self-willed elder sons, even a score of years later, come and go at his bidding (chs 42–45). Joseph's dearest thought, as it is his first thought, is for his aged father (43 7.27; 44 19; and esp. 45 3.9.13.23, and 46 29).

It is this devotion of Joseph that results in Jacob's migration to Egypt. What honors there Joseph can show his father he shows him: he presents him to Pharaoh, who for Joseph's sake receives him with dignity, and assigns him a home and sustenance for himself and all his people as honored guests of the land of Egypt (47 7-12). Yet in Beersheba, while en route to Egypt, Jacob had obtained a greater honor than this reception by Pharaoh. He had found there, as ready to respond to his sacrifices as ever to those of his fathers, the God of his father Isaac, and had received the gracious assurance of Divine guidance in this momentous journey, fraught with so vast a significance for the future nation and the world (46 1-4): God Himself would go with him into Egypt and give him, not merely the gratification of once more embracing his long-lost son, but the fulfilment of the covenant-promise (15 13-16) that he and his were not turning their backs upon Canaan forever. Though 130 years of age when he stood before Pharaoh, Jacob felt his days to have been "few" as well as "evil," in comparison with those of his fathers (47 9). And in fact he had yet 17 years to live in Goshen (47 28).

These last days are passed over without record, save of the growth and prosperity of the family. But at their close came the impartation of the ancestral blessings, with the last will of the dying patriarch. After adopting Joseph's sons, Manasseh and Ephraim, as his own, Jacob blesses them, preferring the younger to the elder as he himself had once been preferred to Esau, and assigns to Joseph the "double portion" of the firstborn—that "preeminence" which he denies to Reuben (48 22; 49 4). In poetry that combines with the warm emotion and glowing imagery of its style and the unsurpassed elevation of its diction, a lyrical fervor of religious sentiment which demands for its author a personality that had passed through just such a course of tuition as Jacob had experienced, the last words of Jacob, in ch 49, mark a turning-point in the history of the people of God. This is a translation of biography into prophecy. On the assumption that it is genuine, we may confidently aver that it was simply unforgettable by those who heard it. Its auditors were its theme. Their descendants were its fulfilment. Neither the one class nor the other could ever let it pass out of memory.

It was "by faith," we are well reminded, that Jacob "blessed" and "worshipped" "when he was dying" (He 11 21). For he held to the promises of God, and even in the hour of dissolution looked for the fulfilment of the covenant, according to which Canaan should belong to him and to his seed after him. He therefore set Joseph an example, by "giving commandment concerning his bones," that they might rest in the burial-place of Abraham and Isaac near Hebron. To the accomplishment of this mission Joseph and all his brethren addressed themselves after their father's decease and the 70 days of official mourning. Followed by a "very great company" of the notables of Egypt, including royal officials and representatives of the royal family, this Heb tribe carried up to sepulture in the land of promise the embalmed body of the patriarch from whom henceforth they were to take their tribal name, lamented him according to custom for 7 days, and then returned to their temporary home in Egypt, till their children should at length be "called" thence to become God's "son" (Hos 11 1) and inherit His promises to their father Jacob.

IV. Character and Beliefs.—In the course of this account of Jacob's career the inward as well as the outward fortunes of the man have somewhat appeared. Yet a more comprehensive view of the kind of man he was will not be superfluous at this point. With what disposition was he endowed—the natural nucleus for acquired characteristics and habits? Through what stages did he pass in the development of his beliefs and his character? In particular, what attitude did he maintain toward the most significant thing in his life, the promise of God to his house? And lastly, what resemblances may be traced in Israel the man to Israel the nation, of such sort that the one may be regarded as "typical" of the other? These matters deserve more than a passing notice.

From his father, Jacob inherited that domesticity and affectionate attachment to his home circle which appears in his life from beginning to end. He inherited shrewdness, initiative and resourcefulness from Rebekah—qualities which she shared apparently with her brother Laban and all his family. The conspicuous ethical faults of Abraham and Isaac alike are want of candor and want of courage. It is not surprising, therefore, to find the same failings in Jacob. Deceit and cowardice are visible again and again in the impartial record of his life. Both spring from unbelief. They belong to the natural man. God's transformation of this man was wrought by faith—by awakening and nourishing in him a simple trust in the truth and power of the Divine word. For Jacob was not at any time in his career indifferent to the things of the spirit, the things unseen and belonging to the future. Unlike Esau, he was not callous to the touch of God. Whether through inheritance, or as a fruit of early teaching, he had as the inestimable treasure, the true capital of his spiritual career, a firm conviction of the value of what God had promised, and a supreme ambition to obtain it for himself and his children. But against the Divine plan for the attainment of this goal by faith, there worked in Jacob constantly his natural qualities, the non-moral as well as the immoral qualities, that urged him to save himself and his fortunes by "works"—by sagacity, cunning, compromise, pertinacity—anything and everything that would anticipate God's accomplishing His purpose in His own time and His own way. In short, "the end justifies the means" is the program that, more than all others, finds illustration and rebuke in the character of Jacob.

Starting with such a combination of natural endowments, social, practical, ethical, Jacob passed through a course of Divine tuition, which, by building upon some of them, repressing others and transfiguring the remainder, issued in the triumph of grace over nature, in the transformation of a Jacob into an Israel. This tuition has been well analyzed by a recent writer (Thomas, Genesis, III, 204 f) into the school of sorrow, the school of providence and the school of grace. Under the head of sorrow, it is not difficult to recall many experiences in the career just reviewed: long exile; disappointment; sinful passions of greed, anger, lust and envy in others, of which Jacob was the victim; perplexity; and, again and again, bereavement of those he held most dear.

But besides these sorrows, God's providence dealt with him in ways most remarkable, and perhaps more instructive for the study of such Divine dealings than in the case of any other character in the OT. By alternate giving and withholding, by danger here and deliverance there, by good and evil report, now by failure of "best laid schemes" and now by success with seemingly inadequate means, God developed in him the habit—not native to him as it seems to have been in part to Abraham and to Joseph—of reliance on Divine power and guidance, of accepting the Divine will, of realizing the Divine nearness and faithfulness.

And lastly, there are those admirably graded lessons in the grace of God, that were imparted in the series of Divine appearances to the patriarch, at Beth-el, at Haran, at Peniel, at Beth-el again and at Beersheba. For if the substance of these Divine revelations be compared, it will be found that all are alike in the assurance (1) that God is with him to bless; (2) that the changes of his life are ordained of God and are for his ultimate good; and (3) that he is the heir of the ancestral promises.

It will further be found that they may be arranged in a variety of ways, according as one or another of the revelations be viewed as the climax. Thus (1), agreeing with the chronological order, the appearance at Beersheba may well be regarded as the climax of them all. Abraham had gone to Egypt to escape a famine (12 10), but he went without revelation, and returned with bitter experience of his error. Isaac essayed to go to Egypt for the same cause (26 1 f), and was prevented by revelation. Jacob now goes to Egypt, but he goes with the express approval of the God of his fathers, and with the explicit assurance that the same Divine providence which ordained this removal (50 20) will see that it does not frustrate any of the promises of God. This was a crisis in the history of the "Kingdom of God" on a par with events like the Exodus, the Exile, or the Return.

(2) In its significance for his personal history, the first of these revelations was unique. Beth-el witnessed Jacob's choice, evidently for the first time, of his fathers' God as his God. And though we find Jacob later tolerating idolatry in his household and compromising his religious testimony by sin, we never find a hint of his own unfaithfulness to this first and final religious choice. This is further confirmed by the attachment of his later revelations to this primary one, as though this lent them the significance of continuity, and made possible the unity of his religious experience. So at Haran it was the "God of Beth-el" who directed his return (31 13); at Shechem it was to Beth-el that he was directed, in order that he might at length fulfil his Beth-el vow, by erecting there an altar to the God who had there appeared to him (35 1); and at Beth-el finally the promise of former years was renewed to him who was henceforth to be Israel (vs 9-15).

(3) Though thus punctuated with the supernatural, the only striking bit of the marvelous in all this biography is the night scene at Peniel. And this too may justly be claimed as a climax in Jacob's development. There he first received his new name, and though he deserved it as little in many scenes thereafter as he had deserved it before, yet the same could be said of many a man who has "seen the face of God," but has yet to grasp, like Jacob, the lesson that the way to overcome is through the helpless but clinging impurity of faith.

(4) Rather than in any of the other scenes, however, it was at Beth-el the second time that the patriarch reached the topmost rung on the ladder of development. As already noticed, the substance of all the earlier revelations is here renewed and combined. It is no wonder that after this solemn theophany we find Jacob, like Moses later, "enduring as seeing him who is invisible" (He 11 27), and "waiting for the salvation" (Gen 49 18) of a God "who is not ashamed of him, to be called his God" (He 11 16), but is repeatedly called "the God of Jacob."

Finally, such a comparison of these revelations to Jacob reveals a variety in the way God makes Himself known. In the first revelation, naturally, the effort is made chiefly to impress upon its recipient the identity of the revealing God with the God of his fathers. And it has been remarked already that in the later revelations the same care is taken to identify the Revealer with the One who gave that first revelation, or else to identify Him, as then, with the God of the fathers. Yet, in addition to this, there is a richness and suitability in the Divine names revealed, which a mechanical theory of literary sources not only leaves unexplained but fails even to recognize. At Beth-el first it is Jeh, the personal name of this God, the God of his fathers, who enters into a new personal relation with Jacob; now, of all times in his career, he needs to know God by the differential mark that distinguishes Him absolutely from other gods, that there may never be confusion as to Jeh's identity. But this matter is settled for Jacob once for all. Thenceforth one of the ordinary terms for deity, with or without an attributive adjunct, serves to lift the patriarch's soul into communication with his Divine Interlocutor. The most general word of all in the Sem tongues for deity is 'Ēl, the word used in the revelations to Jacob at Haran (31 13), at Shechem (35 1), at Beth-el the second time (35 11) and at Beersheba (46 3). But it is never used alone. Like Allah in the Arab. language (=the God), so 'Ēl with the definite article before it serves to designate in Heb a particular divinity, not deity in general. Or else 'Ēl without the article is made definite by some genitive phrase that supplies the necessary identification: so in Jacob's case, El-beth-el (35 7; cf 31 13) or El-Elohe-Israel (33 20). Or, lastly, there is added to 'Ēl some determining title, with the force of an adjective, as Shaddai (tr<sup>d</sup> "Almighty") in 35 11 (cf 43 3). In clear distinction from this word, 'Ēl, with its archaic or poetic flavor, is the common Heb word for God, 'Ēlōhīm. But while 'Ēlōhīm is used regularly by the narrator of the Jacob-stories in speaking, or in letting his actors speak, of Jacob's God, who to the monotheistic writer is of course the God and his own God, he never puts this word thus absolutely into the mouth of the revealing Deity. Jacob can say, when he awakes from his dream, "This is the house of 'Ēlōhīm," but God says to him in the dream, "I am the God ['Ēlōhīm] of thy father" (28 17.13). At Mahanaim Jacob says, "This is the host of 'Ēlōhīm" (32 2), but at Beersheba God says to Jacob, "I am . . . the God ['Ēlōhīm] of thy father" (46 3). Such are the distinctions maintained in the use of these words, all of them used of the same God, yet chosen in each case to fit the circumstances of speaker, hearer and situation.

The only passage in the story of Jacob that might appear to be an exception does in fact but prove the rule. At Peniel the angel of God explains the new name of Israel by saying, "Thou hast striven with God ['Ēlōhīm] and with men, and hast prevailed." Here the contrast with "men" proves that 'Ēlōhīm without the article is just the right expression, even on the lips of Deity: neither Deity nor humanity has prevailed against Jacob (32 28).

Throughout the entire story of Jacob, therefore, his relations with Jeh his God, after they were once established (28 13-16), are narrated in terms that emphasize the Divinity of Him who had thus entered into covenant-relationship with him: His Divinity—that is to say, those attributes in which His Divinity manifested itself in His dealings with Jacob.

From the foregoing, two things appear with respect to Jacob's attitude toward the promise of God. First, with all his faults and

3. Attitude toward the Promise vices he yet was spiritually sensitive; he responded to the approaches of his God concerning things of a value wholly spiritual—future good, moral and spiritual blessings. And second, he was capable of progress in these matters; that is, his reaction to the Divine tuition would appear, if charted, as a series of elevations, separated one from another, to be sure, by low levels and deep declines, yet each one higher than the last, and all taken collectively lifting the whole average up and up, till in the end faith has triumphed over sight, the future over present good, a yet unpossessed but Divinely promised Canaan over all the comfort and honors of Egypt, and the aged patriarch lives only to "wait for Jeh's salvation" (49 18).

The contrast of Jacob with Esau furnishes perhaps the best means of grasping the significance of these two facts for an estimate of Jacob's attitude toward the promise. For in the first place, Esau, who possessed so much that Jacob lacked—directness, manliness, a sort of bonhomie, that made him superficially more attractive than his brother—Esau shows nowhere any real "sense" for things spiritual. The author of Hebrews has caught the man in the flash of a single word, "profane" (βέβηλος, bēbēlos)—of course, in the older, broader, etymological meaning of the term. Esau's desires dwelt in the world of the non-sacred; they did not aspire to that world of nearness to God, where one must 'put off the shoes from off his feet, because the place whereon he stands is holy ground.' And in the second place, there is no sign of growth in Esau. What we see him in his father's encampment, that we see him to the end—so far as appears from the laconic story. With the virtues as well as the vices of the man who lives for the present—forgiving when strong enough to revenge, condescending when flattered, proud of power and independent of parental control or family tradition—Esau is as impartially depicted by the sacred historian as if the writer had been an Edomite instead of an Israelite: the sketch is evidently true to life, both from its objectivity and from its coherence.

Now what Esau was, Jacob was not. His fault in connection with the promises of God, the family tradition, the ancestral blessing, lay not in despising them, but in seeking them in immoral ways. Good was his aim; but he was ready to "do evil that good might come." He was always tempted to be his own Providence, and God's training was clearly directed, both by providential leadings and by gracious disclosures, to this corresponding purpose: to enlighten Jacob as to the nature of the promise; to assure him that it was his by grace; to awaken personal faith in its Divine Giver; and to supplement his "faith" by that "patience" without which none can "inherit the promises." The faith that accepts was to issue at length in the faith that waits.

A nation was to take its name from Jacob-Israel, and there are some passages of Scripture where it is uncertain whether the name designates the nation or its ancestor. In their respective relations to God and to the world of men and nations, there is a true sense in which the father was a "type" of the children. It is probably only a play of fancy that would discover a parallel in their respective careers, between the successive stages of life in the father's home (Canaan), life in exile, a return, and a second exile. But it is not fanciful to note the resemblance between Jacob's character and that of his descendants. With few exceptions the qualities mentioned above (IV. 2) will be found, mutatis mutandis, to be equally applicable to the nation of Israel. And even that curriculum in which the patriarch learned of God may be viewed as a type of the school in which the Heb people—not all of them, nor even the mass, but the "remnant" who approximated to the ideal Israel of the prophets, the "servant of Jeh"—were taught the lessons of faith and patience, of renunciation and consecration, that appear with growing clearness on the pages of Isaiah, of Habakkuk, of Jeremiah, of Malachi. This is apparently Hosea's point of view in 12 2-4.12.

A word of caution, however, is needed at this point. There are limits to this equation. Even critics who regard Jacob under his title of Israel as merely the eponymous hero, created by legend to be the forefather of the nation (cf below, VI. 1), must confess that Jacob as Jacob is no such neutral creature, dressed only in the colors of his children's racial qualities. There is a large residuum in Jacob, after all parallelisms have been traced, that refuses to fit the lines of Heb national character or history, and his typical relation in fact lies chiefly in the direction of the covenant-inheritance, after the fashion of Malachi's allusion (Mal 1 2), interpreted by Paul (Rom 9 10-13).

V. References Outside of Genesis.—Under his two names this personage Jacob or Israel is more frequently mentioned than any other in the whole of sacred history. Yet in the vast majority of cases the nation descended from him is intended by the name, which in the form of "Jacob" or "Israel" contains not the slightest, and in the form "children of Israel," "house of Jacob" and the like, only the slightest, if any, allusion to the patriarch himself. But there still remain many passages in both Testaments where the Jacob or Israel of Gen is clearly alluded to.

There is a considerable group of passages that refer to him as the last of the patriarchal triumvirate—Abraham, Isaac and Jacob: so

1. In the OT particularly of Jeh as the "God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob," and of the covenant-oath as having been "sworn unto Abraham, Isaac and Jacob." And naturally the nation that is known by his name is frequently called by some phrase, equivalent to the formal b'nē yisrā'el, yet through its unusualness lending more significance to the idea of their derivation from him: so "seed of Jacob" and (frequently) "house of Jacob [Israel]." But there are a few OT passages outside of Gen in which so much of Jacob's history has been preserved, that from these allusions alone a fair notion might have been gathered concerning the Hebrews' tradition of their common ancestor, even if all the story in Gen had been lost. These passages are: Josh 24 3.4.32; Ps 105 10-23; Hos 12 2-4.12; Mal 1 2 f. Besides these, there are other allusions, scattered a word here and a sentence there, from all of which together we learn as follows. God gave to Isaac twin sons, Esau and Jacob, the latter at birth taking the former by the heel. God elected Jacob to be the recipient of the covenant-promise made to his father Isaac and to his grandfather Abraham; and this choice involved the rejection of Esau. Jeh appeared to Jacob at Beth-el and told him the land of Canaan was to be his and his seed's after him forever. Circumstances not explained caused Jacob to flee from his home in Canaan to Aram, where he served as a shepherd to obtain a wife as his wage. He became the father of 12 sons. He strove with the angel of God and prevailed amid earnest supplication. His name was by Jeh Himself changed to Israel. Under Divine protection as God's chosen one and representative, his life was that of a wanderer from place to place; once only he bought a piece of land, for a hundred pieces, near Shechem, from Hamor, the father of Shechem. A famine drove him down to Egypt, but not without providential preparation for the reception there of himself and all his family, through the remarkable fortunes of his son Joseph, sold, exiled, imprisoned, delivered, and exalted to a position where he could dispose of rulers and nations. In Egypt the children of Jacob multiplied rapidly, and at his death he made the sons of Joseph the heirs of the only portion of Canaanitish soil that he had acquired.

From this it appears, first, that not much that is essential in the biography of Jacob would have perished though Gen had been lost; and, second, that the sum of the incidental allusions outside Gen resemble the total impression of the narratives in Gen—in other words, that the Bib. tradition is self-consistent. And it runs back to a date (Hosca, 8th cent. BC) little farther removed from the events recounted than the length of time that separates our own day from the Norman conquest, or the Fall of Constantinople from the Hegira, or Jesus Christ from Solomon.

In the NT also there are, besides the references to Jacob simply as the father of his nation, several

2. In the NT passages that recall events in his life or traits of his character. These are: Jn 4 5.6.12; Acts 7 12.14-16; Rom 9 10-13; He 11 9.20 f. In the conversation between Jesus and the Samaritan woman it appears that the Samaritans cherished the association of Jacob with the ground he bought near Shechem, and with the well he dug while sojourning there with his sons and his flocks; they prided themselves on its transmission to them through Joseph, not to the hated Jews through Judah, and magnified themselves in magnifying Jacob's "greatness" and calling him "our father." Stephen's speech, as Luke reports it, includes in its rapid historical flight a hint or two about Jacob beyond the bare fact of his place in the tribal genealogy. Moved by the fame prevailing in Egypt and Canaan, Jacob twice dispatches his sons to buy grain in Egypt, and the second time Joseph is made known to his brothers, and his race becomes manifest to Pharaoh. At Joseph's behest, Jacob and all the family remove to Egypt. There all remain until their death, but the "fathers" (Joseph and his brethren; cf Jerome, Epistola cviii, ed. Migne) are buried in the family possession near Shechem. (Here emerges one of those divergences from the OT tradition that are a notable feature of Stephen's speech, and that have furnished occasion for much speculation upon their origin, value and implications. See comms. on Acts.) Paul's interest in Jacob appears in connection with his discussion of Divine election, where he calls attention to the oracle of Gen 25 23 and to the use already made of the passage by Malachi (1 2 f), and reminds his readers that this choice of Jacob and rejection of Esau was made by God even before these twin sons of Isaac and Rebecca were born. Finally, the author of He, when charting the heroes of faith, focuses his glass for a moment upon Jacob: first, as sharing with Abraham and Isaac the promise of God and the life of unworldly, expectant faith (He 11 9); and second, as receiving from Isaac, and at his death transmitting to his grandsons, blessings that had value only for one who worships and believes a God with power over "things to come" (vs 20 f).

VI. Modern Interpretations of Jacob.—For those who see in the patriarchal narratives anything—myth, legend, saga—rather than true biography, there is, of course, a different interpretation of the characters and events portrayed in the familiar Gen-stories, and a different value placed upon the stories themselves.

Apart from the allegorizing treatment accorded them by Philo the Jew and early Christian writers of like mind (see specimen in ABRAHAM), these views belong to modern criticism. To critics who make Heb history begin with the settlement of Canaan by the nomad Israelites fresh from the desert, even the Mosaic age and the Egypt residence are totally unhistorical—much more so these tales of a pre-Mosaic patriarchal age. Yet even those writers who admit the broad outlines of a residence of the tribes in Egypt, an exodus of some sort, and a founder of the nation named Moses, are for the most part skeptical of this cycle of family figures and fortunes in a remote age, with its nomads wandering between Mesopotamia and Canaan, and to and fro in Canaan, its circumstantial acquaintance with the names and relationships of each individual through those 4 long patriarchal generations, and its obvious foreshadowing of much that the later tribes were on this same soil to act out cents. later. This, we are told, is not history. Whatever else it may be, it is not a reliable account of such memorable events as compel their own immortality in the memories and through the written records of mankind.

The commonest view held, collectively of the entire narrative, specifically of Jacob, is that which sees here the precipitate from a pure

1. Personification of fortunes. Wellhausen, e.g., says (Prolegomena, 316): "The material here is not mythical, but national; therefore clearer [viz. than in Gen 1-11] and in a certain sense historical. To be sure there is no historical knowledge to be gained here about the patriarchs, but only about the time in which the stories concerning them arose in the people of Israel; this later time with its inward and outward characteristics is here unintentionally projected into the gray antiquity and mirrored therein like a glorified phantasm . . . [p. 318] Jacob is more realistically drawn than the other two [Abraham and Isaac]." In section IV, 4, above, we observed that, while many of Jacob's personal qualities prefigured the qualities of the later Heb people, there were some others that did not at all fit this equation. Wellhausen himself remarks this, in regard to the contrast between warlike Israel and the peaceful ancestors they invented for themselves. In his attempt to account for this contrast, he can only urge that a nation condemned to eternal wars would naturally look back upon, as well as forward to, a golden age of peace. (An alternative explanation he states, only to reject.) He fails to observe that this plea does not in the least alter the fact—his plea is indeed but a restatement of the fact—that this phenomenon is absolutely at variance with his hypothesis of how these stories of Jacob and the rest came to be what they are (see Meyer, Die Israeliten und ihre Nachbarn, 250 ff).

This general view, which when carried to its extreme implications (as by Steuernagel, Die Einwanderung der israelitischen Stämme in Kanaan, 1901) comes perilously near the reductio ad absurdum that is its own refutation, has been rejected by that whole

2. God and Demi-God group of critics, who, following Nöldeke, see in Jacob, as in so many others of the patriarchs, an original deity (myth), first abased to the grade of a hero (heroic legend), and at last degraded to the level of a clown (tales of jest or marvel). Adherents of this trend of interpretation differ widely among themselves as to details, but Jacob is generally regarded as a Canaanitish deity, whose local shrine was at Shechem, Beth-el or Peniel, and whose cult was taken over by the Hebrews, their own object of worship being substituted for him, and the outstanding features of his personality being made over into a hero that Israel appropriated as their national ancestor, even to the extent of giving him the secondary name of Israel. Stade attempted a combination of this "mythical" view with the "national" view in the interest of his theory of primitive animism, by making the patriarch a "mythological figure revered as an eponymous hero." This theory, in any form, requires the assumption, which there is nothing to support, that Jacob (or Jacob-el) is a name originally belonging to a deity and framed to fit his supposed character. At first, then, it meant "'El deceives" or "'El recompenses" (so B. Luther, ZATW, 1901, 60 ff; cf also the same writer, as well as Meyer himself, in the latter's Israeliten, etc, 109 ff, 271 ff). Meyer proposes the monstrosity of a nominal sentence with the tr, "'He deceives' is 'El.'" Thus the first element of the name Jacob came to be felt as the name itself (= "Jacob is God"), and it was launched upon its course of evolution into the human personage that Gen knows. It suffices to say with regard to all this, that in addition to its being inherently improbable—not to say, unproved—it goes directly in the face of the archaeological evidence adduced under I, 1, above. The simple fact that Jacob(-el) was a personal name for men, of everyday occurrence in the 2d-3d millenniums BC, is quite enough to overthrow this whole hypothesis; for, as Luther himself remarks (op. cit., 65), the above evolution of the name is essential to the "mythical" theory: "when this alteration took place cannot be told; yet it has to be postulated, since otherwise it remains inexplicable, how personal names could arise out of these formations [like Jacob-el] by rejection of the 'El.'" The inadequacy of the two theories hitherto advanced to account for the facts of Gen being thus evident, Gunkel and others have ex-

3. Character of Fiction plicitly rejected them and enunciated a third theory, which may be called the saga-theory. According to Gunkel, "to understand the persons of Gen as nations is by no means a general key to their interpretation"; and, "against the whole assumption that the principal patriarchal figures are originally gods is this fact first and foremost, that the names Jacob and Abraham are shown by the Bab to be customary personal names, and furthermore that the tales about them cannot be understood at all as echoes of original myths." In place of these discredited views Gunkel (cf also Gressmann, ZATW, 1910, 1 ff) makes of Jacob simply a character in the stories (marvelous, humorous, pathetic and the like) current in ancient Israel, esp. on the lips of the professional story-teller. Whereas much of the material in these stories came to the Hebrews from the Babylonians, Canaanites or Egyptians, Jacob himself is declared to have belonged to the old Heb saga, with its flavor of nomadic desert life and sheep-raising. "The original Jacob may be the sly shepherd Jacob, who fools the hunter Esau; another tale, of the deceit of a father-in-law by his son-in-law, was added to it—the more naturally because both are shepherds; a third cycle, about an old man that loves his youngest son, was transferred to this figure, and that youngest son received the name of Joseph at a time when Jacob was identified with Israel's assumed ancestor 'Israel.' Thus our result is, that the most important patriarchs are creations of fiction" (Schriften des AT, 5te Lieferung, 42).

It is so obvious that this new attitude toward the patriarchs lends itself to a more sympathetic criticism of the narrative of Gen, that critics who adopt it are at pains to deny any intention on their part of rehabilitating Jacob et al. as historical figures. "Saga," we are told, "is not capable of preserving through so many cents. a picture" of the real character or deeds of its heroes, even supposing that persons bearing these names once actually lived; and we are reminded of the contrast between the Etzel of saga and the Attila of history, the Dietrich of saga and the Theodoric of history. But as against this we need to note, first, that the long and involved course of development through which, ex hypothesi, these stories have passed before reaching their final stage (J, 9th cent. BC; Gunkel, op. cit., 8, 46) involves a very high antiquity for the earlier stages, and thus reduces to a narrow strip of time those "so many cents." that are supposed to separate the actual Jacob from the Jacob of saga (cf ABRAHAM, VII, 4); and second, that the presuppositions as to the origin, nature and value of saga with which this school of criticism operates are, for the most part, only an elaborate statement of the undisputed major premise in a syllogism, of which the minor premise is: the Gen-stories are saga. Against this last proposition, however, there lie many weighty considerations, that are by no means counterbalanced by those resemblances of a general sort which any student of comparative literature can easily discern (see also Baethgen, op. cit., 158). JAMES OSCAR BOYD

JACOB (יַעֲקֹב, ya'ākōbh; Ἰακώβ, Iakōb):

- (1) The patriarch (see preceding art.).
- (2) The father of Joseph the husband of Mary (Mt 1 15.16).
- (3) Patronymic denoting the Israelites (Isa 10 21; 14 1; Jer 10 16).

JACOB, TESTAMENT OF. See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.

JACOB'S WELL (πηγή τοῦ Ἰακώβ, pēgē tou Iakōb): In Jn 4 3 ff we read that Our Lord "left Judaea, and departed again into Galilee. And he must needs pass through Samaria. So he cometh to a city of Samaria, called Sychar, near to the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph: and Jacob's well was there." When Jacob came to Shechem on his return from Paddan-1. Position aram he encamped "before," i.e. E. of of Well the city, and bought the land on which he had spread his tent (Gen 33 18f).

This is doubtless the "portion" (Heb sh'khem) spoken of in Gen 48 22; although there it is said to have been taken with sword and bow from the Amorites. Where the pass of Shechem opens to the E., near the northern edge of the valley, lies the traditional tomb of Joseph. On the other side of the vale, close to the base of Gerizim, is the well universally known as Bir Ya'kūb, "the well of Jacob." The position meets perfectly the requirements of the narrative. The main road from the S. splits a little to the E., one arm leading westward through the pass, the other going more directly to the N. It is probable that these paths follow pretty closely the ancient tracks; and both would be frequented in Jesus' day. Which of them He took we cannot tell; but, in any case, this well lay in the fork between them, and could be approached with equal ease from either. See SYCHAR.

In the chapter quoted, it is said that Jacob dug the well (ver 12). The OT says nothing of this.

With the copious springs at 'Ain Askar and Balāṭā, one might ask why a well should have been dug here at all. We must remember that in the East, very strict laws have always governed the use of water, esp. when there were large herds to be considered. The purchase of land here may not have secured for Jacob such supplies as he required. There was danger of strife between rival herdsmen. The patriarch, therefore, may have dug the well in the interests of peace, and also to preserve his own independence.

Jew, Samaritan, Moslem and Christian agree in associating this well with the patriarch Jacob.

3. Consensus of Tradition This creates a strong presumption in favor of the tradition; and there is no good reason to doubt its truth. Standing at the brink of the well, overshadowed by the giant bulk of Gerizim, one feels how naturally it would be spoken of as "this mountain."

For long the well was unprotected, opening among the ruins of a vaulted chamber some feet below the surface of the ground. Major Anderson describes it (Recovery of Jerus, 465) as having "a narrow opening, just wide enough to allow the body of a man to pass through with arms uplifted, and this narrow neck, which is about 4 ft. long, opens into the well itself, which is cylindrically

4. Description shaped, and about 7 ft. 6 in. in diameter. The mouth and upper part of the well are built of masonry, and the well appears to have been sunk through a mixture of alluvial soil and limestone fragments, till a compact bed of mountain limestone was reached, having horizontal strata which could be easily worked; and the interior of the well presents the appearance of having been lined throughout with rough masonry." The depth was doubtless much greater in ancient times; but much rubbish has fallen into it, and now it is not more than 75 ft. deep. It is fed by no spring, nor is the water conducted to it along the surface, as to a cistern. Its supplies depend entirely upon rainfall and percolation. Possibly, therefore, the water may never have approached the brim. The woman says "the well is deep." Pēgē, "spring," does not, therefore, strictly apply to it, but rather "tank" or "reservoir," phréar, the word actually used in vs 11 f. The modern inhabitants of Nablūs highly esteem the "light" water of the well as compared with the "heavy" or "hard" water of the neighboring springs. It usually lasts till about the end of May; then the well is dry till the return of the rain. Its contents, therefore, differ from the "living" water of the perennial spring.

From the narratives of the pilgrims we learn that at different times churches have been built over the well. The Moslems probably demolished the last of them after the overthrow of the Crusaders in 1187. A description of the ruins with drawings, as they were 30 years ago, is given in PEF, II, 174, etc. A stone found in 1881 may have been the original cover of the well. It measures 3 ft. 9 in. X 2 ft. 7 in. X 1 ft. 6 in. The aperture in the center is 13 in. in diameter; and in its sides are grooves worn by the ropes used in drawing up the water (PEFS, 1881, 212 ff.).

Some years ago the plot of ground containing the well was purchased by the authorities of the Gr church, and it has been surrounded by

5. Present Condition a wall. A chapel has been built over the well, and a large church is being erected beside it. W. EWING

JACUBUS, ja-kū'bus (Ἰάκουβος, Iákoubos; B reads Iarsoúboos): In 1 Esd 9 48 = "Akkub" in Neh 8 7, a Levite who helped in the exposition of the law.

JADA, jā'da (יָדָא, yādhā, "the knowing one"): Son of Onam and grandson of Jerahmeel by his wife Atarah (1 Ch 2 26.28.32).

JADAU, jā'dō, ja-dā'ū (יָדָא, yiddō, Kthibh; יָדָא, yadday, K<sup>rē</sup> AV; but RV IDDO): In Ezr 10 43, one of those who had married foreign wives. RVm has "Jaddai" (= "Edos," 1 Esd 9 35). See IDDO.

JADDAI, jad'ī, jad'ā-i. See IDDO; JADAU.

JADDUA, jad'ū-a, ja-dū'a (יָדָא, yaddū'a, "known"):

(1) One of the "chiefs of the people" who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant, thus signifying their voluntary acceptance of the law and their solemn promise to submit to its yoke (Neh 10 21 [Heb 22]).

(2) Son of Jonathan or Johanan, and great-grandson of Eliashib, the high priest in Nehemiah's time (Neh 12 11.22). He is the last of the high priests mentioned in the OT, and held office during the reign of Darius the Pers, i.e. Darius III Codomannus, the last king of Persia (336-332 BC), who was overthrown by Alexander the Great. It is doubtless to him that Jos refers in his romantic account of Alexander's entrance into Jerus (Ant, XI, viii, 4 f; vii, 2; viii, 7). JAMES CRICHTON

JADDUS, jad'us (Β, Ἰαδδούς, Iaddoús; A, Ἰοδ-δούς, Ioddous): AV has "Addus" = Barzillai (Ezr 2 61; Neh 7 63). J. was removed from the office of the priesthood because he could not prove his right to it after the return to Jerus under Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 38). He is called Barzillai in the OT, because he married Augia, the daughter of Zorzelleus (Barzillai the Gileadite, in the OT). Cf BARZILLAI.

JADON, jā'don (יָדֹן, yādhōn, perhaps "he will judge" or "plead"): One who helped to rebuild the wall of Jerus in company with the men of Gibeon and of Mizpah (Neh 3 7). He is called the "Meronothite," and another Meronothite is referred to in 1 Ch 27 30, but there is no mention of a place Meronoth. Jadon is the name given by Jos (Ant, VIII, viii, 5; ix, 1) to "the man of God" from Judah who confronted Jeroboam as he burned incense at the altar in Bethel, and who was afterward deceived by the lie of the old prophet (1 K 13). Jos may probably have meant Iddo the seer, whose visions concerning Jeroboam (2 Ch 9 29) led to his being identified in Jewish tradition with "the man of God" from Judah. JAMES CRICHTON

JAEL, jā'el (יָעֵל, ya'el, "a wild or mountain goat," as in Ps 104 18; יָעֵל, Ia'el): The wife of Heber the Kenite and the slayer of Sisera (Jgs 4 17-22; 5 2-31). Jael emerges from obscurity by this single deed, and by the kindest construction can hardly be said to have reached an enviable fame. The history of this event is clear. For years Jabin the king of Canaan had oppressed Israel. For twenty years the Israelites had been subject to him, and, in largest measure, the instrument of their subjugation had been Sisera, the king's general, the "man of the iron chariots." Deborah, a prophetess of Israel, by her passion for freedom, had roused the tribes of Israel to do battle against Sisera. They defeated him at "Taanach by the waters of Megiddo," but Sisera sought in flight to save himself. He came to the "oaks of the wanderers," where the tribe of Heber lived. Here he sought, and was probably invited, to take shelter in the tent of Jael (4 17-18). There are two accounts of the subsequent events—one a prose narrative (4 19-22), the other a poetic one, found in Deborah's song of triumph (5 24-27). The two accounts are as nearly in agreement as could be expected, considering their difference in form.

It is evident that the tribe of Heber was regarded by both parties to the struggle as being neutral. They were descendants of Jethro, and hence had the confidence of the Israelites. Though they had suffered somewhat at the hands of the Canaanites they had made a formal contract of peace with Jabin. Naturally Sisera could turn to the tents of Heber in Kedesh-naphtali with some confidence. The current laws of hospitality gave an added element of safety. Whether Jael met Sisera and urged him to enter her tent and rest (4 18), or only invited him after his appeal for refuge, the fact remains that he was her guest, was in the sanctuary of her home, and protected by the laws of hospitality. She gave him milk to drink, a mantle for covering, and apparently acquiesced in his request that she should stand guard at the tent and deny his presence to any pursuers. When sleep came to the wearied fugitive she took a "tent-pin, and took a hammer in her hand, and went softly unto him, and smote the pin into his temples" (ver 21), and having murdered him, goes forth to meet Barak the Israelitish general and claims the credit for her deed. Some critics suggest that Sisera was not asleep when murdered, and thus try to convert Jael's treachery into strategy. But to kill your guest while he is drinking the milk of hospitality is little less culpable than to murder him while asleep. There is no evidence that Sisera offered Jael any insult or violence, and but little probability that she acted under any spiritual or Divine suggestion. It is really impossible to justify Jael's act, though it is not impossible to understand it or properly to appreciate Deborah's approval of the act as found in 5 24. The motive of Jael may have been a mixed one. She may have been a sympathizer with Israel and with the religion of Israel. But the narrative scarcely warrants the interpretation that she felt herself as one called to render "stern justice on an enemy of God" (Expositor's Bible). Jael was unquestionably prudential. Sisera was in flight and Barak in pursuit. Probably her sympathy was with Barak, but certainly reflection would show her that it would not be wisdom to permit Barak to find Sisera in her tent. She knew, too, that death would be Sisera's portion should he be captured—therefore she would kill him and thus cement a friendship with the conqueror.

As to Deborah's praise of Jael (5 24), there is no call to think that in her hour of triumph she was either capable of or intending to appraise the moral quality of Jael's deed. Her country's enemy was dead and that too at the hand of a woman. The woman who would kill Sisera must be the friend of Israel. Deborah had no question of the propriety of meting out death to a defeated persecutor. Her times were not such as to raise this question. The method of his death mattered little to her, for all the laws of peace were abrogated in the times of war. Therefore Jael was blessed among women by all who loved Israel. Whether Deborah thought her also to be worthy of the blessing of God we may not tell. At any rate there is no need for us to try to justify the treachery of Jael in order to explain the words of Deborah.

JAGUR, jā'gur (יָגוּר, yāghūr): An unidentified town on the Edomite frontier of Judah in the S. (Josh 15 21).

JAH, jā. See GOD, NAMES OF.

JAHATH, jā'hath (יָחַת, yahath, perhaps for יָחַתָּה, yahthēh, יָחַתָּה, yahāthēh, "he [God] will snatch up"):

(1) Son of Reaiah, son of Shobal, a descendant of Judah, and father of Ahumai and Lahad, the families of the Zorathites (1 Ch 4 2).

(2) A frequent name for a descendant of Levi:

(a) Son of Libni, son of Gershom, the eldest son of Levi (1 Ch 6 20.43 [Heb 6 5.28], where "son of Libni" is omitted).

(b) Son of Shimei, son of Gershom (1 Ch 23 10f).

(c) One of the "sons" of Shelomoth, a descendant of Izhar, son of Kohath, the second son of Levi (1 Ch 24 22).

(d) A descendant of Merari, the third son of Levi, and an overseer in the repairing of the temple in the reign of Josiah (2 Ch 34 12). JAMES CRICHTON

JAHAZ, jā'haz (יָחָז, yahaz, Isa 15 4; Jer 48 34, יָחָזָה, yahāzhāh, or יָחָזָה, yahzhāh, Nu 21 23; Dt 2 32; Josh 13 18; 21 36, AV "Jahazah"; Jgs 11 20; Jer 48 21; 1 Ch 6 78, "Jahzah"): This is the place where in a great battle Israel overwhelmed Sihon king of the Amorites, and then took possession of all his territory (Nu 21 23, etc). It is named along with Beth-baal-meon and Kedemoth (Josh 13 18), with Kedemoth (21 37) pointing to a position in the S.E. of the Amorite territory. It was given to Reuben by Moses, and was one of the cities in the portion of that tribe assigned to the Merarite Levites. Mesha (MS, ll. 18 ff) says that the king of Israel dwelt in Jahaz when at war with him. Mesha drove him out, and the city passed into the hands of Moab. It is referred to as a city of Moab in Isa 15 4; Jer 48 21. 34. Cheyne thinks that either Jahaz or Kedemoth must be represented today by the important ruins of Umm er-Reṣās, about 2½ hours N. of Dibon toward the desert (EB, s.v.). No certain identification is possible.

JAHAZIAH, jā-ha-zī'a: AV for JAHZEIAH (q.v.).

JAHAZIEL, ja-hā'zi-el (יָחֲזִי'ֵל, yahāzī'ēl, "God sees"):

(1) In 1 Ch 12 4 (Heb ver 5), one of David's recruits at Ziklag, a Benjamite or maybe a Judaeen.

(2) In 1 Ch 16 6, one of two priests appointed by David to sound trumpets before the ark on its journey to Jerus. LXX B, A, read "Uzzziel."

(3) In 1 Ch 23 19; 24 23, a Levite, "son" of Hebron, a Kohathite. Kittel, following LXX, reads "Uzzziel."

(4) In 2 Ch 20 14, an Asaphite, son of Zechariah. He encouraged King Jehoshaphat of Judah and his subjects to fight against the Moabite and Ammonite invaders.

(5) In Ezr 8 5, an ancestor of one of the families of the Restoration. Read probably "of the sons of Zattu, Sheconiah the son of J," following 1 Esd 8 32 (=Jezelus). DAVID FRANCIS ROBERTS

JAHDAI, jā'dā-i, jā'dī (יָחְדָּי, yahday, "Jeh leads" [?]; Baer reads יָחְדָּי, yehday): In 1 Ch 2 47, where six sons of J. are mentioned. "The name has been taken as that of another wife or concubine of Caleb; more probably Jahdai is a descendant of Caleb, whose name, in the original connection, has fallen from the text" (Curtis, Ch, 96).

JAHDIEL, jā'di-el (יָחְדִּי'ֵל, yahdī'ēl, "God gives joy"): In 1 Ch 5 24, head of a Manassite family.

JAHDO, jā'dō (יָחְדּוֹ, yahdō, meaning uncertain; Kittel suggests יָחְדָּי, yahday = Jahdai): In 1 Ch 5 14, a Gileadite.

JAHLEEL, jā'lē-el (יָחְלֵ'ֵל, yahl'ēl, "wait for God!"): In Gen 46 14; Nu 26 26, a "son" (i.e. clan) of Zebulun.

JAHLEELITES, jā'lē-el-īts, THE (יָחְלֵ'ֵלִים, yahlē'ēlīm, coll. with art.): In Nu 26 26, the descendants of the clan of Jahleel.

JAHMAI, jā'mā-i, jā'mī (יָחְמִי, yahmay, perhaps יָחְמִי'ֵל, yahm'yāh, "may Jeh protect!"): In 1 Ch 7 2, head of a clan of Issachar.

JAHWEH, yā'we. See GOD, NAMES OF.

JAHZAH, jā'za. See JAHAZ.

JAHZEEL, jā'zē-el (יָחְזֵ'ֵל, yahzē'ēl, "God divides," "apportions"): In Gen 46 24; Nu 26 48; and 23 MSS in 1 Ch 7 13; and JAHZIEL (יָחְזֵ'ֵל, yahzē'ēl, same meaning as above): 1 Ch 7 13, a "son" (clan) of Naphtali.

JAHZEELITES, jā'zē-el-its, THE (יְהִזְעֵלִים, yahzē-ēlīm, coll. with art.): In Nu 26 48, descendants of the clan of Jahzeel.

JAHZEIAH, jā-zē'ya, jā'zē-ya (יְהִזְעִיָּה, yahzē-yāh, "Jeh sees"): In Ezr 10 15, son of Tikvah, and a contemporary of Ezra. It is disputed whether he and Jonathan opposed or supported Ezra in the matter of prosecuting those who had married foreign wives=Ezekias, 1 Esd 9 14, or Ezias. See JONATHAN, 9.

Two translations of the Heb phrase קָמַד עַל-זֵהָרָה, 'āmādh 'āl-zō'h) are given: (1) "stood over this matter," i.e. supported Ezra; so AV ("were employed in this matter"), and so LXX, 1 Esd 9 14, RvM. This is supported by ver 4, "Let now our princes be appointed for all the assembly," where the same phrase is found. (2) RV "stood up against this matter," so BDB, Gesenius, Bertheau, Stade. Both translations can be supported by [s] in Heb. The context is better suited by the former rendering.

JAHZERAH, jā'zē-ra, jā-zē'ra (יְהִזְרָה, yahzērāh, meaning unknown): In 1 Ch 9 12, an ancestor of Maasai and apparently="Ahzai" of Neh 11 13.

JAHZIEL, jā'zi-el. See JAHZEEL.

JAILOR, jā'l'ēr. See PRISON.

JAIR, jā'ēr:

(1) Jair (יָאִיר, yā'ir, "he enlightens" or "one giving light"):

(a) Son, i.e. descendant of Manasseh (Nu 32 41; Dt 3 14; Josh 13 30; 1 K 4 13; 1 Ch 2 22 f). According to 1 Ch 2 21 f he was the son of Segub, son of Hezron, a descendant of Judah, who married the daughter of Machir, son of Manasseh. He was thus descended both from Judah and Manasseh. At the time of the conquest he distinguished himself by taking the tent-villages HAVVOTH-JAIR (q.v.). The accounts of his exploit are difficult to harmonize (see ICC on above passages). Some would identify him with the Jair of Jgs 10 3, holding that Manasseh's settlement in Northern Gilead and Bashan took place, not before Israel's passage of the Jordan, but after the settlement of the tribe on the W. For a criticism of this view see HGHL, 577, n.

(b) One of the judges. He is said to have had 30 sons, who rode on 30 ass colts, and who had as many cities, known as Havvoth-jair (Jgs 10 3.4). One tradition identifies (a) and (b). Others reconcile the two narratives by interpreting the word "son" in a non-literal sense.

(c) The father of Mordecai (Est 2 5). In the Apoc (Ad Est 11 2) his name is given as "Jairus" (Ίάειρος, Iáeios).

(2) Jair (יָאִיר, yā'ir, "he arouses"; Kethibh יָאִיר, yā'ūr; a different name from [1] above): The father of Elhanan, the giant-slayer (1 Ch 20 5). In the || passage (2 S 21 19) his name is given as "Jaare-oregim," but the text should be corrected to Jair, "oregim" (ōrghīm) having crept in from the line below through a copyist's error.

JAMES CRICHTON

JAIRITE, jā'ēr-it (יָאִירִי, yā'irī, "of Jair"): In 2 S 20 26, Ira the Jairite is "chief minister unto David." He was a descendant of Jair who was a Manassite (Nu 32 41, etc) and whose territory was in Gilead. LXX Luc and Syr suggest יַאֲתִירִי, yattirī, "Jattirite," i.e. a native of Jattir mentioned in 1 S 30 27 as one of the towns friendly to David when he was in Ziklag. It is not improbable that a native of Jattir would be given such a post by David. See IRA, and cf 2 S 23 38.

JAIRUS, jā'i-rus, jā-i'rus (Ίάειρος, Iáeios; 1 Esd 5 31; Ad Est 11 2). See AIRUS; JAIR.

JAIRUS, jā'i-rus, jā-i'rus (Ίάειρος, Iáeios): A ruler in a synagogue near Capernaum whose only daughter, aged about 12 years, was raised from the dead by Jesus (Mt 9 18-26; Mk 5 22-43; Lk 8 41-56). The accounts of the miracle are substantially the same, but vary in detail. According to Mk and Lk the arrival of Jairus in Capernaum fell immediately after the return of Jesus from Gadara, but according to Mt the sequence of events was that Jesus had returned to Capernaum, had called Matthew, had joined the feast of the publicans, and had just finished His discourse on fasting when Jairus came to Him. Mt and Mk both testify to the great faith of Jairus, who besought of Jesus that He should but lay His hand upon the maid and she should live. According to Mt she was already dead when Jairus came to Capernaum; according to the others she was on the point of death; but all agree as to her death before the arrival of Jesus and His followers at her abode. Mt implies that Jesus alone was present at the actual raising; Mk and Lk state that Peter, James, John and the parents were also there. The healing of the woman with the issue of blood by Jesus on the way is given by all.

JAKAN, jā'kan (יָאֵקָן, yā'ākān). See JAAKAN.

JAKEH, jā'ke (יָאֵקֶה, yākeh, perhaps from Arab. root meaning "carefully religious"; יָאֵקֶה, yākeh, as if from יָאֵקֶה, yākeh): The father of Agur, the author of the sayings recorded in Prov 30 1. Nothing is known of either Jakeh or Agur. The immediate connection in the Heb text of ha-massā, "the prophecy" or "burden" (AV "even the prophecy," RV "the oracle") with n'um, "oracle" (AV "spake," RV "saith") is quite exceptional, while the ver is unintelligible and the text, as the LXX shows, is evidently corrupt. The best emendation is that which changes ha-massā, "the prophecy," into ha-massā'i, "the Massaites," or into mimmassā, "of Massa" (RVm), Massa being the name of the country of an Ishmaelite tribe (cf Gen 25 14; 1 Ch 1 30; Prov 31 1 RVm). See AGUR.

JAKIM, jā'kim (יָאֵכִים, yā'kīm, "he [God] lifteth up"; cf ELIAKIM):

(1) A Benjamite, a son of Shimei (1 Ch 8 19).

(2) A priest, the head of the 12th of the 24 courses into which the priests were divided (1 Ch 24 12).

JALAM, jā'lam (יָאֵלָם, yā'lām, according to BDB following LXX Ίεγλόμ, Ieglóm, in Gen, from יָאֵלָם, 'ālām, meaning "to conceal"; according to Gunkel, Gen<sup>3</sup>, 390, from יָאֵל, yā'el, "mountain-goat"; see HPN, 90, n. 5; AV Jaalam): In Gen 36 5.14.18; 1 Ch 1 35, a son of Esau, mentioned as the 2d son by Oholibamah; probably an Edomite clan.

JALON, jā'lon (יָאֵלֹן, yā'lōn, meaning unknown): In 1 Ch 4 17, a son of Ezrah, a Judahite.

JAMBRES, jam'brēz. See JANNES AND JAMBRES.

JAMBRI, jam'bri (οἱ υἱοὶ Ἰαμβρεῖν, hoi huiot Iambrein; 1 Macc 9 36-41): The sons of Jambri are said to have come out of Medeba (originally Med'ba), a city of the Moabites, and subsequently a possession of the Amorites, and to have carried off John, the brother of Jonathan, who succeeded Judas Maccabaeus as leader of the Jews. The Israelites got possession of the place and assigned it to the tribe of Reuben. No mention is made elsewhere of the Jambri. In Jos (Ant, XIII, i, 2) they are called "sons of Amaraeus."

JAMES, jāmx (Ἰάκωβος, Iácōbos): English form of Jacob, and the name of 3 NT men of note:

(1) The Son of Zebedee, one of the Twelve Apostles (ὁ τοῦ Ζεβεδαίου, ho toú Zebedaíou):

1. In NT.—To the Synoptists alone are we indebted for any account of this James. He was the son of Zebedee and the brother of John (Mt 4 21; Mk 1 19; Lk 5 10). As the Synoptists generally place the name of James before that of John, and allude to the latter as "the brother of James," it is inferred that James was the elder of the two brothers. His mother's name was probably Salome, the sister of the mother of Jesus (cf Mt 27 56; Mk 15 40; Jn 19 25), but this is disputed by some (cf BRETHREN OF THE LORD).

J. was a fisherman by trade, and worked along with his father and brother (Mt 4 21). According to Lk, these were partners with Simon (5 10), and this is also implied in Mk (1 19). As they owned several boats and employed hired servants (Lk 5 11; Mk 1 20), the establishment they possessed must have been considerable.

The call to J. to follow Christ (Mt 4 18–22; Mk 1 16–20; Lk 5 1–11) was given by Jesus as He was walking by the sea of Galilee (Mt 4 18). There He saw "James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother, in the boat with Zebedee their father, mending their nets; and he called them. And they straightway left the boat and their father, and followed him" (Mt 4 21, 22). The account of Lk varies in part from those of Mt and Mk, and contains the additional detail of the miraculous draught of fishes, at which J. and John also were amazed. This version of Lk is regarded by some as an amalgamation of the earlier accounts with Jn 21 1–8.

As the above incident took place after the imprisonment of John the Baptist, when Jesus had departed into Galilee (Mt 4 12; Mk 1 14), and as there is no mention of J. among those who received the preliminary call recorded by John (cf Jn 1 35–51; 3 24, and cf ANDREW), it is probable that while Peter and Andrew made the pilgrimage to Bethany, J. and the other partners remained in Galilee to carry on the business of their trade. Yet, on the return of Peter and Andrew, the inquiries of J. must have been eager concerning what they had seen and heard. His mind and imagination became filled with their glowing accounts of the newly found "Lamb of God" (Jn 1 36) and of the preaching of John the Baptist, until he inwardly dedicated his life to Jesus and only awaited an opportunity to declare his allegiance openly. By this is the apparently abrupt nature of the call, as recorded by the Synoptists, to be explained. After a period of companionship and probationership with his Master, when he is mentioned as being present at the healing of Simon's wife's mother at Capernaum (Mk 1 29–31), he was ordained one of the Twelve Apostles (Mt 10 2; Mk 3 17; Lk 6 14; Acts 1 13).

From this time onward he occupied a prominent place among the apostles, and, along with Peter and John, became the special confidant of Jesus. These three alone of the apostles were present at the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mk 5 37; Lk 8 51), at the Transfiguration (Mt 17 1–8; Mk 9 2–8; Lk 9 28–36), and at the Agony in the Garden of Gethsemane (Mt 26 36–46; Mk 14 32–42). Shortly after the Transfiguration, when Jesus, having "stedfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem" (Lk 9 51), was passing through Samaria, the ire of J. and John was kindled by the ill reception accorded to Him by the populace (Lk 9 53). They therefore asked of Jesus, "Lord, wilt thou that we bid fire to come down from heaven, and consume them?" (Lk 9 54). "But he turned, and rebuked them" (ver 55). It was probably this hot-headed impetuosity and fanaticism that won for them the surname "Boanerges, which is, Sons of thunder," bestowed on them when they were ordained to the Twelve (Mk 3 17). Yet upon this last occasion, there was some excuse for their action. The impression left by the Transfiguration was still deep upon them, and they felt strongly that their Lord, whom they had lately beheld "in his glory" with "countenance altered" and "glistering raiment," should be subjected to such indignities by the Samaritans. Upon the occasion of Jesus' last journey to Jerus (Mk 10 32), the two brothers gave expression to this presumptuous impetuosity in a more selfish manner (Mk 10 35–45). Presuming on their intimacy with Jesus, they made the request of him, "Grant unto us that we may sit, one on thy right hand, and one on thy left hand, in thy glory" (Mk 10 37). In the account of Mt (20 20–28), the words are put in the mouth of their mother. The request drew forth the rebuke of Jesus (Mk 10 38), and moved the ten with indignation (Mk 10 40); but by the words of their Lord peace was again restored (Mk 10 42–45). After the arrival of Jesus in Jerus, when He "sat on the mount of Olives over against the temple," J. was one of the four who put the question to Him concerning the last things (Mk 13 3, 4). He was also present when the risen Jesus appeared for the 3d time to the disciples and the miraculous draught of fishes was made at the sea of Tiberias (Jn 21 1–14).

J. was the first martyr among the apostles, being slain by King Herod Agrippa I about 44 AD, shortly before Herod's own death.

5. Death The vehemence and fanaticism which were characteristic of J. had made him to be feared and hated among the Jewish enemies of the Christians, and therefore when "Herod the king put forth his hands to afflict certain of the church . . . he killed J. the brother of John with the sword" (Acts 12 1, 2). Thus did J. fulfil the prophecy of Our Lord that he too should drink of the cup of his Master (Mk 10 39).

II. In Apocryphal Literature.—According to the "Genealogies of the Twelve Apostles" (cf Budge, Contendings of the Apostles, II, 49), "Zebedee was of the house of Levi, and his wife of the house of Judah. Now, because the father of James loved him greatly he counted him among the family of his father Levi, and similarly because the mother of John loved him greatly, she counted him among the family of her father Judah. And they were surnamed 'Children of Thunder,' for they were of both the priestly house and of the royal house." The Acts of St. John, a heretical work of the 2d cent., referred to by Clement of Alexandria in his Hypotyposis and also by Eusebius (HE, III, 25), gives an account of the call of J. and his presence at the Transfiguration, similar in part to that of the Gospels, but giving fantastic details concerning the supernatural nature of Christ's body, and how its appearances brought confusion to J. and other disciples (cf Hennecke, Handbuch zu den neutestamentlichen Apokryphen, 423–59). The Acts of St. James in India (cf Budge, II, 295–303) tells of the missionary journey of J. and Peter to India, of the appearance of Christ to them in the form of a beautiful young man, of their healing a blind man, and of their imprisonment, miraculous release, and their conversion of the people. According to the Martyrdom of St. James (Budge, II, 304–8), J. preached to the 12 tribes scattered abroad, and persuaded them to give their first-fruits to the church instead of to Herod. The accounts of his trial and death are similar to that in Acts 12 1–2.

J. is the patron saint of Spain. The legend of his preaching there, of his death in Judaea, of the transportation of his body under the guidance of angels to Iria and of the part that his miraculous appearances played in the history of Spain, is given in Mrs. Jameson's Sacred and Legendary Art, I, 230-41.

(2) James the son of Alphaeus ( $\delta \tau \omicron \upsilon \alpha \lambda \phi \alpha \iota \omicron \upsilon$ , ho tou Alphaiou; for etymology, etc., of James, see above): One of the Twelve Apostles (Mt 10 3; Mk 3 18; Lk 6 15; Acts 1 13). By Mt and Mk he is coupled with Thaddaeus, and by Lk and Acts with Simon Zelotes. As Matthew or Levi is also called the son of Alphaeus (cf Mt 9 9; Mk 2 14), it is possible that he and James were brothers. According to the Genealogies of the Apostles (cf Budge, Contentings of the Apostles, II, 50), James was of the house of Gad. The Martyrdom of St. James, the son of Alphaeus (cf Budge, ib, 264-66) records that James was stoned by the Jews for preaching Christ, and was "buried by the Sanctuary in Jerus."

This James is generally identified with James the Little or the Less, the brother of Josès and son of Mary (Mt 27 56; Mk 15 40). In Jn 19 25 this Mary is called the wife of Cleophas (AV) or Clopas (RV), who is thus in turn identified with Alphaeus. There is evidence in apocryphal lit. of a Simon, a son of Clopas, who was also one of the disciples (cf NATHANAEL). If this be the same as Simon Zelotes, it would explain why he and James (i.e. as being brothers) were coupled together in the apostolic lists of Lk and Acts. Some have applied the phrase "his mother's sister" in Jn 19 25 to Mary the wife of Clopas, instead of to a separate person, and have thus attempted to identify James the son of Alphaeus with James the brother of Our Lord. For a further discussion of the problem, see BRETHREN OF THE LORD.

(3) James, "the Lord's brother" ( $\delta \alpha \delta \epsilon \lambda \phi \omicron \varsigma \tau \omicron \upsilon \kappa \upsilon \rho \iota \omicron \upsilon$ , ho adelphos tou Kurion):

I. NT References.—This James is mentioned by name only twice in the Gospels, i.e. when, on the visit of Jesus to Nazareth, the countrymen of Our Lord referred in contemptuous terms to His earthly kindred, in order to disparage His preaching (Mt 13 55; Mk 6 3). As J. was one of "his brethren," he was probably among the group of Christ's relatives who sought to interview Him during His tour through Galilee with the Twelve (Mt 12 46). By the same reasoning, he accompanied Jesus on His journey to Capernaum (Jn 2 12), and joined in attempting to persuade Him to depart from Galilee for Judaea on the eve of the Feast of Tabernacles (Jn 7 3). At this feast J. was present (7 10), but was at this time a non-believer in Jesus (cf 7 5, "Even his brethren did not believe on him").

Yet the seeds of conversion were being sown within him, for, after the crucifixion, he remained in Jerus with his mother and brethren, and formed one of that earliest band of believers who "with one accord continued stedfastly in prayer" (Acts 1 14). While there, he probably took part in the election of Matthias to the vacant apostleship (Acts 1 15-25). J. was one of the earliest witnesses to the resurrection, for, after the risen Lord had manifested Himself to the five hundred, "he was seen of James" (1 Cor 15 7 AV). By this his growing belief and prayerful expectancy received confirmation. About 37 or 38 AD, J., "the Lord's brother" (Gal 1 19), was still in Jerus, and had an interview there for the first time with Paul, when the latter returned from his 3 years' sojourn in Damascus to visit Cephas, or Peter (Gal 1 18, 19; cf Acts 9 26). In several other passages the name of J. is coupled with that of Peter. Thus, when Peter escaped from prison (about 44 AD), he gave instructions to those in the house of John Mark that they should immediately inform "James and the brethren" of the manner of his escape (Acts 12 17). By the time of the Jerus convention, i.e. about 51 AD (cf Gal 2 1), J. had reached the position of first overseer in the church (cf Acts 15 13, 19). Previous to this date, during Paul's ministry at Antioch, he had dispatched certain men thither to further the mission, and the teaching of these had caused dissension among the newly converted Christians and their leaders (Acts 15 1, 2; Gal 2 12). The conduct of Peter, over whom J. seems to have had considerable influence, was the principal matter of contention (cf Gal 2 11 ff). However, at the Jerus convention the dispute was amicably settled, and the pillars of the church, J., John and Cephas, gave to Paul and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship (Gal 2 9). The speech of J. on this occasion (Acts 15 13-29), his sympathy with the religious needs of the gentile world (ver 17), his desire that formalism should raise no barrier to their moral and spiritual advancement (vs 19, 20, 28, 29), and his large-hearted tributes to the "beloved Barnabas and Paul" (vs 25, 26), indicate that J. was a leader in whom the church was blessed, a leader who loved peace more than faction, the spirit more than the law, and who perceived that religious communities with different forms of observance might still live and work together in common allegiance to Christ. Once more (58 AD), J. was head of the council at Jerus when Paul made report of his labors, this time of his 3d missionary journey (Acts 21 17 ff). At this meeting Paul was admonished for exceeding the orders he had received at the first council, in that he had endeavored to persuade the converted Jews also to neglect circumcision (Acts 21 21), and was commanded to join in the vow of purification (Acts 21 23-26). There is no Scriptural account of the death of J. From 1 Cor 9 5 it has been inferred that he was married. This is, however, only a conjecture, as the passage refers to those who "lead about a sister, a wife" (AV), while, so far as we know, J. remained throughout his life in Jerus.

This J. has been regarded as the author of the Ep. of Jas, "a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ"; cf JAMES, EPISTLE OF. Also, for details concerning his relationship to Christ, cf BRETHREN OF THE LORD.

II. References in Apocryphal Literature.—J. figures in one of the miraculous events recorded in the gnostic "Gospel of the Infancy, by Thomas the Israelite philosopher," being cured of a snake-bite by the infant Jesus (cf Hennecke, Handbuch zu den neutestamentlichen Apokryphen, 73). According to the Gospel of the Hebrews (cf ib, 11-21), J. had also partaken of the cup of the Lord, and refused to eat till he had seen the risen Lord. Christ acknowledged this tribute by appearing to J. first. In the Acts of Peter (cf Budge, Contentings of the Apostles, II, 475), it is stated that "three days after the ascension of our Lord into heaven, James, whom our Lord called his 'brother in the flesh,' consecrated the Offering and we all drew nigh to partake thereof: and when ten days had passed after the ascension of our Lord, we all assembled in the holy fortress of Zion, and we stood up to say the prayer of sanctification, and we made supplication unto God and besought Him with humility, and James also entreated Him concerning the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the Offering." The Preaching of St. James the Just (cf Budge, ib, 78-81) tells of the appointment of J. to the bishopric of Jerus, of his preaching, healing of the sick and casting out of devils there. This is confirmed by the evidence of Clement of Alexandria (Euseb., HE, II, 1). In the Martyrdom of St. James the Just (cf Budge, ib, 82-89), it is stated that J., "the youngest of the sons of Joseph," alienated, by his preaching, Fiobasata from her husband Ananus, the governor of Jerus. Ananus therefore inflamed the Jews against J., and they hurled him down from off the pinnacle of the temple. Hegesippus, quoted by Eusebius (HE, II, 23), and Jos (Ant, XX, ix, 1), testify to the general truth of this. It is thus probable that James was martyred about 62 or 63 AD.

Besides the ep. which bears his name, J. was also the reputed author of the Protevangelium Jacobi, a work which originated in the 2d cent. and received later additions (cf Henn, N.A., 47-63; also JOSEPH, HUSBAND OF MARY).

LITERATURE

1. Characteristics of the Epistle.—The Ep. of Jas is the most Jewish writing in the NT. The Gospel according to Mt was written for the Jews. The Ep. to the He is addressed explicitly to them. The Apocalypse is full of the spirit of the OT. The Ep. of Jude is Jewish too. Yet all of these books have more of the distinctively Christian element in them than we can find in the Ep. of Jas. If we eliminate two or three passages containing references to Christ, the whole epistle might find its place just as properly in the Canon of the OT as in that of the NT, as far as its substance of doctrine and contents is concerned. That could not be said of any other book in the NT. There is no mention of the incarnation or of the resurrection, the two fundamental facts of the Christian faith. The word "gospel" does not occur in the ep. There is no suggestion that the Messiah has appeared and no presentation of the possibility of redemption through Him. The teaching throughout is that of a lofty morality which aims at the fulfilment of the requirements of the Mosaic law. It is not strange therefore that Spitta and others have thought that we have in the Ep. of Jas a treatise written by an unconverted Jew which has been adapted to Christian use by the interpolation of the two phrases containing the name of Christ in 1 1 and 2 1. Spitta thinks that this can be the only explanation of the fact that we have here an ep. practically ignoring the life and work of Jesus and every distinctively Christian doctrine, and without a trace of any of the great controversies in the early Christian church or any of the specific features of its propaganda. This judgment is a superficial one, and rests upon superficial indications rather than any appreciation of the underlying spirit and principles of the book. The spirit of Christ is here, and there is no need to label it. The principles of this ep. are the principles of the Sermon on the Mount. There are more  $\parallel$ s to that Sermon in this ep. than can be found anywhere else in the NT in the same space. The ep. represents the idealization of Jewish legalism under the transforming influence of the Christian motive and life. It is not a theological discussion. It is an ethical appeal. It has to do with the outward life for the most part, and the life it pictures is that of a Jew informed with the spirit of Christ. The spirit is invisible in the ep. as in the individual man. It is the body which appears and the outward life with which that body has to do. The body of the ep. is Jewish, and the outward life to which it exhorts is that of a profoundly pious Jew. The Jews familiar with the OT would read this ep. and find its language and tone that to which they were accustomed in their sacred books. Jas is evidently written by a Jew for Jews. It is Jewish in character throughout. This is apparent in the following particulars: (1) The ep. is addressed to the 12 tribes which are of the Dispersion (1 1). The Jews were scattered abroad through the ancient world. From Babylon to Rome, wherever any community of them might be gathered for commercial or social purposes, these exhortations could be carried and read. Probably the ep. was circulated most widely in Syria and Asia Minor, but it may have gone out to the ends of the earth. Here and there in the ghettos of the Rom Empire, groups of the Jewish exiles would gather and listen while one of their number read this letter from home. All of its terms and its allusions would recall familiar home scenes. (2) Their meeting-place is called "your synagogue" (2 2). (3) Abraham is mentioned as "our father" (2 21). (4) God is given the OT name, "the Lord of Sabaoth" (5 4). (5) The law is not to be spoken against nor judged, but reverently and loyally obeyed. It is a royal law to which every loyal Jew will be subject. It is a law of liberty, to be freely obeyed (2 8-12; 4 11). (6) The sins of the flesh are not inveighed against in the ep., but those sins to which the Jews were more conspicuously liable, such as the love of money and the distinction which money may bring (2 2-4), worldliness and pride (4 4-6), impatience and murmuring (5 7-11), and other sins of the temper and tongue (3 1-12; 4 11, 12). (7) The illustrations of faithfulness and patience and prayer are found in OT characters, in Abraham (2 21), Rahab (2 25), Job (5 11), and Elijah (5 17, 18). The whole atmosphere of the ep. is Jewish.

The writer of this ep. speaks as one having authority. He is not on his defence, as Paul so often is. There is no trace of apology in his presentation of the truth. His official position must have been recognized and unquestioned. He is as sure of his standing with his readers as he is of the absoluteness of his message.

No OT lawgiver or prophet was more certain that he spoke the word of the Lord. He has the vehemence of Elijah and the assured meekness of Moses. He has been called "the Amos of the NT," and there are paragraphs which recall the very expressions used by Amos and which are full of the same fiery eloquence and prophetic fervor. Both fill their writings with metaphors drawn from the sky and the sea, from natural objects and domestic experiences. Both seem to be country-bred and to be in sympathy with simplicity and poverty. Both inveigh against the luxury and the cruelty of the idle rich, and both abhor the ceremonial and the ritual which are substituted for individual righteousness. Malachi was not the last of the prophets. John the Baptist was not the last prophet of the Old Dispensation. The writer of this ep. stands at the end of that prophetic line, and he is greater than John the Baptist or any who have preceded him because he stands within the borders of the kingdom of Christ. He speaks with authority, as a messenger of God. He belongs to the goodly fellowship of the prophets and of the apostles. He has the authority of both. There are 54 imperatives in the 108 verses of this ep.

The ep. is interested in conduct more than in creed. It has very little formulated theology, less than any other ep. in the NT; but

3. Practical it insists upon practical morality throughout. It begins and it closes with an exhortation to patience and prayer. It preaches a gospel of good works, based upon love to God and love to man. It demands liberty, equality, fraternity for all. It enjoins humility and justice and peace. It prescribes singleness of purpose and steadfastness of soul. It requires obedience to the law, control of the passions, and control of the tongue. Its ideal is to be found in a good life, characterized by the meekness of wisdom. The writer of the ep. has caught the spirit of the ancient prophets, but the lessons that he teaches are taken, for the most part, from the Wisdom lit. of the OT and the Apoc. His direct quotations are from the Pent and the Book of Prov; but it has been estimated that there are 10 allusions to the Book of Prov, 6 to the Book of Job, 5 to the Book of Wisd, and 15 to the Book of Eccles. This Wisdom lit. furnishes the staple of his meditation and the substance of his teaching. He has little or nothing to say about the great doctrines of the Christian church.

He has much to say about the wisdom that cometh down from above and is pure, peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, without hypocrisy (3 15-17). The whole ep. shows that the author had stored his mind with the rich treasure of the ancient wisdom, and his material, while offered as his own, is both old and new. The form is largely that of the Wisdom lit. of the Jews. It has more parallels with Jesus the son of Sirach than with any writer of the sacred books.

The substance of its exhortation, however, is to be found in the Synoptics and more particularly in the Sermon on the Mount. Its wisdom is the wisdom of Jesus the son of Joseph, who is the Christ.

These are the three outstanding characteristics of this ep. In form and on the surface it is the most Jewish and least Christian of the writings in the NT. Its Christianity is latent and not apparent. Yet it is the most authoritative in its tone of any of the epp. in the NT, unless it be those of the apostle John. John must have occupied a position of undisputed primacy in the Christian church after the death of all the other apostles, when he wrote his epp. It is noteworthy that the writer of this ep. assumes a tone of like authority with that of John. John was the apostle of love, Paul of faith, and Peter of hope. This writer is the apostle of good works, the apostle of the wisdom which manifests itself in peace and purity, mercy and morality, and in obedience to the royal law, the law of liberty. In its union of Jewish form, authoritative tone, and insistence upon practical morality, the ep. is unique among the NT books.

II. Author of the Epistle.—The address of the ep. states that the writer is "James, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ" (1 1). The tradition of the church has identified this James with the brother of Our Lord. Clement of Alexandria says that Peter and James and John, who were the three apostles most honored of the Lord, chose James, the Lord's brother, to be the bishop of Jerus after the Lord's ascension (Euseb., HE, II, 1). This tradition agrees well with all the notices of James in the NT books. After the death of James the brother of John, Peter was thrown into prison, and having been miraculously released, he asked that the news be sent to James and to the brethren (Acts 12 17). This James is evidently in authority in the church at this time. In the apostolical conference held at Jerus, after Peter and Paul and Barnabas had spoken, this same James sums up the whole discussion, and his decision is adopted by the assembly and formulated in a letter which has some very striking isms in its phraseology to this ep. (Acts 15 6-29). When Paul came to Jerus for the last time he reported his work to James and all the elders present with him (Acts 21 18). In the Ep. to the Gal Paul says that at the time of one of his visits to Jerus he saw none of the apostles save Peter and James the Lord's brother (Gal 1 18 19). At another visit he received the right hand of fellowship from James and Cephas and John (Gal 2 9). At a later time certain who came from James to Antioch led Peter into backsliding from his former position of tolerance of the Gentiles as equals in the Christian church (Gal 2 12).

All of these references would lead us to suppose that James stood in a position of supreme authority in the mother-church at Jerus, the oldest church of Christendom. He presides in the assemblies of the church. He speaks the final and authoritative word. Peter and Paul defer to him. Paul mentions his name before that of Peter and John. When he was exalted to this leadership we do not know, but all indications seem to point to the fact that at a very early period James was the recognized executive authority in the church at Jerus, which was the church of Pentecost and the church of the apostles. All Jews looked to Jerus as the chief seat of their worship and the central authority of their religion. All Christian Jews would look to Jerus as the primitive source of their organization and faith, and the head of the church at Jerus would be recognized by them as their chief authority. The authoritative tone of this ep. comports well with this position of primacy ascribed to James.

All tradition agrees in describing James as a Hebrew of the Hebrews, a man of the most rigid and ascetic morality, faithful in his observance of all the ritual regulations of the Jewish faith. Hegesippus tells us that he was holy from his mother's womb. He drank no wine nor strong drink. He ate no flesh. He alone was permitted to enter with the priests into the holy place, and he was found there frequently upon his knees begging forgiveness for the people, and his knees became hard like those of a camel in consequence of his constantly bending them in his worship of God and asking forgiveness for the people (Euseb., HE, II, 23). He was called James the Just. All had confidence in his sincerity and integrity, and many were persuaded by him to believe on the Christ. This Jew, faithful in the observance of all that the Jews held sacred, and more devoted to the temple-worship than the most pious among them, was a good choice for the head of the Christian church. The blood of David flowed in his veins. He had all the Jew's pride in the special privileges of the chosen race. The Jews respected him and the Christians revered him. No man among them commanded the esteem of the entire population as much as he.

Jos (Ant, XX, ix) tells us that Ananus the high priest had James stoned to death, and that the most equitable of the citizens immediately rose in revolt against such a lawless procedure, and Ananus was deposed after only three months' rule. This testimony of Jos simply substantiates all that we know from other sources concerning the high standing of James in the whole community. Hegesippus says that James was first thrown from a pinnacle of the temple, and then they stoned him because he was not killed by the fall, and he was finally beaten over the head with a fuller's club; and then he adds significantly, "Immediately Vespasian besieged them" (Euseb., HE, II, 23). There would seem to have been quite a widespread conviction among both the Christians and the Jews that the afflictions which fell upon the holy city and the chosen people in the following years were in part a visitation because of the great crime of the murder of this just man. We can understand how a man with this reputation and character would write an ep. so Jewish in form and substance and so insistent in its demands for a practical morality as is the Ep. of Jas. All the characteristics of the ep. seem explicable on the supposition of authorship by James the brother of the Lord. We accept the church tradition without hesitation.

III. The Style of the Epistle.—The sentence construction is simple and straightforward. It reminds us of the Eng. of Bunyan and

1. Its Plainness DeFoe. There is usually no good reason for misunderstanding anything James says. He puts his truth plainly, and the words he uses have no hidden or mystical meanings. His thought is transparent as his life.

It is somewhat surprising to find that the Gr of the Ep. of Jas is better than that of the other NT writers, with the single exception of

2. Its Good Greek the author of the Ep. to the Hebrews. Of course this may be due to the fact that James had the services of an amanuensis who was a Gr scholar, or that his own MS was revised by such a man; but, although unexpected, it is not impossible that James himself may have been capable of writing such Gr as this.

It is not the good Gr of the classics, and it is not the poor and provincial Gr of Paul. There is more care for literary form than in the uncouth periods of the gentle apostle, and the vocabulary would seem to indicate an acquaintance with the literary as well as the commercial and the conversational Gr. "Galilee was studied with Gr towns, and it was certainly in the power of any Galilean to gain a knowledge of Gr. . . . We may reasonably suppose that our author would not have scrupled to avail himself of the opportunities within his reach, so as to master the Gr language, and learn something of Gr philosophy. This would be natural, even if we think of James as impelled only by a desire to gain wisdom and knowledge for himself; but if we think of him also as the principal teacher of the Jewish believers, many of whom were Hellenists, instructed in the wisdom of Alexandria, then the natural bent would take the shape of duty: he would be a student of Gr in order that he might be a more effective instructor to his own people" (Mayor, The Ep. of St. James, ccxxxvi). The Gr of the ep. is the studied Gr of one who was not a native to it, but who had familiarized himself with its literature. James could have done so and the ep. may be proof that he did.

James is never content to talk in abstractions. He always sets a picture before his own eyes and those of his readers. He has the

3. Its dramatic instinct. He has the secret Vividness of sustained interest. He is not discussing things in general but things in particular. He is an artist and believes in concrete realities. At the same time he has a touch of poetry in him, and a fine sense of the analogies running through all Nature and all life. The doubting man is like the sea spume (1 6). The rich man fades away in his goings, even as the beauty of the flower falls and perishes (1 11). The synagogue scene with its distinction between the rich and the poor is set before us with the clear-cut impressiveness of a cameo (2 1-4). The Pecksniffian philanthropist, who seems to think that men can be fed not by bread alone but by the words that proceed magnificently from his mouth, is pilloried here for all time (2 15,16). The untamable tongue that is set on fire of hell is put in the full blaze of its world of iniquity, and the damage it does is shown to be like that of a forest fire (3 1-12). The picture of the wisdom that comes from above with its sevenfold excellences of purity, peaceableness, gentleness, mercy, fruitfulness, impartiality, sincerity, is worthy to hang in the gallery of the world's masterpieces (3 17). The vaunting tradesmen, whose lives are like vanishing vapor, stand there before the eyes of all in Jerus (4 13-16). The rich, whose luxuries he describes even while he denounces their cruelties and prophesies their coming day of slaughter, are the rich who walk the streets of his own city (5 1-6). His short sentences go like shots straight to the mark. We feel the impact and the impress of them. There is an energy behind them and a reality in them that makes them live in our thought. His abrupt questions are like the quick interrogations of a cross-examining lawyer (2 4-7,14,16; 3 11,12; 4 1,4,5,12,14). His proverbs have the intensity of the accumulated and compressed wisdom of the ages. They are irreducible minimums. They are memorable sayings, treasured in the speech of the world ever since his day.

Sometimes James adds sentence to sentence with the repetition of some leading word or phrase (1 1-6,19-24; 3 2-8). It is the painful style of one who is

4. Its Dual-diplosis not altogether at home with the language which he has chosen as the vehicle of his thought. It is the method by which a discussion could be continued indefinitely.

Nothing but the vividness of the imagery and the intensity of the thought saves James from fatal monotony in the use of this device.

James has a keen eye for illustrations. He is not blind to the beauties and wonders of Nature. He

5. Its Figures of Speech sees what is happening on every hand, and he is quick to catch any homiletical suggestion it may hold. Does he stand by the seashore? The surge that is driven by the wind and tossed reminds him of the man who is unstable in all his ways, because he has no anchorage of faith, and his convictions are like driftwood on a sea of doubt (1 6). Then he notices that the great ships are turned about by a small rudder, and he thinks how the tongue is a small member, but it accomplishes great things (3 4,5). Does he walk under the sunlight and rejoice in it as the source of so many good and perfect gifts? He sees in it an image of the goodness of God that is never eclipsed and never exhausted, unvarying for evermore (1 17). He uses the natural phenomena of the land in which he lives to make his meaning plain at every turn: the flower of the field that passes away (1 10,11), the forest fire that sweeps the mountain side and like a living torch lights up the whole land (3 5), the sweet and salt springs (3 11), the fig trees and the olive trees and the vines (3 12), the seed-sowing and the fruit-bearing (3 18), the morning mist immediately lost to view (4 14), the early and the latter rain for which the husbandman waiteth patiently (5 7).

There is more of the appreciation of Nature in this one short ep. of Jas than in all the epp. of Paul put together. Human life was more interesting to Paul than natural scenery. However, James is interested in human life just as profoundly as Paul. He is constantly endowing inanimate things with living qualities. He represents sin as a harlot, conceiving and bringing forth death (1 15). The word of truth has a like power and conceives and brings forth those who live to God's praise (1 18). Pleasures are like gay hosts of enemies in a tournament, who deck themselves bravely and ride forth with singing and laughter, but whose mission is to wage war and to kill (4 1,2). The laborers may be dumb in the presence of the rich because of their dependence and their fear, but their wages, fraudulently withheld, have a tongue, and cry out to high heaven for vengeance (5 4). What is friendship with the world? It is adultery, James says (4 4). The rust of unjust riches testifies against those who have accumulated them, and then turns upon them and eats their flesh like fire (5 3). James observed the man who glanced at himself in the mirror in the morning, and saw that his face was not clean, and who went away and thought no more about it for that whole day, and he found in him an illustration of the one who heard the word and did not do it (1 22,24). The ep. is full of these rhetorical figures, and they prove that James was something of a poet at heart, even as Jesus was. He writes in prose, but there is a marked rhythm in all of his speech. He has an ear for harmony as he has an eye for beauty everywhere.

The Pauline epistles begin with salutations and close with benedictions. They are filled with autobiographical

6. Its Unlikeness to Paul touches and personal messages. None of these things appear here. The ep. begins and ends with all abruptness. It has an address, but no thanksgiving.

There are no personal messages and no indications of any intimate personal relationship between the author and his readers. They are his "beloved brethren." He knows their needs and their sins, but he may never have seen their faces or visited their homes. The ep. is more like a prophet's appeal to a nation than a personal letter.

Both the substance of the teaching and the method of its presentation remind us of the discourses of Jesus. James says less

7. Its Likeness to Jesus about the Master than any other writer in the NT, but his speech is more like that of the Master than the speech of any one of them. There are at least ten parallels to the Sermon on the Mount in this short ep., and for almost everything that James has to say we can recall some statement of Jesus which might have suggested it. When the parallels fail at any point, we are inclined to suspect that James may be repeating some unrecorded utterance of Our Lord. He seems absolutely faithful to his memory of his brother's teaching. He is the servant of Jesus in all his exhortation and persuasion.

Did the Master shock His disciples' faith by the loftiness of the Christian ideal He set before them in His great sermon, "Ye therefore shall be perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect" (Mt 5 48)? James sets the same high standard in the very forefront of his ep.: "Let patience have its perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, lacking in nothing" (1 4). Did the Master say, "Ask, and it shall be given you" (Mt 7 7)? James says, "If any of you lacketh wisdom, let him ask of God . . . ; and it shall be given him" (1 5). Did the Master add a condition to His sweeping promise to prayer and say, "Whosoever . . . shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that what he saith cometh to pass; he shall have it" (Mk 11 23)? James hastens to add the same condition, "Let him ask in faith, nothing doubting: for he that doubteth is like the surge of the sea driven by the wind and tossed" (1 6). Did the Master close the great sermon with His parable of the Wise Man and the Foolish Man, saying, "Every one that heareth these words of mine, and doeth them, shall be likened unto a wise man. And every one that heareth these words of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man" (Mt 7 24, 26)? James is much concerned about wisdom, and therefore he exhorts his readers, "Be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deluding your own selves" (1 22). Had the Master declared, "If ye know these things, blessed are ye if ye do them" (Jn 13 17)? James echoes the thought when he says, "A doer that worketh, this man shall be blessed in his doing" (1 25). Did the Master say to the disciples, "Blessed are ye poor: for yours is the kingdom of God" (Lk 6 20)? James has the same sympathy with the poor, and he says, "Hearken, my beloved brethren; did not God choose them that are poor as to the world to be rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he promised to them that love him?" (2 5). Did the Master inveigh against the rich, and say, "Woe unto you that are rich! for ye have received your consolation. Woe unto you, ye that are full now! for ye shall hunger. Woe unto you, ye that laugh now! for ye shall mourn and weep" (1 16-25)? James bursts forth into the same invective and prophecies the same sad reversal of fortune, "Come now, ye rich, weep and howl for your miseries that are coming upon you" (5 1). "Cleanse your hands, ye sinners; and purify your hearts, ye doubleminded. Be afflicted, and mourn, and weep: let your laughter be turned to mourning, and your joy to heaviness" (4 8, 9). Had Jesus said, "Judge not, that ye be not judged" (Mt 7 1)? James repeats the exhortation, "Speak not one against another, brethren. He that . . . judgeth his brother . . . judgeth the law: . . . but who art thou that judgest thy neighbor?" (4 11, 12). Had Jesus said, "Whosoever shall humble himself shall be exalted" (Mt 23 12)? We find the very words in James, "Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord, and he shall exalt you" (4 10). Had Jesus said, "I say unto you, Swear not at all; neither by the heaven, for it is the throne of God; nor by the earth, for it is the footstool of his feet. . . . But let your speech be, Yea, yea; Nay, nay: and whatsoever is more than these is of the evil one" (Mt 5 34-37)? Here in James we come upon the exact ||: "But above all things, my brethren, swear not, neither by the heaven, nor by the earth, nor by any other oath; but let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay; that ye fall not under judgment" (5 12).

We remember how the Master began the Sermon on the Mount with the declaration that even those who mourned and were persecuted and reviled and reproached were blessed, in spite of all their suffering and trial. Then we notice that James begins his ep. with the same paradoxical putting of the Christian faith, "Count it all joy, my brethren, when ye fall into manifold trials" (1 2 ARVm). We remember how Jesus proceeded in His sermon to set forth the spiritual significance and the assured permanence of the law; and we notice that James treats the law with the same respect and puts upon it the same high value. He calls it "the perfect law" (1 25), "the royal law" (2 8), the "law of liberty" (2 12). We remember what Jesus said about forgiving others in order that we ourselves may be forgiven; and we know where James got his authority for saying, "Judgment is without mercy to him that hath showed no mercy" (2 13). We remember all that the Master said about good trees and corrupt trees being known by their fruits, "Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?" (Mt 7 16-20). Then in the Ep. of Jas we find a like question, "Can a fig tree, my brethren, yield olives, or a vine figs?" (3 12). We remember that the Master said, "Know ye that he is nigh, even at the doors" (Mt 24 33). We are not surprised to find the statement here in James, "Behold, the judge standeth before the doors" (5 9). These reminiscences of the sayings of the Master meet us on every page. It may be that there are many more of them than we are able to identify. Their number is sufficiently large, however, to show us that James is steeped in the truths taught by Jesus, and not only their substance but their phraseology constantly reminds us of Him.

IV. Date of the Epistle.—There are those who think that the Ep. of Jas is the oldest ep. in the NT. Among those who favor an early date are Mayor, Plumptre, Alford, Stanley, Renan, Weiss, Zahn, Beyschlag, Neander, Schneckenburger, Thiersch, and Dods.

The reasons assigned for this conclusion are: (1) the general Judaic tone of the ep., which seems to antedate admission of the Gentiles in any alarming numbers into the church; but since the ep. is addressed only to Jews, why should the Gentiles be mentioned in it, whatever its date? and (2) the fact that Paul and Peter are supposed to have quoted from Jas in their writing; but this matter of quotation is always an uncertain one, and it has been ably argued that the quotation has been the other way about.

Others think that the ep. was written toward the close of James's life. Among these are Kern, Wiesinger, Schmidt, Brückner, Wordsworth, and Farrar.

These argue (1) that the ep. gives evidence of a considerable lapse of time in the history of the church, sufficient to allow of a declension from the spiritual fervor of Pentecost and the establishment of distinctions among the brethren; but any of the sins mentioned in the ep. in all probability could have been found in the church in any decade of its history. (2) James has a position of established authority, and those to whom he writes are not recent converts but members in long standing; but the position of James may have been established from a very early date, and in an encyclical of this sort we could not expect any indication of shorter or longer membership in the church. Doubtless some of those addressed were recent converts, while others may have been members for many years. (3) There are references to persecutions and trials which fit the later rather than the earlier date; but all that is said on this subject might be suitable in any period of the presidency of James at Jerus. (4) There are indications of a long and disappointing delay in the Second Coming of the Lord in the repeated exhortation to patience in waiting for it; but on the other hand James says, "The coming of the Lord is at hand," and "The judge standeth before the doors" (5 7-9). The same passage is cited in proof of a belief that the immediate appearance of the Lord was expected, as in the earliest period of the church, and in proof that there had been a disappointment of this earlier belief and that it had been succeeded by a feeling that there was need of patience in waiting for the coming so long delayed.

It seems clear to us that there are no decisive proofs in favor of any definite date for the ep. It must have been written before the martyrdom of James in the year 63 AD, and at some time during his presidency over the church at Jerus; but there is nothing to warrant us in coming to any more definite conclusion than that Davidson, Hilgenfeld, Baur, Zeller, Hausrath, von Soden, Jülicher, Har-nack, Bacon and others date the ep. variously in the post-Pauline period, 69-70 to 140-50 AD. The arguments for any of these dates fall far short of proof, rest largely if not wholly upon conjectures and presuppositions, and of course are inconsistent with any belief in the authorship by James.

V. History of the Epistle.—Eusebius classed Jas among those whose authenticity was disputed by some. "James is said to be the author of the first of the so-called Catholic Epp. But it is to be observed that it is disputed; at least, not many of the ancients have mentioned it, as is the case likewise with the ep. that bears the name of Jude, which is also one of the seven so-called Catholic Epp. Nevertheless, we know that these also, with the rest, have been read publicly in most churches" (HE, II, 23). Eusebius himself, however, quotes Jas 4 11 as Scripture and Jas 5 13 as spoken by the holy apostle. Personally he does not seem disposed to question the genuineness of the ep. There are [s] in phraseology which make it possible that the ep. is quoted in Clement of Rome in the 1st cent., and in Ignatius, Polycarp, Justin Martyr, the Ep. to Diognetus, Irenaeus, and Hermas in the 2d cent. It is omitted in the canonical list of the Muratorian Fragment and was not included in the Old Lat version. Origen seems to be the first writer to quote the ep. explicitly as Scripture and to assert that it was written by James the brother of the Lord. It appears in the Pesh version and seems to have been generally recognized in the East. Cyril of Jerus, Gregory of Nazianzus, Ephraem of Edessa, Didymus of Alexandria, received it as canonical. The 3d Council of Carthage in 397 AD finally settled its status for the Western church, and from that date in both the East and the West its canonicity was unquestioned until the time of the Reformation.

Erasmus and Cajetan revived the old doubts concerning it. Luther thought it contradicted Paul and therefore banished it to the appendix of his Bible. "James," he says, "has aimed to refute those who relied on faith without works, and is too weak for his task in mind, understanding, and words, mutilates the Scriptures, and thus directly contradicts Paul and all Scriptures, seeking to accomplish by enforcing the law what the apostles successfully effect by love. Therefore I will not place his Ep. in my Bible among the proper leading books" (Werke, XIV, 148). He declared that it was a downright strawy ep., as compared with such as those to the Rom and to the Gal, and it had no real evangelical character. This judgment of Luther is a very hasty and regrettable one. The modern church has refused to accept it, and it is generally conceded now that Paul and James are in perfect agreement with each other, though their presentation of the same truth from opposite points of view brings them into apparent contradiction. Paul says, "By grace have ye been saved through faith . . . not of works, that no man should glory" (Eph 2 8.9). "We reckon therefore that a man is justified by faith apart from the works of the law" (Rom 3 28). James says, "Faith, if it have not works, is dead in itself" (2 17). "Ye see that by works a man is justified, and not only by faith" (2 24). With these passages before him Luther said, "Many have toiled to reconcile Paul with James . . . but to no purpose, for they are contrary, 'Faith justifies'; 'Faith does not justify'; I will pledge my life that no one can reconcile those propositions; and if he succeeds he may call me a fool" (Colloquia, II, 202).

It would be difficult to prove Luther a fool if Paul and James were using these words, faith, works, and justification, in the same sense, or even if each were writing with full consciousness of what the other had written. They both use Abraham for an example, James of justification by works, and Paul of justification by faith. How can that be possible? The faith meant by James is the faith of a dead orthodoxy, an intellectual assent to the dogmas of the church which does not result in any practical righteousness in life, such a faith as the demons have when they believe in the being of God and simply tremble before Him. The faith meant by Paul is intellectual and moral and spiritual, affects the whole man, and leads him into conscious and vital union and communion with God. It is not the faith of demons; it is the faith that redeems. Again, the works meant by Paul are the works of a dead legalism, the works done under a sense of compulsion or from a feeling of duty, the works done in obedience to a law which is a taskmaster, the works of a slave and not of a son. These dead works, he declares, can never give life. The works meant by James are the works of a believer, the fruit of the faith and love born in every believer's heart and manifest in every believer's life. The possession of faith will insure this evidence in his daily conduct and conversation; and without this evidence the mere profession of faith will not save him. The justification meant by Paul is the initial justification of the Christian life. No doing of meritorious deeds will make a man worthy of salvation. He comes into the kingdom, not on the basis of merit but on the basis of grace. The sinner is converted not by doing anything, but by believing on the Lord Jesus Christ. He approaches the threshold of the kingdom and he finds that he has no coin that is current there. He cannot buy his way in by good works; he must accept salvation by faith, as the gift of God's free grace. The justification meant by James is the justification of any after-moment in the Christian life, and the final justification before the judgment throne. Good works are inevitable in the Christian life. There can be no assurance of salvation without them.

Paul is looking at the root; James is looking at the fruit. Paul is talking about the beginning of the Christian life; James is talking about its continuance and consummation. With Paul, the works he renounces precede faith and are dead works. With James, the faith he denounces is apart from works and is a dead faith.

Paul believes in the works of godliness just as much as James. He prays that God may establish the Thessalonians in every good work (2 Thess 2 17). He writes to the Corinthians that "God is able to make all grace abound unto" them; that they, "having always all sufficiency in everything, may abound unto every good work" (2 Cor 9 8). He declares to the Ephesians that "we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works, which God afore prepared that we should walk in them" (Eph 2 10). He makes a formal statement of his faith in Rom: God "will render to every man according to his works: to them that by patience in well-doing seek for glory and honor and incorruption, eternal life: but unto them that are factious, and obey not the truth, but obey unrighteousness, shall be wrath and indignation, tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that worketh evil, of the Jew first, and also of the Gr; but glory and honor and peace to every man that worketh good, to the Jew first, and also to the Gr" (Rom 2 6-10). This is the final justification discussed by James, and it is just as clearly a judgment by works with Paul as with him.

On the other hand James believes in saving faith as well as Paul. He begins with the statement that the proving of our faith works patience and brings perfection (1 3.4). He declares that the prayer of faith will bring the coveted wisdom (1 6). He describes the Christian profession as a holding "the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory" (2 1). He says that the poor as to the world are rich in faith, and therefore heirs to the kingdom (2 5). He quotes the passage from Gen, "Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned unto him for righteousness" (2 23), and he explicitly asserts that Abraham's "faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect" (2 22). The faith mentioned in all these passages is the faith of the professing Christian; it is not the faith which the sinner exercises in accepting salvation. James and Paul are at one in declaring that faith and works must go hand in hand in the Christian life, and that in the Christian's experience both faith without works is dead and works without faith are dead works. They both believe in faith working through love as that which alone will avail in Christ Jesus (Gal 5 6). Fundamentally they agree. Superficially they seem to contradict each other. That is because they are talking about different things and using the same terms with different meanings for those terms in mind.

VI. The Message of the Epistle to Our Times.—

There are those who talk holiness and are hypocrites; those who make profession of perfect love and yet cannot live peaceably with their brethren; those who are full of pious phraseology but fail in practical philanthropy. This ep. was written for them. It may not give them much comfort, but it ought to give them much profit. The mysticism that contents itself with pious frames and phrases and comes short in actual sacrifice and devoted service will find its antidote here. The antinomianism that professes great confidence in free grace, but does not recognize the necessity for corresponding purity of life, needs to ponder the practical wisdom of this ep. The quietists who are satisfied to sit and sing themselves away to everlasting bliss ought to read this ep. until they catch its bugle note of inspiration to present activity and continuous good deeds. All who are long on theory and short on practice ought to steep themselves in the spirit of James; and since there are such people in every community and in every age, the message of the ep. will never grow old.

The sociological problems are to the front today. The old prophets were social reformers, and James is most like them in the NT. Much that he says is applicable to present-day conditions. He lays down the right principles for practical philanthropy, and the proper relationships between master and man, and between man and man. If the teachings of this ep. were put into practice throughout the church it would mean the revitalization of Christianity. It would prove that the Christian religion was practical and workable, and it would go far to establish the final brotherhood of man in the service of God.

The life of Our Lord is the most important life in the history of the race. It will always be a subject of the deepest interest and study. Modern research has penetrated every contributory realm for any added light the life and upon the heredity and the environment of Jesus. The people and the land, archaeology and contemporary history, have been cultivated intensively and extensively for any modicum of knowledge they might add to our store of information concerning the Christ. We suggest that there is a field here to which sufficient attention has not yet been given. James was the brother of the Lord. His ep. tells us much about himself. On the supposition that he did not exhort others to be what he would not furnish them an example in being, we read in this ep. his own character writ large. He was like his brother in so many things. As we study the life and character of James we come to know more about the life and character of Jesus.

Jesus and James had the same mother. From her they had a common inheritance. As far as they reproduced their mother's characteristics they were alike. They had the same home training. As far as the father in that home could succeed in putting the impress of his own personality upon the boys, they would be alike. It is noticeable in this connection that Joseph is said in the Gospel to have been "a just man" (Mt 1 19 AV), and that James came to be known through all the early church as James the Just, and that in his ep. he gives this title to his brother, Jesus, when he says of the unrighteous rich of Jerus, "Ye have condemned and killed the just" man (5 6 AV). Joseph was just, and James was just, and Jesus was just. The brothers were alike, and they were like the father in this respect. The two brothers seem to think alike and talk alike to a most remarkable degree. They represent the same home surroundings and human environment, the same religious training and inherited characteristics. Surely, then, all that we learn concerning James will help us the better to understand Jesus.

They are alike in their poetical insight and their practical wisdom. They are both fond of figurative speech, and it seems always natural and unforced. The discourses of Jesus are filled with birds and flowers and winds and clouds and all the sights and sounds of rural life in Gal. The writings of James abound in reference to the field flowers and the meadow grass and the salt fountains and the burning wind and the early and the latter rain. They are alike in mental attitude and in spiritual alertness. They have much in common in the material equipment of their thought. James was well versed in the apoc lit. May we not reasonably conclude that Jesus was just as familiar with these books as he? James seems to have acquired a comparative mastery of the Gr language and to have had some acquaintance with the Gr philosophy. Would not Jesus have been as well furnished in these lines as he?

What was the character of James? All tradition testifies to his personal purity and persistent devotion, commanding the reverence and the respect of all who knew him. As we trace the various elements of his character manifesting themselves in his anxieties and exhortations in this ep., we find rising before us the image of Jesus as well as the portrait of James. He is a single-minded man, steadfast in faith and patient in trials. He is slow to wrath, but very quick to detect any sins of speech and hypocrisy of life. He is full of humility, but ready to champion the cause of the oppressed and the poor. He hates all insincerity and he loves wisdom, and he believes in prayer and practises it in reference to both temporal and spiritual good. He believes in absolute equality in the house of God. He is opposed to anything that will establish any distinctions between brethren in their place of worship. He believes in practical philanthropy. He believes that the right sort of religion will lead a man to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world. A pure religion in his estimation will mean a pure man. He believes that we ought to practise all that we preach.

As we study these characteristics and opinions of the younger brother, does not the image of his and our Elder Brother grow ever clearer before our eyes?

JAMES, PROTEVANGELIUM, prō-tē-van-jel'-i-um, OF. See APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS.

JAMIN, jā'min (יָמִין, yāmīn, "right hand"):

(1) In Gen 46 10; Ex 6 15; Nu 26 12; 1 Ch 4 24, a "son" (clan) of Simeon.

The immediate descendants of J. were seven in number, and are represented by the nations designated Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Mesech, and Tiras; or, roughly, the Armenians, Lydians, Medes, Greeks, Tibarenians, and Moschians, the last, Tiras, remaining still obscure. The sons

Mušri, "references to which underlie many passages in the OT," and for melekh yārēbh, he would read melekh 'ārābhī, "king of Arabia." For other views see ICC. JAMES CRICHTON

JAMES CRICHTON

JARED, jā'red (יָרֵד, yeredh, "descent"; pausal form, יָרֵד, yāredh, in Gen 5 15; 1 Ch 1 2, hence EV "Jared" for "Jered"; יָרֵד, Iaréd): In Gen 5 15-20; 1 Ch 1 2; Lk 3 37, son of Mahalaleel and father of Enoch. AV has "Jered" in 1 Ch 1 2.

The name is supposed by Budde to denote a degeneration of the human race, the first five generations being righteous, their successors not, except Enoch and Noah. The name has been identified with that of Irad (יִרָד, irādh), Gen 4 18. See Skinner, Gen, 117, 129, 131.

JARESIAH, jar-ē-sī'a: AV for JAARESHIAH (q.v.).

JARHA, jā'rha (יָרְחָא, yarhā', meaning unknown): An Egypt slave of Shesham, about Eli's time (cf HPN, 235), who married his master's daughter, and became the founder of a house of the Jerahmeelites (1 Ch 2 34 ff).

JARIB, jā'rib, jar'ib (יָרִיב, yārīb, "he contends," or "takes [our] part," or "conducts [our] case"):

(1) In 1 Ch 4 24, a "son" (clan) of Simeon = "Jachin" of Gen 46 10; Ex 6 15; Nu 26 12.

(2) In Ezr 8 16, one of the "chief men" for whom Ezra sent, and dispatched by him to Casiphia to fetch ministers for God's house = "Joribus" (1 Esd 8 44).

(3) In Ezr 10 18, a priest who had married a foreign wife = "Joribus" (1 Esd 9 19).

JARIMOTH, jar'i-moth (Ἰαριμόθ, Iarimōth): 1 Esd 9 28; called "Jeremoth" in Ezr 10 27.

JARMUTH, jā'r'muth (יָרְמֻת, yarmūth):

(1) A city of the Canaanites in the Shephelah (Josh 15 35) of Judah whose "king," Piram, joined the league of the "five kings" against Joshua (Josh 10 3-5), was defeated at Gibeon and slain at Makedah (ver 23). One of the 31 "kings" defeated in Joshua's campaign (Josh 12 11). In Josh 15 35 it is mentioned in conjunction with Adullam, Socoh and Azekah, and in Neh 11 29 with Zorah, Zanoah and Adullam. Cheyne (EB) suggests that the "Maroth" of Mic 1 12 may be a copyist's error for Jarmuth. In Onom (OS 132 31; 266 38) mention is made of a Ἰερμοχὼς, Iermochōs, or Jermucha, 10 Rom miles N.E. of Eleuteropolis (Beit Jibrin). The site of this once important place is Khirbet el Yarmūk, a ruin, with many old walls and cisterns, on the top of a hill 1,465 ft. above sea-level. It is nearly 2 miles N.W. of Beit Natf, from which it is visible, and 8½ miles, as measured on map, N.N.E. of Beit Jibrin. Cf PEF, III, 128, Sh XVIII.

(2) A city of Issachar belonging to the "children of Gershon, of the families of the Levites" (Josh 21 29); in the duplicate list in 1 Ch 6 73 we have Ramoth, while in the LXX version of Josh 21 29 we have, in different VSS, Rhemmath or Iermōth. In Josh 19 21 "Remeth" occurs (in Heb) in the lists of cities of Issachar; in the LXX Rhemmas or Rhamith. The name was probably "Remeth" or "Ramoth," but the place has never been identified with any certainty. See RAMOTH.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

JAROA, ja-rō'a (יָרֹא, yārō'a, meaning unknown): A Gadite chief (1 Ch 5 14). But the text is doubtful; see Curtis, Ch, 124.

JASAEUS, jas-a-ē'lus (Ἰασάελος, Iasāēlos; B, Asāēlos; AV Jasael, jā'sā-el [1 Esd 9 30]): Called "Sheal" in Ezr 10 29.

JASHAR, jā'shar, jash'ar, BOOK OF (סֵפֶר יָשָׁר, šēpher ha-yāshār; AV Book of Jasher, m "the book of the upright"): The title of an ancient Hebrew national song-book (lit. "book of the righteous one") from which two quotations are made in the OT: (1) Josh 10 12-14, the command of Joshua to the sun and moon, "Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon. . . . Is not this written in the book of Jasher?" (see BETH-HORON; LXX in this place omits the reference to Jasher); and (2) 2 S 1 18 ff, "the song of the bow," or lament of David over Saul and Jonathan. (3) Some conjecture a third extract in 1 K 8 12, "Then spake Solomon, Jeh hath said that he would dwell in the thick darkness." The words of Jeh are quoted by LXX in ver 53 as "written in the book of the song" (en bibliō tēs ōdēs), and it is pointed out that the words "the song" (in Heb יָשָׁר, ha-shūr) might easily be a corruption of יָשָׁר, ha-yāshār. A similar confusion ("song" for "righteous") may explain the fact that the Pesh Syr of Josh has for a title "the book of praises or hymns." The book evidently was a well-known one, and may have been a gradual collection of religious and national songs. It is conjectured that it may have included the Song of Deborah (Jgs 5), and older pieces now found in the Pent (e.g. Gen 4 23, 24; 9 25-27; 27 27-29); this, however, is uncertain. On the curious theories and speculations of the rabbis and others about the book (that it was the Book of the Law, of Gen, etc), with the fantastic reconstructive theory of Dr. Donaldson in his Jasher, see the full art. in HDB. JAMES ORR

JASHEN, jā'shen, jash'en (יָשֵׁן, yāshēn, "asleep" [?]): Seemingly the father of some of David's thirty valiant men (2 S 23 32 f). The MT reads "Eliabha the Shaalbonite, the sons of Jashen, Jonathan, Shammah the Hararite, . . ." 1 Ch 11 33 f has "Eliabha the Shaalbonite, the sons of Hashem the Gizonite, Jonathan the son of Shagee the Hararite . . ." It is clear that "sons of" are a dittography of the last three consonants of the previous word. LXX, Luc in 2 S and 1 Ch has ὁ Γουνί, ho Gouni, "the Gunite," for "the Gizonite," perhaps correctly (cf Gen 46 24; Nu 26 48 for "Guni," "Gunite"). So 2 S 23 32 may be corrected thus: "Eliabha the Shaalbonite, Jashen the Gunite, Jonathan the son of Shammah the Hararite." Jashen thus becomes one of the thirty = "Hashem" of 1 Ch 11 34. DAVID FRANCIS ROBERTS

JASHER, jā'shēr, jash'ēr, BOOK OF: AV for JASHAR (q.v.), and see BETH-HORON, BATTLE OF.

JASHOBEAM, ja-shō'bē'am (יָשׁוֹבֵב, yāshobh-ā'm, probably "people will return"; see discussion of names compounded with יָשׁ, am, in HPN, 41-59): Jashobeam is mentioned in three passages (1 Ch 11 11; 12 6 [Heb 7]; 27 2 f), but opinions vary as to the number of persons referred to. In 1 Ch 11 11 he is called "the son of a Hachmonite" (reference unknown) and "the chief of the three" ("three," the best reading; RV "thirty"; AV, RVm "captains"), mighty men of David. He is said to have slain 300 (800 in 2 S 23 8) at one time, i.e. one after another.

The gibborim, or heroes, numbered 600 and were divided into bands of 200 each and subdivided into smaller bands of 20 each, with a captain for each company large and small. Jashobeam had command of the first of the three bands of 200 (see Ewald, HT, III, 140 f; Stanley, HJC, II, 78). From the indefiniteness of the description, "three of the thirty chief," he can hardly be regarded as one of the three mighty men who broke through the ranks of the Philis, and brought water from the well of Bethlehem to David on the hill-fortress of Adullam (1 Ch 11 15-17), and the fact that "the thirty" have not yet been mentioned would seem to indicate that this story is not in its proper place. But "Jashobeam" here (1 Ch 11 11) is probably an error for "Ishbaal," the reading of many of the MSS of the LXX (HPN, 46, n.).

In the || passage (2 S 23 8) he is called "Joshebbasshebeth, a Tahchemonite." This verse, however, is probably corrupt (RVm), and the text should be corrected in accordance with Ch to "Ishbaal, the Hachmonite." In 1 Ch 27 2 f Jashobeam is said to have been "the son of Zabdiel," of the family of Perez, and the commander-in-chief of the division of David's army which did duty the first month. The army consisted of 12 divisions of 24,000 each, each division serving a month in turn. In 1 Ch 12 6 (Heb 7) Jashobeam is mentioned among those who joined David at Ziklag in the time of Saul, and is described as a Korahite, probably one belonging to a family of Judah (cf 2 43). JAMES CRICHTON

JASHUB, jā'shub, jash'ub (יָשׁוּב, yāshūbh; יָשׁוּב, yāshūbh, in Ch, but יָשׁוּב, yāshūbh, "he returns"):

(1) In Nu 26 24; 1 Ch 7 1, a "son" (clan) of Issachar. Gen 46 13 has incorrectly Iob, but LXX Jashub.

(2) In Ezr 10 29, one of those who had married foreign wives = "Jasubus" in 1 Esd 9 30.

(3) In Isa 7 3, part of the name SHEAR-JASHUB (q.v.).

JASHUBI-LEHEM; ja-shōō-bi-lē'hēm (יָשׁוּבֵי לֶחֶם, yāshūbhī-lehem): A name in 1 Ch 4 22 where commentators insert בֵּית, bēth, between the two words and translate "[and] returned to Beth-lehem."

JASHUBITES, jā'shub-its, jash'ub-its, THE (יָשׁוּבִים, ha-yāshūbhīm, coll. with art.): In Nu 26 24, descendants of JASHUB (q.v. [1]).

JASIEL, jā'si-el, jas'el (יָסִיֵּל, ya'āsī'ēl, "God is maker," 1 Ch 11 47 AV). See JAASIEL.

JASON, jā'sun (Ἰάσων, Iásōn): A common name among the Hellenizing Jews who used it for Jesus or Joshua, probably connecting it with the Gr vb. iaisthai ("to heal").

(1) Son of Eleazar, sent (161 BC) by Judas Maccabaeus with other deputies to Rome "to make a league of amity and confederacy" (1 Macc 8 17; Jos, Ant, XII, x, 6), and perhaps to be identified with (2).

(2) The father of Antipater who went as ambassador of Jonathan to Rome in 144 BC (1 Macc 12 16; 14 22; Ant, XIII, v, 8).

(3) Jason of Cyrene, a Jewish historian, who is known only from what is told of him in 2 Macc 2 19-23. 2 Macc is in fact simply an abridgment in one book of the 5 books written by Jason on the Jewish wars of liberation. He must have written after 162 BC, as his books include the wars under Antiochus Eupator.

(4) Jason the high priest, second son of Simon II and brother of Onias III. The change of name from Jesus (Jos, Ant, XII, v) was part of the Hellenizing policy favored by Antiochus Epiphanes from whom he purchased the high-priesthood by a large bribe, thus excluding his elder brother from the office (2 Macc 4 7-26). He did everything in his power to introduce Gr customs and Gr life among the Jews. He established a gymnasium in Jerus, so that even the priests neglected the altars and the sacrifices, and hastened to be partakers of the "unlawful allowance" in the palaestra. The writer of 2 Macc calls him "that ungodly wretch" and "vile" Jason. He even sent deputies from Jerus to Tyre to take part in the worship of Hercules; but what he sent for sacrifices, the deputies expended on the "equipment of galleys." After 3 years of this Hellenizing work he was supplanted in 172 BC in the favor of Antiochus by Menelaus who gave a large bribe for the high priest's office.

Jason took refuge with the Ammonites; on hearing that Antiochus was dead he tried with some success to drive out Menelaus, but ultimately failed (2 Macc 5 5 ff). He took refuge with the Ammonites again, and then with Aretas, the Arabian, and finally with the Lacedaemonians, where he hoped for protection "as being connected by race," and there "perished miserably in a strange land."

(5) A name mentioned in Acts 17 5-9 and in Rom 16 21. See following article.

J. HUTCHISON

JASON, jā'sun (Ἰάσων, Iásōn): A Gr name assumed by Jews who bore the Heb name Joshua. This name is mentioned twice in the NT. (See also preceding article.)

(1) Jason was the host of St. Paul during his stay in Thessalonica, and, during the uproar organized by the Jews, who were moved to jealousy by the success of Paul and Silas, he and several other "brethren" were severely handled by the mob. When the mob failed to find Paul and Silas, they dragged Jason and "certain brethren" before the politarchs, accusing Jason of treason in receiving into his house those who said "There is another king, one Jesus." The magistrates, being troubled, took security from them, and let them go.

There are various explanations of the purpose of this security. "By this expression it is most probably meant that a sum of money was deposited with the magistrates, and that the Christian community of the place made themselves responsible that no attempt should be made against the supremacy of Rome, and that peace should be maintained in Thessalonica itself" (Conybeare and Howson, St. Paul). Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller) thinks that the security was given to prevent Paul from returning to Thessalonica and that St. Paul refers to this in 1 Thess 2 18.

The immediate departure of Paul and Silas seems to show the security was given that the strangers would leave the city and remain absent (Acts 17 5-9).

(2) Jason is one of the companions of St. Paul who unite with him in sending greetings to the Rom Christians (Rom 16 21). He is probably the same person as (1). Paul calls him a kinsman, which means a Jew (cf Rom 9 3; 16 11.21).

JASPER, jas'pēr, JASPIS, jas'pis. See STONES, PRECIOUS.

JASUBUS, ja-sū'bus (Ἰάσουβος, Iásoubos): An Israelite who in the time of Ezra had to put away his foreign wife (1 Esd 9 30); called "Jashub" in Ezr 10 29.

JATAL, jā'tal (1 Esd 5 28). See ATAR.

JATHAN, jā'than (Ἰαθάμ, Iathán; נָתָן, Nathán): For "Jonathas" in AV, which is the Lat form for the Heb "Jonathan." Jonathan was brother of Ananias and "son of that great Sammaias" (Tob 5 13).

JATHBATH, jath' bath. See JOTBATHAH.

JATHNIEL, jath'ni-el (יָתִנְיֵל, yathnī'ēl, "God lives"): Fourth "son" of Meshelemiah, a Korahite (1 Ch 26 2).

JATTIR, jat'ēr (יַתִּיר, yattīr, and יַתִּיר, yattir): A town in the hill country of Judah, mentioned in conjunction with Shamir and Socoh (Josh 15 48); one of the cities given to the "children of Aaron the priest" (Josh 21 14; 1 Ch 6 57). David after his victory over the Amalekites sent a present of the spoil from Ziklag "to them that were in Jattir" (1 S 30 27).

It is now Khirbet 'Attir, an important ruin, in the extreme S. of the hill country, 5 miles S.E. of edh Dhariyeh and 20 miles S.E. of Beit Jibrin. This must correspond to the "very large village Jethira" which is mentioned in Onom (119 27; 133 3; 134 24, etc) as 20 miles S.E. of Eleutheropolis (i.e. Beit Jibrin). The site is full of caves. See PEF, III, 408, Sh XXV. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

JAVAN, jā'van (יָוָן, yāwān, meaning unknown):

(1) In Gen 10 2-4 = 1 Ch 1 5-7 (LXX 'Ιωάν, Iōuān); Isa 66 19; Ezk 27 13 (LXX 'Ελλάς, Hellás, Greece); Dnl 8 21 m; 10 20; 11 2; Zec 9 13; Joel 3 6 (Heb 4 6) (LXX of Ἑλλήνες, hoi Hēllēnes, i.e. "Greeks"), "son" of Japheth, and "father" of Elishah, Tarshish, Kittim, and Rodarim, i.e. Rhodes (incorrectly "Dodanin" in Gen 10 4). Javan is the Gr Iáwōn, Iáōn, or Iá(φ)wōn, Iá(v)ōn, and in Gen and 1 Ch = the Ionian Greeks of Asia Minor, probably here = Cyprus. The reference in Ezk 27 13 (from which that in Isa 66 19 is copied) is the country personified. In Joel the pl. יָוָנִים, yāwānīm, is found. In Dnl the name is extended to the Greeks generally. Corroboration of the name is found in Assyr (KB, II, 43). "The Pers Yauna occurs in the same double reference from the time of Darius; cf Aesch. Pers., 176, 562" (Skinner, Gen, 198). In Egypt the word is said to be yāwān(n)-a; in the Am Tab Yavana is mentioned as being in the land of Tyre. See HDB, II, 552b.

(2) Place (Ezk 27 19); name wanting in LXX. DAVID FRANCIS ROBERTS

JAVELIN, jav'lin, jav'e-lin. See ARMOR; ARMS.

JAW, jā (יָכֶה, l'hī, "cheek [bone]"), "jaw [bone]"), JAWBONE, jā'bōn, JAW TEETH: In Job 41 2, RV gives "pierce his jaw through with a hook" for AV "bore his jaw through with a thorn" (see Hook; LEVIATHAN). Ps 22 15, "My tongue cleaveth to my jaws [mal'kō'h]," is descriptive of the effect of a fever or physical torture, a dryness and a horrible clamminess. Mal'kōhayim is an ancient dual form meaning the two jaws, and, metaphorically, mal'kō'h indicates that which is caught between the jaws, booty, prey, including captives (Nu 31 11.26.32; Isa 49 24f).

Figurative: (1) Of the power of the wicked, with a reference to Divine restraint and discipline: "I brake the jaws [Heb "great teeth"] of the unrighteous" (Job 29 17; Prov 30 14); cf Ps 58 6, "Break out the great teeth [mal'kō'ōh, "jaw teeth"] of the young lions, O Jeh." Let the wicked be deprived of their ability for evil; let them at least be disabled from mischief. LXX reads "God shall break," etc. (Cf Edmund Prys's Metrical Paraphrase of the Pss, in loc.) "A bridle . . . in the jaws of the peoples" (Isa 30 28; cf 2 K 19 28) is descriptive of the ultimate check of the Assyr power at Jerus, "as when a bridle or lasso is thrown upon the jaws of a wild animal when you wish to catch and tame him" (G. A. Smith, Isa, I, 235). Cf Ezk 29 4 (concerning Pharaoh); 38 4 (concerning Gog), "I will put hooks in [into] thy jaws." (2) Of human labor and trials, with a reference to the Divine gentleness: "I was to them as they that lift up the yoke on their jaws" (Hos 11 4), or "take the yoke off their jaws," as the humane driver eased the yoke with his hands or "lifted it forward from neck to the jaws"; or it may perhaps refer to the removal of the yoke in the evening, when work is over.

M. O. EVANS

JAZER, jā'zēr (יָזֶר or יָזֶרִי, yā'zēr; LXX 'Ιαζήρ, Iazēn in A; יָזֶר, Iazēr): In some cases, e.g. Nu 21 32, AV reads "Jaazer." This was a city of the Amorites E. of the Jordan taken, along with its towns, by Moses, and occupied by the tribe of Gad (Nu 21 32; 32 35). The country was very fertile, and its spacious pasture-lands attracted the flock-masters of Gad (32 1), the southern border of whose territory it marked (Josh 13 25). It was assigned to the Merarite Levites (Josh 21 39; 1 Ch 6 81). The place was reached by Joab when taking the census (2 S 24 5). In the 40th year of King David mighty men of valor were found here to whom he intrusted the oversight in Reuben and Gad "for every matter pertaining to God, and for the affairs of the king" (1 Ch 26 32 f). The fruitfulness of the country is alluded to in Isa 16 8 f; Jer 48 32. (Note: "Sea of" Jazer in this verse has arisen through accidental repetition of yām, "sea," from the preceding clause.) The city was taken from the Ammonites by Judas Maccabaeus, and burned (1 Macc 5 7.8; Ant, XII, viii, 1).

Onom places Jazer 10 Rom miles W. of Philadelphia (Amman), and about 15 miles from Heshbon, where a great stream rises, which flows into the Jordan. Many would identify it with Khirbet Šar, on the S. of Wādī Šir, about 5 miles W. of Amman. The perennial stream from Wādī Šir reaches the Jordan by Wādī el-Kefrein. Cheyne (EB, s.v.) suggests Yajūz on Wādī Zorby, a tributary of the Jabbok, with extensive Rom remains. It lies a little way to the E. of el Jubeihāt ("Jogbehah." Nu 32 35). It is situated, however, to the N. and not to the W. of Amman, where Onom places it. Neither identification is certain.

JAZIZ, jā'ziz (יָזִיז, yāzīz, meaning uncertain): The Hagrite who was over David's flocks (1 Ch 27 30 [Heb 31]).

JEALOUSY, jel'us-i (כִּנְיָה, kin'āh; ζήλος, zēlos): Doubtless, the root idea of both the Gr and the Heb tr'd "jealousy" is "warmth," "heat." Both are used in a good and a bad sense—to represent right and wrong passion.

When jealousy is attributed to God, the word is used in a good sense. The language is, of course, anthropomorphic; and it is based upon the feeling in a husband of exclusive right in his wife. God is conceived as having wedded Israel to Himself, and as claiming, therefore, exclusive devotion. Disloyalty on the part of Israel is represented as adultery, and as provoking God to jealousy. See, e.g., Dt 32 16.21; 1 K 14 22; Ps 78 58; Ezk 8 3; 16 38.42; 23 25; 36 5; 38 19.

When jealousy is attributed to men, the sense is sometimes good, and sometimes bad. In the good sense, it refers to an ardent concern for God's honor. See, e.g., Nu 25 11 (cf 1 K 19 10; 2 K 10 16); 2 Cor 11 2 (cf Rom 10 2). In the bad sense, it is found in Acts 7 9; Rom 13 13; 1 Cor 3 3; 2 Cor 12 20; Jas 3 14.16.

The "law of jealousy" is given in Nu 5 11-31. It provided that, when a man suspected his wife of conjugal infidelity, an offering should be brought to the priest, and the question of her guilt or innocence should be subjected to a test there carefully prescribed. The test was intended to be an appeal to God to decide the question at issue. See ADULTERY; SACRIFICE. E. J. FORRESTER

JEALOUSY, WATER OF. See ADULTERY, (2).

JEARIM, jē'a-rim, jē-ā-rim, MOUNT (יְרֵמֹה, har-y'ārīm): A mountain by the side of which passed the border of Judah (Josh 15 10). It is mentioned here only; and is identical with CHESALON (q.v.).

JEATHERAI, jē-ath'ē-ri (RV), JEATERAI, jē-at'ē-ri (AV) (יְעָתֵרַי, y'ath'aray, meaning unknown): A descendant of Gershon, "son" of Levi (1 Ch 6 21 [Heb 6]), and probably an ancestor of Asaph (so commentators); in vs 39-43 the corresponding name is "Ethni." The difference in the Heb words is not great.

JEBERECHIAH, je-ber-ê-kî'a (יְבֶרֶכְיָהוּ, yēbherekhyāhū, "Jeh blesses"): The father of the Zechariah whom Isaiah (8 2) took as a witness of his prophecy against Syria and Ephraim (c 734 BC).

JEBUS, jē'bus (יְבוּס, yēbhūs; Ἰεβούς, Iebouús):
In Jgs 19 10.11, "Jebus (the same is Jerus)"; 1 Ch
11 4.5, "Jerus (the same is Jebus)." It was once thought that this was the first name of Jerus, as indeed might be suggested by the Bib. references, but it is now known from the Am Tab that Urusa-lem was a name used centuries before the time of David (see JERUSALEM, I). It would appear probable that the name "Jebus" was evolved by the Hebrews as an alternate name, and possibly they may have imagined an earlier name, for Jerus from JEBUSITE (q.v.), the name of the local tribe who owned the district in the first centuries of Israel's occupation of Canaan. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

JEBUS, jē'bus, JEBUSI, jeb'û-sî, JEBUSITE, jeb'û-zît (יְבוּסִי, yēbhūsî, ha-yēbhūsî): "Jebbus" is an old name for Jerus (Jgs 19 10.11; 1 Ch
4.5 || 2 S 5 6-9, "the same is Jerus"; see preceding article). "Jebusi" (lit. "Jebusite") is also used as a name for the city in AV (Josh 18 16.28; cf 15 8); RV correctly renders "Jebusite" (see JERUSALEM). "Jebusites," for the people (in AV Gen 15 21; Ex 3 8 17, etc), does not occur in Heb in the pl.; hence in RV is always rendered in the sing., "Jebusite." The "Jebusite" is said in Gen 10 16; 1 Ch 1 14 to be the 3d son of Canaan, i.e. of the country of Canaan. Elsewhere he represents a tribe separate from the Canaanites. He stands between Heth and the Amorite (cf Nu 13 29; Josh 11 3; Ezk 16 3 45). In the lists of the peoples inhabiting Pal the "Jebusite" is always placed last, a fact indicative, probably, of their smaller number.

To what race the Jebusites belonged is doubtful.
Their name does not seem Sem, and they do not make their appearance till after the patriarchal period.

The original name of Jerus was Bab, Uru-Salim, "the city of Salim," shortened into Salem in Gen 14 18 and in the inscriptions of the Egypt kings Ramses II and Ramses III. In the Am Tab (1400 BC) Jerus is still known as Uru-Salim, and its king bears a Hittite name, implying that it was at the time in the possession of the Hittites. His enemies, however, were closing around him, and one of the tablets shows that the city was eventually captured and its king slain. These enemies would seem to have been the Jebusites, since it is after this period that the name "Jebus" makes its appearance for the first time in the OT (Jgs 19 10.11).

The Jebusite king at the time of the conquest was Adoni-zedek, who met his death at Beth-horon (Josh 10 1 ff; in ver 5 the word "Amorite" is used in its Bab sense to denote the inhabitants of Canaan generally). The Jebusites were a mountain tribe (Nu 13 29; Josh 11 3). Their capital "Jebus" was taken by the men of Judah and burned with fire (Jgs 1 8), but they regained possession of, and held, the fortress till the time of David (2 S 5 6 ff).

When Jerus was taken by David, the lives and property of its Jebusite inhabitants were spared, and they continued to inhabit the temple-hill, David and his followers settling in the new City of David on Mt. Zion (Josh 15 8.63; Jgs 1 21; 19 11).
And as Araunah is called "king" (2 S 24 23), we may conclude that their last ruler also had been allowed to live. His name is non-Sem, and the various spellings of it (cf 1 Ch 21 15, "Ornan") indicate that the Heb writers had some difficulty in pronouncing it. The Jebusites seem ultimately to have blended with the Israelitish population.

JECAMIAH, jek-a-mî'a: AV for JEKAMIAH (q.v.).

JECHILIAH, jek-i-lî'a (יְכִילְיָהוּ, yēkhilyāh). See JECHOLIAH; Kêthibh and 2 Ch 26 3 RV, where Kêrê is יְכִלְיָהוּ, yēkholyāh = "Jecoliah" (AV).

JECHOLIAH, jek-ê-lî'a (יְכִלְיָהוּ, yēkholyāhū;
2 K 15 2 AV = יְכִלְיָהוּ, yēkholyāh, Kêrê in 2 Ch 26 3, "Jeh is able" or "Jeh has been able"): The mother of King Uzziiah (Azariah) of Judah. RV has "Jecoliah" in 2 K and so AV in 2 Ch.

JECHONIAS, jek-ê-nî'as (Ἰεχονίας, Iechontias, AV; Gr form of "Jechoniah," RV):

(1) The altered form of Jehoichin (Ad Est 11 4; Bar 1 3.9; Mt 1 11.12). The last but one of the kings of Judah.

(2) The son of Zeelus (1 Esd 8 92), called "Shec-aniah" in Ezr 10 2.

JECOLIAH, jek-ê-lî'a: 2 K 15 2; 2 Ch 26 3 AV;
see JECHILIAH; JECHOLIAH.

JECONIAH, jek-ê-nî'a. See JEHOIACHIN.

JECONIAS, jek-ê-nî'as (Ἰεχονίας, Iechonias):

(1) One of the chiliarchs who made great gifts of sheep and calves at the Passover of Josiah (1 Esd 1 9); called "Conaniah" in 2 Ch 35 9.

(2) One reading makes Jeconias (not Joachaz) son of Josiah in 1 Esd 1 34 m.

JEDIAIAH, jē-dā'ya, jē-dî'a:

(1) יְדִי'יָהוּ, yēdhā'yāh, "Jeh knows":

(a) A priest in Jerus (1 Ch 9 10; 24 7).

(b) Ezr 2 36 = Neh 7 39, where "children of Jediaiah" are mentioned = "Jeddu" in 1 Esd 5 24.

(c) J. is among "the priests and the Levites" that returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 11 10; 12 6.19).

(d) Another priest of the same name (Neh 12 7.21).

(e) One of the exiles whom Zechariah was commanded to send with silver and gold to Jerus. LXX does not take the word as a proper name (Zec 6 10.14).

(2) יְדִי'יָהוּ, yēdhā'yāh, "Jeh throws" [?]:

(a) Father of a Simeonite prince (1 Ch 4 37).

(b) One of the repairers of the wall of Jerus (Neh
3 10).

JEDDU, jed'ōō (Ἰέδδου, Iédidou): Called JE-DAIAH (q.v. 1, [b]) in canonical books (1 Esd 5 24).

JEDEUS, je-dē'us (Ἰεδατος, Iedatos): Called ADAIAH (q.v.) in Ezr 10 29 (1 Esd 9 30).

JEDIAEL, jē-dî'el (יְדִי'אֵל, yēdhî'ā'el, "God makes known" [?]):

(1) A "son" of Benjamin or probably of Zebu-lun (1 Ch 7 6.10.11). See Curtis, Ch, 145-49, who suggests emending the name to יְהִלְיָהוּ, yahl'yāh, Jahleel, in agreement with Gen 46 24.

(2) One of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11 45), probably = the Manassite who deserted to David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12 20 [Heb 21]).

(3) A Korahite doorkeeper in David's reign (1 Ch 26 2).

JEDIDAH, jē-dî'da (יְדִידָה, yēdhîdāh, "beloved"): Mother of King Josiah of Judah, daughter of Adaiah of Bozkath (2 K 22 1).

3. Israel and Syria (1 K 19:22): Hazael had been selected, together with Jehu, as the instrument by which the idolatry of Israel was to be punished (1 K 19 16). Later the instruments of vengeance fell out. On Jehu's death, the pressure from the east on Hazael was greatly relieved. The great conqueror, Shalmaneser II, had died, and his son Samsi-Ramman IV had to meet a revolt within the empire, and was busy with expeditions against Babylon and Media during the 12 years of his reign (824–812 BC). During these years, the kingdoms of the seaboard of the Mediterranean were unmolested. They coincide with the years of Jehoahaz, and explain the freedom which Hazael had to harass the dominions of that king.

Particulars of the several campaigns in which the troops of Damascus harassed Israel are not given. The life of Elisha extended through the 3 reigns of Jehoram (12 years), Jehu (28 years) and Jehoahaz (12 or 13 years).

4. The Elisha Episodes

into the reign of Joash (2 K 13 14). It is therefore probable that in the memorabilia of his life in 2 K 4–8, now one and now another king of Israel should figure, and that some of the episodes there recorded belong to the reign of Jehoahaz. There are evidences that strict chronological order is not observed in the narrative of Elisha, e.g. Gehazi appears in waiting on the king of Israel in 8 5, after the account of his leprosy in 5 27. The terrible siege of Samaria in ch 7 is generally referred to the reign of Jehoram; but no atmosphere is so suitable to it as that of the reign of Jehoahaz, in one of the later years of whom it may have occurred. The statement in 13 7 that "the king of Syria destroyed them, and made them like the dust in threshing," and the statistics there given of the depleted army of Jehoahaz, would correspond with the state of things that siege implies. In this case the Ben-hadad of 2 K 6 24 would be the son of Hazael (13 3).

Jehoahaz, like his father, maintained the calf-worship in Bethel and Dan, and revived also the cult of the Asherah, a form of Canaanitic idolatry introduced by Ahab

5. His Idolatry

(1 K 16 33). It centered round a sacred tree or pole, and was probably connected with phallic worship (cf 1 K 15 13, where Maacah, mother of Asa, is said to have "made an abominable image for an Asherah" in Jerus).

The close of this dark reign, however, is brightened by a partial reform. In his distress, we are told, "Jehoahaz besought Jeh, and Jeh hearkened unto him" (2 K 13 4). If the siege of Samaria in ch 6 belongs to his reign, we might connect this with his wearing "sackcloth withun upon his flesh" (ver 30)—an act of humiliation only accidentally discovered by the rending of his garments. Ver 5 goes on to say that "Jeh gave Israel a saviour, so that they went out from under the hand of the Syrians." The "saviour" may refer to Joash, under whom the deliverance began (13 25), or to Jeroboam II, of whom it is declared that by him God "saved" Israel (14 27). Others take it to refer to Ramman-nirari III, king of Assyria, whose conquest of Damascus made possible the victories of these kings. See JEHOASH.

6. Partial Reform

W. SHAW CALDECOTT

(2) A king of Judah, son and successor of Josiah; reigned three months and was deposed, 608 BC. Called "Shallum" in Jer 22 11; cf 1 Ch 3 15. The story of his reign is told in 2 K 23 30–35, and in a briefer account in 2 Ch 36 1–3. The historian of 2 K characterizes his reign as evil; 2 Ch passes no verdict upon him. On the death of his father in battle, which threw the realm into confusion, he, though a younger son (cf 2 K 23 31 with 23 36; 1 Ch 3 15 makes him the fourth son of Josiah), was raised to the throne by "the people of the land," the same who had secured the accession to his father; see under JOSIAH. Perhaps, as upholders of the sterling old Davidic idea, which his father had carried out so well, they saw in him a better hope for its integrity than in his elder brother Jehoiakim (Eliakim), whose tyrannical tendencies may already have been too apparent. The prophets also seem to have set store by him, if we may judge by the sympathetic mentions of him in Jer 22 11 and Ezk 19 3.4. His career was too short, however, to make any marked impression on the history of Judah.

Josiah's ill-advised meddling with the designs of Pharaoh-necoh (see under JOSIAH) had had, in fact, the ill effect of plunging Judah again into the vortex of oriental politics, from which it had long been comparatively free. The Egypt king immediately concluded that so presumptuous a state must not be left in his rear unpunished. Arrived at Riblah on his Mesopotamian expedition, he put Jehoahaz in bonds, and later carried him prisoner to Egypt, where he died; raised his brother Jehoiakim to the throne as a vassal king; and imposed on the realm a fine of a hundred talents of silver and a talent of gold. So the fortunes of the Judacan state, so soon after Josiah's good reign, began their melancholy change for the worse.

(3) In 2 Ch 21 17; 25 23 = AHAZIAH, king of Judah (q.v.) (2 K 8 25 ff; 2 Ch 22 1 ff).

JEHOASH, jê-hô'ash, the uncontracted form of JOASH (יְהוֹשָׁא, yêhō'ash, יוֹשָׁא, yô'ash, "Jeh hath bestowed"; cf 2 K 11 2.21; 12 1 19; 2 Ch 24 1, etc; Ἰωᾶς, Iōās).

(1) The 9th king of Judah; son of Ahaziah and Zibiah, a woman of Beersheba (2 K 11–12; 2 Ch 22 10–24 27). Jehoash was 7 years old at his accession, and reigned 40 years. His accession may be placed in 852 BC. Some include in the years of his reign the 6 years of Athaliah's usurpation.

When, on Athaliah's usurpation of the throne, she massacred the royal princes, J. was saved from her unnatural fury by the action of his

the high priest (2 K 11 1.2; 2 Ch 22 10.11). During 6 years he was concealed in the house of Jehoiada, which adjoined the temple; hence is said to have been "hid in the house of Jeh"—a perfectly legitimate use of the phrase according to the idiom of the time.

During these formative years of J.'s early life, he was under the moral and spiritual influence of Jehoiada—a man of lofty character and devout spirit. At the end of 6 years, a counter-revolution was planned by Jehoiada, and was successfully carried out on a Sabbath, at one of the great festivals. The accounts of this revolution in K and Ch supplement each other, but though the Levitical interest of the Chronicler is apparent in the details to which he gives prominence, the narratives do not necessarily collide, as has often been represented. The event was prepared for by the young king being privately exhibited to the 5 captains of the "executioners" (RV "Carites") and "runners" (2 K 11 4; 2 Ch 23 1). These entered into covenant with Jehoiada, and, by his direction, summoned the Levites from Judah (2 Ch 23 2), and made the necessary arrangements for guarding the palace and the person of the king. In these dispositions both the royal body-guard and the Levites seem to have had their parts. J. next appears standing on a platform in front of the temple, the law of the testimony in his hand and the crown upon his head. Amid acclamations, he is anointed king. Athaliah, rushing on the scene with cries of "treason" (see ATHALIAH), is driven forth and slain. A new covenant is made between Jeh and the king and people, and, at the conclusion of the ceremony, a great procession is formed, and the king is conducted with honor to the royal house (2 K 11 19; 2 Ch 23 20). Thus auspiciously did the new reign begin.

2. The Counter-Revolution

Grown to manhood (cf the age of his son Amaziah, 2 K 14 25), J. married two wives, and by them had sons and daughters (2 Ch 24 3).

3. Repair of the Temple His great concern at this period, however, was the repair of the temple—the “house of Jeh”—which in the reign of Athaliah had been broken up in many places, plundered, and allowed to become dilapidated (2 K 12 5,12; 2 Ch 24 7). To meet the expense of its restoration, the king gave orders that all monies coming into the temple, whether dues or voluntary offerings, should be appropriated for this purpose (2 K 12 4), and from the account in Ch would seem to have contemplated a revival of the half-shekel tax appointed by Moses for the construction of the tabernacle (2 Ch 24 5,6; cf Ex 30 11-16; 38 25). To enforce this impost would have involved a new census, and the memory of the judgments which attended David’s former attempt of this kind may well have had a deterrent effect on Jehoiaada and the priesthood. “The Levites hastened it not,” it is declared (2 Ch 24 5).

Time passed, and in the 23d year of the king’s reign (his 30th year), it was found that the breaches of the house had still not been repaired.

4. A New Expedient A new plan was adopted. It was arranged that a chest with a hole bored in its lid should be set up on the right side of the altar in the temple-court, under the care of two persons, one the king’s scribe, the other an officer of the high priest, and that the people should be invited to bring voluntarily their half-shekel tax or other offerings, and put it in this box (2 K 12 9; 2 Ch 24 8,9). Gifts from worshippers who did not visit the altar were received by priests at the gate, and brought to the box. The expedient proved brilliantly successful. The people cheerfully responded, large sums were contributed, the money was honestly expended, and the temple was thoroughly renovated. There remained even a surplus, with which gold and silver vessels were made, or replaced, for the use of the temple. Jehoiaada’s long and useful life seems to have closed soon after.

With the death of this good man, it soon became evident that the strongest pillar of the state was removed. It is recorded that “J. died that which was right in the eyes of

5. The King’s Declension Jeh all his days wherein Jehoiaada the priest instructed him” (2 K 12 2), but after Jehoiaada had been honorably interred in the sepulchers of the kings (2 Ch 24 16), a sad declension became manifest. The princes of Judah came to J. and expressed their wish for greater freedom in worship than had been permitted them by the aged priest. With weak complaisance, the king “hearkened unto them” (ver 17). Soon idols and Asherahs began to be set up in Jerus and the other cities of Judah. Unnamed prophets raised their protests in vain. The high priest Zechariah, a worthy son of Jehoiaada, testified in his place that as the nation had forsaken Jeh, he also would forsake it, and that disaster would follow (ver 20). Wrathful at the rebuke, the king gave orders that Zechariah should be stoned with stones in the temple-court (ver 21). This was done, and the act of sacrilege, murder, and ingratitude was perpetrated to which Jesus seems to refer in Mt 23 35; Lk 11 51 (“son of Barachiah” in the former passage is probably an early copyist’s gloss through confusion with the prophet Zechariah).

The high priest’s dying words, “Jeh look upon it, and require it,” soon found an answer. Within a year of Zechariah’s death, the armies of Hazael, the Syrian king, were ravaging and laying waste Judah. The city of Gath fell, and a battle, the place of which is not given, placed Jerus at the mercy of the foe (2 K 12 17; 2 Ch 24 23,24). To save the capital from the indignity of foreign occupation, J., then in dire sickness, collected all the hallowed things of the temple, and all the gold of the palace, and sent them to Hazael (2 K 12 17,18). This failure of his policy, in both church and state, excited such popular feeling against J., that a conspiracy was formed to assassinate him. His physical sufferings won for him no sympathy, and two of his own officers slew him, while asleep, in the fortress of Millo, where he was paying a visit (ver 20). He was buried in the city of David, but not in the royal sepulchers, as Jehoiaada had been (2 Ch 24 25).

J. is mentioned as the father of Amaziah (2 K 14 1; 2 Ch 25 25). His contemporaries in Israel were Jehoahaz (2 K 13 1) and Jehoash (2 K 13 10).

(2) The son of Jehoahaz, and 12th king of Israel (2 K 13 10-25; 14 8-16; 2 Ch 25 17-24). Jehoash reigned for 16 years. His acces-

1. Accession and Reign sion may be placed in 813 BC. There were almost simultaneous changes in the sovereignties of Judah and of Assyria—Amaziah succeeding to the throne of Judah in the 2d year of J., and Ramman-nirari III coming to the throne of Assyria in 811 BC—which had important effects on the history of Israel in this reign.

During the three previous reigns, for half a century, Elisha had been the prophet of Jeh to Israel.

2. Elisha and Jehoash He was now aged and on his deathbed. Hearing of his illness, the young king came to Dothan, where the prophet was, and had a touching interview with him. His affectionate exclamation, “My father, my father, the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof” (2 K 13 14; cf 2 12), casts a pleasing light upon his character. On his lips the words had another meaning than they bore when used by Elisha himself at Elijah’s translation. Then they referred to the “appearance” which parted Elisha from his master; now they referred to the great service rendered by the prophet to the kingdom. Not only had Elisha repeatedly saved the armies of Israel from the ambushes prepared for them by the Syrians (2 K 6 8-23), but he had given assurance of the relief of the capital when it was at its worst extremity (6 24 ff). To J., Elisha’s presence was indeed in place of chariots and horse. The truth was anew demonstrated by the promise which the dying prophet now made to him. Directing J. in the symbolical action of the shooting of certain arrows, he predicted three victories over the Syrians—the first at Aphek, now Fik, on the E. of the Lake of Galilee—and more would have been granted, had the faith of the king risen to the opportunity then afforded him (6 15-19).

An interesting light is thrown by the annals of Assyria on the circumstances which may have made these victories of J. possible. Ram-

3. Assyria and Damascus man-nirari III, who succeeded to the throne in 811 BC, made an expedition against Damascus, Edom and Philistia, in his account of which he says: “I shut up the king [of Syria] in his chief city, Damascus. . . . He clasped my feet, and gave himself up. . . . His countless wealth and goods I seized in Damascus.” With the Syrian power thus broken during the remainder of this ruler’s reign of 27 years, it may be understood how J. should be able to recover, as it is stated he did, the cities which Ben-hadad had taken from his father Jehoahaz (2 K 13 25). Schrader and others see in this Assyr ruler the “saviour” of Israel alluded to in

2 K 13 5; more usually the reference is taken to be to J. himself, and to Jeroboam II (cf 2 K 14 27).

The epitome of J.'s reign is very brief, but the favorable impression formed of him from the acts of Elisha is strengthened by another

4. War gained from the history of Amaziah with Judah (2 K 14 8-16; 2 Ch 25 17-24). For the purpose of a southern campaign, Amaziah had hired a large contingent of troops from Samaria. Being sent back unemployed, these mercenaries committed ravages on their way home, for which, apparently, no redress was given. On the first challenge of the king of Judah, J. magnanimously refused the call to arms, but on Amaziah persisting, the peace established nearly 80 years before by Jehoshaphat (1 K 22 44) was broken at the battle of Beth-shemesh, in which Amaziah was defeated and captured. Jerus opened its gates to the victor, and was despoiled of all its treasure, both of palace and temple. A portion of the wall was broken down, and hostages for future behavior were taken to Samaria (2 K 14 13,14).

J. did not long survive his crowning victory, but left a resuscitated state, and laid the foundation for a subsequent rule which raised

5. Character Israel to the zenith of its power. Jos gives J. a high character for godliness, but, like each of his predecessors, he followed in the footsteps of Jeroboam I in permitting, if not encouraging, the worship of the golden calves. Hence his conduct is pronounced "evil" by the historian (2 K 13 11). He was succeeded by his son Jeroboam II.

JEHOHANAN, jē-hō-hā'nān (יְהוֹחָנָן, y'hōhā-nān, "Jeh is [or has been] gracious"):

(1) A Korahite doorkeeper in David's reign, "son" of Meshelemiah (1 Ch 26 3). LXX, Luc, has "Jehonathan."

(2) One of the five captains over King Jehoshaphat's army (2 Ch 17 15), probably father of Ishmael, "son of J." (2 Ch 23 1).

(3) Ezr 10 6 (AV has "Johanan") = "Johanan" of Neh 12 22 23 = "Jonathan" of Neh 12 11, "son" of Eliashib (Ezr 10 6; but "grandson" in Neh 12 11). He was high priest in Ezra's time = "Jonas" in 1 Esd 9 1 (AV "Joanan").

(4) One of those who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 28) = "Joannes" RV, "Johannes" AV (1 Esd 9 29).

(5) Son of Tobiah, the Ammonite, Nehemiah's opponent (Neh 6 18, AV "Johanan").

(6) Head of the priestly family of Amariah (Neh 12 13).

(7) A priest present at the dedication of the walls of Jerus (Neh 12 42).

(8) The name in the Heb of 2 Ch 28 12. See JOHANAN, (7).

JEHOIACHIN, je-hoi'a-kin (יְהוֹיָכִין, y'hōyā-khīn, "Jeh will uphold"; called also "Jeconiah" in 1 Ch 3 16; Jer 24 1; יְהוֹיָכִין, y'hōyāh, "Jeh will be steadfast," and "Coniah" in Jer 22 24,28; יְהוֹיָכִין, konyāhū, "Jeh has upheld him"; Iōakeīm, Iōakeīm): A king of Judah; son and successor of Jehoiakim; reigned three months and surrendered to Nebuchadnezzar; was carried to Babylon, where, after being there 37 years a prisoner, he died.

The story of his reign is told in 2 K 24 8-16, and more briefly in 2 Ch 36 9-10. Then, after the reign of his successor Zedekiah and

1. Sources the final deportation are narrated, the account of his release from prison 37 years afterward and the honor done him is given as the final paragraph of 2 K (25 27-30). The same thing is told at the end of the Book of Jer (52 31-34). Neither for this reign nor for the succeeding is there the usual reference to state annals; these seem to have been discontinued after Jehoiakim. In Jer 22 24-30 there is a final pronouncement on this king, not so much upon the man as upon his inevitable fate, and a prediction that no descendant of his shall ever have prosperous rule in Judah.

Of the brief reign of J. there is little to tell. It was rather a historic landmark than a reign; but its year, 597 BC, was important as the

2. His date of the first deportation of Jewish Reign captives to Babylon (unless we except the company of hostages carried away in Jehoiakim's 3d [4th] year, Dnl 1 1-7). His coming to the throne was just at or near the time when Nebuchadnezzar's servants were besieging Jerus; and when the Chaldaean king's arrival in person to superintend the siege made apparent the futility of resistance, J. surrendered to him, with all the royal household and the court. He was carried prisoner to Babylon, and with him ten thousand captives, comprising all the better and sturdier element of the people from prince to craftsman, leaving only the poorer sort to constitute the body of the nation under his successor Zedekiah. With the prisoners were carried away also the most valuable treasures of the temple and the royal palace.

Ever since Isaiah fostered the birth and education of a spiritually-minded remnant, for him the vital hope of Israel, the growth and influ-

3. The Two ence of this element in the nation Elements has been discernible, as well in the persecution it has roused (see under MANASSEH), as in its fiber of sound progress. It is as if a sober sanity of reflection were curing the people of their empty idolatries. The feeling is well expressed in such a passage as Hab 2 18-20. Hitherto, however, the power of this spiritual Israel has been latent, or at best mingled and pervasive among the various occupations and interests of the people. The surrender of Jehoiachin brings about a segmentation of Israel on an unheard-of principle: not the high and low in wealth or social position, but the weight and worth of all classes on the one side, who are marked for deportation, and the refuse element of all classes on the other, who are left at home. With which element of this strange sifting Jeremiah's prophetic hopes are identified appears in his parable of the Good and Bad Figs (Jer 24), in which he predicts spiritual integrity and upbuilding to the captives, and to the home-staying remainder, shame and calamity. Later on, he writes to the exiles in Babylon, advising them to make themselves at home and be good citizens (Jer 29 1-10). As for the hapless king, "this man Coniah," who is to be their captive chief in a strange land, Jeremiah speaks of him in a strain in which the stern sense of Jeh's inexorable purpose is mingled with tender sympathy as he predicts that this man shall never have a descendant on David's throne (Jer 22 24-30). It is as if he said, All as Jeh has ordained, but—the pity of it!

In the first year of Nebuchadnezzar's successor, perhaps by testamentary edict of Nebuchadnezzar himself, a strange thing occurred.

4. Thirty- J, who seems to have been a kind of seven Years hostage prisoner for his people, was Later released from prison, honored above all the other kings in similar case, and thenceforth to the end of his life had his portion at the royal table (2 K 25 27-30; Jer 52 31-34). This act of clemency may have been due to some such good influence at court as is described in the Book of Dnl; but also it was a tribute to the good conduct of that better element of the people of which he was hostage and representative. It was the last event of Judaeon royalty; and suggestive for the glimpse it seems to afford of a people whom the Second Isaiah could address as redeemed and forgiven, and of a king taken from durance and judgment (cf Isa 53 8), whose career makes strangely vivid the things that are said of the mysterious "Servant of Jeh." JOHN FRANKLIN GENUNG

JEHOIADA, jē-hoi'a-da (יְהוֹיָדָה, y'hōyādhā, "Jeh knows"; 'Iōḥā, Iōdāc):

(1) Father of Benaiah, the captain of David's body-guard (2 S 8 18; 20 23; 23 20.22; 1 K 1 8, etc.). J. was "the son of a valiant man of Kabzeel" (2 S 23 20), but commentators read with LXX and Ewald, "Benaiah (the son of Jehoiada) a man of valour." Kabzeel was a town belonging to Judah on the border of Edom in the S. (Josh 15 21). In 1 Ch 27 5, we read "Benaiah, the son of Jehoiada the priest, chief," RV, but RVm has "chief minister" wrongly. Yet J. is nowhere else called a priest or even a Levite, though in 1 Ch 12 27 (Heb 28) a J. is mentioned as a military "leader of the house of Aaron," who came to David to Hebron with other members of the house of Levi. In 1 Ch 27 34 there is named among David's counsellors, "J. the son of Benaiah," where some commentators would read with two MSS, "B., the son of J." though Curtis, Crit. and Exeget. Comm. on the Books of Ch, 295, keeps the MT.

(2) Priest in the reigns of Ahaziah, Queen Athaliah, and Jehoash (Joash) of Judah (2 K 11 4—12 16 [Heb 17]=2 Ch 23 1—24 14; 2 Ch 22 11; 24 14—16.17—20.22.25). In 2 K 12 10 (Heb 11) he is called "high priest," and is the first to be given that title, but as the priest lived in the temple, there is no meaning in saying that he "came up," so commentators omit the words, "and the chief priest." According to 2 Ch 22 11, he had married Jehoshabeath (=Jehosheba), the daughter of the king, i.e. Jehoram.

(a) The account in 2 Ch 23 1–21 differs in many respects from that in 2 K 11 4–20, but even the latter has its problems, and Stade

1. Jehoiada (ZATW, 1885, 280 ff) pointed out two sources in it. This view is accepted by many. A reader is struck at once by the double reference to the death of Athaliah (vs 16.20), and the construction of the Heb for "making a covenant" is different in ver 4 from that in ver 17. Stade holds that there is one narrative in 11 4–12.18b–20 and another in vs 13–18a.

In the first, J. makes an agreement with the captains of the foreign body-guard, and arranges that both the incoming and outgoing temple-guard shall be kept in the temple at the time when the guard should be changed on the Sabbath, and also that the young prince, Jehoash, who had been kept in hiding, shall be proclaimed. The captains do this, and the prince is crowned and proclaimed (vs 4–12). Then officers are set up in the temple, and Jehoash is taken to the royal palace and enthroned. The revolt proves popular with the people of Jerus and those of the district, and Athaliah is slain in the palace.

But there are difficulties in this narrative, though the above gives the trend of events; ver 5 refers to a third of the guard who "came in on the sabbath," and ver 7 to two companies who "go forth on the sabbath"; the Heb is, "they that enter the sabbath" and "they that go out of the sabbath." Ver 9 makes clear the connection between vs 5 and 7. But ver 6 introduces a difficulty: it seems to denote a division of those who "enter" into three divisions, i.e. the two in ver 6 and one in ver 5. If ver 6 be omitted, as is proposed by many, this difficulty vanishes. But there still remains the question of the change of guards. Commentators say that "they who enter the sabbath" are those who leave the temple and enter their quarters at the beginning of the Sabbath, presumably, while "those who go out" are those who leave their quarters to mount guard. This is not impossible as an explanation of the Heb. It is further believed that the guard at the temple on the Sabbath was double that on other days. The other explanation, held by older commentators is that on the Sabbath the guard was only half its usual size; this gives another meaning to the Heb phrases. On the other hand, it may be held that the revolt took place at the close of the Sabbath, and that the double-sized guard was kept by J. even after the usual-sized one had come to take their place. It should be added that Wellhausen proposed to read יְהוֹדָה (yē'ādhōth), "armlets" (cf Isa 3 19), for יְהוֹדָה (yē'ādhōth), "testimony," in ver 12; and in ver 19 the words "and all the people of the land" are held to be an addition.

(b) The 2d narrative (vs 13–18a) begins suddenly. Presumably its earlier part was identical with the earlier part of the 1st narrative, unless ver 6 was a part originally of this 2d account. Athaliah hears the noise of the people (ver 13, where "the guard" is a gloss and so to be omitted), and comes to the temple, where she witnesses the revolt and cries, "Treason! treason!" J. orders her to be put forth (omit "between the ranks" in ver 15), so that she should not be slain in the temple, and she is murdered at one of the palace entrances (ver 16, where RV, following LXX of 2 Ch 23 15, trs the first sentence wrongly: it should be "So they laid hands on her"). J. then makes the king and the people enter into a solemn covenant to be Jeh's people, and the result is the destruction of the temple of Baal, and the death of Mattan, its priest (vs 17.18a). This 2d narrative gives a religious significance to the revolt, but it is incomplete. The other narrative presents a very natural course of events, for it was absolutely necessary for J. to secure the allegiance of the royal foreign body-guard.

(c) The account in 2 Ch 23 1–21, though following that of 2 K in the main, differs from it considerably. The guard is here composed of Levites; it does not mention the foreign body-guard, and relates how the revolt was planned with the Levites of the cities of Judah—a method which would have become known to Athaliah and for which she would have made preparations, no doubt. Ch makes it a wholly religious movement, while 2 K gives two points of view. The value of the Chronicler's account depends largely on one's estimate of the Books of Ch and one's views as to the development of the Jewish priestly system. A. Van Hoonacker, Le sacerdoce lévitique dans la loi et dans l'histoire des Hébreux, 93–100, defends the account in 2 Ch.

The part which J. played in the restoration of the temple buildings is described in 2 K 11 21—12 16 (Heb 12 1–17) || 2 Ch 24 1–14. Here

Restoration of the Temple (a) According to 2 K (i) the priests are commanded by Jehoash to devote the dues or free-will offerings of the people to repairing the breaches in the temple. They fail to do so, and (ii) J. is summoned by the king and rebuked. Then (iii) a new regulation is put into force: the offerings, except the guilt offerings and sin offerings, are no longer to be given to the priests, but to be put into a chest provided in the temple for the purpose. (iv) The money got in this way is devoted to repairing the temple, but (v) none of it is used to provide temple vessels.

(b) Ch, on the other hand, (i) relates that the priests and Levites are commanded to go through Judah to collect the necessary money. They "hastened it not." Then (ii) J. is summoned to account for this disobedience, and (iii) a chest is put outside the temple to receive the tax commanded by Moses. (iv) This the people pay willingly, and the temple is repaired. There is such a surplus that (v) there is money also to provide vessels for the temple.

It is at least questionable whether the additions in 2 Ch are trustworthy; the contradictions against 2 K are clear, and the latter gives the more likely narrative, although Van Hoonacker (op. cit., 101-14) defends the former.

According to 2 Ch 24 15, J. lived to be 130 years old, and was buried among the kings—a unique distinction.

(3) AV in Neh 3 6=JOIADA (q.v.).

(4) There is a Jehoiada, the priest mentioned in Jer 29 26, in whose stead Zephaniah was declared priest by Shemaiah in a letter.

Giesebrecht takes him to be the same as the priest of Athaliah's time (see [2] above), but Duhm says that nothing is known of him. In any case, Zephaniah could not have been the direct successor of the well-known Jehoiada, and so the reference can scarcely be to him if it is to have any meaning.

JEHOIAKIM, jê-hoi'a-kim (יהויקים, y'hōyākīm, "Jeh will establish"; Ἰωακίμ, Ioakīm): The name given him by Pharaoh-nechoh, who raised him to the throne as vassal king in place of his brother Jehoahaz, is changed from Eliakim (אֱלִיָּאִים, 'elyākīm, "God will establish"). The change compounds the name, after the royal Judacan custom, with that of Jeh; it may also imply that Necho claims Jeh's authorization for his act, as in a similar way Sennacherib had claimed it for his invasion of Judah (2 K 18 25). He has represented the campaign with which Josiah interfered as undertaken by Divine command (Eli, 2 Ch 35 21); this episode of it merely translates the authorization, rather arrogantly, into the conquered nation's dialect.

A king of Judah, elder (half-) brother and successor of Jehoahaz; reigned 11 years from 608 BC.

1. Sources for His Life and Time.—The circumstances of his accession and raising of the indemnity to Pharaoh-nechoh, followed by a brief

1. Annalistic résumé of his reign, are narrated in 2 K 23 34—24 6. The naming of the source for "the rest of his acts" (24 5) is the last reference we have to "the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah." The account in 2 Ch 36 5-8, though briefer still, mentions Nebuchadnezzar's looting of the temple at some uncertain date in his reign. Neither account has any good to say of J.; to the writer of 2 K, however, his ill fortunes are due to Jeh's retributive justice for the sins of Manasseh; while to the Chronicler the sum of his acts, apparently connected with the desecration of the sanctuary, is characterized as "the abominations which he did." For "the rest of his acts" we are referred, also for the last time, to the "book of the kings of Israel and Judah."

For the moral and spiritual chaos of the time, and for prophecies and incidents throwing much light on the king's character, Jeremiah has

2. Prophetic a number of extended passages, not, however, in consecutive order.

The main ones clearly identifiable with this reign are: 22 13-19, inveighing against the king's tyrannies and predicting his ignominious death; ch 26, dated in the beginning of his reign and again predicting (as had been predicted before in 7 12-15) the destruction of the temple; ch 25, dated in his 4th year and predicting the conquest of Judah and surrounding nations by Nebuchadnezzar; ch 36, dated in the 4th and 5th years, and telling the story of the roll of prophecy which the king destroyed; ch 45, an appendix from the 4th year, reassuring Baruch the scribe. In terms of the larger prophetic scale, for his dismay at what he had to write; ch 46, also an appendix, a reminiscence of the year of Carchemish, containing the oracle then pronounced against Egypt, and giving words of the larger comfort to Judah. The Book of the prophet Habakkuk, written in this reign, gives expression to the prophetic feeling of doubt and dismay at the unrequited ravages of the Chaldeans against a people more righteous than they, with a sense of the value of steadfast faith and of Jeh's world-movement and purpose which explains the seeming enormity.

II. Character and Events of His Reign.—The reign of J. is not so significant for any personal impress of his upon his time as for the fact that it fell in one of the most momentous epochs of ancient history. By the fall of Nineveh in 606 to the assault of Nebuchadnezzar, then crown prince of the rising Bab empire, Assyria, "the rod of [Jeh's] anger" (Isa 10 5), ended its arrogant and inveterate sway over the nations. Nebuchadnezzar, coming soon after to the Chaldaean throne, followed up his victory by a vigorous campaign against Pharaoh-nechoh, whom we have seen at the end of Josiah's reign (see under JOSIAH) advancing toward the Euphrates in his attempt to secure Egypt dominion over Syria and Mesopotamia. The encounter took place in 605 at Carchemish on the northern Euphrates, where Necho was defeated and driven back to the borders of his own land, never more to renew his aggressions (2 K 24 7). The dominating world-empire was now in the hands of the Chaldeans, "that bitter and hasty nation" (Hab 1 6); the first stage of the movement by which the world's civilization was passing from Sem to Aryan control. With this world-movement Israel's destiny was henceforth to be intimately involved; the prophets were already dimly aware of it, and were shaping their warnings and promises, as by a Divine instinct, to that end. It was on this larger scale of things that they worked; it had all along been their endeavor, and continued with increasing clearness and fervor, to develop in Israel a conscience and stamina which should be a leavening power for good in the coming great era (cf Isa 2 2-4; Mic 4 1-3).

Of all these prophetic meanings, however, neither the king nor the ruling classes had the faintest realization; they saw only the political

2. The King's Perverse Character exigencies of the moment. Nor did the king himself, in any patriotic way, rise even to the immediate occasion. As to policy, he was an unprincipled opportunist: vassal to Necho to whom he owed his throne, until Necho himself was defeated; enforced vassal to Nebuchadnezzar for 3 years along with the other petty kings of Western Asia; then rebelling against the latter as soon as he thought he could make anything by it. As to responsibility of administration, he had simply the temper of a despotic self-indulgent Oriental. He raised the immense fine that Necho imposed upon him by a direct taxation, which he farmed out to unscrupulous officials. He indulged himself with erecting costly royal buildings, employing for the purpose enforced and unpaid labor (Jer 22 13-17); while all just interests of his oppressed subjects went wholly unregarded. As to religion, he let matters go on as they had been under Manasseh, probably introducing also the still more strange and heathenish rites from Egypt and the East of which we see the effects in Ezk 8 5-17. And meanwhile the reformed temple-worship which Josiah had introduced seems to have become a mere formal and perfunctory matter, to which, if we may judge by his conspicuous absence from fast and festival occasions (e.g. Jer 26, 36), the king paid no attention. His impious act of cutting up and burning Jeremiah's roll (36 23), as also his vindictive pursuit and murder of Uriah for prophesying in the spirit of Jeremiah (26 20-23), reveal his antipathy to any word that does not prophesy "smooth things" (cf Isa 30 10), and in fact a downright perversity to the name and will of Jeh.

With the onset of the Chaldaean power, prophecy, as represented in the great seers whose words remain to us, reached a crisis which only time and the consistent sense of its larger issues could enable it to weather. Isaiah, in his time, had stood for the inviolability of Zion, and a miraculous deliverance had vindicated his sublime faith. But with Jeremiah, conditions had changed. The idea thus engendered, that the temple was bound to stand and with it Jerus, an idea confirmed by Josiah's centralizing reforms, had become a superstition and a presumption (cf Jer 7 4); and Jeremiah had reached the conviction that it, with its wooden rites and glaring abuses, must go: that nothing short of a clean sweep of the old religious fetishes could cure the inveterate unspirituality of the nation. This conviction of his must needs seem to many like an inconsistency—to set prophecy against itself. And when the Chaldaean appeared on the scene, his counsel of submission and prediction of captivity would seem a double inconsistency; not only a traversing of a tested prophecy, but treason to the state. This was the situation that he had to encounter; and for it he gave his tender feelings, his liberty, his life. It is in this reign of J. that, for the sake of Jehu's word and purpose, he is engulfed in the deep tragedy of his career. And in this he must be virtually alone. Habakkuk is indeed with him in sympathy; but his vision is not so clear; he must weather disheartening doubts, and cherish the faith of the righteous (Hab 2 4), and wait until the vision of Jehu's secret purpose clears (Hab 2 1-3). If the prophets themselves are thus having such an equivocal crisis, we can imagine how forlorn is the plight of Jehu's "remnant," who are dependent on prophetic faith and courage to guide them through the depths. The humble nucleus of the true Israel, which is some day to be the nation's redeeming element, is undergoing a stern seasoning.

After Syria fell into Nebuchadnezzar's power, he seems to have established his headquarters for some years at Riblah; and after J.

4. Harass- attempted to revolt from his authority, ing and he sent against him guerilla bands Death from the neighboring nations, and detachments from his Chaldaean garrisons, who harassed him with raids and depredations. In 2 Ch 36 6,7, it is related that Nebuchadnezzar carried some of the vessels of the temple to Babylon and bound the king in fetters to carry him also to Babylon—the latter purpose apparently not carried out. This was in J.'s 4th year. In Dnl 1 1,2, though ascribed to Jehoiakim's 3d year, this same event is related as the result of a siege of Jerus. It is ambiguously intimated also that the king was deported; and among "the seed royal and of the nobles" who were of the company were Daniel and his three companions (Dnl 1 3,6). The manner of J.'s death is obscure. It is merely said (2 K 24 6) that he "slept with his fathers"; but Jos (Ant, X, vi, 3), perhaps assuming that Jeremiah's prediction (Jer 22 19) was fulfilled, states that Nebuchadnezzar slew him and cast his body outside the walls unburied.

JEHOIARIB, jê-hoi'a-rib (יהויָרִיב, yehōyārīb, "Jeh pleads" or "contends"): A priest in Jerus (1 Ch 9 10); the name occurs again in 1 Ch 24 7 as the name of a family among the 24 courses of priests—the family Joiarib (יִיָרִיב, yōyārīb, same meaning as above, Neh 12 6), the head of which is Mattenai in Neh 12 19. In Neh 11 10 we should probably read "Jedaiah and Joiarib" for "Jedaiah the son of Joiarib" (cf 1 Ch 9 10). Jehoiarib = Joarib in 1 Macc 2 1.

JEHONADAB, jê-hon'a-dab (יהונָדָב, yehōnādhābh, either "Jeh is noble" or "liberal," or "Jeh has impelled") = Jonadab (יֹנָדָב, yōnādhābh, same meaning):

(1) Jehonadab in Heb of 2 S 13 5; but Jonadab in EV, and in Heb and EV of 13 3,32,35; son of Shimeah, King David's brother. He was friendly with Amnon his cousin, and is said to be "a very shrewd [RV "subtle"] man." He planned to get Tamar to wait upon Amnon. Two years after, when Absalom had murdered Amnon, and David had heard that all the king's sons were assassinated, J. assured him that only Amnon was killed; and his reassuring tone is justified (ver 35); possibly he knew of Absalom's intentions. LXX, Luc, has "Jonathan" in 13 3 ff; and in 2 S 21 21 || 1 Ch 20 7, there is mentioned a son of Shimei (= "Shimeah," 1 Ch 20 7 = "Shammah," 1 S 16 9), whose name is Jonathan. See JONATHAN, (4).

(2) Jehonadab in 2 K 10 15,23; in Heb of Jer 35 8,14,16,18 = Jonadab in Jer 35 6,10,19, and EV of 35 8,14,16,18, "son" of Rechab, of the Kenite clan (1 Ch 2 55). J. is described in 2 K 10 as an ally of Jehu in the abolition of Baal-worship in Samaria. Jehu met him after slaying the son of Ahab (10 15); the second part of the verse should probably be tr'd 'And he greeted him and said to him, Is thy heart upright [with me] as my heart is with thee? And Jehonadab answered, Yes. Then spake Jehu [so LXX], If so, give me thy hand.' In Jer 35 (where EV has Jonadab throughout), he is called the "father" of the Rechabites, who derived from him their ordinances for their nomadic life and abstention from wine. See RECHAB, RECHABITES.

JEHONATHAN, jê-hon'a-than (יהונָתָן, yehōnāthān, "Jeh has given"): The name is the same as Jonathan: the Heb has the two forms for the same person sometimes; sometimes only one is found. See JONATHAN. The form "Jehonathan" occurs as follows in EV:

(1) A Levite who took part in teaching the Torah in the cities of Judah under Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 17 8 EV and Heb).

(2) Head of the priestly family of Shemaiah (Neh 12 18 EV and Heb).

(3) AV and Heb in 1 Ch 27 25; see JONATHAN, (7).

JEHORAM, jê-hō'ram, written also in the abbreviated form, JORAM (יהורָם, yehōrām, יִרְם, yōrām, "Jeh is high"; RV retains "Joram" for Heb y'hōrām in 2 K 9 15-24):

(1) Ninth king of Israel (2 K 1 17—9 28), son of Ahab and Jezebel, successor to his brother Ahaziah, who died childless. He began to reign 853 BC, and reigned 12 years (2 K 3 1; 8 16).

The statement in 2 K 1 17, "the second year of Jehoram," follows a system of chronology common to the Lucian group of MSS, in which the 1st year of Jehoshaphat falls in the 11th year of Omri; the 24th year of Jehoshaphat in the 1st year of Ahaziah; and the 1st year of Jehoram in the 2d year of Jehoram of Judah. The double chronology (2 K 1 17 and 2 K 3 1) is due to the intention of the compiler of K to refer all the acts of Elisha to the reign of Jehoram, thus dislocating the order of events in that reign. Elisha, however, survived Jehoram many years, and it is possible that some of the events are to be referred to subsequent reigns.

It is difficult to estimate the religious character of J. Apparently the fierce fanaticism of Jezebel and the boldness of Ahab reappear in the son in the form of duplicity and superstition. The attempt of Jezebel to substitute Baal for Jeh had failed. The people were on the side of Jeh.

Otherwise Jehu could not have carried out his bloody reform. All the worshippers of Baal in the land could be gathered into one temple of Baal (2 K 10 18 ff). Evidently J. feared the people. Accordingly he posed as a reformer by putting away the pillar of Baal (2 K 3 2), while secretly he worshipped Baal (3 13a). Nevertheless, when he got into straits, he expected to receive the help of Jeh (3 13b). He had not learned that a dual nature is as impossible as a union of Baal and Jeh.

Immediately upon his accession, J. came into conflict with Mesha, king of Moab (2 K 3 4 ff).

The account of the conflict is of special interest because of the supplementary information concerning Mesha furnished by the Moabite Stone. There we learn (ll. 1-8) that Moab became tributary to Israel in the days of Omri, and remained so for forty years, but that it rebelled in the days of Ahab. This probably brings us to the statement in 2 K 3 4 ff that Mesha "rendered unto the king of Israel the wool of a hundred thousand lambs, and of a hundred thousand rams," and that "when Ahab was dead, . . . the king of Moab rebelled against the king of Israel." The victories of Mesha, glorified by the M S, possibly took place before the events of 2 K 3 4 ff. Accordingly, J. resolved to recover the allegiance of the Moabites. He called to his aid the ally of his father, Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, and the latter's vassal, the king of Edom. J. was entertained at Jerus (Jos, Ant, IX, iii, 1). The allies marched against Moab by the longer route, around the southern end of the Dead Sea, indicating that Moab was fortified against attack from the W., and that Israel was weak in the East Jordan country. After the allies had been miraculously delivered from perishing for lack of water, they devastated the land and sacked the cities, and finally they succeeded in shutting up Mesha in Kir-hareseth. Driven to despair, Mesha offered his eldest son upon the wall as a burnt offering to Chemosh. This seems to have caused the tide to turn, for "there was great wrath against Israel," and the allies returned to their own land, apparently having failed to secure a lasting advantage.

Assuming that 2 K 4-8 belong to the reign of J., it appears that the Syrians made frequent incursions into the land of Israel, perhaps more

3. The Conflicts with Syria in the nature of plundering robber bands than invasions by a regular army (2 K 6). Finally, however, Ben-hadad in person invaded the country and besieged Samaria. The inhabitants were reduced to horrible straits by famine, when the oppressors took sudden flight and Israel was saved. In the years 849, 848, and 845, Shalmaneser II invaded Syria. It is probable that during this period J. recovered Ramoth-gilead, which had fallen to Syria under Ahab. Hazael succeeded Ben-hadad as ruler of Syria, and his first act, after having murdered his predecessor, was to regain Ramoth-gilead. In the defence of the city, J., who was assisted by his nephew, Ahaziah, was wounded, and returned to Jezreel to be healed of his wounds.

J. left the army at Ramoth-gilead under the command of Jehu, a popular captain of the host. While

4. The Conspiracy of Jehu J. was at Jezreel, Elisha sent a prophet to anoint Jehu as king of Israel. Jehu spiracy of had been a witness of the dramatic scene when Elijah hurled the curse of Jch at Ahab for his crime against Naboth. Jehu at once found in himself the instrument to bring the curse to fulfilment. Accordingly, he conspired his crime against J. With a company of horsemen he proceeded to Jezreel, where Ahaziah was visiting his sick uncle, J. J. suspected treachery, and, in company with Ahaziah, he rode out to meet Jehu. On his question, "Is it peace, Jehu?" he received a brutal reply that no longer left him in doubt as to the intention of the conspirator. As J. turned to flee, Jehu drew his bow and shot him in the back so that the arrow pierced his heart. His dead body was thrown into the plat of ground that had belonged to Naboth.

(2) King of Judah, son of Jehoshaphat (2 K 8 16-24; 2 Ch 21 1-20), he began to rule about 849 and reigned 8 years. With reference to the chronological difficulty introduced by 2 K 1 17, see (1) above.

In the beginning of the reigns of Ahab and Jehoshaphat, an attempt was made to end the old feud

1. His Marriage between Israel and Judah. At the suggestion of Ahab, the two kingdoms, for the first time, joined forces against the common foe from the N., the Syrians. To seal the alliance, Athaliah, daughter of Jezebel and Ahab, was married to J., son of Jehoshaphat. Thus Jehoram was brother-in-law to

(1) above. No doubt this was considered as a master stroke of conciliatory policy by the parties interested. However, it proved disastrous for Judah. Beyond a doubt, the unholy zeal of Jezebel included the Baalizing of Judah as well as of Israel. This marriage was a step in that direction.

"A man shall leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife." J. did so. "He walked

2. His Idolatry in the ways of the kings of Israel, as did the house of Ahab" (2 K 8 18). According to 2 Ch 21 11,13, J. not only accepted the religion of Athaliah, but he became a persecutor, compelling the inhabitants of Jerus and of the land to become apostates.

Because of his gross idolatry and his wickedness, he is said (2 Ch 21 12 ff) to have received a denunciatory letter from the prophet Elijah, which, however, had no effect on him. But this leads to a chronological difficulty. Was Elijah still alive? The inference from 2 K 3 11 is that he was not. Then, too, the Chronicler otherwise never mentions Elijah. Oettli is of the opinion that one should either read "Elisha" for "Elijah," or else consider the letter to have been the conception of a later writer, who felt that Elijah must have taken note of the wickedness of J. and his wife, Athaliah, daughter of Ahab. In the latter event, the letter might be called a haggadic Midrash.

A man's religion cannot be divorced from his character. Baalism had in it the elements of tyranny and civic unrighteousness.

4. His Character In keeping with his religion, and in true oriental fashion, J. began his reign by murdering his brothers, and other princes of the land, to whom Jehoshaphat had given valuable gifts and responsible positions. The only event belonging to his reign recorded in K is the revolt of Edom.

5. The Revolt of Edom Edom was subdued by David, and, probably with the exception of a temporary revolt under Solomon (1 K 11 14 ff), it had remained subject to the united kingdom or to Judah until the revolt under J. The text is somewhat obscure, but both accounts indicate that the expedition of J. against Edom ended in failure. In the account we are told that at the same time Libnah revolted.

Perhaps the revolt of Libnah should be taken in connection with the invasion of the Philis and of the Arabians, mentioned in 2 Ch 21.

6. The Raid into Judah Libnah was located on the southwestern border of Judah. Since it was a border city, it is possible that the compiler of K considered it as belonging to Philistia. In the account in Ch, J. is represented as having lost all his possessions and all his family, save Jehoahaz, the youngest of his sons, when the town was sacked and the palace plundered by the invading force of Philis and Arabians. The account appears to be based upon reliable sources.

In his last days, he was afflicted with a frightful disease in the bowels. His death was unregretted,

7. His Death and his burial without honor. Contrast, however, 2 K 8 24 with 2 Ch 21 20. Ahaziah, also called Jehoahaz, his younger son, then became king in his stead.

JEHOSHABEATH, jē-hō-shab'ā-th (יְהוֹשָׁבֶעֱת), y'hōshabh'ath, "Jeh is an oath": In 2 Ch 22 11=JEHOSHEBA (q.v.) of 2 K 11 2.

JEHOSHAPHAT, jē-hosh'a-fat (יְהוֹשָׁפָט), y'hō-shāphāt, "Jeh has judged":

(1) King of Judah. See separate article.

(2) Son of Ahilud. He was recorder under David

(2 S 8 16; 20 24; 1 Ch 18 15) and Solomon (1 K 4 3).

(3) Son of Paruah, and Solomon's overseer in Issachar to provide victuals for the royal household for one month of the year (1 K 4 17).

(4) Son of Nimshi, and father of Jehu, king of Northern Israel (2 K 9 2.14). His name is omitted in 9 20 and 1 K 19 16, where Jehu is called "son of Nimshi."

JEHOSHAPHAT, jê-hosh'a-fat (יְהוֹשָׁפָט, yhō-shāphāt, "Jeh judges"): The 4th king of Judah, son of Asa. His mother was Azubah, the daughter of Shilhi, of whom nothing further is known. He was 35 years of age at his accession, and reigned 25 years, c 873-849 BC. The history of his reign is contained in 1 K 22 41-50 and in 2 Ch 17 1-21 1. The narrative in 1 K 22 1-35a and in 2 K 3 4 ff belongs to the history of the Northern Kingdom. The absence from K of the details contained in 2 Ch affords no presumption against their truth. Neither do high numbers, embellished statements, and the coloring of the writer's own age destroy the historical perspective.

The reign of J. appears to have been one of unusual religious activity. It was, however, characterized not so much by striking religious measures as it was by the religious spirit that pervaded every act of the king, who sought the favor of Jeh in every detail of his life (2 Ch 17 3.4).

1. His Religious Policy

He evidently felt that a nation's character is determined by its religion. Accordingly, he made it his duty to purify the national worship. The "sodomites," i.e. those who practised immorality in the worship of Jeh in the temple precincts, were banished from the land (1 K 22 46). The Asherim were taken out of Judah (2 Ch 17 6; 19 3), and "the people from Beer-sheba to the hill-country of Ephraim were brought back unto Jeh, the God of their fathers" (19 4). Because of his zeal for Jeh, J. is rewarded with power and "riches and honor in abundance" (17 5).

Believing that religion and morals, the foundation and bulwarks of civilization, suffer from ignorance, J. introduced a system of public instruction for the whole land (2 Ch 17 7 ff). He appointed a commission, composed of princes, Levites and priests, to go from city to city to instruct the people. Their instruction was to be based on the one true foundation of sound morals and healthy religious life, "the book of the law of Jeh" (17 7-9).

Next in importance to J.'s system of public instruction, was his provision for the better administration of justice. He appointed

3. His Judicial Institutions

judges to preside over courts of common pleas, which he established in all the fortified cities of Judah. In addition to these local courts, two courts of appeal, an ecclesiastical and a civil court, were established at Jerus to be presided over by priests, Levites, and leading nobles as judges. At the head of the ecclesiastical court of appeal was the high priest, and a layman, "the ruler of the house of Judah," headed the civil court of appeal (2 Ch 19 4-11). The insistence that a judge was to be in character like Jeh, with whom there is "no iniquity . . . nor respect of persons, nor taking of bribes" (19 7), is worthy of note.

According to 2 Ch 17 2, J. began his reign with defensive measures against Israel. Furthermore, he built castles and cities of store in the land of Judah, "and he had many works," probably military supplies, "in the cities of Judah" (17 13).

He appears to have had a large standing army, including cavalry (1 K 22 4; 2 Ch 17 14 ff). However, the numbers in 2 Ch 17 14 ff seem to be impossibly high.

Godliness and security at home were followed by respect and peace abroad. The fact that the

Philis and the Arabians brought tribute (17 11), and that Edom had no king (1 K 22 47), but a deputy instead, who possibly was appointed by J., would indicate that he held the suzerainty over the nations and tribes bordering Judah on the S. and W. Holding the suzerainty over the weaker nations, and being allied with the stronger, J. secured the peace for the greater part of his reign (1 Ch 17 10) that fostered the internal development of the kingdom.

In contrast to the former kings of Judah, J. saw greater benefit in an alliance with Israel than in civil war. Accordingly, the old feud between the two kingdoms (1 K 14 30; 15 6) was dropped, and J. made peace with Israel (22 44). The political union was cemented by the marriage of Jehoram, son of J., to Athaliah, daughter of Ahab and Jezebel. Shortly after the marriage, J. joined Ahab in a campaign against Syria (2 Ch 18 1-3). In view of the subordinate position that J. seems to take in the campaign (1 K 22 4 30), and in view of the military service rendered to Jehoram (2 K 3 4 ff), Judah seems to have become a dependency of Israel. Nevertheless, the union may have contributed to the welfare and prosperity of Judah, and it may have enabled J. to hold the suzerainty over the neighboring nations. However, the final outcome of the alliance with the house of Omri was disastrous for Judah. The introduction into Judah of Baalism more than counterbalanced any political and material advantage gained, and in the succeeding reigns it indirectly led to the almost total extinction of the royal family of Judah (11 1 ff).

In spite of the denunciation of the prophet Jehu for his expedition with Ahab, thus "help[ing] the wicked" (2 Ch 19 2), J. entered into a similar alliance with Jehoram of Israel

(2 K 3 4 ff). On the invitation of Jehoram to join him in an expedition against Moab, J. was ready with the same set speech of acceptance as in the case of Ahab (2 K 3 7; cf 1 K 22 4). For the details of the expedition see JEHOAM, (1).

The Chronicler has given us a very remarkable account of a victory gained by J. over the Moabites and Ammonites. No doubt he made use of a current historical Midr. Many find the historical basis of the Midr in the events recorded in 2 K 3 4 ff. However, the localities are different, and there a defeat is recorded, while in this case we have a victory. The story in outline bears the stamp of probability. 1 K 22 45 seems to suggest wars of J. that are not mentioned in K. The tribes mentioned in the account are represented as trying to make permanent settlement in Judah (2 Ch 20 11). In their advance through the S. of Judah, they were doubtless harassed by the shepherd population of the country. J., according to his custom, sought the help of Jeh. The invading forces fell to quarreling among themselves (2 Ch 20 23), and destroyed one another. The spoil was great because the invaders had brought all their goods with them, expecting to remain in the land.

The destruction of J.'s fleet is recorded in 1 K 22 48.49 and in 2 Ch 20 35-37. However, the two accounts are quite different. 9. Destruction of Je- According to K, J. built ships of hoshaphat's vessels to sail to Ophir for gold, but the Fleet Thereupon Ahaziah offered to assist J. with seamen, but J. refused to enter into the alliance. According to Ch the alliance had been formed, and together they built ships at Ezion-geber, which were destroyed because J. had made an alliance with the wicked king of Israel. In view of J's other alliances, the Chronicler may be in the right. Ch, however, misunderstood the term "ships of Tarshish."

at hand at the resurrection. This, too, was an ordinary place for Jewish graves in preëxilic times (2 K 23 6, etc). The valley today, esp. that part adjacent to the temple, is crowded with Moslem and Jewish graves. A worthless tradition indicates the tomb of Jehoshaphat himself close to the so-called "Pillar of Absalom." See KING'S VALE. There is not the slightest reason for believing that this is the spot referred to by Joel—indeed he may have spoken of an ideal spot only. The valley of the Kidron is a nahal ("ravine"), not an 'emek ("broad valley"). It is impossible not to suspect that there is some connection between the name Jehoshaphat and the name of a village near the head of this valley—Sháphat; perhaps at one time

VALLEY OF JEHOSEPHAT (LOOKING N.E.).

J. died at the age of 60. Jos says (Ant, IX, iii, 2) that he was buried in a magnificent manner, for he had imitated the actions of David. The kingdom was left to 10. His Death Jehoram, who inaugurated the beginning of his reign by causing the massacre of his brethren. S. K. MOSIMAN

JEHOSEPHAT, VALLEY OF (עֵמֶק יְהוֹשָׁפָט, 'emek y'hōshāphāt; the latter word means "Jeh judgeth," and 'emek, "wide," "open valley"; LXX hē koilās Iōsaphát): The name is used in Joel 3 2.12 of the scene of Judgment: "Let the nations bestir themselves, and come up to the valley of Jehoshaphat; for there will I sit to judge all the nations round about" (ver 12). "The valley of decision" (or "sharp judgment") is another name the prophet gives to this spot (ver 14). Some have identified it with the valley ('emek) of BERACAH (q.v.) of 2 Ch 20 26, where King Jehoshaphat obtained a great victory, but this is improbable.

Since the 4th cent. AD the KIDRON (q.v.) valley has been named the Valley of J. The tradition is now strongest among the Moslems who point out the exact scene of the Judgment; the Bridge As Sirāt, dividing heaven and hell, is to stretch across this valley from the Haram area to the Mount of Olives. It is, however, the ambition of every pious Jew to be buried on the slopes of this valley, to be it was Wādy Sháphat, which name would readily suggest the traditional one. See GEHENNA.

JEHOSEBBA, jē-hosh'ē-ba, jē-hō-shē'ba (יְהוֹשֶׁבַע, y'hōshebba, "Jeh is an oath"): Called "Jehoshabeath" in 2 Ch 22 11; daughter of Jehoram king of Judah, possibly by a wife other than Athaliah (2 K 11 2). According to 2 Ch 22 11, she was the wife of Jehoiaada, the priest. She hid Jehoash, the young son of King Ahaziah, and so saved his life from Queen Athaliah.

JEHOSEHUA, jē-hosh'ū-a (יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, y'hōshua', "Jeh is deliverance," or "is opulence"): The usual Heb form of the name "Joshua"; it occurs in AV of Nu 13 16 (ARV "Hoshea"); and in some editions of AV in 1 Ch 7 27, where others have the form "Jehoshuah" (h being wrongly added at the end). See JOSHUA, son of Nun.

JEHOVAH, jē-hō'va, jē-hō'va. See GON, NAMES OF, II, 5.

JEHOVAH-JIREH, jē-hō'va-jī're (יְהוָה יִרְאֶה, yahweh yir'eh, "Jeh sees"): The name given by Abraham to the place where he had sacrificed a ram provided by God, instead of his son Isaac (Gen 22 14). The meaning plainly is that the Lord sees and provides for the necessities of His servants. There is an allusion to ver 8 where Abraham says, "God will provide himself [RVm "will see for himself"] the lamb for a burnt offering." The ver (14 AV) goes on to connect the incident with the popular proverb, "In the mount of the Lord it shall be seen" (RV "provided"), RVm suggests "he shall be seen." "The mount of Jeh" in other places denotes the temple hill at Jerus (Ps 24 3; Isa 2 3, etc). With changes of the punctuation very different readings have been suggested. According to Swete's text: "And A. called the name of that place [the] 'Lord saw' [aorist] in order that they may say today: 'In the mountain [the] Lord was seen'" (aorist). LXX reads, "In the mountain Jeh seeth," or "will see." If there is merely a verbal connection between the clauses we should most naturally read, "In the mount of Jeh one is seen [appears]" i.e. men, people, appear—the reference being to the custom of visiting the temple at pilgrimages (Driver, HDB, s.v.). But if the connection of the proverb with the name "Jehovah-jireh" depends on the double sense of the word "see," then the best explanation may be, Jeh sees the needs of those who come to worship before Him on Zion, and there "is seen," i.e. reveals Himself to them by answering their prayers and supplying their wants. His "seeing," in other words, takes practical effect in a "being seen" (ibid).

JEHOVAH-NISSI, j-nis'i (יהוה ניסי, yahuweh nissī, "Jeh is my banner"): So Moses named the altar which he reared to signalize the defeat of the Amalekites by Israel under Joshua, at Rephidim (Ex 17 15). LXX translates "the Lord my refuge," deriving nissī from נִסַּי, nūs, "to flee." Tg Onkelos reads, "Moses built an altar and worshipped on it before Jeh, who had wrought for him miracles" (יְהוָה נִסָּיו, nissīn). The suggestion is that the people should rally round God as an army gathers round its standard. He it is who leads them to victory.

JEHOVAH, SERVANT OF. See SERVANT OF JEHOVAH.

JEHOVAH-SHALOM, j-shā'lom (יהוה שלום, yahuweh shālōm, "Jeh is peace"): This was the name given by Gideon to the altar he built at Ophra, in allusion to the word spoken to him by the Lord, "Peace be unto thee" (Jgs 6 24). It is equivalent to "Jeh is well disposed."

JEHOVAH-SHAMMAH, j-sham'a (יהוה שמה, yahuweh shāmmāh, "Jeh is there"): The name to be given to the new Jerus, restored and glorified, as seen in the vision of Ezk (48 35 m; cf Rev 21 3). Jeh returns to the temple which He had forsaken, and from that time forward the fact of supreme importance is that He is there, dwelling in the midst of His people.

JEHOVAH-TSIDKENU (CIDKENU), j-tsid-kē-nū, tsid'kē-nū (יהוה צדקנו, yahuweh cidh'kēnū, "Jeh [is] our righteousness"): The symbolic name given (1) to the king who is to reign over the restored Israel (Jer 23 6); (2) to the state or capital (33 16).

JEHOZABAD, jē-hoz'a-bad (יהוזבד, y'hōzābhādh, "Jeh has bestowed"):

(1) A servant of King Jehoash of Judah. According to 2 K 12 21 (22), he was a son of Shomer, but 2 Ch 24 26 makes him "son of Shimrith the Moabitess."

(2) A Korahite doorkeeper, son of Obed-edom (1 Ch 26 4).

(3) A Benjaminite, one of King Jehoshaphat's warriors (2 Ch 17 18).

JEHOZADAK, jē-hoz'a-dak (יהוזבד, y'hōzādhāk, "Jeh is righteous"): Priest at the time of the captivity under Nebuchadrezzar (1 Ch 6 14.15 [Heb 5 40.41]). He was the father of Joshua (Jeshua) the priest (Hag 1 1.12.14; 2 2.4; Zec 6 11). AV has Josedeck in Hag and Zec. Same as "Jozadak" (יֹזָדָק, yōzādāhāk, same meaning) in Ezr 3 2.8; 5 2; 10 18; Neh 12 26; and = "Josedeck" (AV "Josedeck") of 1 Esd 5 5.48.56; 6 2; 9 19; Sir 49 12.

JEHU, jē'hū (יהוה, yēhū; meaning uncertain, perhaps "Jeh is he"; 1 K 19 16.17; 2 K 9, 10; Eloú, Eioú): Son of Jehoshaphat, and descendant of Nimshi, hence commonly called "the son of Nimshi"; 10th king of Israel, and founder of its IVth Dynasty. Jehu reigned for 28 years. His accession may be reckoned at c 752 BC (some date a few years later).

Jehu's Tribute—from Obelisk of Shalmaneser.

A soldier of fortune, J. appears first as an officer in the body-guard of Ahab. To himself we owe the information that he was present at the judicial murder of Naboth, and that Naboth's sons were put to death with their father (2 K 9 26). He was in attendance when Ahab drove from Samaria to inspect his new possession in Jezreel, and was witness of the dramatic encounter at the vineyard between the king and the prophet Elijah (cf 1 K 21 16 ff). Years after, J. reminded Bidkar, his captain (lit. "thirdsman," in chariot), of the doom they had there heard pronounced upon Ahab and his house (2 K 9 25 ff). It was in fulfilment of this doom that J. at that time ordered the body of the slain Jehoram to be thrown into the inclosure which had once been Naboth's (ver 26). Ahab's temporary repentance averted the punishment from himself for a few years (1 K 21 27-29), but the blow fell at the battle of Ramoth-gilead, and J. would not be unmindful of the prophet's words as he beheld the dogs licking Ahab's blood as they washed his chariot "by the pool of Samaria" (22 38).

A different fate awaited Ahab's two sons. The elder, Ahaziah, died, after a short reign, from the effects of an accident (2 K 1). He

2. Jehoram was succeeded by his brother Jehoram, at Ramoth-gilead and 12 years (2 K 3 1) determined on an attempt to recover Ramoth-gilead, where his father had been fatally stricken, from Hazael, of Syria. Ramoth-gilead was taken (2 K 9 14), but in the attack the Israelitish king was severely wounded, and was taken to Jezreel to be healed of his wounds (ver 15). The city meanwhile was left in charge of J. and his fellow-captains. At Jezreel he was visited by Ahaziah, of Judah, who had taken part with him in the war (8 28.29; 9 16).

The time was now ripe for the execution of the predicted vengeance on the house of Ahab, and to Elisha the prophet, the successor of Elijah, it fell to take the decisive step which precipitated the crisis. Hazael and J. had already been named to

3. The Anointing of Jehu as king of Syria, the other as king of Israel (1 K 19 15-17). Elijah was doubtless aware of this commission, which it was now his part, as respected J., to fulfil. A messenger was hastily dispatched to Ramoth-gilead, with instructions to seek out J., take him apart, anoint him king of Israel in Jeh's name, and charge him with the task of utterly destroying the house of Ahab in punishment for the righteous blood shed by Ahab and Jezebel. The messenger was then to flee. This was done, and J., the sacred oil poured on his head, found himself alone with this appalling trust committed to him (2 K 9 1-10).

Events now moved rapidly. J.'s companions were naturally eager to know what had happened,

4. The Revolution—Death of Jehoram and on learning that J. had been anointed king, they at once improvised a throne by throwing their garments on the top of some steps, blew the trumpet, and proclaimed, "J. is king." Not a moment was lost. No one was permitted to leave the city to carry forth tidings, and J. himself, with characteristic impetuosity, set out, with a small body of horsemen, in his chariot to Jezreel. Bidkar was there as charioteer (9 25). As they came within sight of the city, a watchman reported their advance, and messengers were sent to inquire as to their errand. These were ordered to fall into the rear. This conduct awakened suspicion, and Jehoram and Ahaziah—who was still with his invalided kinsman—ordered their chariots, and proceeded in person to meet J. The companies met at the ill-omened field of Naboth, and there the first stroke of vengeance fell. The anxious query, "Is it peace?" was answered by a storm of denunciation from J., and on Jehoram turning to flee, an arrow from J.'s powerful bow shot him through the heart, and he sank dead in his chariot. Ahaziah likewise was pursued, and smitten "at the ascent of Gur, which is by Ibleam." He died at Megiddo, and was taken to Jerus for burial in the sepulcher of the kings (9 11-28). A somewhat variant account of Ahaziah's death is given in 2 Ch 22 9. It is possible that J. came to Megiddo or its neighborhood, and had to do with his end there.

The slaughter of Jehoram was at once followed by that of the chief instigator of all the crimes for which the house of Ahab suffered—the queen-mother Jezebel. Hot from the pursuit of Ahaziah, J. pressed on Jezreel.

5. Death of Jezebel Jezebel, now an aged woman, but still defiant, had painted and attired herself, and, looking from her window, met him as he drove into the palace court, with the insulting question, "Is it peace, thou Zimri, thy master's murderer?" (cf 1 K 16 9-12). J.'s answer was an appeal for aid from those within. Two or three eunuchs of the palace gave signs of their concurrence. These, at J.'s bidding, threw Jezebel down into the courtyard, where, lying in her blood, she was trodden under foot by the chariot horses. When, a little later, her remains were sought for burial, she was found to have been almost wholly devoured by the dogs—a lurid commentary on Elijah's earlier threatening, which was now recalled (2 K 9 30-37). J. was an intrepid minister of judgment, but the pitiless zeal, needless cruelty, and, afterward, deceit, with which he executed his mission, withdrew our sympathy from him, as it did that of a later prophet (Hos 1 4).

The next acts of J. reveal yet more clearly his thoroughness of purpose and promptitude of action, while they afford fresh exhibitions of his ruthlessness and unscrupulousness of spirit. Samaria was

6. Slaughter of Ahab's Descendants the capital of the kingdom, and headquarters of the Baal-worship introduced by Jezebel, though it is recorded of Jehoram that he had removed, at least temporarily, an obelisk of Baal which his father had set up (2 K 3 2; cf 10 26). The city was still held for the house of Ahab, and 70 of Ahab's "sons"—to be taken here in the large sense of male descendants—resided in it (10 1.6). J. here adopted a bold and astute policy. He sent letters to Samaria challenging those in authority to set up one of their master's sons as king, and fight for the city and the kingdom. The governors knew well that they could make no effective resistance to J., and at once humbly tendered their submission. J., in a second message, bade them prove their sincerity by delivering to him the heads of the 70 princes of Ahab's house in baskets. This they did, by their act irrevocably committing themselves to J.'s cause (ver 9). The ghastly relics were piled up in two heaps at the gate of Jezreel—a horrible object-lesson to any still inclined to hesitate in their allegiance. Friends and partisans of the royal house shared the fate of its members (ver 11).

Apart from the faultiness in the agent's motive, the deeds now recounted fell within the letter of J.'s commission. As much cannot be said of the deeds of blood that follow. J. had killed

7. Slaughter of Ahaziah's Brethren Ahaziah, king of Judah. Now, on his way to Samaria, he met a company of 42 persons, described as "brethren of Ahaziah"— evidently blood-relations of various degrees, as Ahaziah's own brethren had been earlier slain by the Arabians (2 Ch 21 17; 22 1)—and, on learning who they were, and of their purpose to visit their kinsfolk at Jezreel, gave orders that they be slain on the spot, and their bodies ignominiously thrown into the pit (or "cistern") of the shearing-house where he had encountered them. It was a cruel excess for which no sufficient justification can be pleaded (2 K 10 12-14).

Still less can the craft and violence be condoned by which, when he reached Samaria, J. evinced his

"zeal for Jeh" (ver 16) in the extirpa-

8. Massacre of the worshippers of Baal J. of the Worshippers of Baal had secured on his side the support of a notable man—Jehonadab the son of Baal

Rechab (vs 15.16; cf Jer 35 6-19)—and his entrance into Samaria was signalized by further slaying of all adherents of Ahab. Then, doubtless to the amazement of many, J. proclaimed himself an enthusiastic follower of Baal. A great festival was organized, to which all prophets, worshippers, and priests of Baal were invited from every part of Israel. J. himself took the leading part in the sacrifice (ver 25). Vestments were distributed to distinguish the true worshippers of Baal from others. Then when all were safely gathered into "the house of Baal," the gates were closed, and 80 soldiers were sent in to massacre the whole deluded company in cold blood. None escaped. The temple of Baal was broken up. Thus, indeed, "J. destroyed Baal out of Israel" (ver 28), but at what a frightful cost of falsehood and treacherous dealing! (2 K 10 18-28).

The history of J. in the Bible is chiefly the history of his revolution as now narrated. His reign itself is summed up in a few vs, chiefly occu-

9. Wars with Hazael pied with the attacks made by Hazael, king of Syria, on the trans-Jordanic territories of Israel (10 32.33). These districts were overrun, and remained lost to Israel till the reign of J.'s great-grandson, Jeroboam II (2 K 14 28).

It is in another direction, viz. to the annals of Assyria, we have to look for any further information we possess on the reign of J. In these annals, fortunately, some interesting notices are preserved. In 854 BC was fought the great battle of Karkar (a place between Aleppo and Hamath), when Shalmaneser II, king of Assyria, defeated a powerful combination formed

10. Assyrian Notices against him (Damascus, Hamath, Philistia, Ammon, etc.). Among the allies on this occasion is mentioned "Ahabbu of Sir'ila," who took the third place with 2,000 chariots and 10,000 footmen. There is a difficulty in supposing Ahab to have been still reigning as late as 854, and Wellhausen, Kamphausen and others have suggested that Ahab's name has been confused with that of his successor Jehoram in the Assyrian annals. Kittel, in his History of the Hebrews (II, 233, ET) is disposed to accept this view. G. Smith, in his Assyrian Eponym Canon (179), is of the opinion that the tribute lists were often carelessly compiled and in error as to names. The point of interest is that from this time Israel was evidently a tributary of Assyria.

With this accord the further notices of Israel in the inscriptions of Shalmaneser II, two in number. Both belong to the year 842 BC and relate to J. On Shalmaneser's Black Obelisk

11. Tribute of Jehu is a pictorial representation of "the tribute of J., son of Omri." An ambassador kneels before the conqueror, and presents his gifts. They include silver, gold, a gold cup, gold vessels, a golden ladle, lead, a staff for the king's hand, scepters. An allusion to the same event occurs in the annals of Shalmaneser's campaign against Hazael of Syria in this year. "At that time I received the tribute of the Tyrians, Sidonians, of J., son of Omri."

There are some indications that in his latter years, which were clouded with misfortune, J. associated with himself his son Jehoahaz in the government (cf 2 K 13 1.10, where Jehoahaz comes to the throne in the 23d, and dies in the 37th year of Jehoash of Judah—14 years—yet has a total reign of 17 years). J. is not mentioned in Ch, except incidentally in connection with the death of Ahaziah (2 Ch 22 9), and as the grandfather of Jehoash (25 17).

The character of J. is apparent from the acts recorded of him. His energy, determination, promptitude, and zeal fitted him for the work he had to do. It was rough work, and was executed with relentless thoroughness. Probably gentler measures would have failed to eradicate Baal-worship from Israel. His impetuosity was evinced in his furious driving (2 K 9 20). He was bold, daring, unscrupulous, and masterful and astute in his policy. But one seeks in vain in his character for any touch of magnanimity, or of the finer qualities of the ruler. His "zeal for Jeh" was too largely a cloak for merely worldly ambition. The bloodshed in which his rule was founded early provoked a reaction, and his closing years were dark with trouble. He is specially condemned for tolerating the worship of the golden calves (2 K 10 29-31). Nevertheless the throne was secured to his dynasty for four generations (10 30; cf 15 12).

JEHUBBAH, jê-hub'a (יְהוּבָה, y'hubbâh, meaning unknown): A descendant of Asher, mentioned in 1 Ch 7 34, where Kêrê is יְהוּבָה, y'hubbâh, "and Hubbah," but K'thîbh is יְהוּבָה, yahbâh; LXX B follows Kêrê.

JEHUCAL, jê-hû'kal (יְהוֹכָל, y'hûkhal, probably meaning "Jeh is able"): A courtier sent by King Zedekiah to Jeremiah to ask the prophet to pray for the king and the people (Jer 37 3). Most VSS except LXX, with 38 1, have "Jucal" (יְהוֹכָל, yûkhal, same meaning).

JEHUD, jê'hud (יְהוּדָה, y'hûdh): A town in the lot of Dan named between Baalath and Bene-berak (Josh 19 45). The only possible identification seems to be with el-Yehudiyeh, which lies about 8 miles E. of Jaffa.

JEHUDI, jê-hû'di (יְהוּדִי, y'hûdhî, properly "a Jew"): An officer of King Jehoiakim (Jer 36 14.21.23). He was sent by the princes to summon Baruch to read the roll containing Jeremiah's prophecies to them; he afterward read them to the king, who destroyed them. His name is noteworthy, as also is that of his grandfather Cushî (i.e. "Ethiopian"), and the two are said to point to a foreign origin.

JEHUDIJAH, jê-hû-di'ja (1 Ch 4 18 AV). See HA-JEHUDIJAH.

JEHUEL, jê-hû'el (K'thîbh יְהוּאֵל, y'hû'el; but Kêrê יְהוּאֵל, y'hî'el, i.e. "Jehiel" AV, in 2 Ch 29 14): A Levite; see JEHIEL, (5).

JEHUSH, jê'hush (1 Ch 8 39). See JEUSH, (3).

JEIEL, jê-i'el (יְעִיֵּאל, y'e'i'el, meaning unknown): (1) A Reubenite (1 Ch 5 7).

(2) In 1 Ch 8 29, added in RV from 9 35, where K'thîbh is "Jeuel," an ancestor of King Saul; AV "Jehiel."

(3) One of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11 44). AV is "Jehiel"; K'thîbh is "Jeuel."

(4) A Levite, keeper of the ark with Obed-edom (1 Ch 15 18.21; 16 5; 2 Ch 20 14), called "Jehiah" in 1 Ch 15 24.

(5) A Levite (1 Ch 16 5) = "Jaaziel" of 1 Ch 15 18 (q.v.).

(6) A scribe under King Uzziah (2 Ch 26 11).

(7) A chief of the Levites, present at King Josiah's great Passover feast (2 Ch 35 9).

(8) One of those who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 43) = "Juel" in 1 Esd 9 35.

(9) AV in 2 Ch 29 14; see JEHIEL, (5).

(10) AV in Ezr 8 13; see JEUEL, (3).

DAVID FRANCIS ROBERTS

JEKABZEEL, jê-kab'zê-el (יְקָבֶזֶעַל, y'kabhç'el, "God gathers"; Neh 11 25). See KABZEEL.

JEKAMEAM, jek-a-mê'am, jê-kam'ê-am (יְקָמֵאֵם, y'kam'âm, probably "my kinsman establish"): Head of a Levitical house (1 Ch 23 19; 24 23). The meaning of the name depends upon that of יָמָ (am) in compound names; see HPN, 46, 51 ff.

JEKAMIAH, jek-a-mî'a (יְקָמִיָּה, y'kamyâh, "may Jeh establish"):

(1) A Judahite, son of Shallum (1 Ch 2 41).

(2) A son of King Jeconiah (Jehoiachin); in AV "Jecamiah" (1 Ch 3 18).

JEKUTHIEL, jê-kû'thi-el (יְקֻתִּיֵּאל, y'kûthî'el, meaning doubtful): A Judahite (1 Ch 4 18). The meaning may be "preservation of God," or perhaps the same as יְקָתֵאל, yokth'el, "Joktheel," the name of a place in Josh 15 38; 2 K 14 7.

JEMIMAH, jê-mî'ma (יְמִימָה, y'mîmâh, perhaps a diminutive meaning "little dove"): The first daughter of Job (42 14), born after his restoration from affliction.

JEMNAAN, jem'nâ-an (Ἰεμνάαν, Iemnâan): A city on the coast of Pal; mentioned among those affected by the expedition of Holofernes (Jth 2 28; 3 1 ff). The name is used for Jabniel, generally called "Jamnia" by the Gr writers.

JEMUEL, jê-mû'el (יְמִיֵּאֵל, y'mû'el, meaning unknown): A "son" of Simeon (Gen 46 10; Ex 6 15) = "Nemuel" in Nu 26 12; 1 Ch 4 24.

Syr version has "Jemuel" in the 4 passages, but Gray (HPN, 307, n. 6) thinks "Jemuel" is more probably a correction in Gen than "Nemuel" in Nu.

JEOPARD, jep'ard, JEOPARDY, jep'ar-di: The Eng. word referred originally to a game where the chances were even (from OFr. jeu parti); transferred thence to designate any great risk. In the NT, represented by the Gr vb. kinduneō (Lk 8 23; 1 Cor 15 30). In the OT (Jgs 5 18) for a Heb idiom, "despise the soul," i.e. they placed a small value upon their lives (Vulg "offered their souls to death"); for elliptical expression, "went with their lives," in 2 S 23 17 m.

JEPHTHAH, jef'tha (יִפְתָּח, yiphtāh, "opened," or "opener," probably signifying "Jeh will open"; יִפְתָּח, Iephthā; used as the name of a place, as in Josh 15 43; 19 14; of a man, Jgs 10 6—12 7): Ninth judge of the Israelites. His antecedents are obscure. Assuming Gilead to be the actual name of his father, his mother was a harlot. He was driven from home on account of his illegitimacy, and went to the land of Tob in Eastern Syria (Jgs 11 2.3). Here he and his followers lived the life of freebooters.

The Israelites beyond the Jordan being in danger of an invasion by the Ammonites, J. was invited by the elders of Gilead to be their leader (11 5.6). Remembering how they had expelled him from their territory and his heritage, J. demanded of them that in the event of success in the struggle with the Ammonites, he was to be continued as leader. This condition being accepted he returned to Gilead (11 7—11). The account of the diplomacy used by J. to prevent the Ammonites from invading Gilead is possibly an interpolation, and is thought by many interpreters to be a compilation from Nu 20—21. It is of great interest, however, not only because of the fairness of the argument used (11 12—28), but also by virtue of the fact that it contains a history of the journey of the Israelites from Lower Egypt to the banks of the Jordan. This history is distinguished from that of the Pent chief by the things omitted. If diplomacy was tried, it failed to dissuade the Ammonites from seeking to invade Israel. J. prepared for battle, but before taking the field paused at Mizpeh of Gilead, and registered a vow that if he were successful in battle, he would offer as a burnt offering to Jeh whatsoever should first come from his doors to greet him upon his return (11 29—31). The battle is fought, J. is the victor, and now his vow returns to him with anguish and sorrow. Returning to his home, the first to greet him is his daughter and only child. The father's sorrow and the courage of the daughter are the only bright lights on this sordid, cruel conception of God and of the nature of sacrifice. That the sacrifice was made seems certain from the narrative, although some critics choose to substitute for the actual death of the maiden the setting the girl apart for a life of perpetual virginity. The Israelitish laws concerning sacrifices and the language used in 11 39 are the chief arguments for the latter interpretation. The entire narrative, however, will hardly bear this construction (11 34—40).

J. was judge in Israel for 6 years, but appears only once more in the Scripture narrative. The men of Ephraim, offended because they had had no share in the victory over the Ammonites, made war upon Gilead, but were put to rout by the forces under J. (12 1—6).

C. E. SCHENK

JEPHUNNEH, jē-fun'e (יִפְנִיחַ, y'phunneh, meaning uncertain):

(1) Father of Caleb (Nu 13 6; 14 6.30, etc.).

According to Nu 13 6, he was of the tribe of Judah; according to 32 12; Josh 14 6, a Kenizite; the Kenizites were incorporated in Judah (cf 1 Ch 4 13—15).

(2) A son of Jether, an Asherite (1 Ch 7 38).

JERAH, jē'ra (יֶרָח, yerah): A son of Joktan (Gen 10 26 || 1 Ch 1 20). No district Jerah has been discovered. However, Yurākh in Yemen and Yarah in Hijaz are places named by the Arab. geographers. The fact that the word in Heb means "moon" has led to the following suggestions: the Banū Hilāl ("sons of the new moon") in the N. of Yemen; Ghubbel-Kamar ("the bay of the moon"); Jebel el-Kamar ("the mountains of the moon") in Eastern Hadramant. But in Southern Arabia worship of the moon has caused the word to bulk largely in place-names.

JERAHMEEL, jē-rā'mē-el (יֶרֶמְיָהּ, y'rahmē'el, "may God have compassion"):

(1) In 1 Ch 2 9.25.26.27.33.42, he is described as the son of Hezron, the son of Perez, the son of Judah by Tamar his daughter-in-law (Gen 38). In 1 S 27 10 is mentioned the negheb of the Jerahmeelites, jē-rā'mē-el-its (יֶרֶמְיָהּ, ha-y'rahmē'eli, a collective noun), RV "the South of the Jerahmeelites." The latter is a tribal name in use probably before the proper name, above; their cities are mentioned in 1 S 30 29. Cheyne has radical views on J. See EB, s.v.; also T. Witton Davies in Review of Theology and Philosophy, III, 689—708 (May, 1908); and Cheyne's replies in Hibbert Journal, VII, 132—51 (October, 1908), and Decline and Fall of the Kingdom of Judah.

(2) A Merarite Levite, son of Kish (1 Ch 24 29).

(3) "The king's son," RV and AVm (Jer 36 26). RVm, AV have "son of Hammelech," taking the word הַמֶּלֶךְ as a proper name. He was "probably a royal prince, one who had a king among his ancestors but not necessarily son of the ruling king; so 38 6; 1 K 22 26b; esp. Zeph 1 8 written at a time when the reigning king, Josiah, could not have had a grown-up 'son' (Driver, Jer, 224, n. e). J. was with two others commanded by Jehoiaikim to arrest Jeremiah and Baruch.

LITERATURE

The name of one of the greatest prophets of Israel. The Heb יֵרֵמְיָהוּ, yirm'yāhū, abbreviated to יֵרֵמְיָה, yirm'yāh, signifies either

1. Name "Jeh hurls" or "Jeh founds." LXX and Person reads Iepulias, Iermias, and the Vulg Jeremias. As this name also occurs not infrequently, the prophet is called "the son of Hilkiah" (1 1), who is, however, not the high priest mentioned in 2 K 22 and 23, as it is merely stated that he was "of the priests that were in Anathoth" in the land of Benjamin. In Anathoth, now Anāta, a small village 1½ hours N.E. of Jerus, lived a class of priests who belonged to a side line, not to the line of Zadok (cf 1 K 2 26).

J. was called by the Lord to the office of a prophet while still a youth (1 6) about 20 years of age, in the 13th year of King Josiah (1 2; 25

2. Life of Jeremiah 3), in the year 627 BC, and was active in this capacity from this time on to the destruction of Jerus, 586 BC, under kings Josiah, Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah. Even after the fall of the capital city he prophesied in Egypt at least for several years, so that his work extended over a period of about 50 years in all. At first he probably lived in Anathoth, and put in his appearance publicly in Jerus only on the occasion of the great festivals; later he lived in Jerus, and was there during the terrible times of the siege and the destruction of the city.

Although King Josiah was God-fearing and willing to serve Jeh, and soon inaugurated his reformation according to the law of Jeh (in the 18th year of his reign), yet J., at the time when he was called to the prophetic office, was not left in doubt of the fact that the catastrophe of the judgment of God over the city would soon come (1 11 ff); and when, after a few years, the Book of the Law was found in the temple (2 K 22 and 23), J. preached "the words of this covenant" to the people in the town and throughout the land (11 1-8; 17 19-27), and exhorted to obedience to the Divine command; but in doing this then and afterward he became the object of much hostility, esp. in his native city, Anathoth. Even his own brethren or near relatives entered into a conspiracy against him by declaring that he was a dangerous fanatic (12 6). However, the condition of J. under this pious king was the most happy in his career, and he lamented the latter's untimely death in sad lyrics, which the author of Ch was able to use (2 Ch 35 25), but which have not come down to our times.

Much more unfavorable was the prophet's condition after the death of Josiah. Jehoahaz-Shallum, who ruled only 3 months, received the announcement of his sentence from J. (22 10 ff). Jehoiakim (609-598 BC) in turn favored the heathen worship, and oppressed the people through his love of luxury and by the erection of grand structures (Jer 22 13 ff). In addition, his politics were treacherous. He conspired with Egypt against his superior, Nebuchadnezzar. Epoch-making was the 4th year of Jehoiakim, in which, in the battle of Carchemish, the Chaldeans gained the upper hand in Hither Asia, as J. had predicted (46 1-12). Under Jehoiakim J. delivered his great temple discourse (7-9; 10 17-25). The priests for this reason determined to have the prophet put to death (ch 26). However, influential elders interceded for him, and the princes yet showed some justice. He was, however, abused by the authorities at the appeal of the priests (ch 20). According to 36 1 ff, he was no longer permitted to enter the place of the temple. For this reason the Lord commanded him to collect his prophecies in a book-roll, and to have them read to the people by his faithful pupil Baruch (ch 36; cf ch 45). The book fell into the hands of the king, who burned it. However, J. dictated the book a second time to Baruch, together with new additions.

Jehoiachin or Coniah (22 24 ff), the son of Jehoiakim, after a reign of 3 months, was taken into captivity to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, together with a large number of his nobles and the best part of the people (Jer 24 1; 29 2), as the prophet had predicted (22 20-30). But conditions did not improve under Zedekiah (597-586 BC). This king was indeed not as hostile to J. as Jehoiakim had been; but all the more hostile were the princes and the generals, who were now in command after the better class of these had been deported to Babylon. They continually planned rebellion against Babylon, while J. was compelled to oppose and put to naught every patriotic agitation of this kind. Finally, the Bab army came in order to punish the faithless vassal who had again entered into an alliance with Egypt. J. earnestly advised submission, but the king was too weak and too cowardly as against his nobles. A long siege resulted, which caused the direst sufferings in the life of J. The commanders threw him into a vile prison, charging him with being a traitor (37 11 ff). The king, who consulted him secretly, released him from prison, and put him into the "court of the guard" (37 17 ff), where he could move around freely, and could again prophesy. Now that the judgment had come, he could again speak of the hopeful future (chs 32, 33). Also chs 30 and 31, probably, were spoken about this time. But as he continued to preach submission to the people, those in authority cast him into a slimy cistern, from which the pity of a courtier, Ebed-melech, delivered him (39 15-18). He again returned to the court of the guard, where he remained until Jerus was taken.

After the capture of the city, J. was treated with great consideration by the Babylonians, who knew that he had spoken in favor of their government (39 11 ff; 40 1 ff). They gave him the choice of going to Babylon or of remaining in his native land. He decided for the latter, and went to the governor Gedaliah, at Mizpah, a man worthy of all confidence. But when this man, after a short time, was murdered by conscienceless opponents, the Jews who had been left in Pal, becoming alarmed and fearing the vengeance of the Chaldeans, determined to emigrate to Egypt. J. advised against this most earnestly, and threatened the vengeance of Jeh, if the people should insist upon their undertaking (42 1 ff). But they insisted and even compelled the aged prophet to go with them (43 1 ff). Their first goal was Tahpanhes (Daphne), a town in Lower Egypt. At this place he still continued to preach the word of God to his fellow-Israelites; cf the latest of his preserved discourses in 43 8-13, as also the sermon in ch 44, delivered at a somewhat later time but yet before 570 BC. At that time J. must have been from 70 to 80 years old. He probably died soon after this in Egypt. The church Fathers report that he was stoned to death at Daphne by the Jews (Jerome, Adv. Jovin. ii, 37; Tertullian, Contra Gnost., viii; Pseudepiphani., De Proph. ch viii; Dorotheus, 146; Isidorus, Orig. et Obil. Patr., ch xxxviii). However, this report is not well founded. The same is the case with the rabbinical tradition, according to which he, in company with Baruch, was taken from Egypt to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, and died there (Šedher 'Olām Rabbā 26).

The Book of Jer gives us not only a fuller account of the life and career of its author than do the books of the other prophets, but we also

3. Personal learn more about his own inner and Character personal life and feelings than we do of Jeremiah of Isaiah or any other prophet. From this source we learn that he was, by nature, gentle and tender in his feelings, and sympathetic. A decided contrast to this is found in the hard and unmerciful judgment which it was his mission to announce. God made him strong and firm and immovable like iron for his mission (1 18; 15 20). This contrast between his naturally warm personal feelings and his strict Divine mission not rarely appears in the heart-utterances found in his prophecies. At first he rejoiced when God spoke to him (15 16); but soon these words of God were to his heart a source of pain and of suffering (15 17 ff). He would have preferred not to utter them; and then they burned in his breast as a fire (20 7 ff; 23 9). He personally stood in need of love, and yet was not permitted to marry (16 1 f). He was compelled to forego the pleasures of youth (15 17). He loved his people as nobody else, and yet was always compelled to prophesy evil for it, and seemed to be the enemy of his nation. This often caused him to despair. The enmity to which he fell a victim, on account of his declaration of nothing but the truth, he deeply felt; see his complaints (9 1 ff; 12 5 f; 15 10; 17 14-18; 18 23, and often). In this sad antagonism between his heart and the commands of the Lord, he would perhaps wish that God had not spoken to him; he even cursed the day of his birth (15 10; 20 14-18; cf Job 3 1 ff). Such complaints are to be carefully distinguished from that which the Lord through His Spirit communicated to the prophet. God rebukes him for these complaints, and demands of him to repent and to trust and obey Him (15 19). This discipline makes him all the more unconquerable. Even his bitter denunciations of his enemies (11 20 ff; 15 15; 17 18; 18 21-23) originated in part in his passionate and deep nature, and show how great is the difference between him and that perfect Sufferer, who prayed even for His deadly enemies. But J. was nevertheless a type of that Suffering Saviour, more than any of the OT saints. He, as a priest, prayed for his people, until God forbade him to do so (7 16; 11 14; 14 11; 18 20). He was compelled more than all the others to suffer through the anger of God, which was to afflict his people. The people themselves also felt that he meant well to them. A proof of this is seen in the fact that the rebellious people, who always did the contrary of what he had commanded them, forced him, the unwelcome prophet of God, to go along with them, to Egypt, because they felt that he was their good genius.

What J. was to preach was the judgment upon Judah. As the reason for this judgment J. everywhere mentioned the apostasy from 4. The Jeh, the idolatry, which was practised Prophecies on bāmōth, or the "high places" by of Jeremiah Judah, as this had been done by Israel.

Many heathenish abuses had found their way into the life of the people. Outspoken heathenism had been introduced by such men as King Manasseh, even the sacrifice of children to the honor of Baal-Molech in the valley of Hinnom (7 31; 19 5; 32 35), and the worship of "the queen of heaven" (7 18; 44 19). It is true that the reformation of Josiah swept away the worst of these abominations. But an inner return to Jeh did not result from this reformation. For the reason that the improvement had been more on the surface and outward, and was done to please the king, J. charges up to his people all their previous sins, and the guilt of the present generation was yet added to this (16 11 f). Together with religious insincerity went the moral corruption of the people, such as dishonesty, injustice, oppression of the helpless, slander, and the like. Compare the accusations found in 5 1 ff. 7 f. 26 ff; 6 7.13; 7 5 f. 9; 9 2 6.8; 17 9 ff; 21 12; 22 13 ff; 23 10; 29 23, etc. Esp. to the spiritual leaders, the priests and prophets, are these things charged up.

The judgment which is to come in the near future, as a punishment for the sins of the people, is from the outset declared to be the conquest of the country through an enemy from abroad. In this way the heated caldron with the face from the N., in the vision containing the call of the prophet (1 13 ff), is to be understood. This power in the N. is not named until the 4th year of Jehoiakim (ch 25), where Nebuchadnezzar is definitely designated as the conqueror. It is often thought, that, in the earlier years of his career, J. had in mind the Scythians when he spoke of the enemies from the N., esp. in chs 4-6. The Scythians (according to Herodotus i.103 ff) had, probably a few years before J.'s call to the prophetic office, taken possession of Media, then marched through Asia Minor, and even forced their way as far as Egypt. They crossed through Canaan, passing by on their march from E. to W., near Beth-shean (Scythopolis). The ravages of this fierce people probably influenced the language used by J. in his prophecies (cf 4 11 ff; 5 15 ff; 6 3 ff. 22 ff). But it is unthinkable that J. expected nothing more than a plundering and a booty-seeking expedition of the Scythian nomad hordes. Chariots, such as are described in 4 13, the Scythians did not possess. Moreover, it must not be forgotten that J. from the outset speaks of a deportation of his people to this foreign land (3 18; 5 19), while an exile of Israel in the country of the Scythians was out of the question. At all events from the 4th year of Jehoiakim, J. regards the Chaldaeans as the enemy who, according to his former announcement, would come from the N. It is possible that it was only in the course of time that he reached a clear conviction as to what nation was meant by the revelation from God. But, upon further reflection, he must have felt almost certain on this subject, esp. as Isaiah (39 6), Micah (4 10), and, soon after these, Habakkuk had named Babylon as the power that was to carry out the judgment upon Israel. Other prophets, too, regard the Babylonians as belonging to the northern group of nations (cf Zec 6 8), because they always came from the N., and because they were the legal successors of the Assyrians.

In contrast to optimistic prophets, who had hoped to remedy matters in Israel (6 14), J. from the beginning predicted the destruction of the city and of the sanctuary, as also the end of the Jewish nation and the exile of the people through these enemies from abroad. According to 25 11; 29 10, the Bab supremacy (not exactly the exile) was to continue for 70 years; and after this, deliverance should come. Promises to this effect are found only now and then in the earlier years of the prophet (3 14 ff; 12 14 ff; 16 14 f). However, during the time of the siege and afterward, such predictions are more frequent (cf 23 1 ff; 24 6 f; 47 2-7; and in the "Book of Comfort," chs 30-33).

What characterizes this prophet is the spiritual inwardness of his religion; the external theocracy he delivers up to destruction, because its forms were not animated by God-fearing sentiments. External circumcision is of no value without inner purity of heart. The external temple will be destroyed, because it has become the hiding-place of sinners. External sacrifices have no value, because those who offer them are lacking in spirituality, and this is displeasing to God. The law is abused and misinterpreted (8 8); the words of the prophets as a rule do not come from God. Even the Ark of the Covenant is eventually to make way for a glorious presence of the Lord. The law is to be written in the hearts of men (31 31 ff). The glories of the Messianic times the prophet does not describe in detail, but their spiritual character he repeatedly describes in the words "Jeh our righteousness" (23 6; 33 16). However, we must not overestimate the idealism of J. He believed in a realistic restoration of the theocracy to a form, just as the other prophets (cf chs 31, 32, 38-40).

As far as the form of his prophetic utterances is concerned, J. is of a poetical nature; but he was not only a poet. He often speaks in the meter of an elegy; but he is not bound by this, and readily passes over into other forms of rhythms and also at times into prosaic speech, when the contents of his discourses require it. The somewhat monotonous and elegiac tone, which is in harmony with his sad message to the people, gives way to more lively and varied forms of expression, when the prophet speaks of other and foreign nations. In doing this he often makes use of the utterances of earlier prophets.

The first composition of the book is reported in 36 1 ff. In the 4th year of Jehoiakim, at the command of Jeh, he dictated all of the prophecies he had spoken down to this time to his pupil Baruch, who wrote them on a roll. After the destruction of this book-roll by the king, he would not be stopped from reproducing the contents again and making additions to it (36 32). In this we have the origin of the present Book of Jer. This book, however, not only received further additions, but has also been modified. While the discourses may originally have been arranged chronologically, and these reached only down to the 4th year of King Jehoiakim, we find in the book, as it is now, as early as 21 1 ff; 23 1 ff; 26 1 ff, discourses from the times of Zedekiah. However, the 2d edition (36 28) contained, no doubt, ch 25, with those addresses directed against the heathen nations extant at that time. The lack of order, from a chronological point of view, in the present book, is attributable also to the fact that historical accounts or appendices concerning the career of J. were added to the book in later times, e.g. chs 26, 35, 36 and others; and in these additions are also found older discourses of the prophet. Beginning with ch 37, the story of the prophet during the siege of Jerus and after the destruction of the city is reported, and in connection with this are his words and discourses belonging to this period.

It is a question whether these pieces, which are more narrative in character, and which are the product of a contemporary, probably Baruch, at one time constituted a book by themselves, out of which they were later taken and incorporated in the book of the prophet, or whether they were inserted by Baruch. In favor of the first view, it may be urged that they are not always found at their proper places chronologically; e.g. ch 26 is a part of the temple discourse in chs 7-9. However, this "Book of Baruch," which is claimed by some critics to have existed as a separate book beside that of Jer, would not furnish a connected biography, and does not seem to have been written for biographical purposes. It contains introductions to certain words and speeches of the prophet and statements of what the consequences of these had been. Thus it is more probable that Baruch, at a later time, made supplementary additions to the original book, which the prophet had dictated without any personal data. But in this work the prophet himself may have cooperated. At places, perhaps, the dictation of the prophet ends in a narrative of Baruch (19 14-20 6), or vice versa. Baruch seems to have written a historical introduction, and then J. dictated the prophecy (27 1; 18 1; 32 1 ff, and others). Of course, the portions of the book which came from the pen of Baruch are to be regarded as an authentic account.

However, critics have denied to J. and his pupil certain sections of the present book, and they claim that these belong to a later date.

6. Authenticity and Integrity of the Book Among these is 10 1-16, containing a warning to those in the exile against idolatry (and related to Isa 40 ff), which, it is claimed, could not possibly in this form and fulness be the work of

J. Also 17 19-27 is without reason denied to J., upon the ground that he could not have thought of emphasizing the Sabbath law. He was, however, no modern idealist, but respected also the Divine ordinances (cf 11 1-8). Then ch 25 is rejected by some, while others attack esp. vs 12-14 and 27-38; but in both cases without reason. On the other hand, we admit that ver 25 and also vs 13 f are later additions. The words, "all that is written in this book, which J. hath prophesied against all the nations," are probably a superscription, which has found its way into the text. In ver 26 the words, "and the king of Sheshach shall drink after them," are likewise considered spurious. Sheshach is rightly regarded here, as in 51 41, as a cipher for "Babel," but the use of 'At-bash (a cipher in which the order of the letters of the Heb alphabet is reversed, א for ש, ש for א, etc, hence SHĒSHACH = BāBĒl, see the comms.) does not prove spuriousness. The sentence is not found in the LXX. The attacks made on chs 30 and 31 are of little moment. 33 14-26 is not found in the LXX, and its contents, too, belong to the passages in Jer that are most vigorously attacked. Critics regard J. as too spiritual to have perpetuated the Levitical priesthood. In ch 39, vs 1.2.4-10 are evidently additions that do not belong to this place. The remaining portion can stand. Among the discourses against the nations, chs 46-51, those in 46 1-12, spoken immediately preceding the battle of Carchemish, cannot be shown to be unauthentic; even vs 13-28 are also genuine. The fact, however, is that the text has suffered very much. Nor are there any satisfactory reasons against the prophecy in chs 47-49, if we assume that J. reasserted some of his utterances against the heathen nations that did not seem to have been entirely fulfilled. Chs 50 and 51, the discourses against Babylon, have the distinct impress of J. This impression is stronger than the doubts, which, however, are not without weight. The events in 51 59 ff, which are not to be called into question, presuppose longer addresses of J. against Babylon. The possibility, however, remains that the editing of these utterances as found in the present book dates from the time after 586 BC. That any influence of Deutero-Isaiah or later authors can be traced in Jer cannot be shown with any certainty. Ch 52 was written neither by Jeremiah nor for his book, but is taken from the Books of K, and is found there almost verbatim (2 K 24, 25).

A special problem is furnished by the relation of the text of Jer to the Alexandrian version of the Seventy (LXX). Not only does the Heb form of the book differ from the Gr materially, much more than this is the case in other books of the OT, but the arrangement, too, is a different one. The oracle concerning the heathen nations (chs 46-51) is in the LXX found in the middle of ch 25, and that, too, in an altogether different order (viz. 49 35 ff. 46; 50; 51; 47 1-7; 49 7-22; 49 1-5 28-33 23-27; 48). In addition, the readings throughout the book in many cases are divergent, the text in the LXX being in general shorter and more compact. The Gr text has about 2,700 Heb words less than the authentic Heb text, and is thus about one-eighth shorter.

7. Relation to the LXX

As far as the insertion of the addresses against the heathen nations in ch 29 is concerned, the Gr order is certainly not more original than is the Heb. It rather tears apart, awkwardly, what is united in ch 25, and has probably been caused by a misunderstanding. The words of 25 13 were regarded as a hint that here the discourses against the heathen were to follow. Then, too, the order of these discourses in the Gr text is less natural than the one in Heb. In regard to the readings of the text, it has been thought that the text of the LXX deserves the preference on account of its brevity, and that the Heb text had been increased by additions. However, in general, the Gr version is very free, and often is done without an understanding of the subject; and there are reasons to believe that the translator shortened the text, when he thought the style of Jeremiah too heavy. Then, too, where he met with repetitions, he probably would omit; or did so when he found trouble with the matter or the language. This does not deny that his tr in many places may be correct, and that additions may have been made to the Heb text.

JEREMIAS, jer-ē-mī'as (Ἰερεμίας, Ieremias):

(1) Named among the sons of Buani as one of those who had married foreign wives (1 Esd 9 34). In Ezr 10 33 we find, "Jeremai" among the sons of Hashum. In 1 Esd it should come in 9 33 before Manasses.

(2) See JEREMIAH (general art.).

JEREMIEL, jer-ē-mī'el (Lat Hieremihel, al Jeremiel, "El hurls" or "El appoints"): AVm and RV in 2 Esd 4 36 for AV "Uriel." He is here called the "archangel" who answers the questions raised by the souls of the righteous dead. He is perhaps identical with Ramiel of Apoc Bar or Remiel of Eth Enoch.

JEREMOTH, jer-ē-mōth ([a] ירְמוֹת, and [b] ירְמוֹת, yrēmōth, [c] ירְמוֹת, yrīmōth, meaning unknown): Of the following (1) has form (b), (5) the form (c), the rest (a).

(1) In 1 Ch 7 8 (AV "Jerimoth"), and

(2) In 1 Ch 8 14, Benjamites. Cf JEROHAM, (2).

(3) In 1 Ch 23 23, and (4) in 1 Ch 25 22 = "Jerimoth," 24 30; heads of Levitical houses.

(5) A Naphtalite, one of David's tribal princes (1 Ch 27 19); AV "Jerimoth."

LITERATURE

In MSS BA the title is simply "An Epistle of Jeremiah." But in B, etc., there is a superscription introducing the letter: "Copy of a letter

1. Name which Jeremiah sent to the captives about to be led to Babylon by [Pesh adds Nebuchadnezzar] the king of the Babylonians, to make known to them what had been commanded him by God." What follows is a satirical exposure of the folly of idolatry, and not a letter. The idea of introducing this as a letter from Jeremiah was probably suggested by Jer 29 1 ff.

The early Gr Fathers were on the whole favorably disposed toward this tract, reckoning it to be a part of the Canon. It is therefore

2. Canon- included in the lists of canonical icity and writings of Origen, Epiphanius, Cyril Position of Jerus and Athanasius, and it was so authoritatively recognized by the Council of Laodicea (360 AD).

In most Gr MSS of the LXX (BA Codd. March, Chisl, in the Syr Hex), it follows Lam as an independent piece, closing the supposed writings of Jeremiah. In the best-known printed edd of the LXX (Tischendorf, Swete, etc.), the order is Jer, Bar, Lam, Ep. Jer. In Fritzsche, Lib. Apoc VT Graece, Ep. Jer stands between Bar and Tob. But in Lat MSS, including those of the Vulg, it is appended to Bar, of which it forms ch 6, though it really has nothing to do with that book. This last is the case with Protestant edd (EV, etc) of the Apoc, a more intelligible arrangement, as Jer and Lam do not occur in the Apoc, and the Bib. Baruch was Jeremiah's amanuensis.

In the so-called letter (see 1, above) the author shows the absurdity and wickedness of heathen worship. The Jews, for their sins, will

3. Contents be removed to Babylon, where they will remain 7 generations. In that land they will be tempted to worship the gods of the people. The writer's aim is ostensibly to warn them beforehand by showing how helpless and useless the idols worshipped are, and how immoral as well as silly the rites of the Bab religion are. For similar polemics against idolatry, see Isa 44 9-19 (which in its earnestness resembles the Ep. Jer closely); Jer 10 3-9; Ps 115 4-8; 135 15-18; Wisd 13 10-19; 15 13-17.

That the Ep. Jer was composed in Gr is the opinion of practically all scholars. There are no marks of translation; the Gr is on the whole

4. Original Language good, and abounds in such rhetorical terms as characterized the Gr of Northern Egypt about the beginning of our era. There is no trace of a Heb original, though Origen has been mistakenly understood to say there was one in his day (see Schürer, GJV, III, 467 f). Romanist writers defend a Heb original, and point to some Hebraisms (ver 44 and the use of the fut. for the past), but these can be matched in admittedly Hellenistic Gr writings.

The writer was almost certainly a resident in Alexandria toward the close of the last cent. BC.

The Gr of the book, the references to 5. Author- Egypt religion (ver 19, where the Feast ship, Date of Lights at Sais—Herod. ii.62—is and Aim referred to), and the allusion to the Ep. Jer in 2 Macc 2 2, denied by Schürer, etc., make the above conclusion very probable. The author had in mind the dangers to the religion of his fellow-countrymen presented by the fascinating forms of idolatry existing at Alexandria. Certainly Jeremiah is not the author, for the book was written in Gr and never formed part of the Heb Canon. Besides, the treatment is far below the level of the genuine writings of that prophet.

(1) The Greek.—This ep. occurs in the principal MSS of the LXX uncials (BA Q 1 contain 7b-24a, etc) and cursives (except 70, 96, 229).

6. Text and Versions

(2) The Syriac.—P follows the Gr. but very freely. The Syr H follows the text of B closely, often at the expense of Syr idioms.

(3) The Latin.—The Vulg is made direct from the Gr. There is a different Lat VS published by Sabatier in his Bib. Sacr. Lat. Versiones Antiquas, II, 734 ff. It is freer than the Vulg.

(4) There are also Arabic (following A). Coptic (ed Quatremère, 1810), and Ethiopic (ed Dillmann, 1894) versions.

LITERATURE.—See under APOCYPHA for Comm. and editions. But note in addition to the lit. mentioned in the art. the following: Reusch, Erklar. des B. Baruch, 1853; Daubanton, "Het Apok boek 'Επιστολή 'Ιερειου", Theol. Studien, 1888, 126-38.

JERIAH, jê-ri'a (יְרִיָּה, yriyāhū, "founded of Jeh"): In 1 Ch 23 19; 24 23="Jerijah" (יְרִיָּה, yriyāhū), 26 31, head of a Levitical house: called chief of the Hebronites in 24 23 (cf ver 30).

JERIBAI, jer'i-bi, jer-i-bā'i (יִרְבִּי, yribhay, meaning uncertain): One of David's mighty men of the armies (1 Ch 11 46); one of the names not found in the list in 2 S 23 24-29a.

JERICHO, jer'i-kō (the word occurs in two forms. In the Pent, in 2 K 25 5 and in Ezr, Neh, Ch it is written יְרִיחוֹ, yrihō; יְרִיחוֹ, yrihō, elsewhere): In 1 K 16 34 the final letter is ה, hē, instead of ו, wāw. The termination wāw is thought to preserve the peculiarities of the old Can. dialect. In the LXX we have the indeclinable form, Ἰεριχώ, Ierichō (Swete has the form Ierichō as well), both with and without the fem. art.; in the NT Ἰεριχώ, Ierichō, once with the fem. art. The Arab. is er-Riha. According to Dt 32 49 it stood opposite Nebo, while in 34 3 it is called a city grove of palm trees. It was surrounded with a wall (Josh 2 15), and provided with a gate which was closed at night (2 5), and was ruled over by a king. When captured, vessels of brass and iron, large quantities of silver and gold, and "a goodly Babylonish garment" were found in it (7 21). It was on the western side of the Jordan, not far from the camp of Israel at Shittim, before crossing the river (2 1). The city was on the "plains" (4 13), but so close to "the mountain" on the W. (probably the cliffs of Quarantania, the traditional scene of Christ's temptation) that it was within easy reach of the spies, protected by Rahab. It was in the lot of Benjamin (18 21), the border of which ascended to the "slope [EV "side"] of J. on the N." (18 12). Authorities are generally agreed in locating the ancient city at Tel es-Sultān, a mile and a half N.W. of modern J. Here there is a mound 1,200 ft. long and 50 ft. in height supporting 4 smaller mounds, the highest of which is 90 ft. above the base of the main mound.

Site of Ancient Jericho.

The geological situation (see JORDAN VALLEY) sheds great light upon the capture of the city by Joshua (Josh 6). If the city was built as we suppose it to have been, upon the unconsolidated sedimentary deposits which accumulated to a great depth in the Jordan valley during the enlargement of the Dead Sea, which took place in Pleistocene (or glacial) times, the sudden falling of the walls becomes easily credible to anyone who believes in the personality of God and in His power either to foreknow the future or to direct at His will the secondary causes with which man has to deal in Nature. The narrative does not state that the blowing of the rams' horns of themselves effected the falling of the walls. It was simply said that at a specified juncture on the 7th day the walls would fall, and that they actually fell at that juncture. The miracle may, therefore, be regarded as either that of prophecy, in which the Creator by foretelling the course of things to Joshua, secured the junction of Divine and human activities which constitutes a true miracle, or we may regard the movements which brought down the walls to be the result of direct Divine action, such as is exerted by man when he produces an explosion of dynamite at a particular time and place. The phenomena are just such as occurred in the earthquake of San Francisco in 1906, where, according to the report of the scientific commission appointed by the state, "the most violent destruction of buildings was on the made ground. This ground seems to have behaved during the earthquake very much in the same way as jelly in a bowl, or as a semi-liquid in a tank." Santa Rosa, situated on the valley floor, "underlain to a considerable depth by loose or slightly coherent geological formations, . . . 20 miles from the rift, was the most severely shaken town in the state and suffered the greatest disaster relatively to its population and extent" (Report, 13 and 15). Thus an earthquake, such as is easily provided for along the margin of this great Jordan crevasse, would produce exactly the phenomena here described, and its occurrence at the time and place foretold to Joshua constitutes it a miracle of the first magnitude.

Notwithstanding the curse pronounced in Josh 6 26 AV, prophesying that whosoever should rebuild the city "he shall lay the foundations thereof in his firstborn," it was rebuilt (1 K 16 34) by Hiel the Bethelite in the days of Ahab. The curse was literally fulfilled. Still David's messengers are said to have "tarried at Jericho" in his day (2 S 10 5; 1 Ch 19 5). In Elisha's time (2 K 2 5) there was a school of prophets there, while several other references to the city occur in the OT and the Apoc (2 Ch 28 15, where it is called "the city of palm-trees"; 2 K 25 5; Jer 39 5; Ezr 2 34; Neh 3 2; 7 36; 1 Macc 9 50). Jos describes it and the fertile plain surrounding it, in glowing terms. In the time of Christ, it was an important place yielding a large revenue to the royal family. But the city which Herod rebuilt was on a higher elevation, at the base of the western mountain, probably at Beit Jubr, where there are the ruins of a small fort. Jericho was the place of rendezvous for Galilean pilgrims desiring to avoid Samaria, both in going to and in departing from Jerus, and it has been visited at all times by thousands of pilgrims, who go down from Jerus to bathe in the Jordan. The road leading from Jerus to Jericho is still infested by robbers who hide in the rocky caverns adjoining it, and appear without warning from the tributary gorges of the wadies which dissect the mountain wall. At the present time Jericho and the region about is occupied only by a few hundred miserable inhabitants, deteriorated by the torrid climate which prevails at the low level about the head of the Dead Sea. But the present barrenness of the region is largely due to the destruction of the aqueducts which formerly distributed over the plain the waters brought down through the wadies which descend from the mountains of Judaea. The ruins of many of these are silent witnesses of the cause of its decay. Twelve aqueducts at various levels formerly branched from the Wādī Kelt, irrigating the plain both N. and S. Remains of Rom masonry are found in these. In the Middle Ages they were so repaired that an abundance and variety of crops were raised, including wheat, barley, millet, figs, grapes and sugar cane. See further PALESTINE (RECENT EXPLORATION). GEORGE FREDERICK WRIGHT

JERIEL, jê-ri-el, jer'i-el (יְרִיֵּאל, yri'el, "founded of God"; cf JERIAH): A chief of Issachar (1 Ch 7 2).

JERIJAH, jê-ri'ja (1 Ch 26 31). See JERIAH.

JERIMOTH, jer'i-moth (see JEREMOTH, [c]):

- (1) A Benjamite (1 Ch 7 7).
- (2) A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag, or perhaps a Judaeon (1 Ch 12 5 [Heb 6]).
- (3) In 1 Ch 24 30 = JEREMOTH, (4) (q.v.).
- (4) A Levite musician in David's time (1 Ch 25 4).
- (5) Son of David and father of Mahalath, Rehoboam's wife (2 Ch 11 18). He is not mentioned (2 S 3 2-5; 5 14-16; 1 Ch 3 1-9; 14 4-7) among the sons of David's wives, so Curtis (Ch, 369) thinks that he was either the son of a concubine, or possibly the name is a corruption of "Ithream" (יִתְרָם, yithr'am, 1 Ch 3 3).
- (6) A Levite overseer in Hezekiah's time (2 Ch 31 13).

JERIOTH, jer'i-oth, jer'i-ōth (יֵרִיּוֹת, yēri'ōth, ["tent-] curtains"): In 1 Ch 2 18, where MT is corrupt, Kittel in his comm. and in Bib. Heb reads "Caleb begat [children] of Azubah his wife, Jerioth." Wellhausen (De Gent. et Fam. Jud., 33) reads, "Caleb begat [children] of Azubah his wife, the daughter of Jerioth." According to EV, Caleb had two wives, but the context does not bear this out. J. H. Michaelis regarded J. as another name for Azubah. See Curtis, Comm. on Ch, 92.

JEROBOAM, jer-ō-bō'am (יֵרֹבָם, yērobh'am; LXX Ἰεροβοάμ, Hierobodm, usually assumed to have been derived from רִיב and עָם, and signifying "the people contend," or, "he pleads the people's cause"): The name was borne by two kings of Israel.

(1) Jeroboam I, son of Nebat, an Ephraimite, and of Zeruah, a widow (1 K 11 26-40; 12-14 20). He was the first king of Israel after the disruption of the kingdom, and he reigned 22 years (937-915 BC).

The history of J. is contained in 1 K 11 26-40; 12 1-14 20; 2 Ch 10 1-11 4; 11 14-16; 12 15; 13 3-20, and in an insertion in the

1. Sources LXX after 1 K 12 24(a-z). This insertion covers about the same ground as the MT, and the LXX elsewhere, with some additions and variations. The fact that it calls J.'s mother a pōrnē (harlot), and his wife the Egypt princess Ano (cf 1 K 11); that J. is punished by the death of his son before he has done any wrong; that the episode with the prophet's mantle does not occur until the meeting at Shechem; that J. is not proclaimed king at all—all this proves the passage inferior to the MT. No doubt it is a fragment of some historical work, which, after the manner of the later Midr, has combined history and tradition, making rather free use of the historical kernel.

J., as a highly gifted and valorous young Ephraimite, comes to the notice of Solomon early in his reign (1 K 11 28; cf 9 15, 24).

2. His Rise and Revolt Having noticed his ability, the king made him overseer of the fortifications and public work at Jerus, and placed him over the levy from the house of Joseph. The fact that the latter term may stand for the whole of the ten tribes (cf Am 5 6; 6 6; Ob ver 18) indicates the importance of the position, which, however, he used to plot against the king. No doubt he had the support of the people in his designs. Prejudices of long standing (2 S 19 40 f; 20 f) were augmented when Israelitish interests were made subservient to Judah and to the king, while enforced labor and burdensome taxation filled the people's hearts with bitterness and jealousy. J., the son of a widow, would be the first to feel the gall of oppression and to give voice to the suffering of the people. In addition, he had the approval of the prophet Ahijah of the old sanctuary of Shiloh, who, by tearing his new mantle into twelve pieces and giving ten of them to J., informed him that he was to become king of the ten tribes. Jos says (Ant, VIII, vii, 8) that J. was elevated by the words of the prophet, "and being a young man of warm temper, and ambitious of greatness, he could not be quiet," but tried to get the government into his hands at once. For the time, the plot failed, and J. fled to Egypt where he was received and kindly treated by Shishak, the successor to the father-in-law of Solomon.

The genial and imposing personality of Solomon had been able to stem the tide of discontent excited by his oppressive régime, which at

3. The Revolt of the Ten Tribes his death burst all restraints. Nevertheless, the northern tribes, at a popular assembly held at Shechem, solemnly promised to serve Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, who had already been proclaimed king at Jerus, on condition that he would lighten the burdens that so unjustly rested upon them. Instead of receiving the magna charta which they expected, the king, in a spirit of despotism, gave them a rough answer, and Jos says "the people were struck by his words, as it were, by an iron hammer" (Ant, VIII, viii, 3). But despotism lost the day. The rough answer of the king was met by the Marseillaise of the people:

"What portion have we in David?

Neither have we inheritance in the son of Jesse:

To your tents, O Israel:

Now seek to thine own house, David" (1 K 12 16).

Seeing the turn affairs had taken, but still unwilling to make any concessions, Rehoboam sent Adoram, who had been over the levy for many years (1 K 5 14; 12 18), and who no doubt had quelled dissatisfaction before, to force the people to submission, possibly by the very methods he had threatened to employ (1 K 12 14). However, the attempt failed. The aged Adoram was stoned to death, while Rehoboam was obliged to flee ignominiously back to Jerus, king only of Judah (1 K 12 20). Thus the great work of David for a united kingdom was shattered by inferiors, who put personal ambitions above great ideals.

As soon as J. heard that Solomon was dead, he returned from his forced exile in Egypt and took up his residence in his native town,

4. The Election Zeredah, in the hill country of Ephraim (LXX 1 K 12 20 ff). The northern tribes, having rejected the house of David, now turned to the leader, and perhaps instigator of the revolution. Jeroboam was sent for and raised to the throne by the choice and approval of the popular assembly. Divinely set apart for his task, and having the approval of the people, J. nevertheless failed to rise to the greatness of his opportunities, and his kingdom degenerated into a mere military monarchy, never stronger than the ruler who chanced to occupy the throne. In trying to avoid the Scylla that threatened its freedom and faith (1 K 11 33), the nation steered into the Charybdis of revolution and anarchy in which it finally perished.

Immediately upon his accession, J. fortified Shechem, the largest city in Central Israel, and made it his capital. Later he fortified

5. Political Events Peniel in the E. Jordan country. According to 1 K 14 17, Tirzah was the capital during the latter part of his reign.

About J.'s external relations very little is known beyond the fact that there was war between him and Rehoboam constantly (1 K 14 30). In 2 Ch 13 2-20 we read of an inglorious war with Abijah of Judah. When Shishak invaded Judah (1 K 14 25 f), he did not spare Israel, as appears from his inscription on the temple at Karnak, where a list of the towns captured by him is given. These belong to Northern Israel as well as to Judah, showing that Shishak exacted tribute there, even if he used violence only in Judah. The fact that J. successfully managed a revolution but failed to establish a dynasty shows that his strength lay in the power of his personality more than in the soundness of his principles.

Despite the success of the revolution politically, J. descried in the halo surrounding the temple and its ritual a danger which threatened

6. His Religious Policy the permanency of his kingdom. He justifiably dreaded a reaction in favor of the house of David, should the people make repeated religious pilgrimages to Jerus after the first passion of the rebellion had spent itself. He therefore resolved to establish national sanctuaries in Israel. Accordingly, he fixed on Bethel, which from time immemorial was one of the chief sanctuaries of the land (Gen 28 19; 35 1; Hos 12 4), and Dan, also a holy place since the conquest, as the chief centers of worship for Israel. J. now made "two calves of gold" as symbols of the strength and creative power of Jeh, and set them up in the sanctuaries at Bethel and Dan, where altars and other sacred objects already existed. It appears that many of the priests still in the land were opposed to his image-worship (2 Ch 11 13 ff). Accordingly, he found it necessary to institute a new, non-Levitical priesthood (1 K 13 33). A new and popular festival on the model of the feasts at Jerus was also established. J.'s policy might have been considered as a clever political move, had it not contained the dangerous appeal to the lower instincts of the masses, that led them into the immoralities of heathenism and hastened the destruction of the nation. J. sacrificed the higher interests of religion to politics. This was the "sin of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, wherewith he made Israel to sin" (1 K 12 30; 16 26).

It may be that many of the prophets sanctioned J.'s religious policy. Whatever the attitude of the majority may have been, there was no doubt a party who strenuously opposed the image-worship.

7. Hostility of the Prophets (1) The anonymous prophet.—On the very day on which J. inaugurated the worship at the sanctuary at Bethel "a man of God out of Judah" appeared at Bethel and publicly denounced the service. The import of his message was that the royal altar should some day be desecrated by a ruler from the house of David. The prophet was saved from the wrath of the king only by a miracle. "The altar also was rent, and the ashes poured out from the altar." This narrative of 1 K 13 is usually assumed to belong to a later time, but whatever the date of compilation, the general historicity of the account is little affected by it.

(2) The prophet Ahijah.—At a later date, when J. had realized his ambition, but not the ideal which the prophet had set before him, Ahijah predicted the consequences of his evil policy. J.'s eldest son had fallen sick. He thought of Ahijah, now old and blind, and sent the queen in disguise to learn the issue of the sickness. The prophet bade her to announce to J. that the house of J. should be extirpated root and branch; that the people whom he had seduced to idolatry should be uprooted from the land and transported beyond the river; and, severest of all, that her son should die.

8. His Death J. died in the 22d year of his reign, having "bequeathed to posterity the reputation of an apostate and a succession of endless revolutions."

(2) Jeroboam II (2 K 14 23-29), son of Joash and 13th king of Israel; 4th sovereign of the dynasty of Jehu. He reigned 41 years. His accession may be placed c 798 BC (some date lower).

J. came into power on the crest of the wave of prosperity that followed the crushing of the supremacy of Damascus by his father.

1. His Warlike Policy By his great victory at Aphek, followed by others, Joash had regained the territory lost to Israel in the reigns of Jehu and Jehoahaz (2 K 13 17.25). This satisfied Joash, or his death prevented further hostilities. J., however, then a young man, resolved on a war of retaliation against Damascus, and on further conquests. The condition of the eastern world favored his projects, for Assyria was at the time engaged, under Shalmaneser III and Assur-dan III, in a life-and-death struggle with Armenia. Syria being weakened, J. determined on a bold attempt to conquer and annex the whole kingdom of which Damascus was the capital. The steps of the campaign by which this was accomplished are unknown to us. The result only is recorded, that not only the intermediate territory fell into J.'s hands, but that Damascus itself was captured (2 K 14 28). Hamath was taken, and thus were restored the eastern boundaries of the kingdom, as they were in the time of David (1 Ch 13 5). From the time of Joshua "the entrance of Hamath" (Josh 13 5), a narrow pass leading into the valley of the Lebanon, had been the accepted northern boundary of the promised land. This involved the subjection of Moab and Ammon, probably already tributaries of Damascus.

J.'s long reign of over 40 years gave time for the collected tribute of this greatly increased territory to flow into the coffers of Samaria, and the exactions would be ruthlessly enforced. The prophet Amos, a contemporary of J. in his later years, dwells on the cruelties inflicted on the trans-Jordanic tribes by Hazael, who "threshed Gilead with threshing instruments of iron" (Am 1 3). All this would be remembered now, and wealth to which the Northern Kingdom had been unaccustomed flowed into its treasuries. The hovels of unburned brick in which the citizens had lived were replaced by "houses of hewn stone" (Am 5 11). The ivory house which Ahab built in Samaria (1 K 22 39; decorations only are meant) was imitated, and there were many "great houses" (Am 3 15). The sovereign had both a winter and a summer palace. The description of a banqueting scene within one of these palatial abodes is lifelike in its portraiture. The guests stretched themselves upon the silken cushions of the couches, eating the flesh of lambs and stall-fed calves, drinking wine from huge bowls, singing idle songs to the sound of viols, themselves perfumed and anointed with oil (Am 6 4-6). Meanwhile, they were not grieved for the affliction of Joseph, and cared nothing for the wrongdoing of which the country was full. Side by side with this luxury, the poor of the land were in the utmost distress. A case in which a man was sold into slavery for the price of a pair of shoes seems to have come to the prophet's knowledge, and is twice referred to by him (Am 2 6; 8 6).

With all this, and as part of the social organization, religion of a kind flourished. Ritual took the place of righteousness; and in a memorable passage, Amos denounces the substitution of the one for the other (Am 5 21 ff). The worship took place in the sanctuaries of the golden calves, where the votaries prostrated themselves before the altar clothed in garments taken in cruel pledge, and drank sacrificial wine bought with the money of those who were fined for non-attendance there (Am 2 8). There were subsidiary temples and altars at Gilgal and Beersheba (Am 4 4; 5 5; 8 14). Both of these places had associations with the early history of the nation, and would be attended by worshippers from Judah as well as from Israel.

Toward the close of his reign, it would appear that J. had determined upon adding greater splendor and dignity to the central shrine, in 4. Mission correspondence with the increased of Amos wealth of the nation. Amos, about the same time, received a commission to go to Bethel and testify against the whole proceedings there. He was to pronounce that these sanctuaries should be laid waste, and that Jeh would raise the sword against the house of J. (Am 7 9). On hearing his denunciation, made probably as he stood beside the altar, Amaziah, the priest of Bethel, sent a messenger to the king at Samaria, to tell him of the "conspiracy" of Amos, and that the land was not able to bear all his words. The messenger bore the report that Amos had declared "J. shall die by the sword," which Amos had not done. When the messenger had gone, priest and prophet had a heated controversy, and new threatenings were uttered (Am 7 10-17).

The large extension of territory acquired for Israel by J. is declared to have been the realization of a prophecy uttered earlier by Jonah, 5. Prophecy the son of Amittai (2 K 14 25)—of Jonah the same whose mission to Nineveh forms the subject of the Book of Jon (1 1). It is also indicated that the relief which had now come was the only alternative to the utter extinction of Israel. But Jeh sent Israel a "saviour" (2 K 13 5), associated by some with the Assyrian king Raman-nirari III, who crushed Damascus, and left Syria an easy prey, first to Jehoash, then to J. (see JEHOASH), but whom the historian seems to connect with J. himself (2 K 14 26, 27).

J. was succeeded on his death by his weak son Zechariah (ver 29). W. SHAW CALDECOTT

JEROHAM, jê-rô'ham (יֵרוֹחַם, yêrôhâm, "may he be compassionate"):—

(1) An Ephraimite, the father of Elkanah, and grandfather of Samuel (1 S 1 1; 1 Ch 6 27 34 [Heb 12.19]); Jerahmeel is the name in LXX, B, in 1 S and in LXX, L+MSS, in 1 Ch.

(2) A Benjamite (1 Ch 8 27), apparently = JEREMOTH, (2) (cf ver 14), and probably the same as he of 1 Ch 9 8.

(3) Ancestor of a priest in Jerus (1 Ch 9 12 = Neh 11 12).

(4) A man of Gedor, father of two of David's Benjamite recruits at Ziklag, though Gedor might be a town in Southern Judah (1 Ch 12 7 [Heb 8]).

(5) Father of Azarel, David's tribal chief over Dan (1 Ch 27 22).

(6) Father of Azariah, one of the captains who supported Jehoiada in overthrowing Queen Athaliah (2 Ch 23 1). DAVID FRANCIS ROBERTS

JERUBBAAL, jer-u-bâ'al, jê-rub'â-al (יֵרֻבְבָּאֵל, yêrubba'al, "let Baal contend"): The name given to Gideon by his father, Joash, and the people in recognition of his destruction of the altar of Baal at Ophrah (Jgs 6 32). For this name the form "Jerubbesheth" (2 S 11 21) was substituted after the analogy of "Ishbosheth" and "Mephibosheth," in which bôsheth, the Heb word for "shame," displaced the word ba'al, no doubt because the name resembled one given in honor of Baal. See GIDEON.

JERUBBESHETH, jer-ub-bê'sheth, jê-rub'ê-sheth (יֵרֻבְבֶּשֶׁת, yêrubbesheth, see JERUBBAAL for meaning): It is found once (2 S 11 21) for JERUBBAAL.

The word יֵרֻבְבֶּתַּי, bôsheth, "shameful thing," was substituted by later editors of the text for יֵרֻבְבָּאֵל, ba'al, "lord," in the text of Jer 3 24; Hos 9 10; in 2 S 2 8, etc., we find Ish-bosheth = Eshbaal (Ishbaal) in 1 Ch 8 33; 9 39. The reason for this was reluctance to pronounce the word Ba'al, which had by their time been associated with Canaanitic forms of worship. In 2 S 11 21 LXX, Luc, has "Jeroboal," which LXX, B, has corrupted to "Jeroboam." Cf MERIBBAAL; MEPHIBOSHETH; and see GB, Intro, 400 ff. For a NT case cf Rom 11 4 and see Sanday and Headlam ad loc. See JERUBBAAL.

JERUEL, jê-rôo'el, jer'ôo-el (יֵרֻאֵל, yêru'el, "founded by El"): Jahaziel prophesied that King Jehoshaphat should meet the hordes of Moabites and Ammonites, after they had come up by the "ascent of Ziz," "at the end of the valley [i.e. wâdy], before the wilderness of Jeruel" (2 Ch 20 16). The particular part of the wilderness intended, is unknown. Cheyne (EB) thinks this may be an error for the Jezreel of Judah, mentioned in Josh 15 56, etc. See JEZREEL.

LITERATURE

I. The Name.—The earliest mention of Jerus is in the Am Tab (1450 BC), where it appears in the form Uru-sa-lim; allied with this we have Ur-sa-li-immu on the Assyrian monuments of the 8th cent. BC.

The most ancient Bib. form is יְרוּשָׁלַם, y'rûshâ-lêm, shortened in Ps 76 2 (cf Gen 14 18) to Salem, but in MT we have it vocalized: יְרוּשָׁלַיִם, y'rûshâ-laim. In Jer 26 18; Est 2 6; 2 Ch 25 1; 32 9 we have יְרוּשָׁלַיִם, y'rûshâlayim, a form which occurs on the Jewish coins of the Revolt and also in Jewish literature; it is commonly used by modern Talmudic Jews. The form 2. In Hebrew with the ending -aim or -ayim is interpreted by some as being a dual, referring to the upper and lower Jerus, but such forms occur in other names as implying special solemnity; such a pronunciation is both local and late.

In the LXX we get Ἱερουσαλήμ (Ierousalēm), constantly reflecting the earliest and the common Heb pronunciation, the initial letter 3. In Gr and Latin being probably unaspirated; soon, however, we meet with Ἱεροσολήμ (Hierosolēm)—with the aspirate—the common form in Jos, and Ἱεροσόλυμα (Hierosóluma) in Macc (Books II-IV), and in Strabo. This last form has been carried over into the Lat writers, Cicero, Pliny, Tacitus and Suetonius. It was replaced in official use for some centuries by Hadrian's Aelia Capitolina, which occurs as late as Jerome, but it again comes into common use in the documents of the Crusades, while Solyma occurs at various periods as a poetic abbreviation.

In the NT we have Ἱερουσαλήμ (Hierousalēm), particularly in the writings of St. Luke and St. Paul, and Ἱεροσόλυμα (há Hierosóluma) elsewhere. The AV of 1611 has Ierosalem in the OT and Hierusalem in the NT. The form Jerusalem first occurs in French writings of the 12th cent.

With regard to the meaning of the original name there is no concurrence of opinion. The oldest known form, Uru-sa-lim, has been considered by many to mean either the "City of Peace" or the "City of [the god] Salem," but other interpreters, considering the name as of Heb origin, interpret it as the "possession of peace" or "foundation of peace." It is one of the ironies of history that a city which in all its long history has seen so little peace and for whose possession such rivers of blood have been shed should have such a possible meaning for its name.

Other names for the city occur. For the name Jebus see JEBUS. In Isa 29 1, occurs the name אֲרִיֶּל, 'arī'el, probably "the hearth of God," and in 1 26 the "city of righteousness." In Ps 72 16; Jer 32 24 f; Ekz 7 23, we have the term הָעִיר, hā-'ir, "the city" in contrast to "the land."

A whole group of names is connected with the idea of the sanctity of the site; 'ir ha-kōdesh, the "holy city" occurs in Isa 48 2; 52 1; Neh 11 1, and y'rûshâlayim ha-k'dhōshāh, "Jerusalem the holy" is inscribed on Simon's coins. In Mt 4 5; 27 53 we have ἡ ἁγία πόλις, hē hagia pōlis, "the holy city," and in Philo, Ἱερόπολις, Hierópolis, with the same meaning.

In Arab. the common name is Beit el Makdis, "the holy house," or el Mukaddas, "the holy," or the common name, used by the Moslems everywhere today, el Kūds, a shortened form of el Kūds esh Sherēf, "the noble sanctuary."

Non-Moslems usually use the Arab. form Yerusalem.

II. Geology, Climate and Springs.—The geology of the site and environs of Jerus is comparatively simple, when studied in connection

1. Geology with that of the land of Pal as a whole (see GEOLOGY OF PALESTINE). The outstanding feature is that the rocks consist entirely of various forms of limestone, with strata containing flints; there are no primary rocks, no sandstone (such as comes to the surface on the E. of the Jordan) and no volcanic rocks. The limestone formations are in regular strata dipping toward the S.E., with an angle of about 10°.

On the high hills overlooking Jerus on the E., S.E. and S.W. there still remain strata of considerable thickness of those chalky limestones of the post-Tertiary period which crown so many hilltops of Pal, and once covered the whole land. On the "Mount of Olives," for example, occurs a layer of conglomerate limestone known as Nāri, or "fire-stone," and another thicker deposit, known as Ka'kūli, of which two distinct strata can be distinguished. In these layers, esp. the latter, occur pockets containing marl or haur, and in both there are bands of flint.

Over the actual city's site all this has been denuded long ages ago. Here we have three layers of limestone of varying density very clearly distinguished by all the native builders and masons:

(1) Mizzeh helu, lit. "sweet mizzeh," a hard, reddish-grey layer capable of polish, and reaching in places to a depth of 70 ft. or more. The "holy rock" in the temple-area belongs to this layer, and much of the ancient building stone was of this nature.

(2) Below this is the Melekeh or "royal" layer, which, though not very thick—35 ft. or so—has been of great importance in the history of the city. This rock is peculiar in that when first exposed to the air it is often so soft that it can be cut with a knife, but under the influence of the atmosphere it hardens to make a stone of considerable durability, useful for ordinary buildings. The great importance of this layer, however, lies in the fact that in it have been excavated the hundreds of caverns, cisterns, tombs and aqueducts which honeycomb the city's site.

(3) Under the Melekeh is a Cenomanian limestone of great durability, known as Mizzeh Yehudeh, or "Jewish mizzeh." It is a highly valued building stone, though hard to work. Geologically it is distinguished from Mizzeh helu by its containing ammonites. Characteristically it is a yellowish-grey stone, sometimes slightly reddish. A variety of a distinctly reddish appearance, known as Mizzeh ahmar, or "red mizzeh," makes a very ornamental stone for columns, tombstones, etc.; it takes a high polish and is sometimes locally known as "marble."

This deep layer, which underlies the whole city, comes to the surface in the Kidron valley, and its impermeability is probably the explanation of the appearance there of the one true spring, the "Virgin's Fount." The water over the site and environs of Jerus percolates with ease the upper layer, but is conducted to the surface by this hard layer; the comparatively superficial source of the water of this spring accounts for the poorness of its quality.

The broad features of the climate of Jerus have probably remained the same throughout history,

2. Climate and Rainfall although there is plenty of evidence that there have been cycles of greater and lesser abundance of rain. The almost countless cisterns belonging to all ages upon the site and the long and complicated conduits for bringing water from a distance, testify that over the greater part of history the rainfall must have been, as at present, only seasonal.

As a whole, the climate of Jerus may be considered healthy. The common diseases should be largely preventable—under an enlightened government; even the malaria which is so prevalent is to a large extent an importation from the low-lying country, and could be stopped at once, were efficient means taken for destroying the carriers of infection, the abundant Anopheles mosquitoes. On account of its altitude and its exposed position, almost upon the watershed, wind, rain and cold are all more excessive than in the maritime plains or the Jordan valley. Although the winter's cold is severely felt, on account of its coinciding with the days of heaviest rainfall (cf Ezr 10 9), and also because of the dwellings and clothes of the inhabitants being suited for enduring heat more than cold, the actual lowest cold recorded is only 25° F., and frost occurs only on perhaps a dozen nights in an average year. During the rainless summer months the mean temperature rises steadily until August, when it reaches 73.6° F., but the days of greatest heat, with temperature over 100° F. in the shade at times, occur commonly in September. In midsummer the cool northwest breezes, which generally blow during the afternoons and early night, do much to make life healthy. The most unpleasant days occur in May and from the middle of September until the end of October, when the dry southeast winds—the sirocco—blow hot and stifling from over the deserts, carrying with them at times fine dust sufficient in quantity to produce a marked haze in the atmosphere. At such times all vegetation droops, and most human beings, esp. residents not brought up under such conditions, suffer more or less from depression and physical discomfort; malarial, "sandfly," and other fevers are apt to be peculiarly prevalent. "At that time shall it be said . . . to Jerus, A hot wind from the bare heights in the wilderness toward the daughter of my people, not to winnow, nor to cleanse" (Jer 4 11).

During the late summer—except at spells of sirocco—heavy "dews" occur at night, and at the end of September or beginning of October the "former" rains fall—not uncommonly in tropical downpours accompanied by thunder. After this there is frequently a dry spell of several weeks, and then the winter's rain falls in December, January and February. In some seasons an abundant rainfall in March gives peculiar satisfaction to the inhabitants by filling up the cisterns late in the season and by producing an abundant harvest. The average rainfall is about 26 in., the maximum recorded in the city being 42.95 in. in the season 1877–78, and the minimum being 12.5 in. in 1869–70. An abundant rainfall is not only important for storage, for replenishment of the springs and for the crops, but as the city's sewage largely accumulates in the very primitive drains all through the dry season, it requires a considerable force of water to remove it. Snow falls heavily in some seasons, causing considerable destruction to the badly built roofs and to the trees; in the winter of 1910–11 a fall of 9 in. occurred.

There is only one actual spring in the Jerus area, and even to this some authorities would deny the

3. The Natural Springs name of true spring on account of the comparatively shallow source of its origin; this is the intermittent spring known today as 'Ain Umm ed deraj (lit. "spring of the mother of the steps"), called by the native Christians 'Ain Sitti Miriam (the "spring of the Lady Mary"), and by Europeans commonly called "The Virgin's Fount." All the archaeological evidence points to this as the original source of attraction of earliest occupants of the site; in the OT this spring is known as GIBON (q.v.). The water arises in the actual bottom, though apparent west side, of the Kidron valley some 300 yds. due S. of the south wall of the Haram. The approach to the spring is down two flights of steps, an upper of 16 leading to a small level platform, covered by a modern arch, and a lower, narrower flight of 14 steps, which ends at the mouth of a small cave. The water has its actual source in a long cleft (perhaps 16 ft. long) running E. and

W. in the rocky bottom of the Kidron valley, now many feet below the present surface. The western or higher end of the cleft is at the very entrance of the cave, but most of the water gushes forth from the lower and wider part which lies underneath the steps. When the water is scanty, the women of Siloam creep down into the cavity under the steps and fill their water-skins there; at such times no water at all finds its way into the cave. At the far end of the cave is the opening of that system of ancient tunnel-aqueducts which is described in VI, below. This spring is "intermittent," the water rising rapidly and gushing forth with considerable force, several times in the 24 hours after the rainy season, and only once or twice in the dry. This "intermittent" condition of springs is not uncommon in Pal; and is explained by the accumulation of the underground water in certain cavities or cracks in the rock, which together make up a reservoir which empties itself by syphon action. Where the accumulated water reaches the bend of the syphon, the overflow commences and continues to run until the reservoir is emptied. Such a phenomenon is naturally attributed to supernatural agency by the ignorant—in this case, among the modern fellahin, to a dragon—and natives, specially Jews, visit the source, even today, at times of its overflow, for healing. Whether this intermittent condition of the fountain is very ancient it is impossible to say, but, as Jerome (Comm. in Esa, 86) speaks of it, it was probably present in NT times, and if so we have a strong argument for finding here the "Pool of Bethesda." See BETHESDA.

In ancient times all the water flowed down the open, rocky valley, but at an early period a wall was constructed to bank up the water and convert the source into a pool. Without such an arrangement no water could find its way into the cave and the tunnels. The tunnels, described below (VI), were constructed for the purpose (1) of reaching the water supply from within the city walls, and (2) of preventing the enemies of the Jews from getting at the water (2 Ch 32 4). The water of this source, though used for all purposes by the people of Siloam, is brackish to the taste, and contains a considerable percentage of sewage; it is quite unfit for drinking. This condition is doubtless due to the wide distribution of sewage, both intentionally (for irrigation of the gardens) and unintentionally (through leaking sewers, etc), over the soil overlying the rocks from which the water flows. In earlier times the water was certainly purer, and it is probable, too, that the fountain was more copious, as now hundreds of cisterns imprison the waters which once found their way through the soil to the deep sources of the spring.

The waters of the Virgin's Fount find their way through the Siloam tunnel and out at 'Ain Silwân (the "spring" of Siloam), into the Pool of Siloam, and from this source descend into the Kidron valley to water the numerous vegetable gardens belonging to the village of Siloam (see SILOAM).

The second source of water in Jerus is the deep well known as Bîr Eyyûb, "Job's well," which is situated a little below the point where the Kidron valley and Hinnom meet. In all probability it derives its modern name from a legend in the Korân (Sura 38 5.40-41) which narrates that God commanded Job to stamp with his foot, whereupon a spring miraculously burst up. The well, which had been quite lost sight of, was rediscovered by the Crusaders in 1184 AD, and was by them cleaned out. It is 125 ft. deep. The supply of water in this well is practically inexhaustible, although the quality is no better than that of the "Virgin's Fount"; after several days of heavy rain the water overflows underground and bursts out a few yards lower down the valley as a little stream. It continues to run for a few days after a heavy fall of rain is over, and this "flowing Kidron" is a great source of attraction to the native residents of Jerus, who pour forth from the city to enjoy the rare sight of running water. Somewhere in the neighborhood of Bîr Eyyûb must have lain 'En-Rogel, but if that were once an actual spring, its source is now buried under the great mass of rubbish accumulated here (see EN-ROGEL).

Nearly 600 yds. S. of Bîr Eyyûb is a small gravelly basin where, when the Bîr Eyyûb overflows, a small spring called 'Ain el Lozêh (the "spring of the almond") bursts forth. It is not a true spring, but is due to some of the water of Job's well which finds its way along an ancient rock-cut aqueduct on the west side of the Wâdy en Nâr, bursting up here.

The only other possible site of a spring in the Jerus area is the Hammâm esh Shefâ, "the bath of healing." This is an underground rock-basin in the Tyropœon valley, within the city walls, in which water collects by percolation through the débris of the city. Though once a reservoir with probably rock-cut channels conducting water to it, it is now a deep well with arches erected over it at various periods, as the rubbish of the city gradually accumulated through the centuries. There is no evidence whatever of there being any natural fountain, and the water is, in the dry season, practically pure sewage, though used in a neighboring Turkish bath.

G. A. Smith thinks that the JACKAL'S WELL (q.v.) mentioned by Nehemiah (2 13), which must have been situated in the Valley of Hinnom, may possibly have been a temporary spring arising there for a few years in consequence of an earthquake, but it is extremely likely that any well sunk then would tap water flowing along the bed of the valley. There is no such "spring" or "well" there today.

III. The Natural Site.—Modern Jerus occupies a situation defined geographically as 31° 46' 45" N. lat., by 35° 13' 25" E. long. It lies in the midst of a bare and rocky plateau, the environs being one of the most stony and least fruitful districts in the habitable parts of Pal, with shallow, grey or reddish soil and many outcrops of bare limestone. Like all the hill slopes with a southeasterly aspect, it is so thoroughly exposed to the full blaze of the summer sun that in its natural condition the site would be more or less barren. Today, however, as a result of diligent cultivation and frequent watering, a considerable growth of trees and shrubs has been produced in the rapidly extending suburbs. The only fruit tree which reaches perfection around Jerus is the olive.

The site of Jerus is shut in by a rough triangle of higher mountain ridges: to the W. runs the main ridge, or water parting, of Judaea, which here makes a sweep to the westward. From this ridge a spur runs

1. The Mountains Around S.E. and E, culminating due E. of the city in the MOUNT OF OLIVES (q.v.), nearly 2,700 ft. above sea-level and about 300 ft. above the mean level of the ancient city. Another spur, known as Jebel Deir abu Tôr, 2,550 ft. high, runs E. from the plateau of el Bukey'a and lies S.W. of the city; it is the traditional "Hill of Evil Counsel." The city site is thus dominated on all sides by these higher ranges—"the mountains [that] are round about Jerus" (Ps 125 2)—so that while on the one hand the ancient city was hidden, at any considerable distance, from any direction except the S.E., it is only through this open gap toward the desert and the mountains of Moab that any wide outlook is obtainable. This strange vision of wilderness and distant mountain wall—often of exquisite loveliness in the light of the setting sun—must all through the ages have been the most familiar and the most potent of scenic influences to the inhabitants of Jerus.

Within the enfolding hills the city's proper site is demarked by two main valleys. That on the W.

2. The Valleys

and S.W. commences in a hollow occupied by the Moslem cemetery around the pool Birket Mamilla. The valley runs due E. toward the modern Jaffa Gate, and there bends S., being known in this upper part of its course as the Wādī el Mēs. In this southern course it is traversed by a great dam, along which the modern Bethlehem road runs, which converts a large area of the valley bed into a great pool, the Birket es Sultān. Below this the valley—under the name of Wādī er Rābābi—bends S.E., then E., and finally S.E. again, until near Bīr Eyyūb it joins the western valley to form the Wādī en Nār, 670 ft. below its origin. This valley has been very generally identified as the Valley of Hinnom (see HINNOM).

Hills and Valleys of Jerusalem with Modern Names.

The eastern valley takes a wider sweep. Commencing high up in the plateau to the N. of the city, near the great water-parting, it descends as a wide and open valley in a southeasterly direction until, where it is crossed by the Great North Road, being here known as Wādī el Jôz (the "Valley of the Walnuts"), it turns more directly E. It gradually curves to the S., and as it runs E. of the city walls, it receives the name of Wādī Sitti Miriam (the "Valley of the Lady Mary"). Below the S.E. corner of the temple-area, near the traditional "Tomb of Absalom," the valley rapidly deepens and takes a direction slightly to the W. of S. It passes the "Virgin's Fount," and a quarter of a mile lower it is joined by el Wād from the N., and a little farther on by the Wādī er Rābābi from the W. South of Bīr Eyyūb, the valley formed by their union is continued under the name of Wādī en Nār to the Dead Sea. This western valley is that commonly known as the Brook Kidron, or, more shortly, the "Brook" (nahal), or ravine (see KIDRON), but named from the 5th cent. onward by Christians the VALLEY OF JEHOSEPHAT (q.v.). The rocky tongue of land inclosed between these deep ravines, an area, roughly speaking, a little over one mile long by half a mile wide, is further subdivided into a number of distinct hills by some shallower valleys. The most prominent of these—indeed the only one noticeable to the superficial observer today—is the great central valley known to modern times by the single name el Wād, "the valley." It commences in a slight depression of the ground a little N. of the modern "Damascus Gate," and after entering the city at this gate it rapidly deepens—a fact largely disguised today by the great accumulation of rubbish in its course. It traverses the city with the Haram to its east, and the Christian and Moslem quarters on rapidly rising ground to its west. Its course is observed near the Bāb es Silseleh, where it is crossed by an ancient causeway, but farther S. the valley reappears, having the walls of the Haram (near the "wailing place" and "Robinson's arch") on the E., and steep cliffs crossed by houses of the Jewish quarter on the W. It leaves the city at the "Dung Gate," and passes with an open curve to the E., until it reaches the Pool of Siloam, below which it merges in the Wādī Sitti Miriam. This is the course of the main valley, but a branch of great importance in the ancient topography of the city starts some 50 yds. to the W. of the modern Jaffa Gate and runs down the Suwaikat Allān, generally known to travelers as "David's Street," and thus easterly, along the Tarik bāb es Silseleh, until it merges in the main valley. The main valley is usually considered to be the Tyropæon, or "Cheesemongers' Valley" of Jos, but some writers have attempted to confine the name esp. to this western arm of it.

Another interior valley, which is known rather by the rock contours, than by surface observations, being largely filled up today, cuts diagonally across the N.E. corner of the modern city. It has no modern name, though it is sometimes called "St. Anne's Valley." It arises in the plateau near "Herod's Gate," known as es Şahra, and entering the city about 100 yds. to the E. of that gate, runs S.S.E., and leaves the city between the N.E. angle of the Haram and the Golden Gate, joining the Kidron valley farther S.E. The Birket Israel runs across the width of this valley, which had far more influence in determining the ancient topography of the city than has been popularly recognized. There is an artificially made valley between the Haram and the buildings to its north, and there is thought by many to be a valley between the S.E. hill, commonly called "Ophel" and the temple-area. Such, then, are the valleys, great and small, by which the historic hills on which the city stood are defined. All of them, particularly in their southern parts, were considerably deeper in ancient times, and in places the accumulated débris is 80 ft. or more. All of them were originally torrent beds, dry except immediately after heavy rain. The only perennial outflow of water is the scanty and intermittent stream which overflows from the Pool of Siloam, and is used to irrigate the gardens in the Wādī Sitti Miriam.

The E. and W. valleys isolate a roughly quadrilateral tongue of land running from N.W.W. to S.S.E., and tilted so as to face S.E.

3. The Hills This tongue is further subdivided by el Wād into two long ridges, which merge into each other in the plateau to the N. The western ridge has its actual origin considerably N. of the modern wall, being part of the high ground lying between the modern Jaffa road to the W., and the commencement of the Kidron valley to the E. Within the city walls it rises as high as 2,581 ft. near the northwestern corner. It is divided by the west branch of the Tyropæon valley into two parts: a northern part—the northwestern hill—on which is situated today the Church of the Holy Sepulchre and the greater part of the "Christian quarter" of the city, and a southern hill—the southwestern—which is connected with the northwestern hill by but a narrow saddle—50 yds. wide—near the Jaffa Gate. This hill sustains the citadel (the so-called "Tower of David"), the barracks and the Armenian quarter within the walls, and the Coenaculum and adjacent buildings outside the walls. This hill is from 2,500 to 2,350 ft. high along its summit, but drops rapidly on its southwestern, southern and southeastern sides. In its central part it falls much more gently toward the eastern hill across the now largely filled valley el Wād.

The eastern ridge may be reckoned as beginning at the rocky hill el-Edhemiyeh—popularly known as Gordon's Calvary—but the wide trench made here by quarrying somewhat obscures this fact. The ridge may for convenience be regarded as presenting three parts, the northeastern, central or central-eastern, and southeastern summits. The northeastern hill within the modern wall supports the Moslem quarter, and rises in places to a height of over 2,500 ft.; it narrows to a mere neck near the "Ecce Homo" arch, where it is joined to the barracks, on the site of the ancient Antonia. Under the present surface it is here separated from the temple summit by a deep rocky trench.

The central, or central-eastern, summit is that appearing as es Sakhra, the sacred temple rock, which is 2,404 ft. high. This is the highest point from which the ground rapidly falls E., W., and S., but the natural contours of the adjacent ground are much obscured by the great substructures which have been made to sustain the temple platform.

The sloping, southeastern, hill, S. of the temple-area appears today, at any rate, to have a steady fall of from 2,350 ft. just S. of the Haram southern wall to a little over 2,100 ft. near the Pool of Siloam. It is a narrow ridge running in a somewhat curved direction, with a summit near 200 ft. above the Kidron and 100 ft. above the bed of the Tyropæon. In length it is not more than 600 yds., in width, at its widest, only 150 yds., but its chief feature, its natural strength, is today greatly obscured on account of the rubbish which slopes down its sides and largely fills up its surrounding valleys. In earlier times, at least three of its sides were protected by deep valleys, and probably on quite two-thirds of its circumference its summit was surrounded by natural rocky scarps. According to Professor Guthe, this hill is divided from the higher ground to the N. by a depression 12 ft. deep and 30–50 yds. wide, but this has not been confirmed by other observers. The city covering so hilly a site as this must ever have consisted, as it does today, of houses terraced on steep slopes with stairways for streets.

IV. General Topography of Jerusalem.—From the foregoing description of the "natural site," it will be seen that we have to deal with 5 natural subdivisions or hills, two on the western and three on the eastern ridges.

In discussing the topography it is useful to commence with the description of Jos, wherein he gives to these 5 areas the names common in his day (BJ, V, iv, 1,2). He says: "The city was built upon two hills which are opposite to one another and have a valley to divide them asunder. . . . Now the Valley of the Cheesemongers, as it was called, and was that which distinguished the hill of the upper city from that of the lower, extended as far as Siloam" (ib, V, iv, 1). Here we get the first prominent physical feature, the bisection of the city-site into two main hills. Farther on, however, in the same passage—one, it must be admitted, of some obscurity—Jos distinguishes 5 distinct regions:

(1) The Upper City or Upper Market Place:

(The hill) "which sustains the upper city is much higher and in length more direct. Accordingly, it was called the citadel (φρούριον, phrourion) of King David . . . but it is by us called the Upper Market Place." This is without dispute the southwestern hill.

(2) Akra and Lower City: "The other hill, which was called Akra, and sustains the lower city, was double-curved" (ἀμφικυρτος, amphikurtos). The description can apply only to the semicircular shape of the southeastern hill, as viewed from the "upper city." These names, "Akra" and "Lower City," are, with reservations, therefore, to be applied to the southeastern hill.

(3) The Temple Hill: Josephus' description here is curious, on account of its indefiniteness, but there can be no question as to which hill he intends. He writes: "Over against this is a third hill, but naturally lower than the Akra and parted formerly from the other by a flat valley. However, in those times when the Hasmonæans reigned, they did away with this valley, wishing to connect the city with the temple; and cutting down the summit of the Akra, they made it lower, so that the temple might be visible over it." Comparison with other passages shows that this "third hill" is the central-eastern—the "Temple Hill."

(4) Bezetha: "It was Agrippa who encompassed the parts added to the old city with this wall (i.e. the third wall) which had been all naked before; for as the city grew more populous, it gradually crept beyond its old limits, and those parts of it that stood northward of the Temple, and joined that hill to the city, made it considerably larger, and occasioned that hill which is in number the fourth, and is called 'Bezetha,' to be inhabited also. It lies over against the tower Antonia, but is divided from it by a deep valley, which was dug on purpose. . . . This new-built part of the city was called 'Bezetha' in our language, which, if interpreted in the Gr language, may be called the 'New City.'" This is clearly the northeastern hill.

(5) The Northern Quarter of the City: From the account of the walls given by Jos, it is evident that the northern part of his "first wall" ran along the northern edge of the southwestern hill; the second wall inclosed the inhabited part of the northwestern hill. Thus Jos writes: "The second wall took its beginning from the gate which they called Gennath in the first wall, and inclosing the northern quarter only reached to the Antonia." This area is not described as a separate hill, as the inhabited area, except on the S., was defined by no natural valleys, and besides covering the northwestern hill, must have extended into the Tyropæon valley.

Here then we have Josephus' names for these five districts: (1) Southwestern Hill, "Upper City" and "Upper Market Place"; also the

2. Summary Phrourion, or "fortress of David." of Names From the 4th cent. AD, this hill has of the Five also been known as "Zion," and on it Hills today is the so-called "Tower of David," built on the foundations of two of Herod's great towers.

(2) Northwestern Hill: "The northern quarter of the city." This district does not appear to have had any other name in OT or NT, though some of the older authorities would place the "Akra" here (see infra). Today it is the "Christian quarter" of Jerus, which centers round the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

(3) Northeastern Hill: "Bezetha" or "New City," even now a somewhat sparsely inhabited area, has no name in Bib. literature.

(4) Central-eastern Hill: The "third hill" of Jos, clearly the site of the Temple which, as Jos says (BJ, V, v), "was built upon a strong hill." In earlier times it was the "threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite." On the question whether it has any claims to be the Moriah of Gen 22 2, as it is called in 2 Ch 3 1, see MORIAH. The temple hill is also in many of the Heb writings called Zion, on which point see ZION.

(5) Southeastern Hill: This Jos calls "Akra" and "Lower City," but while on the one hand these names require some elucidation, there are other names which have at one period or another come to be applied to this hill, viz. "City of David," "Zion" and "Ophel." These names for this hill we shall now deal with in order.

In spite of the very definite description of Jos, there has been considerable difference of opinion regarding the situation of the "Akra."

3. The Akra Various parts of the northwestern, the northeastern, the southeastern hills, and even the central-eastern itself, have been suggested by earlier authorities, but instead of considering the various arguments, now largely out of date, for other proposed sites, it will be better to deal with the positive arguments for the southeastern hill. Jos states that in his day the term "Akra" was applied to the southeastern hill, but in references to the earlier history it is clear that the Akra was not a whole hill, but a definite fortress (akpa, akra = "fortress").

(1) It was situated on the site, or on part of the site, which was considered in the days of the Maccabees to have been the "City of David." Antiochus Epiphanes (168 BC), after destroying Jerus, "fortified the city of David with a great and strong wall, with strong towers and it became unto them an Akra" (1 Macc 1 33-36). The formidable fortress—known henceforth as "the Akra"—became a constant menace to the Jews, until at length, in 142 BC, it was captured by Simon, who not only razed the whole fortress, but, according to Jos (Ant, XIII, vi, 7; BJ, V, iv, 1), actually cut down the hill on which it stood. He says that "they all, labouring zealously, demolished the hill, and ceasing not from the work night and day for three whole years, brought it to a level and even slope, so that the Temple became the highest of all after the Akra and the hill upon which it was built had been removed" (Ant, XIII, vi, 7). The fact that at the time of Jos this hill was evidently lower than the temple hill is in itself sufficient argument against any theory which would place the Akra on the northwestern or southwestern hills. (2) The Akra was close to the temple (1 Macc 13 52), and from its walls the garrison could actually overlook it (1 Macc 14 36). Before the hill was cut down it obscured the temple site (ib). (3) It is identified by Jos as forming part, at least, of the lower city, which (see below) bordered upon the temple (cf BJ, I, i, 4; V, iv, 1; vi, 1). (4) The LXX identifies the Akra with Millo (2 S 5 9; 1 K 9 15-24; 2 Ch 32 5).

Allowing that the original Akra of the Syrians was on the southeastern hill, it is still a matter of some difficulty to determine whereabouts it stood, esp. as, if the statements of Jos are correct, the natural configuration of the ground has been greatly altered. The most prominent point upon the southeastern hill, in the neighborhood of Gihon, appears to have been occupied by the Jebusite fortress of ZION (q.v.), but the site of the Akra can hardly be identical with this, for this became the "City of David," and here were the venerated tombs of David and the Judaean kings, which must have been destroyed if this hill was, as Jos states, cut down. On this and other grounds we must look for a site farther north. Sir Charles Watson (PEFS, 1906, 1907) has produced strong topographical and literary arguments for placing it where the al Akra mosque is today; other writers are more inclined to put it farther south, somewhere in the neighborhood of the massive tower discovered by Warren on the "Ophel" wall (see MILLO). If the account of Jos, written two centuries after the events, is to be taken as literal, then Watson's view is the more probable.

Jos, as we have seen, identified the Akra of his day with the Lower City. This latter is not a name occurring in the Bible because,

4. The Lower City as will be shown, the OT name for this part was "City of David." That by Lower City Jos means the southeastern hill is shown by many facts. It is actually the lowest part of the city, as compared with the "Upper City," Temple Hill and the Bezetha; it is, as Jos describes, separated from the Upper City by a deep valley—the Tyropœon; this southeastern hill is "double-curved," as Jos describes, and lastly several passages in his writings show that the Lower City was associated with the Temple on the one end and the Pool of Siloam at the other (cf Ant, XIV, xvi, 2; BJ, II, xvii, 5; IV, ix, 12; VI, vi, 3; vii, 2).

In the wider sense the "Lower City" must have included, not only the section of the city covering the southeastern hill up to the temple precincts, where were the palaces (BJ, V, vi, 1; VI, vi, 3), and the homes of the well-to-do, but also that in the valley of the Tyropœon from Siloam up to the "Council House," which was near the northern "first wall" (cf BJ, V, iv, 2), a part doubtless inhabited by the poorest.

It is clear (2 S 5 7; 1 Ch 11 5) that the citadel "Zion" of the Jebusites became the "City of David," or as G. A. Smith calls it, "David's Burg," after its capture by the Hebrews. The arguments for placing Zion

"Zion" on the southeastern hill are given elsewhere (see ZION), but a few acts relevant esp. to the "City of David" may be mentioned here: the capture of the Jebusite city by means of the gutter (2 S 5 8), which is most reasonably explained as "Warren's Shaft" (see VII); the references to David's halt on his flight (2 S 15 23), and his sending Solomon to Gihon to be crowned (1 K 1 33), and the common expression "up," used in describing the transference of the Ark from the City of David to the Temple Hill (1 K 8 1; 2 Ch 5 2; cf 1 K 9 24), are all consistent with this view. More convincing are the references to Hezekiah's aqueduct which brought the waters of Gihon "down on the west side of the city of David" (2 Ch 32 30); the mention of the City of David as adjacent to the Pool of Shelah (or Shiloah; cf Isa 8 6), and the "king's garden" in Neh 3 15, and the position of the Fountain Gate in this passage and Neh 12 37; and the statement that Manassah built "an outer wall to the City of David, on the west side of Gihon" in the nahal, i.e. the Kidron valley (2 Ch 33 14).

The name appears to have had a wider significance as the city grew. Originally "City of David" was only the name of the Jebusite fort, but later it became equivalent to the whole southeastern hill. In the same way, Akra was originally the name of the Syrian fort, but the name became extended to the whole southeastern hill. Jos looks upon "City of David" and "Akra" as synonymous, and applies to both the name "Lower City." For the names Ophel and Ophlas see OPHEL.

V. Excavations and Antiquities.—During the last hundred years explorations and excavations of a succession of engineers and archaeologists have furnished an enormous mass of observations for the understanding of the condition of ancient Jerus. Some of the more important are as follows:

In 1833 Messrs. Bonomi, Catherwood and Arundale made a first thorough survey of the Haram (temple-area), a work which was the foundation of all subsequent maps for over a quarter of a century.

In 1838, and again in 1852, the famous American traveler and divine, Rev. E. Robinson, D.D., visited the land as the representative of an American

1. Robinson society, and made a series of brilliant topographical investigations of profound importance to all students of the Holy Land, even today.

In 1849 Jerus was surveyed by Lieuts. Aldrich and Symonds of the Royal Engineers, and the data acquired were used for a map constructed by Van de Vilde and published by T. Tobler.

In 1857 an American, J. T. Barclay, published another map of Jerus and its environs "from actual and minute survey made on the spot."

In 1860-63 De Vogüé in the course of some elaborate researches in Syria explored the site of the sanctuary.

In 1864-65 a committee was formed in London to consider the sanitary condition of Jerus, esp. with a view to furnishing the city with a satisfactory water-supply, and Lady Burdett-Coutts gave

2. Wilson and the Palestine Exploration Fund, 1865 £500 toward a proper survey of Jerus and its environs as a preliminary step. Captain (later Lieutenant-General Sir Charles) Wilson, R.E., was lent by the Ordnance Survey Department of Great Britain for the purpose. The results of this survey, and of certain tentative excavations and observations made at the same time, were so encouraging that in 1865 "The Palestine Exploration Fund" was constituted, "for the purpose of investigating the archaeology, geography, geology, and natural history of the Holy Land."

During 1867-70 Captain (later Lieutenant-General Sir Charles) Warren, R.E., carried out a series of most exciting and original excavations all over the site of Jerus, esp. around the Haram.

3. Warren and Conder During 1872-75 Lieutenant (later Lieutenant-Colonel) Conder, R.E., in the course of the great survey of Western Pal., made further contributions to our knowledge of the Holy City.

In 1875 Mr. Henry Maudslay, taking advantage of the occasion of the rebuilding of "Bishop Gobat's Boys' School," made a careful examination of the remarkable rock cuttings which are

4. Maudslay now more or less incorporated into the school buildings, and made considerable excavations, the results being described in PEFS (April, 1875).

In 1881 Professor Guthe made a series of important excavations on the southeastern hill, commonly called "Ophel," and also near the Pool of Siloam; his reports were published in ZDPV, 1882.

The same year (1881), the famous Siloam inscription was discovered and was first reported by Herr Baurath

5. Schick Schick, a resident in Jerus who from 1866 until his death in 1901 made a long series of observations of the highest importance on the topography of Jerus. He had unique opportunities for scientifically examining the buildings in the Haram, and the results of his study of the details of that locality are incorporated in his wonderful Temple model. He also made a detailed report of the ancient aqueducts of the city. Most important of all were the records he so patiently and faithfully kept of the rock levels in all parts of the city's site whenever the digging of foundations for buildings or other excavations gave access to the rock. His contributions to the PEF and ZDPV run into hundreds of articles.

Mr. Clermont-Ganneau, who was resident in Jerus in the French consular service, made for many years, from 1880 onward, a large number of acute

6. Clermont-Ganneau observations on the archaeology of Jerus and its environs, many of which were published by the PEF. Another name honored in connection with the careful study of the topography of Jerus over somewhat the same period is that of Rev. Selah Merrill, D.D., for many years U.S. consul in Jerus.

In 1894-97 the Palestine Exploration Fund conducted an elaborate series of excavations with a view to determining in particular the course of the ancient southern walls under the direction of Mr.

7. Bliss and Dickie T. J. Bliss (son of Rev. Daniel Bliss, D.D.) then president of the Syrian Protestant College, Beirut), assisted by Mr. A. C. Dickie as architect. After picking up the buried foundations of walls at the southeastern corner where "Maudslay's scarp" was exposed in the Protestant cemetery, Bliss and Dickie followed them all the way to the Pool of Siloam, across the Tyropoeon and on to "Ophel"—and also in other directions. Discoveries of great interest were also made in the neighborhood of the Pool of Siloam (see Siloam).

Following upon these excavations a number of private investigations have been made by the Augustinians in a large estate they have acquired on the E. side of the traditional hill of Zion.

In 1909-11 a party of Englishmen, under Captain the Hon. M. Parker, made a number of explorations with very elaborate tunnels upon the hill of Ophel, immediately above the Virgin's Fount. In the course of their work, they cleaned out the whole Siloam aqueduct, finding some new passages; they reconstructed the Siloam Pool, and they completed Warren's previous investigation in the neighborhood of what has been known as "Warren's Shaft."

There are several societies constantly engaged in observing new facts connected with the topography of ancient Jerus, notably the School of Archaeology connected with the University

8. Jerusalem Archaeological Societies of St. Stephens, under the Dominicans; the American School of Archaeology; the German School of Bib. Archaeology under Professor Dalman, and the Palestine Exploration Fund.

VI. The City's Walls and Gates.—Although the existing walls of Jerus go back in their present form to but the days of Suleiman the Magnificent, c 1542 AD, their study is an essential preliminary to the understanding of the ancient walls. The

1. The Existing Walls total circuit of the modern walls is

4,326 yds., or nearly 2½ miles, their average height is 35 ft., and they have altogether 35 towers and 8 gates—one of which is walled up. They make a rough square, with the four sides facing the cardinal points of the compass. The masonry is of various kinds, and on every side there are evidences that the present walls are a patchwork of many periods.

The northern wall, from near the northwestern angle to some distance E. of the "Damascus Gate," lies parallel with, though somewhat inside of, an ancient fosse, and it and the gate itself evidently follow ancient lines. The eastern and western walls, following as they do a general direction along the edges of deep valleys, must be more or less along the course of earlier walls. The eastern wall, from a little south of St. Stephen's Gate to the southeastern angle, contains many ancient courses, and the general line is at least as old as the time of Herod the Great; the stretch of western wall from the so-called "Tower of David" to the southwestern corner is certainly along an ancient line and has persisted through very many centuries. This line of wall was allowed to remain undestroyed when Titus leveled the remainder. At the northwestern angle are some remains known as Kala'at Jalad ("Goliath's castle"), which, though largely mediæval, contain a rocky core and some masonry of Herodian times, which are commonly accepted as the relics of the lofty tower Psephinus.

The course of the southern wall has long been a difficulty; it is certainly not the line of wall before

2. Wilson's Theory Titus; it has none of the natural advantages of the western and eastern walls, and there are no traces of any great rock fosse, such as is to be found on the north. The eastern end is largely built upon the lower courses of Herod's southern wall for his enlarged temple-platform, and in it are still to be found walled up the triple, single and double gates which lead up to the Temple. The irregular line followed by the remainder of this wall has not until recent times received any explanation. Sir Charles

Wilson (Golgotha and the Holy Sepulchre) suggests the probable explanation that the line of wall from the southwestern to the "Zion Gate" was determined by the legionary camp which stood on the part of the city now covered by the barracks and the Armenian quarter. Allowing that the remains of the first wall on the N. and W. were utilized for this fortified camp (from 70-132 AD), and supposing the camp to have occupied the area of 50 acres, as was the case with various European Rom camps, whose remains are known, the southern camp wall would have run along the line of the existing southern walls. This line of fortification having been thus selected appears to have been followed through the greater part of the succeeding centuries down to modern times. The line connecting the two ex-

CORNER OF WALL OF JERUSALEM FROM KIDRON VALLEY

tremities of the southern wall, thus determined by the temple-platform and legionary camp, respectively, was probably that first followed by the southern wall of Hadrian's city Ælia.

Of the 8 existing city gates, on the west side there is but one, Bāb el Khulil (the "Gate of Hebron"),

3. The Existing Gates

commonly known to travelers as the Jaffa Gate. It is probably the site of several earlier gates. On the N. there are 3 gates, Bāb Abd'ul Hamīd (named after the sultan who made it) or the "New Gate"; Bāb el 'amūd ("Gate of the Columns"), now commonly called the "Damascus Gate," but more anciently known as "St. Stephen's Gate," and clearly, from the existing remains, the site of an earlier gateway; and, still farther east, the Bāb es Sāhirah ("Gate of the Plain"), or "Herod's Gate." On the east side the only open gate is the Bāb el 'Asbat ("Gate of the Tribes"), commonly called by native Christians, Bāb Sitti Miriam ("Gate of the Lady Mary"), but in European guide-books called "St. Stephen's Gate." A little farther S., near the northeastern corner of the Haram is the great walled-up Byzantine Gate, known as Bāb ed Dahariyeh ("Gate of the Conqueror"), but to Europeans as the "Golden Gate." This structure has been variously ascribed to Justinian and Heraclius, but there are massive blocks which belong to a more ancient structure, and early Christian tradition places the "Beautiful Gate" of the Temple here. In the southern wall are two city gates; one, insignificant and mean, occupies the center of el Wād and is known as Bāb el Mughāribeh ("Gate of the Moors"), and to Europeans as the "Dung Gate"; the other, which is on the crown of the western hill, traditional Zion, is the important Bāb Nebi Daoud ("Gate of the Prophet David"), or the "Zion Gate."

All these gates assumed their present form at the time of the reconstruction of the walls by Suleiman the Magnificent, but the more important ones occupy the sites of earlier gates. Their names have varied very much even since the times of the Crusaders. The multiplicity of names for these various gates—they all have two or three today—and their frequent changes are worth noticing in connection with the fact that in the OT history some of the gates appear to have had two or more names.

St. Stephen's Gate.

As has been mentioned, the course of the present southern wall is the result of Rom reconstruction of the city since the time of Titus. To Warren, Guthe, Maudslay and Bliss we owe a great deal of certain knowledge of its more ancient course. These explorers have shown that in all the pre-Rom period (and at least one period since) the continuation southward of the western and eastern ridges, as well as the wide valley between—an area now but sparsely inhabited—was the site of at once the most crowded life, and the most stirring scenes in the Heb history of the city. The sanctity of the Holy Sepulchre has caused the city life to center itself more and more around that sanctuary, thereby greatly confusing the ancient topography for many centuries.

(1) Warren's excavations revealed: (a) a massive masonry wall 46 ft. E. of the Golden Gate, which curved toward the W. at its northern end, following the ancient rock contours at this spot. It is of Earlier Walls probable that this was the eastern wall of the city in pre-Herodian times.

Unfortunately the existence of a large Moslem cemetery outside the eastern wall of the Haram precludes the possibility of any more excavations in this neighborhood. (b) More important remains in the southeastern hill, commonly known as "Ophel." Here commencing at the southeastern angle of the Haram, Warren uncovered a wall 14½ ft. thick running S. for 90 ft. and then S.W. along the edge of the hill for 700 ft. This wall, which shows at least two periods of construction, abuts on the sanctuary wall with a straight joint. Along its course were found 4 small towers with a projection of 6 ft. and a face from 22 to 28 ft. broad, and a great corner tower projecting 4½ ft. from the wall and with a face 80 ft. broad. The face of this great tower consists of stones one to two ft. high and 2 or 3 ft. long; it is founded upon rock and stands to the height of 66 ft. Warren considers that this may be ha-mighdāl ha-yōṣe' or "tower that standeth out" of Neh 3 25.

(2) In 1881 Professor Guthe picked up fragmentary traces of this city-wall farther south, and in the excavations of Captain Parker (1910-11) further fragments of massive walls and a very ancient gate have been found.

(3) Maudslay's excavations were on the southwestern hill, on the site occupied by "Bishop Gobat's School" for boys, and in the adjoining Anglo-German cemetery. The school is built over a great mass of scarped rock 45 ft. sq., which rises to a height of 20 ft. from a platform which surrounds it and with which it is connected by a rock-cut stairway; upon this massive foundation must have stood a great tower at what was in ancient times the southwestern corner of the city. From this point a scarp facing westward was traced for 100 ft. northward toward the modern southwestern angle of the walls, while a rock scarp, in places 40 ft. high on the outer or southern side and at least 14 ft. on the inner face, was followed for 250 ft. eastward until it reached another great rock projection with a face of 43 ft. Although no stones were found in situ, it is evident that such great rock cuttings must have supported a wall and tower of extraordinary strength, and hundreds of massive squared stones belonging to this wall are now incorporated in neighboring buildings.

(4) Bliss and Dickie's work commenced at the southeastern extremity of Maudslay's scarp, where was the above-mentioned massive projection for a tower, and here were found several courses of masonry still in situ. This tower appears to have been the point of divergence of two distinct lines of wall, one of which ran in a direction N.E., skirting the edge of the southeastern hill, and probably joined the line of the modern walls at the ruined masonry tower known as Burj el Kebīr, and another running S.E. down toward the Pool of Siloam, along the edge of the Wādī er Rābābī (Hinnom). The former of these walls cannot be very ancient, because of the occurrence of late Byzantine moldings in its foundations. The coenaculum was included in the city somewhere about 435-450 AD (see IX, 55), and also in the 14th cent. Bliss considers it probable that this is the wall built in 1239

by Frederick II, and it is certainly that depicted in the map of Marino Sanuto (1321 AD). Although these masonry remains are thus comparatively late, there were some reasons for thinking that at a much earlier date a wall took a similar direction along the edge of the southwestern hill; and it is an attractive theory, though unsupported by any very definite archaeological evidence, that the wall of Solomon took also this general line. The wall running S.E. from the tower, along the edge of the gorge of Hinnom, is historically of much greater importance. Bliss's investigations showed that here were remains belonging to several periods, covering altogether considerably over a millennium. The upper line of wall was of fine masonry, with stones 1 ft. by 3 ft. in size, beautifully jointed and finely dressed; in some places this wall was founded upon the remains of the lower wall, in others a layer of debris intervened. It is impossible that this upper wall can be pre-Rom, and Bliss ascribes it to the Empress Eudoxia (see IX, 55). The lower wall rested upon the rock and showed at least 3 periods of construction. In the earliest the stones had broad margins and were carefully jointed, without mortar. This may have been the work of Solomon or one of the early kings of Judah. The later remains are evidently of the nature of repairs, and include the work of the later Judaean kings, and of Nehemiah and of all the wall-repairers, down to the destruction in 70 AD. At somewhat irregular intervals along the wall were towers of very similar projection and breadth to those found on Warren's wall on the southeastern hill. The wall foundations were traced—except for an interval where they passed under a Jewish cemetery—all the way to the mouth of the Tyropœon valley. The upper wall disappeared (the stones having been all removed for later buildings) before the Jewish cemetery was reached.

During most periods, if not indeed in all, the wall was carried across the mouth of the Tyropœon valley upon a great dam of which the massive foundations still exist under the ground, some 50 ft. to the E. of the slighter dam which today supports the Birket el Hamra (see SILOAM). This ancient dam evidently once supported a pool in the mouth of the Tyropœon, and it showed evidences of having undergone buttressing and other changes and repairs. Although it is clear that during the greater part of Jewish history, before and after the captivity, the southern wall of Jerus crossed upon this dam, there were remains of walls found which tended to show that at one period, at any rate, the wall circled round the two Siloam pools, leaving them outside the fortifications.

In the stretch of wall from "Maudslay's Scarp" to the Tyropœon valley remains of 2 city gates were found, and doubtful indications of 2 others. The ruins of the first of these gates are now included in the new extension of the Anglo-German cemetery. The gate had door sills, with sockets, of 4 periods superimposed upon each other; the width of the entrance was 8 ft. 10 in. during the earliest, and 8 ft. at the latest period. The character of the masonry tended to show that the gate belonged to the upper wall, which is apparently entirely of the Christian era. If this is so, this cannot be the "Gate of the Gai" of Neh 3 13, although the earlier gate may have occupied this site. Bliss suggests as a probable position for this gate an interval between the two contiguous towers IV and V, a little farther to the E.

Another gate was a small one, 4 ft. 10. in. wide, marked only by the cuttings in the rock for the door sockets. It lay a little to the W. of the city gate next to be described, and both from its position and its insignificance, it does not appear to have been an entrance to the city; it may, as Bliss suggests, have given access to a tower, now destroyed.

The second great city gateway was found some 200 ft. S. of the Birket el Hamra, close to the southeastern angle of the ancient wall. The existing remains are bonded into walls of the earlier period, but the three superimposed door sills, with their sockets—to be seen uncovered today in situ—mark three distinct periods of long duration. The gate gave access to the great main street running down the Tyropœon, underneath which ran a great rock-cut drain, which probably traversed the whole central valley of the city. During the last two periods of the gate's use, a tower was erected—at the exact southeastern angle—to protect the entrance. The earliest remains here probably belong to the Jewish kings, and it is very probable that we have here the gate called by Neh (3 13) the "Dung Gate." Bliss considered that it might be the "Fountain Gate" (Neh 3 15), which, however, was probably more to the E., although Bliss could find no remains of it surviving. The repairs and alterations here have been so extensive that its disappearance is in no way surprising. The Fountain Gate is almost certainly identical with the "Gate between the Two Walls," through which Zedekiah and his men of war fled (2 K 25 4; Jer 39 4; 52 7).

The most definite account of the old walls is that of Jos (BJ, V, iv, 1, 2), and though it referred primarily to the existing walls of his day,

7. Josephus' it is a convenient one for commencing Description the historical survey. He describes of the Walls three walls. The first wall "began on the N., at the tower called Hippicus, and extended as far as the Xistus, and then joining at the Council House, ended at the western cloister of the temple." On the course of this section of the wall there is no dispute. The tower Hippicus was close to the present Jaffa Gate, and the wall ran from here almost due W. to the temple-area along the southern edge of the western arm of the Tyropœon (see III, 2, above). It is probable that the Haret ed Dawāyeh, a street running nearly parallel with the neighboring "David Street," but high up above it, lies above the foundations of this wall. It must have crossed the main Tyropœon near the Tarik bāb es Salsilel, and joined the western cloisters close to where the Mehkemeh, the present "Council House," is situated.

Jos traces the southern course of the first wall thus: "It began at the same place [i.e. Hippicus], and extended through a place called Bethso to the gate of the Essenes; and after that it went southward, having its bending above the fountain Siloam, when it also bends again toward the E. at Solomon's Pool, and reaches as far as a certain place which they called 'Ophlas,' where it was joined to the eastern cloister of the temple." Although the main course of this wall has now been followed with pick and shovel, several points are still uncertain. Bethso is not known, but must have been close to the southwestern angle, which, as we have seen, was situated where "Bishop Gobat's School" is today. It is very probably identical with the "Tower of the Furnaces" of Neh 3 11, while the "Gate of the Essenes" must have been near, if not identical with, the "Gate of the Gai" of ver 13. The description of Jos certainly seems to imply that the mouth of the Siloam aqueduct ("fountain of Siloam") and the pools were both outside the fortification. We have seen from these indications in the underground remains that this was the case at one period. Solomon's Pool is very probably represented by the modern Birket el Hamra. It is clear that the wall from here to the southeastern angle of the temple-platform followed the edge of the southeastern hill, and coincided farther north with the old wall excavated by Warren. As will be shown below, this first wall was the main fortification of the city from the time of the kings of Judah onward. In the time of Jos, this first wall had 60 towers.

Probable Course of the Three Walls Described by Josephus.

The "Second Wall" was probably added in the days of the Hasmonean rulers; the "Third Wall" was commenced by Herod Agrippa I and hurriedly finished shortly before the siege by Titus.

The Second Wall of Jos "took its beginning from that gate which they called 'Gennath,' which belonged to the first wall: it only en-

9. Second Wall

compassed the northern quarter of the city and reached as far as the tower Antonia" (ib). In no part of Jerus topography has there been more disagreement than upon this wall, both as regards its curve and as regards its date of origin. Unfortunately, we have no idea at all where the "Gate Gennath" was. The Tower Antonia we know. The line must have passed in a curved or zigzag direction from some unknown point on the first wall, i.e. between the Jaffa Gate and the Haram to the Antonia. A considerable number of authorities in the past and a few careful students today would identify the general course of this wall with that of the modern northern wall. The greatest objections to this view are that no really satisfactory alternative course has been laid down for the third wall (see below), and that it must have run far N. of the Antonia, a course which does not seem to agree with the description of Jos, which states that the wall "went up" to the Antonia. On the other hand, no certain remains of any city wall within the present north wall have ever been found; fragments have been reported by various observers (e.g. the piece referred to as forming the eastern wall of the so-called "Pool of Hezekiah"; see VII, ii, below), but in an area so frequently desolated and rebuilt upon—where the demand for squared stones must always have been great—it is probable that the traces, if surviving at all, are very scanty. This is the case with the south wall excavated by Bliss (see VI), and that neighborhood has for many centuries been unbuilt upon. It is quite probable that the area included within the second wall may have been quite small, merely the buildings which clustered along the sides of the Tyropoeon. Its 40 towers may have been small and built close together, because the position was, from the military aspect, weak. It must be remembered that it was the unsatisfactory state of the second wall which necessitated a third wall. There is no absolute reason why it may not have excluded the greater part of the northwestern hill—and with it the site of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre—but there is no proof that it did. The date of the second wall is unknown (see below).

This third wall, which was commenced after the time of Christ by Herod Agrippa I, is described in more detail by Jos. It was begun upon an elaborate plan, but was not finished in its original design because Agrippa feared Claudius Caesar, "lest he should suspect that so strong a wall was built in order to make some innovation in public affairs" (BJ, V, iv, 2). It, however, at the time of the siege, was of a breadth of over 18 ft., and a height of 40 ft., and had 90 massive towers. Jos describes it as beginning at the tower Hippicus (near the Jaffa Gate), "where it reached as far as the north quarter of the city, and the tower Psephinus." This mighty tower, 135 ft. high, was at the northwestern corner and overlooked the whole city. From it, according to Jos (BJ, V, vi, 3), there was a view of Arabia (Moab) at sunrise, and also of "the utmost limits of the Heb possessions at the Sea westward." From this corner the wall turned eastward until it came over against the monuments of Helene of Adiabene, a statement, however, which must be read in connection with another passage (Ant, XX, iv, 3), where it says that this tomb "was distant no more than 3 furlongs from the city of Jerus." The wall then "extended to a very great length" and passed by the sepulchral caverns of the kings—which may well be the so-called "Solomon's Quarries," and it then bent at the "Tower of the Corner," at a monument which is called the Monument of the Fuller (not identified), and joined to the old wall at the Kidron valley.

The commonly accepted theory is that a great part of this line of wall is that pursued by the modern north wall, and Kal'at el Jalud, or rather the foundation of it, that marks the site of Psephinus. The Damascus Gate is certainly on the line of some earlier gate. The "Tower of the Corner" was probably about where the modern Herod's Gate is, or a little more to the E., and the course of the wall was from here very probably along the southern edge of the "St. Anne's Valley," joining on to the N.E. corner of the Haram a little S. of the present St. Stephen's Gate. This course of the wall fits in well with the description of Jos. If the so-called "Tombs of the Kings" are really those of Queen Helena of Adiabene and her family, then the distance given as 3 furlongs is not as far out as the distance to the modern wall; the distance is actually 3½ furlongs.

Others, following the learned Dr. Robinson, find it impossible to believe that the total circuit of the walls was so small, and would carry the third wall considerably farther north, making the general line of the modern north wall coincide with the second wall of Jos. The supporters of this view point to the description of the extensive view from Psephinus, and contend that this presupposed a site on still higher ground, e.g. where the present Russian buildings now are. They also claim that the statement that the wall came "over against" the monument of Queen Helena certainly should mean very much nearer that monument than the present walls. Dr. Robinson and others who have followed him have pointed to various fragments which they claim to have been pieces of the missing wall. The present writer, after very many years' residence in Jerus, watching the buildings which in the last 25 years have sprung up over the area across which this line of wall is claimed to have run, has never seen a trace of wall foundations or of fosse which was in the very least convincing; while on the other hand this area now being rapidly covered by the modern suburb of Jerus presents almost everywhere below the surface virgin rock. There is no evidence of any more buildings than occasional scattered Rom villas, with mosaic floors. The present writer has rather unwillingly come to the opinion that the city walls were never farther north than the line they follow today. With respect to the objection raised that there could not possibly have been room enough between the two walls for the "Camp of the Assyrians," where Titus pitched his camp (BJ, V, vii, 3), any probable line for the second wall would leave a mean of 1,000 ft. between the two walls, and in several directions considerably more. The probable position of the "Camp of the Assyrians" would, according to this view, be in the high ground (the northwestern hill) now occupied by the Christian quarter of the modern city. The question of what the population of Jerus was at this period is discussed in IX, 49, below. For the other great buildings of the city at this period, see also IX, 43-44, below.

Taking then the walls of Jerus as described by Jos, we may work backward and see how the walls ran in earlier periods. The third wall does not concern us any more, as it was built after the Crucifixion. With respect to the second wall, there is a great deal of difference of opinion regarding its origin. Some consider, like Sir Charles Watson, that it does not go back earlier than the monarch. The evidence is inconclusive, but the most probable view seems to be that the "first wall," as described by Jos, was the only circuit of wall from the kings of Judah down to the 2d cent. BC, and perhaps later.

The most complete Scriptural description we have of the walls and gates of Jerus is that given by

12. Nehemiah's Account of the Walls Nehemiah. His account is valuable, not only as a record of what he did, but of what had been the state of the walls before the exile. It is perfectly clear that considerable traces of the old walls and gates remained, and that his one endeavor was to restore what had been before—even though it produced a city enclosure much larger than necessary at his time. The relevant passages are Neh 2 13-15, the account of his night ride; 3 1-32, the description of the rebuilding; and 12 31-39, the routes of the two processions at the dedication.

In the first account we learn that Nehemiah went out by night by the VALLEY GATE (q.v.), or Gate of the Gai, a gate (that is, opening)

13. Valley Gate into the Gai Hinnom, and probably at or near the gate discovered by Bliss in what is now part of the Anglo-German cemetery; he passed from it to the Dung Gate, and from here viewed the walls of the city

14. Dung Gate This, with considerable assurance, may be located at the ruined foundations of a gate discovered by Bliss at the southeastern corner of the city. The line of wall clearly followed the south edge of the southwestern hill from the Anglo-German cemetery to this point. He then proceeded to the Fountain Gate, the site of which has not been re-

15. Fountain Gate covered, but, as there must have been water running out here (as today) from the mouth of the Siloam tunnel, is very appropriately named here. Near by was the KING'S POOL (q.v.), probably the pool—now deeply buried—which is today represented by the Birket el Hamra. Here Nehemiah apparently thought of turning into the city, "but there was no place for the beast that was under me to pass" (2 14), so he went up by the Nahal (Kidron), viewed the walls from there, and then retraced his steps to the Valley Gate. There is another possibility, and that is that the King's Pool was the pool (which certainly existed) at Gihon, in which case the Fountain Gate may also have been in that neighborhood.

All the archaeological evidence is in favor of the wall having crossed the mouth of the Tyropæon by the great dam at this time, and the propinquity of this structure to the Fountain Gate is seen in Neh 3 15, where we read that Shallum built the Fountain Gate "and covered it, and set up the doors thereof . . . and the bars thereof, and the wall of the pool of Shelah [see SILLOAM] by the KING'S GARDEN [q.v.], even unto the stairs that go down from the city of David." All these localities were close together at the mouth of el Wād.

Passing from here we can follow the circuit of the city from the accounts of the rebuilding of the walls in Neh 3 15 f. The wall from here was carried "over against the sepulchres of David," which we know to have stood in the original "City of David" above Gihon, past "the pool that was made," and "the house of the Gibbōrim" (mighty men)—both unknown sites. It is clear that the wall is being carried along the edge of the southeastern hill toward the temple. We read of two angles in the wall—both needed by the geographical conditions—the high priest's house, of "the tower that standeth out" (supposed to have been unearthed by Warren), and the wall of the OPHEL (q.v.).

Probable Course of Walls and Position of the Principal Gates from Hezekiah till Long after Nehemiah. (The N.E. corner is necessarily doubtful.)

Hasmoneans; whereas others (e.g. G. A. Smith), because of the expression in 2 Ch 32 5 that Hezekiah, after repairing the wall, raised "another wall without," think that this wall goes back as far as this

There is also mention of a Water Gate in this position, which is just where one would expect a road to lead from the temple-area down to Gihon. From the great number of companies engaged in building, it may be inferred that all along this stretch of wall from the Tyropœon to the temple, the destruction of the walls had been specially great.

Proceeding N., we come to the Horse Gate. This was close to the entry to the king's house (2 K 11 16; 2 Ch 23 15; Jer 31

it may have been a kind of rock-cut passage or tunnel. It cannot have been far from the present southeastern angle of the city. Thence "repaired the priests, every one over against his own house"—the houses of these people being to the E. of the temple. Then comes the GATE OF HAMMIPHKAD (q.v.), the ascent (or "upper chamber" m) of the corner, and finally the SHEEP GATE (q.v.), which was repaired by the goldsmiths and merchants. This last gate was the point from which the circuit of the repairs was traced. The references, Neh 3 1.31; 12 39, clearly show that it was at the eastern extremity of the north wall.

The details of the gates and buildings in the north wall as described by Nehemiah, are difficult, and certainty is impossible; this side must always necessarily have been the weak side for defence because it was protected by no, or at best by very little, natural valley. As has been said, we cannot be certain whether Nehemiah is describing a wall which on its western two-thirds corresponded with the first or the second wall of Jos. Taking the first theory as probable, we may plan it as follows: W. of the Sheep Gate two towers are mentioned (Neh 3 1; 12 39). Of these HANANEL (q.v.) was more easterly than HAMMEAH (q.v.), and, too, it would appear from Zec 14 10 to have been the most northerly point of the city. Probably then two towers occupied the important hill where afterward stood the fortress Baris and, later, the Antonia. At the Hammeah tower the wall would descend into the Tyropœon to join the eastern extremity of the first wall where in the time of Jos stood the Council House (BJ, V, iv, 2).

It is generally considered that the FISH GATE (q.v.) (Neh 3 3; 12 39; Zeph 1 10; 2 Ch 33

19. Fish Gate 14) stood across the Tyropœon in much the same way as the modern Damascus Gate does now, only considerably farther S. It was probably so called because here the men of Tyre sold their fish (Neh 13 16). It is very probably identical with the "Middle Gate" of Jer 39 3. With this region are associated the MISHNEH (q.v.) or "second quarter" (Zeph 1 10 m) and the MAKTESH (q.v.) or "mortar" (Zeph 1 11).

The next gate westward, after apparently a considerable interval, is tr<sup>d</sup> in EV the "OLD GATE" (q.v.), but is more correctly the "Gate

whereas Mitchell (Wall of Jerus according to the Book of Neh) proposes "old pool," taking the pool in question to be the so-called "Pool of Hezekiah." According to the view here accepted, that the account of Neh refers only to the first wall, the expression "old wall" would be peculiarly suitable, as here must have been some part of that first wall which went back unaltered to the time of Solomon. The western wall to the extent of 400 cubits had been rebuilt after its destruction by Jehoash, king of Israel (see IX, 12, below), and Manasseh had repaired all the wall from Gihon round N. and then W. to the Fish Gate. This gate has also been identified with the Sha'ar ha-Pinnāh, or "Corner Gate," of 2 K 14 13; 2 Ch 25 23; Jer 31 38; Zec 14 10, and with the Sha'ar ha-Ri'shōn, or "First Gate," of Zec 14 10, which is identified as the same as the Corner Gate; indeed ri'shōn ("first") is probably a textual error for yāshān ("old"). If this is so, this "Gate of the Old" or "Corner Gate" must have stood near the northwestern corner of the city, somewhere near the present Jaffa Gate.

The next gate mentioned is the Gate of Ephraim (Neh 12 39), which, according to 2 K 14 13; 2 Ch 25 23, was 400 cubits or 600 ft.

21. Gate of Ephraim from the Corner Gate. This must have been somewhere on the western wall; it is scarcely possible to believe, as some writers would suggest, that there could have been no single gate between the Corner Gate near the northwestern corner and the Valley Gate on the southern wall.

The "Broad Wall" appears to correspond to the southern stretch of the western wall as far as the "Tower of the Furnaces" or ovens, which was probably the extremely important corner tower now incorporated in "Bishop Gobat's School." This circuit of the walls satisfies fairly well all the conditions; the difficulties are chiefly on the N. and W. It is a problem how the Gate of Ephraim comes to be omitted in the account of the repairs, but G. A. Smith suggests that it may be indicated by the expression, "throne of the governor beyond the river" (Neh 3 7). See, however, Mitchell (loc. cit.). If the theory be accepted that the second wall already existed, the Corner Gate and the Fish Gate will have to be placed farther north.

Probable Course of Solomon's Wall.

In OT as in later times, some of the gates appear to have received different names at various times.

23. The Gate of Benjamin Thus the Sheep Gate, at the north-eastern angle, appears to be identical with the Gate of Benjamin or Upper Gate of Benjamin (Jer 20 2; 37 13; 38 7); the prophet was going, apparently, the nearest way to his home in Anathoth.

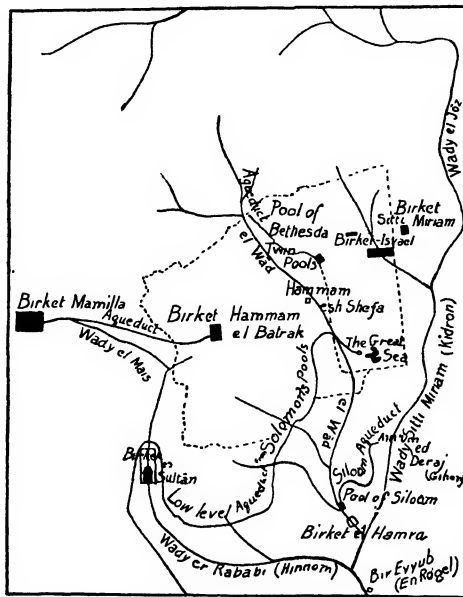

abruptly interrupted across its whole width by a deep chasm which Warren partially excavated, but which Parker has since conclusively shown to end blindly. It is clear that this great gallery, which is 8 to 9 ft. wide, and in places as high or higher, was constructed (a natural cavern possibly utilized in the process) to enable the inhabitants of the walled-in city above it to reach the spring. It is in fact a similar work to the great water-passage at GEZER (q.v.), which commenced in a rock-cut pit 26 ft. deep and descended with steps, to a depth of 94 ft. 6 in. below the level of the rock surface; the sloping passage was 23 ft. high and 13 ft. broad. This passage which could be dated with certainty as before 1500 BC, and almost certainly as early as 2000 BC, was cut out with flint knives and apparently was made entirely to reach a great underground source of water. The discovery of this Gezer well-passage has thrown a flood of light upon the "Warren's Shaft" in Jerus, which would appear to have been made for an exactly similar purpose. The chasm mentioned before may have been an effort to reach the source from a higher point, or it may have been made, or later adapted, to prevent ingress by means of the system of tunnels into the city. This passage is in all probability the "watercourse" (מִנְחָה, ginnôr) of 2 S 5 8 up which, apparently, Joab and his men (1 Ch 11 6) secretly made their way; they must have waded through the water at the source, ascended the perpendicular shaft (a feat performed in 1910 by some British officers without any assistance from ladders), and then made their way into the heart of the city along the great tunnel. Judging by the similar Gezer water tunnel, this great work may not only have existed in David's time, but may have been constructed as much as 1,000 years before.

The true Siloam tunnel is a considerably later work. It branches off from the older aqueduct at a point 67 ft. from the entrance, and after running an exceedingly winding course of 1,682 ft., it empties itself into the Pool of Siloam (total length 1,749 ft.). The whole canal is rock cut; it is 2 to 3 ft. wide, and varies in height from 16 ft. at the south end to 4 ft. 6 in. at the lowest point, near the middle. The condition of this tunnel has recently been greatly changed through Captain Parker's party having cleared out the accumulated silt of centuries; before this, parts of the channel could be traversed only with the greatest difficulty and discomfort. The primitive nature of this construction is shown by the many false passages made, and also by the extensive curves which greatly add to its length. This latter may also be partly due to the workmen following lines of soft strata. M. Clermont-Ganneau and others have thought that one or more of the great curves may have been made deliberately to avoid the tombs of the kings of Judah. The method of construction of the tunnel is narrated in the Siloam Inscription (see SILOAM). It was begun simultaneously from each end, and the two parties met in the middle. It is a remarkable thing that there is a difference of level of only one foot at each end; but the lofty height of the southern end is probably due to a lowering of the floor here after the junction was effected. It is practically certain that this great work is that referred to in 2 K 20 20: "Now the rest of the acts of Hezekiah, and all his might, and how he made the pool, and the conduit, and brought water into the city, are they not written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah?" And in 2 Ch 32 30: "This same Hezekiah also stopped the upper spring of the waters of Gihon, and brought them straight down on the west side of the city of David."

In addition to these two conduits, which have a direct Scriptural interest, there are remains of at least two other aqueducts which take their origin at the Virgin's Fount—5. Other Aqueducts one a channel deeply cut in rock along at Gihon the western sides of the Kidron valley, found by Captain Parker, and the other a built channel, lined with very good cement, which takes its rise at a lower level than any of the other conduits close to the before-mentioned rocky cleft from which the water rises, and runs in a very winding direction along the western side of the Kidron. This the present writer has described in PEFS, 1902. One of these, perhaps more probably the former, may be the conduit which is referred to as Shiloah (shilôh), or "conducted" (Isa 8 6), before the construction of Hezekiah's work (see SILOAM).

There are other caves and rock-cut channels around the ancient Gihon which cannot fully be described here, but which abundantly confirm the sanctity of the site.

(b) Bir Eyyûb has a depth of 125 ft.; the water collects at the bottom in a large rock-hewn chamber, and it is clear that it has been deepened at some period, because at the depth of 113 ft. there is a collecting chamber which is now replaced by the deeper one. Various rock-cut passages or staircases were found by Warren in the neighborhood of this well.

6. Bir Eyyûb depth of 113 ft. there is a collecting chamber which is now replaced by the deeper one. Various rock-cut passages or staircases were found by Warren in the neighborhood of this well.

(2) The cisterns and tanks.—Every ancient site in the hill country of Pal is riddled with cisterns for the storage of rain water. In 7. Varieties Jerus for very many centuries the private resident has depended largely upon the water collected from the roof of his house for all domestic purposes. Such cisterns lie either under or alongside the dwelling. Many of the earliest of these excavations are bottle-shaped, with a comparatively narrow mouth cut through the hard Mizze and a large rounded excavation made in the underlying Melekeh (see II, 1 above). Other ancient cisterns are cavities hewn in the rock, of irregular shape, with a roof of harder rock and often several openings. The later forms are vaulted over, and are either cut in the rock or sometimes partially built in the superlying rubbish.

For more public purposes large cisterns were made in the Haram, or temple-area. Some 3 dozen are known and planned; the largest is calculated to contain 3,000,000 gallons. Such structures were made largely for the religious ritual, but, as we shall see, they have been supplied by other sources than the rainfall. In many parts of the city open tanks have been constructed, such a tank being known in Arab. as a birkeh, or, followed by a vowel, birket. With most of these there is considerable doubt as to their date of construction, but probably none of them, in their present form at any rate, antedates the Rom period.

Within the city walls the largest reservoir is the Birket Israël which extends from the northeastern angle of the Haram westward for 360

8. Birket Israël ft. It is 125 ft. wide and was originally 80 ft. deep, but has in recent years been largely filled up by the city's refuse. The eastern and western ends of this pool are partially rock-cut and partly masonry, the masonry of the former being a great dam 45 ft. thick, the lower part of which is continuous with the ancient eastern wall of the temple-area. The sides of the pool are entirely masonry because this reservoir is built across the width of the valley referred to before (III, 2) as "St. Anne's Valley." Other parts of this valley are filled with débris to the depth of 100 ft. The original bottom of the reservoir is covered with a layer of about 19 in. of very hard concrete and cement. There was a great conduit at the eastern end of the pool built of massive stones, and connected with the pool by a perforated stone with three round holes 5½ in. in diameter. The position of this outlet shows that all water over a depth of 22 ft. must have flowed away. Some authorities consider this pool to have been preëxile. By early Christian pilgrims it was identified as the "Sheep Pool" of Jn 5 2, and at a later period, until quite recent times, it was supposed to have been the Pool of Bethesda.

9. Pool of Bethesda The discovery, a few years ago, of the long-lost Piscina in the neighborhood of the "Church of St. Anne," which was without doubt the Pool of Bethesda of the 5th cent. AD, has caused this identification to be abandoned. See BETHESDA.

To the W. of the Birket Israël are the "twin pools" which extend under the roadway in the neighborhood of the "Ecce Homo" arch. The 10. The Twin Pools western one is 165 ft. by 20 ft. The eastern 127 ft. by 20 ft. M. Clermont-Ganneau considers them to be identical with the Pool Struthius of Jos (BJ, V, xi, 4), but others, considering that they are actually made in the fosse of the Antonia, give them a later date of origin. In connection with these pools a great aqueduct was discovered in 1871, 2½–3 ft. wide and in places 12 ft. high, running from the neighborhood of the Damascus Gate—but destroyed farther north—and from the pools another aqueduct runs in the direction of the Haram.

On the northwestern hill, between the Jaffa Gate and the Church of the Sepulchre there is a large open reservoir, known to the modern

11. Birket Hammâm el Batrak inhabitants of the city as Birket Hammâm el Batrak, "the Pool of the Patriarch's Bath." It is 240 ft. long

(N. to S.), 144 ft. broad and 19–24 ft. deep. The cement lining of the bottom is cracked and practically useless. The eastern wall of this pool is particularly massive, and forms the base of the remarkably level street Haret en Nasara, or "Christian Street"; it is a not improbable theory that this is actually a fragment of the long-sought "second" wall. If so, the pool, which is proved to have once extended 60 ft. farther north, may have been constructed originally as part of the fosse. On the other hand, this pool appears to have been the Amygdalon Pool, or "Pool of the Tower" (בִּרְכַּת הַמִּגְדָּלִין, brekhath ha-mighdālîn), mentioned by Jos (BJ, V, xi, 4), which was the scene of the activities of the 10th legion, and this seems inconsistent with the previous theory, as the events described seem to imply that the second wall ran outside the pool. The popular travelers' name, "Pool of Hezekiah," given to this reservoir is due to the theory, now quite discredited, that this is the pool referred to in 2 K 20 20, "He made the pool, and the conduit, and brought water into the city." Other earlier topographers have identified it as the "upper pool" of Isa 7 3; 36 2.

The Birket Hammâm el Batrak is supplied with water from the Birket Mamilla, about ¼ mile to the W. This large pool, 293 ft. long by 12. Birket Mamilla 193 ft. broad and 19½ ft. deep, lies in the midst of a large Moslem cemetery at the head of the Wâdy Mês, the first beginning of the Wâdy er Râbâbi (Hinnom). The aqueduct which connects the two pools springs from the eastern end of the Birket Mamilla, runs a somewhat winding course and enters the city near the Jaffa Gate. The aqueduct is in bad repair, and the water it carries, chiefly during heavy rain, is filthy. In the Middle Ages it was supposed that this was the "Upper Pool of Gihon" (see GIHON), but this and likewise the "highway of the FULLER'S FIELD" (q.v.) are now located elsewhere. Wilson and others have suggested that it is the "Serpent's Pool" of Jos (BJ, V, iii, 2). Titus leveled "all the places from Scopus to Herod's monument which adjoins the pool called that of the Serpent." Like many such identifications, there is not very much to be said for or against it; it is probable that the pool existed at the time of the siege. It is likely that this is the Beth Memel of the Talm (Talm Bab, 'Ērûbhîn 51b; Sanhedrîn 24a; Br'ê shûlth Rabba 51).

The Birket es Sultân is a large pool—or, more strictly speaking, inclosure—555 ft. N. and S. by 220 ft. E. and W. It is bounded on 13. Birket es Sultân the W. and N. by a great curve of the low-level aqueduct as it passes along and then across the Wâdy er Râbâbi.

The southern side consists of a massive dam across the valley over which the Bethlehem carriage road runs. The name may signify either the "great" pool or be connected with the fact that it was reconstructed in the 16th cent. by the sultan Suleiman ibn Selim, as is recorded on an inscription upon a wayside fountain upon the southern wall. This pool is registered in the cartulary of the Holy Sepulchre as the Lacus Germani, after the name of a knight of Germanus, who built or renovated the pool in 1176 AD. Probably a great part of the pool is a catchment area, and the true reservoir is the rock-cut birkeh at the southern end, which has recently been cleaned out. It is extremely difficult to believe that under any conditions any large proportion of the whole area could ever have been filled. Today the reservoir at the lower end holds, after the rainy season, some 10 or 12 ft. of very dirty water, chiefly the street drainage of the Jaffa road, while the upper two-thirds of the inclosure is used as a cattle market on Fridays. The water is now used for sprinkling the dusty roads in dry seasons.

The Pool of Siloam and the now dry Birket el Hamra are described under SILOAM (q.v.).

There are other tanks of considerable size in and around the city, e.g. the Birket Sitti Miriam, near "St. Stephen's Gate," an uncemented pool in the Wâdy Jôz, connected with which there is a rock-cut aqueduct and others, but they are not of sufficient historical importance to merit description here.

(3) The conduits bringing water to the city from a distance are called the "high-level" and "low-level" aqueducts respectively, because they reached the city at different levels —the former probably somewhere near the present Jaffa Gate, the latter at the temple-platform.

The low-level aqueduct which, though out of repair, can still be followed along its whole course, conveyed water from three great pools in the Wādy 'Artās, 7 miles S. of Jerus. They are usually called "Solomon's pools," in reference perhaps partly to Eccl 2 6: "I made me pools of water, to water therewith the forest where trees were reared," but as any mighty work in Pal is apt to be referred to the wise king of Israel, much stress cannot be laid on the name. These three storage reservoirs are constructed across the breadth of the valley, the lowest and largest being 582 ft. long by 177 ft. broad and, at the lowest end, 50 ft. deep. Although the overflow waters of 'Ain es Sālch, commonly known as the "sealed fountain" (cf Cant 4 12), reach the pools, the chief function was probably to collect the flood waters from the winter rains, and the water was passed from tank to tank after purification. There are in all four springs the southern slopes of the site of Jerus to the Haram. The total length of this aqueduct is nearly 12 miles, but at a later date the supply was increased by the construction of a long extension of the conduit for a further 28 miles to Wādy 'Arrāb on the road to Hebron, another 5 miles directly S. of the pools. Here, too, there is a reservoir, the Birket el 'Arrāb, for the collection of the flood-water, and also several small springs, which are conducted in a number of underground rock-cut channels to the aqueduct. The total length of the low-level aqueduct is about 40 miles, and the fall in level from Birket el 'Arrāb (2,645 ft. above sea-level) at its far end to el Kās, the termination in the Haram Jerus (2,410 ft. above sea-level), is 235 ft.

The high-level aqueduct commences in a remarkable chain of wells connected with a tunnel, about 4 miles long, in the Wādy Biār, "the Valley of Wells." Upward of 50 wells along the valley bottom supplied each its quotient; the water thence passed through a pool where the solid matter settled, and traversed a tunnel 1,700 ft. long into the 'Artas valley. Here, where its level was 150 ft. above that of the low-level aqueduct, the conduit received the waters of the "sealed fountain," and finally "delivered them in Jerus at a level of about 20 ft. above that of the Jaffa Gate" (Wilson). The most remarkable feature of this conduit is the inverted syphon of perforated limestone blocks, forming a stone tube 15 in. in diameter, which carried the water across the valley near Rachel's Tomb. On a number of these blocks, Lat inscriptions with the names of centurions of the time of Severus (195 AD) have been found, and this has led many to fix a date to this great work. So good an authority as Wilson, however, considers that these inscriptions may refer to repairs, and that the work is more probably Herodian. Unless the accounts of Jos (BJ, V, iv, 4; II, xvii, 9) are exaggerated, Herod must have had some means of bringing abundant running water into the city at the level obtained by this conduit. The late Dr. Schick even suggested a date as early as Hyrcanus (135-125 BC). With regard to the low-level aqueduct, we have two definite data. First Jos (Ant, XVIII, iii, 2) states that Pontius Pilate "undertook to bring a current of water to Jerus, and did it with the sacred money, and derived the origin of the stream from the distance of 200 furlongs," over 22 miles; in BJ, II, ix, 4 he is said to have brought the water "from 400 furlongs"—probably a copyist's error. But these references must either be to restorations or to the extension from Wādy 'Arrāb to Wādy 'Artās (28 miles), for the low-level aqueduct from the pools to Jerus is certainly the same construction as the aqueduct from these pools to the "Frank Mountain," the Herodium, and that, according to the definite statements of Jos (Ant, XV, ix, 4; BJ, I, xxi, 10), was made by Herod the Great. On the whole the usual view is that the high-level aqueduct was the work of Severus, the low-level that of Herod, with an extension southward by Pontius Pilate.

Jerus still benefits somewhat from the low-level aqueduct which is in repair as far as Bethlehem, though all that reaches the city comes only through a solitary 4-in. pipe. The high-level aqueduct is hopelessly destroyed and can be traced only in places; the wells of Wādy Biār are choked and useless, and the long winding aqueduct to Wādy 'Arrāb is quite broken.

VIII. Tombs, Antiquarian Remains, and Ecclesiastical Sites.—Needless to say all the known ancient tombs in the Jerus area have been rifled of

in this valley which supply the aqueduct which still conveys water to Bethlehem, where it passes through the hill by means of a tunnel and then, after running, winding along the sides of the hill, it enters another tunnel now converted into a storage tank for Jerus; from this it runs along the mountain sides and along their contents long ago. The so-called Tombs of the Kings in the Wady el Jôz are actually the monument of Queen Helena of Adiabene, a convert to Judaism (c 48 AD). Jos (Ant, XX, iv, 3) states that her bones, with those of members of her family, were buried "at the pyramids," which were 3 in number and distant from Jerus 3 furlongs. A Heb inscription upon a sarcophagus found here by De Saulcy ran: צרה מלכה (ṣārāh malkēthāh), "Queen Sarah," possibly the Jewish name of Queen Helena.

On the western side of the Wady el Mês (the higher part of Hinnom), is a very interesting Gr

2. "Herod's tomb containing beautifully carved sarcophagi."

These are commonly known as "Herod's Tombs" (although Herod the Great was buried on the Herodium), and, according to Schick, one of the sarcophagi may have belonged to Mariamne, Herod's wife. A more probable theory is that this is the tomb of the high priest Ananias (BJ, V, xii, 2).

On the eastern side of the Kidron, near the southeastern angle of the Haram, are 3 conspicuous tombs. The most northerly, Tantûr Fer'ôn, generally called "Absalom's Tomb," is a Gr-Jewish tomb of the Hasmonean period, and, according to Conder, possibly the tomb of Alexander Jannaeus (HDB, art. "Jerusalem"). S. of this is the traditional "Grotto of St. James," which we know by a square Heb inscription over the pillars to be the family tomb of certain members of the priestly family (1 Ch 24 15), of the Beni Hazir. It may belong to the century before Christ.

The adjoining traditional tomb of Zachariah is a monolithic monument cut out of the living rock, 16 ft. sq. and 30 ft. high. It has square pilasters at the corners, Ionic pillars between, and a pyramidal top. Its origin is unknown; its traditional name is due to Our Lord's word in Mt 23 35; Lk 11 51 (see ZACHARIAH).

A little farther down the valley of the Kidron, at the commencement of the village of Siloam, is

4. The "Egyptian Tomb," another rock-cut tomb, the so-called "the tomb of Solomon's Egyp wife."

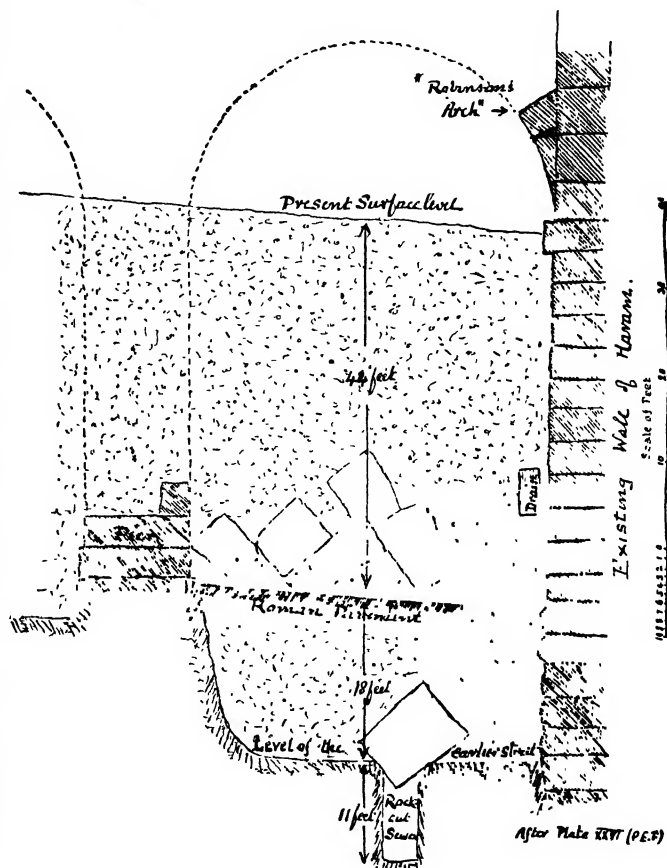

It is a monolith 18 ft. sq. and 11 ft. high, and the interior has at one time been used as a chapel. It is now Russian property. It probably belongs to much the same period as the three before-mentioned tombs, and, like them, shows strong Egyp influence.

The so-called "Tombs of the Judges" belong to the Rom period, as do the scores of similar excavations in the same valley. The "Tombs of the Prophets" on the western slopes of the Mount of Olives are now considered to belong to the 4th or 5th Christian century.

Near the knoll over Jeremiah's Grotto, to the W. and N.W., are a great number of tombs, mostly Christian. The more northerly members of the group are now included in the property of the Dominicans attached to the Church of St. Stephen, but one, the southernmost, has attracted a great deal of attention because it was supposed by the late General Gordon to be the tomb of Christ. In its condition when found it was without doubt, like its neighbors, a Christian tomb of about the 5th cent., and it was full of skeletons. Whether it may originally have been a Jewish tomb is unproved; it certainly could not have been recognized as a site of any sanctity until General Gordon promulgated his theory (see PEFS, 1892, 120-24; see also GOLGOTHA).

5. The "Garden Tomb"

Plan Showing Results of Warren's Excavations at "Robinson's Arch."

The Jews greatly venerate a tomb on the eastern side of the Wady el Jôz, not far S. of the great North Road; they consider it to be

6. Tomb of Simon the Just, but it is "Simon the Just" in all probability not a Jewish tomb at all.

Only passing mention can here be made of certain remains of interest connected with the exterior walls of the Haram. The foundation walls of the temple-platform are built, specially upon the E., S. and W., of magnificent blocks of smooth, drafted masonry with an average height of 3½ ft.

One line, known as the "master course," runs for 600 ft. westward from the southeastern angle, with blocks 7 ft. high. Near the southeastern angle at the foundation itself, certain of the blocks were found by the Palestine Exploration Fund engineers to be marked with Phoen characters, which it was supposed by many at the time of their discovery indicated their Solomonic origin. It is now generally held that these "masons' marks" may just as well have been used in the time of Herod the Great, and on other grounds it is held that all this magnificent masonry is due to the vast reconstruction of the Temple which this great monarch initiated (see TEMPLE). In the western wall of the Haram, between the southwestern corner and the "Jewish wailing place," lies "Robinson's Arch." It is the spring of an arch 50 ft. wide, projecting from the temple-wall; the bridge arising from it had a span of 50 ft., and the pier on the farther side was discovered by Warren. Under the bridge ran a contemporary paved Rom street, and beneath the unbroken pavement was found, lying inside a rock aqueduct, a vousoir of an older bridge. This bridge connected the temple-inclosure with the upper city in the days of the Hasmonean kings. It was broken down in 63 BC by the Jews in anticipation of the attack of Pompey (Ant. XIV, iv, 2; BJ, I, vii, 2), but was rebuilt by Herod in 19 BC (BJ, VI, viii, 1; vi, 2), and finally destroyed in 70 AD.

Nearly 600 ft. farther N., along this western temple-wall is Wilson's Arch, which lies under the surface within the causeway which crosses the Tyropæon to the Bâb es Silselch of the Haram; although not itself very ancient there are here, deeper down, arches belonging to the Herodian causeway which here approached the temple-platform.

With regard to the common ecclesiastical sites visited by pious pilgrims little need be said here.

8. Ecclesiastical Sites

The congeries of churches that is included under that name of Church of the Holy Sepulchre includes a great many minor sites of the scenes of the Passion which have no serious claims. Besides the Holy Sepulchre itself—which, apart from its situation, cannot be proved or disproved, as it has actually been destroyed—the only important site is that of "Mount Calvary." All that can be said is that if the Sepulchre is genuine, then the site may be also; it is today the hollowed-out shell of a rocky knoll incased in marble and other stones and riddled with chapels. See GOLGOTHA.

The coenaculum, close to the Moslem "Tomb of David" (a site which has no serious claims), has been upheld by Professor Sanday (Sacred Sites of the Gospels) as one which has a very strong tradition in its favor. The most important evidence is that of Epiphanius, who states that when Hadrian visited Jerus in 130, one of the few buildings left standing was "the little Church of God, on the site where the disciples, returning after the Ascension of the Saviour from Olivet, had gone up to the Upper room, for there it had been built, that is to say in the quarter of Zion." In connection with this spot there has been pointed out from early Christian times the site of the House of Caiaphas and the site of the death of the Virgin Mary—the Dormitio Sanctae Virginis. It is in consequence of this latter tradition that the German Roman Catholics have now erected here their magnificent new church of the Dormition. A rival line of traditions locates the tomb of the Virgin in the Kidron valley near Gethsemane, where there is a remarkable underground chapel belonging to the Greeks.

IX. History.—Pre-Israelite period.—The beginnings of Jerus are long before recorded history: at various points in the neighborhood, e.g. at el Bukci'a to the S.W., and at the northern extremity of the Mount of Olives to the N.E., were very large settlements of Paleolithic man, long before the dawn of history, as is proved by the enormous quantities of celts scattered over the surface. It is certain that the city's site itself was occupied many centuries before David, and it is a traditional view that the city called SALEM (q.v.) (Gen 14 18), over which Melchizedek was king, was identical with Jerus.

The first certain reference to this city is about 1450 BC, when the name U-r-u-salem occurs in several letters belonging to the Am

1. Tell el-Amarna Tab correspondence. In 7 of these letters occurs the name Abd Khiba, and it is clear that this man was "king," or governor of the city, as the representative of Pharaoh of Egypt.

In this correspondence Abd Khiba represents himself as hard pressed to uphold the rights of his suzerain against the hostile forces which threaten to overwhelm him. Incidentally we may gather that the place was then a fortified city, guarded partly by mercenary Egypt troops, and there are reasons for thinking that the then ruler of Egypt, Amenhotep IV, had made it a sanctuary of his god Aten—the sun-disc. Some territory, possibly extending as far west as Ajalon, seems to have been under the jurisdiction of the governor. Professor Sayce has stated that Abd Khiba was probably a Hittite chief, but this is doubtful. The correspondence closes abruptly, leaving us in uncertainty with regard to the fate of the writer, but we know that the domination of Egypt over Pal suffered an eclipse about this time.

At the time of Joshua's invasion of Canaan, ADONI-ZEDEK (q.v.) is mentioned (Josh 10 1-27) as king of Jerus; he united with the

2. Joshua's kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish Conquest and Eglon to fight against the Gibeonites who had made peace with Joshua; the 5 kings were defeated and, being captured in hiding at the cave Makkedah, were all slain. Another king, ADONI-BEZEK (q.v.) (whom some identify with Adoni-zedek), was defeated by Judah after the death of Joshua, and after being mutilated was brought to Jerus and died there (Jgs 1 1-7), after which it is recorded (ver 8) that Judah "fought against Jerus, and took it . . . and set the city on fire." But it is clear that the city remained in the hands of the "Jebusites" for some years more (Jgs 1 21; 19 11), although it was theoretically reckoned on the southern border of Benjamin (Josh 15 8; 18 16, 28). David, after he had reigned 7½ years at Hebron, determined to make the place his capital and, about 1000 BC, captured the city.

Up to this event it is probable that Jerus was like other contemporary fortified sites, a comparatively small place encircled with powerful walls, with but one or perhaps two gates; it is very generally admitted that this city occupied the ridge to the S. of the temple long incorrectly called "Ophel," and that its walls stood upon steep rocky scarps above the Kidron valley on the one side, and the Tyropæon on the other. We have every reason to believe that the great system of tunnels, known as "Warren's Shaft" (see VII, 3, above) existed all through this period.

Jerusalem of the Jebusites, as Captured by David.

The account of the capture of Jerus by David is obscure, but it seems a probable explanation of a difficult passage (2 S 5 6-9) if 4. David we conclude that the Jebusites, relying upon the extraordinary strength of their position, challenged David: "Thou shalt not come in hither, but the blind and the lame shall turn thee away" (ver 6 m), and that David directed his followers to go up the "watercourse" and smite the "lame and the blind"—a term he in his turn applies mockingly to the Jebusites. "And Joab the son of Zeruiah went up first, and was made chief" (1 Ch 11 6). It seems at least probable that David's men captured the city through a surprise attack up the great tunnels (see VII, 3, above). David having captured the stronghold "Zion," renamed it the "City of David" and took up his residence there; he added to the strength of the fortifications "round about from the MILLO [q.v.] and onward"; with the assistance of Phoen workmen supplied by Hiram, king of Tyre, he built himself "a house of cedar" (2 S 5 11; cf 7 2). The ark of Jeh was brought from the house of Obed-edom and lodged in a tent (2 S 6 17) in the "city of David" (cf 1 K 8 1). The threshing-floor of Araunah (2 S 24 18), or Ornan (1 Ch 21 15), the Jebusite, was later purchased as the future site of the temple.

The Jerus which David captured was small and compact, but there are indications that during his reign it must have increased considerably by the growth of suburbs outside the Jebusite walls. The population must have been increased from several sources. The influx of David's followers doubtless caused many of the older inhabitants to be crowded out of the walled area. There appear to have been a large garrison (2 S 15 18; 20 7), many officials and priests and their families (2 S 8 16-18; 20 23-26; 23 8 ff), and the various members of David's own family and their relatives (2 S 5 13-16; 14 24.28; 1 K 1 5.53, etc). It is impossible to suppose that all these were crowded into so narrow an area, while the incidental mention that Absalom lived two whole years in Jerus without seeing the king's face implies suburbs (2 S 14 24.28). The new dwellings could probably extend northward toward the site of the future temple and northwestward into and up the Tyropæon valley along the great north road. It is improbable that they could have occupied much of the western hill.

With the accession of Solomon, the increased magnificence of the court, the foreign wives and their establishments, the new officials brought to the city for Solomon's great buildings must necessarily have enormously swelled the resident population, while the recorded buildings of the city, the temple, the king's house, the House of the Daughter of Pharaoh, the House of the Forest of Lebanon, the Throne Hall and the Pillared Hall (1 K 7 1-8) must have altered the whole aspect of the site. In consequence of these new buildings, the sanctuary together with the houses of the common folk, a new wall for the city was necessary, and we have a statement twice made that Solomon built "the wall of Jerus round about" (1 K 3 1; 9 15); it is also recorded that he built Millo (9 15 24; 11 27), and that "he repaired the breach of the city of David his father" (11 27). The question of the Millo is discussed elsewhere (see MILLO); the "breach" referred to may have been the connecting wall needed to include the Millo within the complete circle of fortifications, or else some part of David's fortification which his death had left incomplete.

As regards the "Wall of Jerus" which Solomon built, it is practically certain that it was, on the N. and W., that described by Jos as the First Wall (see VI, 7 above). The vast rock-cut scarps at the southwestern corner testify to the massiveness of the building. Whether the whole of the southwestern hill was included is a matter of doubt. Inasmuch as there are indications at Bliss's tower (see VI, 4d above) of an ancient wall running northeasterly, and inclosing the summit of the southwestern hill, it would appear highly probable that Solomon's wall followed that line; in this case this wall must have crossed the Tyropæon at somewhat the line of the existing southern wall, and then have run southeasterly to join the western wall of the old city of the Jebusites. The temple and palace buildings were all inclosed in a wall of finished masonry which made it a fortified place by itself—as it appears to have been through Heb history—and these walls, where external to the rest of the city, formed part of the whole circle of fortification.

Although Solomon built so magnificent a house for Jeh, he erected in the neighborhood shrines to other local gods (1 K 11 7.8), a lapse ascribed largely to the influence of his foreign wives and consequent foreign alliances.

The disruption of the kingdom must have been a severe blow to Jerus, which was left the capital, no longer of a united state, but of a petty tribe. The resources which were at the command of Solomon for the building up of the city were suddenly cut off by Jeroboam's avowed policy, while the long state of war which existed between the two peoples—a state lasting 60 years (1 K 14 30; 15 6.16; 22 44)—must have been very injurious to the growth of commerce and the arts of peace.

In the 5th year of Rehoboam (928), Shishak (Sheshonk) king of Egypt came up against Jerus (1 K 14 25 ff) and took "the fenced

9. Invasion cities of Judah" (2 Ch 12 4 AV). It of Shishak has been commonly supposed that he (928 BC) besieged and captured Jerus itself, but as there is no account of the destruction of fortifications and as the name of this city has not been deciphered upon the Egypt records of this campaign, it is at least as probable, and is as consistent with the Scriptural references, that Shishak was bought off with "the treasures of the house of Jeh, and the treasures of the king's house" and "all the shields of gold which Solomon had made" (1 K 14 26).

It is clear that by the reign of Jehoshaphat the city had again largely recovered its importance (cf 1 K 22), but in his son Jehoram's

10. City Plundered by Arabs reign (849–842 BC) Judah was invaded and the royal house was pillaged by Philis and Arabs (2 Ch 21 16–17).

Ahaziah (842 BC), Jehoram's son, came to grief while visiting his maternal relative at Jezreel, and after being wounded in his chariot near Ibleam, and expiring at Megiddo, his body was carried to Jerus and there buried (2 K 9 27–28). Jerus was now the scene of the dramatic events which center round the usurpation and death of Queen Athaliah (2 K 11 16; 2 Ch 23 15) and the coronation and reforms of her grandson Joash (2 K 12 1–16; 2 Ch 24 1–14). After the death of the good priest Jehoiada, it is recorded (2 Ch 24 15 ff) that the king was led astray by the princes of Judah and forsook the house of Jeh, as a consequence of which the Syrians under Hazael came against Judah and Jerus, slew the princes and spoiled the land, Joash giving him much treasure from both palace and temple (2 K 12 17.18; 2 Ch 24 23). Finally Joash was assassinated (2 K 12 20.21; 2 Ch 24 25) "at the house of Millo, on the way that goeth down to Silla."

During the reign of Amaziah (797–729 BC), the murdered king's son, a victory over Edom appears to have so elated the king that he

12. Capture of the City by Jehoash wantonly challenged Jehoash of Israel to battle (2 K 14 8f). The two armies met at Beth-shemesh, and Judah of Israel was defeated and "fled every man to his tent." Jerus was unable to offer any resistance to the victors, and Jehoash "brake down the wall of Jerus from the gate of Ephraim unto the corner gate, 400 cubits" and then returned to Samaria, loaded with plunder and hostages (ver 14). Fifteen years later, Amaziah was assassinated at Lachish whither he had fled from a conspiracy; nevertheless they brought his body upon horses, and he was buried in Jerus.

Doubtless it was a remembrance of the humiliation which his father had undergone which made

13. Uzziah's Refortification (779–740 BC) Uzziah (Azariah) strengthen his position. He subdued the Philis and the Arabs in Gûr, and put the Ammonites to tribute (2 Ch 26 7.8). He "built towers in Jerus at the corner gate, and at the valley gate, and at the turnings [LXX] of the walls, and fortified them" (ver 9). He is also described as having made in Jerus "engines, invented by skilful men, to be on the towers and upon the battlements, wherewith to shoot arrows and great stones" (ver 15). The city during its long peace with its northern neighbors appears to have recovered something of her prosperity in the days of Solomon. During his reign the city was visited by a great earthquake (Zec 14 4; Am 1 1; cf Isa 9 10; 29 6; Am 4 11; 8 8). Jotham, his son, built "the upper gate of the house of Jeh" (2 K 15 35; 2 Ch 27 3), probably the same as the "upper gate of Benjamin" (Jer 20 2). He also built much on the wall of Ophel—probably the ancient fortress of Zion on the southeastern hill (2 Ch 27 3); see OPEL.

His son Ahaz was soon to have cause to be thankful for his father's and grandfather's work in fortifying the city, for now its walls were 14. Ahaz Allies with Assyria (736–728 BC) successful in defence against the kings of Syria and Israel (2 K 16 5.6); but Ahaz, feeling the weakness of his little kingdom, bought with silver and gold from the house of Jeh the alliance of Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria. He met the king at Damascus and paid him a compliment by having an altar similar to his made for his own ritual in the temple (vs 10–12). His reign is darkened by a record of heathen practices, and specially by his making "his son to pass through the fire"—as a human sacrifice in, apparently, the Valley of Hinnom (1 K 16 3–4; cf 2 Ch 28 3).

Hezekiah (727–699 BC), his son, succeeded to the kingdom at a time of surpassing danger. Samaria, and with it the last of Israel's kingdom,

15. Hezekiah's Great Works had fallen. Assyria had with difficulty been bought off, the people were largely apostate, yet Jerus was never so great and so inviolate to prophetic eyes (Isa 7 4 f; 8 8.10; 10 28 f; 14 25–32, etc). Early in his reign, the uprising of the Chaldaean Merodach-baladan against Assyria relieved Judah of her greatest danger, and Hezekiah entered into friendly relations with this new king of Babylon, showing his messengers all his treasures (Isa 39 1.2). At this time or soon after, Hezekiah appears to have undertaken great works in fitting his capital for the troublous times which lay before him. He sealed the waters of Gihon and brought them within the city to prevent the kings of Assyria from getting access to them (2 K 20 20; 2 Ch 32 4.30). See SILOAM.

It is certain, if their tunnel was to be of any use, the southwestern hill must have been entirely enclosed, and it is at least highly probable that in the account (2 Ch 32 5), he "built up all the wall that was broken down, and built towers thereon [m], and the other wall without," the last phrase may refer to the stretch of wall along the edge of the southwestern hill to Siloam. On the other hand, if that was the work of Solomon, "the other wall" may have been the great buttressed dam, with a wall across it which closed the mouth of the Tyropeon, which was an essential part of his scheme of preventing a besieging army from getting access to water. He also strengthened MILLO (q.v.), on the southeastern hill. Secure in these fortifications, which made Jerus one of the strongest walled cities in Western Asia, Hezekiah, assisted, as we learn from Sennacherib's descriptions, by Arab mercenaries, was able to buy off the great Assyr king and to keep his city inviolate (2 K 18 13–16). A second threatened attack on the city appears to be referred to in 2 K 19 9–37.

Hezekiah undertook reforms. "He removed the high places, and brake the pillars, and cut down the Asherah: and he brake in pieces the brazen serpent that Moses had made and . . . he called it Nchush-tan," i.e. a piece of brass (2 K 18 4).

Manasseh succeeded his father when but 12, and reigned 55 years (698–643) in Jerus (2 K 21 1). He was tributary to Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal, as we know from their inscriptions; in one of the latter's he is referred to as king "of the city of Judah." The king of Assyria who, it is said (2 Ch 33 11; cf Ant. X, iii, 2), carried Manasseh in chains to Babylon, was probably Ashurbanipal. How thoroughly the country was permeated by Assyrian influence is witnessed by the two cuneiform tablets recently found at Gezer belonging to this Assyrian monarch's reign (PEFS, 1905, 206, etc).

The same influence, extending to the religious sphere, is seen in the record (2 K 21 5) that Manasseh "built altars for all the host of heaven in the two courts of the house of Jeh." There are other references to the idolatrous practices introduced by this king (cf Jer 7 18; 2 K 23 5, 11, 12, etc). He also filled Jerusalem from one end to the other with the innocent blood of martyrs faithful to Jeh (2 K 21 16; cf Jer 19 4). Probably during this long reign of external peace the population of the city much increased, particularly by the influx of foreigners from less isolated regions. Of this

18. His king's improvements to the fortifications of Jerusalem we have the statement (2 Ch 33 14), "He built an outer wall to the city of David, on the west side of Gihon in the valley, even to the entrance at the fish gate." This must have been a new or rebuilt wall for the whole eastern side of the city. He also compassed about the OPHEL (q.v.) and raised it to a very great height.

Manasseh was the first of the Judahic kings to be buried away from the royal tombs. He was buried (as was his son Amon) "in the garden of his own house, in the garden of Uzza" (2 K 21 18). These may be the tombs referred to (Ezk 43 7-9) as too near the temple precincts.

In the reign of Josiah was found the "Book of the Law," and the king in consequence instituted

19. Josiah radical reforms (2 K 22, 23). Kidron smoked with the burnings of the Asherah and of the vessels of Baal, and Topheth in the Valley of Hinnom was defiled. At length after a reign of 31 years (2 K 23 29, 30), Josiah, in endeavoring to intercept Pharaoh-nechoh from combining with the king of Babylon, was defeated and slain at Megiddo and was buried "in his own sepulchre" in Jerusalem—probably in the same locality where his father and grandfather lay buried. Jehoahaz, after a reign of but 3 months, was carried captive (2 K 23 34) by Necho to Egypt, where he died—and apparently was buried among strangers (Jer 22 10-12). His brother Eliakim, renamed Jehoiakim, succeeded. In the 4th year of his reign, Egypt was defeated at Carchemish by the Babylonians, and as a consequence Jehoiakim had to change from subjection to Egypt to that of Babylon (1 K 23 35 ff). During this time

Jeremiah was actively foretelling in streets and courts of Jerusalem (5 1, etc) the approaching ruin of the city, messages which were received with contempt and anger by the king and court (Jer 36 23). In consequence of his revolt against Babylon, bands of Chaldeans, Syrians, Moabites and Ammonites came against him (2 K 24 2), and his death was inglorious (2 K 24 6; Jer 22 18, 19).

20. Jeremiah His son Jehoiaquin, who succeeded him, went out with all his household and surrendered to the approaching Nebuchadnezzar (597), and was carried to Babylon where he passed more than 37 years (2 K 25 27-30). Jerusalem was despoiled of all its treasures and all its important inhabitants. The king of Babylon's nominee, Zedekiah, after 11 years rebelled against him, and consequently Jerusalem was besieged for a year and a half until "famine was sore in the city." On the 21. Nebuchadnezzar 9th of Ab all the men of war "fled by Twice night by the way of the gate between the two walls, which was by the king's Takes Jerusalem garden," i.e. near the mouth of the (586 BC) Tyropæon, and the king "went by the way of the Arabah," but was overtaken and captured "in the plains of Jericho." A terrible punishment followed his faithlessness to Babylon (2 K 25 1-7). The city and the temple were despoiled and burnt; the walls of Jerusalem were broken down, and none but the poorest of the land "to be vinedressers and husbandmen" were left behind (2 K 25 8 f; 2 Ch 36 17 f). It is probable that the ark was removed also at this time.

With the destruction of their city, the hopes of the best elements in Judah turned with longing to the thought of her restoration. It is master of the Babylonian empire, among many acts of a similar nature for the shrines of Assyrian and Babylonian gods, he gave permission to Jews to return to rebuild the house of Jeh (Ezr 1 1 f). Over 40,000 (Ezr 1, 2) under Sheshbazzar, prince of Judah (Ezr 1 8, 11), governor of a province, returned, bringing with them the sacred vessels of the temple. The daily sacrifices were renewed and the feasts and fasts restored (3 3-7), and later the foundations of the restored temple were laid (3 10; 5 16), but on account of the opposition of the people of the land and the Samaritans, the building was not completed until 20 years later (6 15).

22. Cyrus possible that some of the remnant left and the in the land may have kept up some First Return semblance of the worship of Jeh at (538 BC) the temple-site. At length, however, when in 538 Cyrus the Persian became

The graphic description of the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem in 445 by Nehemiah gives us the 23. Nehemiah fullest account we have of these fortifications at any ancient period. It is clear that Nehemiah set himself to restore the walls, as far as possible, in their condition before the exile.

The work was done hurriedly and under conditions of danger, half the workers being armed with swords, spears and bows to protect the others, and every workman was a soldier (Neh 4 13, 16-21). The rebuilding took 52 days, but could not have been done at all had not much of the material lain to hand in the piles of ruined masonry. Doubtless the haste and limited resources resulted in a wall far weaker than that Nebuchadnezzar destroyed 142 years previously, but it followed the same outline and had the same general structure.

For the next 100 years we have scarcely any historical knowledge of Jerusalem. A glimpse is 24. Bagohi afforded by the papyri of Elephantine where we read of a Jewish community in Upper Egypt petitioning Bagohi, the governor of Judaea, for permission to rebuild their own temple to Jeh in Egypt; incidentally they mention that they had already sent an unsuccessful petition to Johanan the high priest and his colleagues in Jerusalem. In another document we gather that this petition to the Persian governor was granted. These documents must date about 411-407 BC. Later, probably about 350, we have somewhat ambiguous references to the destruction of Jerusalem and the captivity of numbers of Jews in the time of Artaxerxes (III) Ochus (358-337 BC).

With the battle of Issus and Alexander's Palestinian campaign (c 332 BC), we are upon surer historical ground, though the details of the account (Ant. XI, viii, 4) of Alexander's visit to Jerus itself are considered of doubtful authenticity.

25. Alexander the Great After his death (323 BC), Pal suffered much from its position, between the Ptolemies of Egypt and the Seleucidae of Antioch. Each became in turn its suzerain, and indeed at one time the tribute appears to have been divided between them (Ant. XII, iv, 1).

In 321 Ptolemy Soter invaded Pal, and, it is said (Ant. XII, i, 1), captured Jerus by a ruse, entering the city on the Sabbath as if anxious to offer sacrifice. He carried away

26. The Ptolemaic Rule many of his Jewish prisoners to Egypt and settled them there. In the struggles between the contending monarchies, although Pal suffered, the capital itself, on account of its isolated position, remained undisturbed, under the suzerainty of Egypt. In 217 BC, Ptolemy (IV) Philopator, after his victory over Antiochus III at Raphia, visited the temple at Jerus and offered sacrifices; he is reported (3 Macc 1) to have entered the "Holy of Holies." The comparative prosperity of the city during the Egypt domination is witnessed to by Hecataeus of Abdera, who is quoted by Jos; he even puts the population of the city at 120,000, which is probably an exaggeration.

At length in 198, Antiochus the Great having conquered Coele-Syria in the epoch-making battle at Bannas, the Jews of their own accord

27. Antiochus the Great went over to him and supplied his army with plentiful provisions; they assisted him in besieging the Egypt garrison in the Akra (q.v.) (Ant. XII, iii, 3). Jos produces letters in which Antiochus records his gratification at the reception given him by the Jews and grants them various privileges (ib). We have an account of the prosperity of the city about this time (190-180 BC) by Jesus ben Sirā in the Book of Ecclesiastes; it is a city of crowded life and manifold activities. He refers in glowing terms to the great high priest, Simon ben Onias (226-199 BC), who (Ecclesiastes 50 1-4) had repaired and fortified the temple and strengthened the walls against a siege. The letter of Aristæus, dated probably at the close of this great man's life (c 200 BC), gives a similar picture. It is here stated that the compass of the city was 40 stadia. The very considerable prosperity and religious liberty which the Jews had enjoyed under the Egyptians were soon menaced under the new ruler; the taxes were increased, and very soon fidelity to the tenets of

28. Hellenization of the City under Antiochus Epiphanes Judaism came to be regarded as treachery to the Seleucid rule. Under Antiochus Epiphanes the Hellenization of the nation grew apace (2 Macc 4 9-12; Ant. XII, v, 1); at the request of the Hellenizing party a "place of exercise" was erected in Jerus (1 Macc 1 14; 2 Macc 4 7 f). The Gymnasium was built and was soon thronged by young priests; the Gr hat—the pétasos—became the fashionable headdress in Jerus. The Hellenistic party, which was composed of the aristocracy, was so loud in its professed devotion to the king's wishes that it is not to be wondered at that Antiochus, who, on a visit to the city, had been received with rapturous greetings, came to think that the poor and pious who resisted him from religious motives were largely infected with leanings toward his enemies in Egypt. The actual open rupture began when tidings reached Antiochus, after a victorious though politically barren campaign in Egypt, that Jerus had risen in his rear on behalf of the house of Ptolemy. Jason, the renegade high priest, who had been hiding across the Jordan, had, on the false report of the death of Antiochus, suddenly returned and re-possessed himself of the city. Only the Akra remained to Syria, and this was crowded with Menelaus and those of his followers who had escaped the sword of Jason. Antiochus lost no time; he hastened (170 BC) against Jerus with a

29. Capture of the City (170 BC) great army, captured the city, massacred the people and despoiled the temple (1 Macc 1 20-24; Ant. XII, v, 3). Two years later Antiochus, balked by Rome in Egypt (Polyb. xxix.27; Livy xlv.12), appears to have determined that in Jerus, at any rate, he would have no sympathizers with Egypt. He sent his chief collector of tribute (1 Macc 1 29), who attacked the city

30. Capture of 168 BC with strong force and, by means of stratagem, entered it (ver 30). After he had despoiled it, he set it on fire and pulled down both dwellings and walls. He massacred the men, and many of the women and children he sold as slaves (1 Macc 1 31-35; 2 Macc 5 24). He sacrificed swine (or at least a sow) upon the holy altar, and caused the high priest himself—

31. At-tempted Suppression of Judaism a Greek in all his sympathies—to partake of the impure sacrificial feasts; he tried by barbarous cruelties to suppress the ritual of circumcision (Ant. XII, v, 4). In everything he endeavored, in conjunction with the strong Hellenizing party, to organize Jerus as a Gr city, and to secure his position he built a strong wall, and a great tower for the Akra, and, having furnished it well with armor and victuals, he left a strong garrison (1 Macc 1 33-35). But the Syrians had overreached themselves this time, and the reaction against persecution and attempted religious suppression produced the great uprising of the Maccabæans.

The defeat and retirement of the Syrian commander Lysias, followed by the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, led to an entire reversal

32. The Maccabean Rebellion of policy on the part of the Council of the boy-king, Antiochus V. A general amnesty was granted, with leave to restore the temple-worship in its ancestral forms. The following year (165 BC) Judas Maccabæus found "the sanctuary desolate, and the altar profaned, the gates burned up, and shrubs growing in the courts as in a forest . . . and the priests' chambers pulled down" (1 Macc 4 38). He at once saw to the reconstruction of the altar and restored the temple-services, an event celebrated ever after as the "Feast of the Dedication," or hanukkah (1 Macc 4 52-59; 2 Macc 10 1-11; Ant. XII, vii, 7; cf Jn 10 22). Judas also "built up Mt. Zion," i.e. the temple-hill, making it a fortress with "high walls and strong towers round about," and set a garrison

33. The Dedication of the Temple (165 BC) in it (1 Macc 4 41-61).

The Hellenizing party suffered in the reaction, and the Syrian garrison in the Akra, Syria's one hold on Judaea, was closely invested,

34. Defeat of Judas and Capture of the City but though Judas had defeated three Syrian armies in the open, he could not expel this garrison. In 163 BC a great Syrian army, with a camel corps and many elephants, came to the relief of the hard-pressed garrison. Lysias, accompanied by the boy-king himself (Antiochus V), approached the city from the S. via BETH-ZUR (q.v.). At Beth-zachariah the Jews were defeated, and Judas' brother Eleazar was slain, and Jerus was soon captured. The fort on Mt. Zion which surrounded the sanctuary was surrendered by treaty, but when the king saw its strength, he broke his oath and destroyed the fortifications (1 Macc 6 62). But even in this desperate state Judas and his followers were saved. A certain pretender, Philip, raised a rebellion in a distant part of the empire, and Lysias was obliged to patch up a truce with the nationalist Jews more favorable to Judas than before his defeat; the garrison in the Akra remained, however, to remind the Jews that they were not independent. In 161 BC another Syrian general, Nicanor, was sent against Judas, but he was at first won over to friendship and when, later, at the instigation of the Hellenistic party, he was compelled to attack Judas, he did so with hastily raised levies and was defeated at Adasa, a little N. of Jerus. Judas was, however, not long suffered to celebrate his triumph. A month later Bacchides appeared before Jerus, and in April, 161, Judas was slain in battle with him at Berea.

35. His Death (161 BC) Both the city and the land were re-garrisoned by Syrians; nevertheless, by 152, Jonathan, Judas' brother, who was residing at Michmash, was virtual ruler of the land, and by astute negotiation between Demetrius and Alexander, the rival claimants to the throne of Antioch, Jonathan gained more than any of his family had ever done. He was appointed high priest and stratēgós, or deputy for the king, in Judaea. He repaired the city and restored the temple-fortress with squared stones (1 Macc 10 10-11). He made the walls higher and built up a great part of the eastern wall which had been destroyed and "repaired that which was called Caphenatha" (1 Macc 12 36-37; Ant, XIII, v, ii); he also made a great mound between the Akra and the city to isolate the Syrian garrison (ib).

Simon, who succeeded Jonathan, finally captured the Akra in 139, and, according to Jos (Ant, XIII, vi, 7), not only destroyed it, but partially leveled the very hill on which it stood (see, however, 1 Macc 14 36-37).

37. Surrender of City to Antiochus Sidetes (134 BC) John Hyrcanus, 5 years later (134 BC), was besieged in Jerus by Antiochus Sidetes in the 4th year of his reign; during the siege the Syrian king raised 100 towers each 3 stories high against the northern wall—possibly these may subsequently have been used for the foundations of the second wall. Antiochus was finally bought off by the giving of hostages and by heavy tribute, which Hyrcanus is said to have obtained by opening the sepulcher of David. Nevertheless the king "broke down the fortifications that encompassed the city" (Ant, XIII, viii, 2-4).

During the more prosperous days of the Has-monean rulers, several important buildings were erected. There was a great palace on the western (southwestern) hill overlooking the temple (Ant, XX, viii, 11), and connected with it at one time by means of a bridge across the Tyropœon, and on the northern side of the temple a citadel—which may (see VIII, 7 above) have been the successor of one here in pre-exilic times—known as the Baris; this, later on, Herod enlarged into the Antonia (Ant, XV, xi, 4; BJ, V, v, 8).

In consequence of the quarrel of the later Has-monean princes, further troubles fell upon the city.

39. Rome's Intervention In 65 BC, Hyrcanus II, under the instigation of Antipas the Idumaean, rebelled against his brother Aristobulus, to whom he had recently surrendered his claim to sovereignty. With the assistance of Aretas, king of the Nabataeans, he besieged Aristobulus in the temple. The Rom general Scaurus, however, by order of Pompey, compelled Aretas to retire, and then lent his assistance to Aristobulus, who overcame his brother (Ant, XIV, ii, 1-3). Two years later (63 BC) Pompey, having been met by the ambassadors of both parties, bearing presents, as well as of the Pharisees, came himself to compose the quarrel of the rival factions, and, being shut out of the city, took it by storm. He entered the "Holy of Holies," but left the temple treasures unharmed. The walls of the city were demolished; Hyrcanus II was reinstated high priest, but Aristobulus was carried a prisoner to Rome, and the city became tributary to the Rom Empire (Ant, XIV, iv, 1-4; BJ, I, vii, 1-7). The Syrian proconsul, M. Lucinius Crassus, going upon his expedition against the Parthians in 55 BC, carried off from the temple the money which Pompey had left (Ant, XIV, vii, 1).

In 47 BC Antipater, who for 10 years had been gaining power as a self-appointed adviser to the weak Hyrcanus, was made a Rom citizen and appointed procurator in return for very material services which he had been able to render to Julius Caesar in Egypt (Ant, XIV, viii, 1, 3, 5); at the same time Caesar granted to Hyrcanus permission to rebuild the walls of Jerus besides other privileges (Ant, XIV, x, 5). Antipater made his eldest son, Phasaelus, governor of Jerus, and committed Galilee to the care of his able younger son, Herod.

41. Julius Caesar Appoints Antipater Procurator (47 BC) In 40 BC Herod succeeded his father as procurator of Judaea by order of the Rom Senate, but the same year the Parthians under Pacorus II and Barzapharnes captured and plundered Jerus (Ant, XIV, xiii, 3, 4) and reestablished Antigonus (BJ, I, xiii, 13). Herod removed his family and treasures to Massada and, having been appointed king of Judaea by Antony, returned, after various adventures, in 37 BC. Assisted by Sosius, the Rom proconsul, he took Jerus by storm after a 5 months' siege; by the promise of liberal reward he restrained the soldiers from sacking the city (Ant, XIV, xvi, 2-3).

During the reign of this great monarch Jerus assumed a magnificence surpassing that of all other ages. In 24 BC the king built his vast palace in the upper city on the southwestern hill, near where today are the Turkish barracks and the Armenian Quarter. He rebuilt the fortress to the N. of the temple—the ancient Baris—on a great scale with 4 lofty corner towers, and renamed it the Antonia in honor of his patron. He celebrated games in a new theater, and constructed a hippodrome (BJ, II, iii, 1) or amphitheater (Ant, XV, viii, 1). He must necessarily have strengthened and repaired the walls, but such work was outshone by the 4 great towers which he erected, Hippicus, Pharsael and Mariamne, near the present Jaffa Gate—the foundations of the first two are supposed to be incorporated in the present so-called "Tower of David"—and the lofty octagonal tower, Psephinus, farther to the N.W. The development of Herod's plans for the reconstruction of the temple was commenced in 19 BC, but they were not completed till 64 AD (Jn 2 20; Mt 24 1, 2; Lk 21 5, 6). The sanctuary itself was built by 1,000 specially trained priests within a space of 18 months (11-10 BC). The conception was magnificent, and resulted in a mass of buildings of size and beauty far surpassing anything that had stood there before. Practically all the remains of the foundations of the temple-enclosure now surviving in connection with the Haram belong to this period. In 4 BC—the year of the Nativity—occurred the disturbances following upon the destruction of the Golden Eagle

Reign of Herod the Great (37-4 BC) He rebuilt the fortress to the N. of the temple—the ancient Baris—on a great scale with 4 lofty corner towers, and renamed it the Antonia in honor of his patron. The development of Herod's plans for the reconstruction of the temple was commenced in 19 BC, but they were not completed till 64 AD (Jn 2 20; Mt 24 1, 2; Lk 21 5, 6). In 4 BC—the year of the Nativity—occurred the disturbances following upon the destruction of the Golden Eagle which Herod had erected over the great gate of the temple, and shortly afterward Herod died, having previously shut up many of the leading Jews in the hippodrome with orders that they should be slain when he passed away (BJ, I, xxxiii, 6). The accession of Archelaus was signalized by Passover riots which ended in the death of 3,000, an after-result of the affair of the Golden Eagle.

Tomb of David.

Thinking that order had been restored, Archelaus set out for Rome to have his title confirmed. During his absence Sabinus, the Rom procurator, by mismanagement and greed, 45. Herod raised the city about his ears, and the (4 BC–6 AD) next Passover was celebrated by a massacre, street fighting and open robbery. Varus, the governor of Syria, who had hastened to the help of his subordinate, suppressed the rebellion with ruthless severity and crucified 2,000 Jews. Archelaus returned shortly afterward as ethnarch, an office which he retained until his exile in 6 AD. During the procuratorship of Coponius (6–10 AD) another Passover riot occurred in consequence of the aggravating conduct of some Samaritans.

During the procuratorship of Pontius Pilate (26–37 AD) there were several disturbances, culminating in a riot consequent upon

46. Pontius his taking some of the "corban" or Pilate sacred offerings of the temple for the construction of an aqueduct (Ant, XVIII, iii, 2)—probably part at least of the "low-level aqueduct" (see VII, 15, above). Herod Agrippa I inclosed the suburbs, which had grown up N. of the second wall and of the temple, by what Jos calls the "Third Wall" (see V, above).

His son, King Agrippa, built—about 56 AD—a large addition to the old Hasmonean palace, from which he could overlook the temple-

47. King area. This act was a cause of offence Agrippa to the Jews who built a wall on the western boundary of the Inner Court to shut off his view. In the quarrel which ensued the Jews were successful in gaining the support of Nero (Ant, XX, viii, 11): In 64 AD the long rebuilding of the temple-courts, which had been begun in 19 BC, was concluded. The 18,000 workmen thrown out of employment appear to have been given "unemployed work" in "paving the city with white stone" (Ant, XX, ix, 6–7).

Finally, the long-smouldering discontent of the Jews against the Romans burst forth into open rebellion under the criminal incompetence

48. Rising of Gessius Florus, 66 AD against (Ant, XX, xi, 1). Palaces and public buildings were fired by the angered multitude, and after but two days' siege, the Antonia itself was captured, set on fire and its garrison slain (BJ, II, xvii, 6–7). Cestius Gallus, hastening from Syria, was soon engaged in a siege of the city. The third wall was captured and the suburb BEZETHA (q.v.) burnt, but, when about to renew the attack upon the second wall, Gallus appears to have been seized with panic, and his partial withdrawal developed into an inglorious retreat in which he was pursued by the Jews down the pass to the Beth-horons as far as Antipatris (BJ, II, xix).

This victory cost the Jews dearly in the long run, as it led to the campaign of Vespasian and the eventual crushing of all their national

49. The hopes. Vespasian commenced the con- City Be- quest in the north, and advanced by sieged by slow and certain steps. Being recalled Titus to Rome as emperor in the midst of (70 AD) the war, the work of besieging and capturing the city itself fell to his son

Titus. None of the many calamities which had happened to the city are to be compared with this terrible siege. In none had the city been so magnificent, its fortifications so powerful, its population so crowded. It was Passover time, but, in addition to the crowds assembled for this event, vast numbers had hurried there, flying from the advancing Rom army. The loss of life was enormous; refugees to Titus gave 600,000 as the number dead (BJ, V, xii, 7), but this seems incredible. The total population today within the walls cannot be more than 20,000, and the total population of modern Jerus, which covers a far greater area than that of those days, cannot at the most liberal estimate exceed 80,000. Three times this, or, say, a quarter of a million, seems to be the utmost that is credible, and many would place the numbers at far less.

The siege commenced on the 14th of Nisan, 70 AD, and ended on the 8th of Elul, a total of 134

50. Party days. The city was distracted by Divisions internal feuds. Simon held the upper within the and lower cities; John of Gischala, the Besieged temple and "Ophel"; the Idumaeans, Walls introduced by the Zealots, fought only for themselves, until they relieved the city of their terrors. Yet another party, too weak to make its counsels felt, was for peace with Rome, a policy which, if taken in time, would have found in Titus a spirit of reason and mercy. The miseries of the siege and the destruction of life and property were at least as much the work of the Jews themselves as of their conquerors. On the 15th day of the siege the third wall (Agrippa's), which had been but hastily finished upon the approach of the Romans, was captured; the second wall was finally taken on the 24th day; on the 72d day the Antonia fell, and 12 days later the daily sacrifice ceased. On the 105th day—the ominous

51. Capture 9th of Ab—the temple and the lower city were city were burnt, and the last day and Utter found the whole city in flames. Only Destruction the three great towers of Herod, Hip- of the City picus, Pharsael and Mariamne, with the western walls, were spared to protect the camp of the Xth Legion which was left to guard the site, and "in order to demonstrate to posterity what kind of city it was and how well fortified"; the rest of the city was dug up to its foundations (BJ, VII, i, 1).

For 60 years after its capture silence reigns over Jerus. We know that the site continued to be garrisoned, but it was not to any extent rebuilt. In 130 AD it was visited by Hadrian, who found but few buildings standing. Two years later (132–35 AD) occurred the last great rebellion of the Jews in the uprising of Bar-Cochba ("son of a star"), who was encouraged by the rabbi Akiba. With the suppression of this last effort for freedom by Julius Severus, the remaining traces of Judaism were stamped out, and it is even said (Talm Jerus, Ta'ani'th 4) that the very site of the temple was ploughed up by T. Annius Rufus. An altar of Jupiter was placed upon the temple-site, and Jews were excluded from Jerus on pain of death.

In 138 Hadrian rebuilt the city, giving it the name Ælia Capitolina. The line of the Southern wall of Ælia was probably determined by the southern fortification of the great Rom legionary camp on the western (southwestern) hill, and it is probable that it was the general line of the existing southern wall. At any rate, we know that the area occupied by the coenaculum and the traditional "Tomb of David" was outside the walls in the 4th cent. An equestrian statue of Hadrian was placed on the site of the "Holy of Holies" (Jerome, Comm. on Isa 2 8; Mt 24 15). An inscription now existing in the southern wall of the temple-area, in which occurs the name of Hadrian, may have belonged to this monument, while a stone head, discovered in the neighborhood of Jerus some 40 years ago, may have belonged to the statue. Either Hadrian himself, or one of the Antonine emperors, erected a temple of Venus on the northwestern hill, where subsequently was built the Church of the Holy Sepulchre (Euseb., Life of Constantine, III, 36). The habit of pilgrimage to the holy sites, which appears to have had its roots far back in the 2d cent. (see Turner, Journal of Theological Studies, I, 551, quoted by Sanday, Sacred Sites of the Gospels, 75-76), seems to have increasingly flourished in the next two centuries; beyond this we know little of the city.

In 333 AD, by order of Constantine, the new church of the Anastasis, marking the supposed site of the Holy Sepulchre, was begun. The traditions regarding this site and the Holy Cross alleged to have been found there, are recorded some time after the events and are of doubtful veracity. The building must have been magnificent, and covered a considerably larger area than that of the existing church. In 362 Julian is said to have attempted to rebuild the temple, but the work was interrupted by an explosion. The story is doubtful.

54. Constantine Builds the Church of the Anastasis

At some uncertain date before 450 the coenaculum and "Church of the Holy Zion" were incorporated within the walls. This is the condition depicted in the Madaba Mosaic and also that described by Eucherius who, writing between 345-50 AD, states that the circuit of the walls "now receives within itself Mt. Zion, which was once outside, and which, lying on the southern side, overhangs the city like a citadel." It is possible this was the work of the emperor Valentinian who is known to have done some reconstruction of the walls.

In 450 the empress Eudoxia, the widow of Theodosius II, took up her residence in Jerus and rebuilt the walls upon their ancient lines, bringing the whole of the southwestern hill, as well as the Pool of Siloam, within the circuit (Evagarius, Hist. Eccles., I, 22). At any rate, this inclusion of the pool existed in the walls described by Antoninus Martyr in 560 AD, and it is confirmed by Bliss's work (see above VI, 4). She also built the church of St. Stephen, that at the Pool of Siloam and others.

The emperor Justinian, who was perhaps the greatest of the Christian builders, erected the great Church of St. Mary, the remains of which are now considered by some authorities to be incorporated in the el Aksa Mosque; he built also a "Church of St. Sophia" in the "Prætorium," i.e. on the site of the Antonia (see, however, PRÆTORIUM), and a hospital to the W. of the temple. The site of the temple itself appears to have remained in ruins down to the 7th cent.

55. The Empress Eudoxia Rebuilds the Walls

In 614 Pal was conquered by the Pers Chosroes II, and the Jerus churches, including that of the Holy Sepulchre, were destroyed, an event which did much to prepare the way for the Moslem architects of half a century later, who freely used the columns of these ruined churches in the building of the "Dome of the Rock."

In 629 Heracleus, having meanwhile made peace with the successor of Chosroes II, reached Jerus in triumph, bearing back the captured fragment of the cross. He entered the city through the "Golden Gate," which indeed is believed by many to have reached its present form through his restorations. The triumph of Christendom was but short. Seven years earlier had occurred the historic flight of Mohammed from Mecca (the Hegira), and in 637 the victorious followers of the Prophet appeared in the Holy City. After a short siege, it capitulated, but the khalif Omar treated the Christians with generous mercy. The Christian sites were spared, but upon the temple-site, which up to this had apparently been occupied by no important Christian building but was of peculiar sanctity to the Moslems through Mohammed's alleged visions there, a wooden mosque was erected, capable of accommodating 3,000 worshippers. This was replaced in 691 AD by the magnificent Kubbet es Sahrah, or "Dome of the Rock," built by 'Abd'ul Malek, the 10th khalif. For some centuries the relations of the Christians and Moslems appear to have been friendly: the historian el Mukaddasi, writing in 985, describes the Christians and Jews as having the upper hand in Jerus. In 969 Pal passed into the power of the Egypt dynasty, and in 1010 her ruler, the mad Hakim, burnt many of the churches, which, however, were restored in a poor way.

In 1077 Isar el Atsis, a leader of the Seljuk Turks conquered Pal from the N., drove out the Egyptians and massacred 3,000 of the inhabitants of the city.

60. The Seljuk Turks and Their Cruelties

The cruelty of the Turks—in contrast, be it noted, with the conduct of the Arab Moslems—was the immediate cause of the Crusades. In 1098 the city was retaken by the Egypt Arabs, and the following year was again captured after a 40 days' siege by the soldiers of the First Crusade, and Godfrey de Bouillon became the first king. Great building activity marked the next 80 peaceful years of Lat rule: numbers of churches were built, but, until toward the end of this period, the walls were neglected. In 1177 they were repaired, but 10 years later failed to resist the arms of the victorious Saladin. The city surrendered, but the inhabitants were spared. In 1192 Saladin repaired the walls, but in 1210 they were dismantled by orders of the sultan of Damascus. In 1229 the emperor Frederick II of Germany obtained the Holy City by treaty, on condition that he did not restore the fortifications, a stipulation which, being broken by the inhabitants 10 years later, brought down upon them the vengeance of the emir of Kerak. Nevertheless, in 1243 the city was again restored to the Christians unconditionally.

The following year, however, the Kharizimian Tartars—a wild, savage horde from Central Asia—burst into Pal, carrying destruction before them; they seized Jerus, massacred the people, and rifled the tombs of the Lat kings. Three years later they were ejected from Pal by the Egyptians who in their turn retained it until, in 1517, they were conquered by the Ottoman Turks, who still hold it. The greatest of their sultans, Suleiman the Magnificent, built the present walls in 1542. In 1832 Mohammed Ali with his Egypt forces came and captured the city, but 2 years later the fellahin rose against his rule and for a time actually gained possession of the city, except the citadel, making their entrance through the main drain. The besieged citadel was relieved by the arrival of Ibrahim Pasha from Egypt with reinforcements. The city and land were restored to the Ottoman Turks by the Great Powers in 1840.

X. Modern Jerusalem.—The modern city of Jerus has about 75,000 inhabitants, of whom over two-thirds are Jews. Until about 50 years ago the city was confined within its 16th-cent. walls, the doors of its gates locked every night, and even here there were considerable areas unoccupied. Since then, and particularly during the last 25 years, there has been a rapid growth of suburbs to the N., N.W., and W. of the old city. This has been largely due to the steady stream of immigrant Jews from every part of the world, particularly from Russia, Roumania, Yemin, Persia, Bokhara, the Caucasus, and from all parts of the Turkish empire. This influx of Jews, a large proportion of whom are extremely poor, has led to settlements or "colonies" of various classes of Jews being erected all over the plateau to the N.—an area never built upon before—but also on other sides of the city. With the exception of the Bokhara Colony, which has some fine buildings and occupies a lofty and salubrious situation, most of the settlements are mean cottages or ugly almshouses. With the exception of a couple of hospitals, there is no Jewish public building of any architectural pretensions. The "Zionist" movement, which has drawn so many Jews to Jerus, cannot be called a success, as far as this city is concerned, as the settlers and their children as a rule either steadily deteriorate physically and morally—from constant attacks of malaria, combined with pauperism and want of work—or, in the case of the energetic and enlightened, they emigrate—to America esp.; this emigration has been much stimulated of late by the new law whereby Jews and Christians must now, like Moslems, do military service.

The foreign Christian population represents all nations and all sects; the Roman church is rapidly surpassing all other sects or religions in the importance of their buildings. The Russians are well represented by their extensive enclosure, which includes a large cathedral, a hospital, extensive hospice in several blocks, and a handsome residence for the consul-general, and by the churches and other buildings on the Mount of Olives. The Germans have a successful colony belonging to the "Temple" sect to the W. of Jerus near the railway stationing 3,000 worshippers. This was replaced in 691 AD by the magnificent Kubbet es Sahrah, or "Dome of the Rock," built by 'Abd'ul Malek, the 10th khalif. In influence, both secular and religious, the Germans have rapidly gained ground in the last 2 decades. British influence has much diminished, relatively. LITERATURE.—This is enormous, but of very unequal value and much of it out of date. For all purposes the best book of reference is Jerus from the Earliest Times to AD 70, 2 vols, by Principal G. A. Smith. It contains references to all the lit. To this book and to its author it is impossible for the present writer adequately to express his indebtedness, and no attempt at acknowledgment in detail has been made in this art. In supplement of the above, Jerus, by Dr. Selah Merrill, and Jerus in Bible Times, by Professor Lewis B. Paton, will be found useful. The latter is a condensed account, esp. valuable for its illustrations and its copious references. Of the arts, in the recent Bible Dictionaries on Jerus, that by Conder in HDB is perhaps the most valuable. Of guide-books, Baedeker's Guide to Pal and Syria (1911), by Socin and Benzinger, and Barnabe Meistermann's (R.C.) New Guide to the Holy Land (1909), will be found useful; also Hanauer's Walks about Jerus.

the Dominican monastery and seminary connected with the handsome church of St. Stephen—rebuilt on the plan of an old Christian church—by the Ratisbon (Jesuit) Schools, the Hospital of St. Louis, the hospice and Church of St. Augustine, and the monastery and seminary of the "white fathers" or Frères de la mission algérienne, whose headquarters center round the beautifully restored Church of St. Anne. Not far from here are the convent and school of the Sœurs de Sion, at the Ecce Homo Church. Also inside the walls near the New Gate is the residence of the Lat Patriarch—a cardinal of the Church of Rome—with a church, the school of the Frères de la doctrine chrétienne, and the schools, hospital and convent of the Franciscans, who are recognized among their coreligionists as the "parish priests" in the city, having been established there longer than the numerous other orders.

All the various nationalities are under their respective consuls and enjoy extra-territorial rights. Besides the Turkish post-office, which is very inefficiently managed, the Austrians, Germans, French, Russians and Italians all have post-offices open to all, with special "Levant" stamps. The American mail is delivered at the French post-office. There are four chief banks, French, German, Ottoman and Anglo-Pal (Jewish). As may be supposed, on account of the demand for land for Jewish settlements or for Christian schools or convents, the price of such property has risen enormously. Unfortunately in recent years all owners of land—and Moslems have not been slow to copy the foreigners—have taken to inclosing their property with high and unsightly walls, greatly spoiling both the walks around the city and the prospects from many points of view. The increased development of carriage traffic has led to considerable dust in the dry season, and mud in winter, as the roads are metalled with very soft limestone. The Jerus-Jaffa Railway (a Fr. company), 54 miles long, which was opened in 1892, has steadily increased its traffic year by year, and is now a very paying concern. There is no real municipal water-supply, and no public sewers for the new suburbs—though the old city is drained by a leaking, ill-constructed mediaeval sewer, which opens just below the Jewish settlement in the Kildron and runs down the Wady en Nâr. A water-supply, new sewers, electric trams and electric lights for the streets, are all much-

JERUSALEM, NEW (Ἱερουσαλὴμ καινὴ, Hierousalēm kainē): This name occurs in Rev 21 2 (ver 10, "holy city"). The conception is based on prophecies which predict a glorious future to Jerus after the judgment (Isa 52 1). In Rev, however, it is not descriptive of any actual locality on earth, but allegorically depicts the final state of the church ("the bride," "the wife of the Lamb," 21 2.9), when the new heaven and the new earth shall and possibly to the Sheba of 19 2. The site may be Khirbet Sā'weh, a ruin upon a prominent hill, Tell es Sā'weh, 12 miles E.N.E. of Beersheba. The hill is surrounded by a wall of large blocks of stone. PEF, III, 409-10, Sh XXV.

JESHUA, jesh'û-a, jê-shû'a (יֵשׁוּעָ, yêshûa'): A place occupied by the children of Judah after their return from captivity (Neh 11 26), evidently, from the places named with it, in the extreme S. of Judah. It may correspond with the Shema of Josh 15 26.

JESHURUN, jê-shū'run, jesh'û-run (יֵשׁוּרֻן, yêshurûn, "upright one," Dt 32 15; 33 5.26; Isa 44 2): LXX tr<sup>s</sup> it "the beloved one" (ἀγαπημένος, ēgapēménos, the perf. part. passive of agapáō), and in Isa 44 2 adds "Israel"; Vulg has dilectus in Dt 32 15, elsewhere rectissimus; Aq., Symm., Theod. have "upright." For the form, Duhm compares זִבְחֻלֻן, z'bhulûn, Zebulun. (1) The name used to be explained as a diminutive form, a pet name, and some, e.g. Cornill, Schultz (OT Theol., ET, II, 29, n.12) still explain it so, "the righteous little people." But there is no evidence that the ending -ûn had a diminutive force. (2) Most moderns take it as a poetical or ideal title of Israel, derived from יֵשָׁר, yâshâr, "upright"; it is held to contain a tacit reference to the word Israel (יִשְׂרָאֵל, yisrā'êl), of which the first three consonants are almost the same as those of "Jeshurun"; in Nu 23 10 the term "the righteous ones" (יֵשָׁרִים, yêshârîm) is supposed to contain a similar reference. Most commentators compare also "the Book of Jashar," and it has been held that "Jashar" is similarly a name by which Israel is called. See JASHAR.

Following Bacher (Z.1TW, 1885, 161 ff), commentators hold that in Isa this new name, a coinage due to the author of Second Isaiah and adopted in Dt, stands in contrast to Jacob, "the supplanter," as his name was explained by the Hebrews (cf Hos 12 2-4). Israel is here given a new name, "the upright, pious one," and with the new name goes a new chance in life, to live up to its meaning. Driver (Dt, 361) says that in Dt 32 15 "where the context is of declension from its ideal [it is] applied reproachfully. 'Nomen Recti pro Israele ponens, ironice eos perstringit qui a rectitudine defecerant' (Calv.). Elsewhere it is used as a title of honor." AV has "Jesurun" in Isa 44 2.

The grouping of the references to J. in 1 S is bound up with that of the grouping of the whole narrative of David and Saul. See SAMUEL, BOOKS OF. There seem to be three main veins in the narrative, so far as J. is concerned.

(1) In 1 S 16 1-13, where J. is called the Bethlehemite. Samuel is sent to seek among J.'s sons a successor to Saul.

Both Samuel and J. fail to discern at first Jeh's choice, Samuel thinking that it would be the eldest son (ver 6), while J. had not thought it worth while to call the youngest to the feast (ver 11).

(2) (a) In 1 S 16 14-23, Saul is mentally disturbed, and is advised to get a harpist. David "the son of J. the Bethlehemite" is recommended by a courtier, and Saul sends to J. for David.

"And J. took ten loaves [so emend and translate, and not as RV, "an ass laden with bread"], and a [skin] bottle of wine, and a kid, and sent them" to Saul as a present with David, who becomes a courtier of Saul's with his father's consent.

(b) The next mention of J is in three contemptuous references by Saul to David as "the son of J." in 20 27.30.31, part of the quarrel-scene between Saul and Jonathan. (But it is not quite certain if ch 20 belongs to the same source as 16 14-23.) In answer to the first reference, Jonathan calls his friend "David," and Saul repeats the phrase "the son of J.," abusing Jonathan personally (ver 30, where the meaning is uncertain). The reference to David as "the son of J." here and in the following verse is contemptuous, not because of any reproach that might attach itself to J., but, as Budde remarks, because "an upstart is always contemptuously referred to under his father's name" in courts and society. History repeats itself!

(c) Further references of a like kind are in the passage, 22 6-23, viz. in vs 7.8.13 by Saul, and repeated by Doeg in ver 9.

(d) The final one of this group is in 25 10, where Nabal sarcastically asks "Who is David? and who is the son of J.?"

(3) The parts of 17-18 5 which are omitted by LXX B, i.e. 17 12-31.41.48b.50.55-18 6a. Here J. is mentioned as "an Ephrathite of Beth-lehem-judah" (ver 12, not "that" Ephrathite, which is a grammatically impossible tr of the MT), Ephrath or Ephrathah being another name for Bethlehem, or rather for the district. He is further said to have eight sons (ver 12), of whom the three eldest had followed Saul to the war (ver 13).

J. sends David, the shepherd, to his brothers with provisions (ver 17). Afterward David, on being brought to Saul and asked who he is, answers, "I am the son of thy servant J. the Bethlehemite" (ver 58). J. is also described (ver 12) as being "in the days of Saul an old man, advanced in years" (so emend and translate, not as RV, "stricken in years among men"). The mention of his having 8 sons in ver 12 is not in agreement with 1 Ch 2 13-15, which gives only 7 sons with two sisters, but where Syr gives 8, adding, from 27 18, Elihu which MT has there probably by corruption (Curtis, Ch, 88). 1 S 16 10 should be tr<sup>d</sup> "and J. made his 7 sons to pass before Samuel" (not as RV, AV, "seven of his sons"). Budde (Kurz. Hand-Komm., "Samuel," 114) holds 16 1-13 to be a late Midr. and (ib. 123 f) omits (a) "that" in 17 12; (b) also "and he had 8 sons" as due to a wrong inference from 16 10; (c) the names of the 3 eldest in 17 13; (d) ver 14b; he then changes 15a, and reads thus: (12) "Now D. was the son of an Ephrathite of Bethlehem-judah, whose name was J., who was . . . [years] old at the time of Saul. (13) And the 3 eldest sons of J. had marched with Saul to the war, (14) and David was the youngest, (15) and David had remained to feed his father's sheep at Bethlehem. (16) Now the Philis came," etc.

According to all these narratives in 1 S, whether all 3 be entirely independent of one another or not, J. had land in Bethlehem, probably outside the town wall, like Boaz (see BOAZ) his grandfather (Ruth 4 17). In 22 3.4 David intrusts his father and mother to the care of the king of Moab, but from 20 29 some have inferred that J. was dead (although most critics assign 22 3 at any rate to the same stratum as ch 20).

Jonathan tells Saul that David wanted to attend a family sacrificial feast at Bethlehem (20 29). MT reads, "And he, my brother, has commanded me," whereas we should probably read with LXX, "and my brethren have commanded me," i.e. the members of the clan, as we have farther on in the verse, "Let me get away, I pray thee, and see my brethren." As to J.'s daughters, see ABIGAIL; NAHASH.

(4) Of the other references to J., the most noteworthy is that in Isa 11 1: "There shall come forth a shoot out of the stock of Jesse, and a branch out of his roots shall bear fruit," i.e. out of Jesse's roots (cf Rev 5 5). "Why J. and not David?" asks Duhm; and he answers, "Because the Messiah will be a second David, rather than a descendant of David." Marti explains it to mean that he will be, not from David, but from a collateral line of descent. Duhm's explanation suggests a parallelism between David and Christ, of whom the former may be treated as a type similar to Aaron and Melchizedek in He. Saul might pour contempt upon "the son of J.," but Isaiah has given J. here a name above all Heb names, and thus does Providence mock "society." See also ROOT OF JESSE.

DAVID FRANCIS ROBERTS

JESTING, jest'ing: Used from Tindale down as the tr of εὐτραπέλια, eutrapelia (Eph 5 4). Aristotle uses the original in his Ethics iv.14 as an equivalent of "quick-witted," from its root meaning "something easily turned," adding that, since the majority of people love excessive jesting, the word is apt to be degraded. This is the case here, where it clearly has a flavor of the coarse or licentious.

JESUI, jes'û-i. See ISHVI.

JESUITES, jes'û-its. See ISHVI.

JESURUN, jê-sû'run, jes'û-run. See JESHURUN.

JESUS, jê'zus ('Ιησους, Iēsoûs, for יהושע, y'hōshua'):

(1) Joshua, son of Nun (AV Acts 7 45; He 4 8; cf 1 Macc 2 55; 2 Esd 7 37).

(2) (3) High priest and Levite. See JESHUA, 2, 5.

(4) Son of Sirach. See SIRACH.

(5) An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 29, AV "Jose").

LITERATURE

Jesus Christ: The Founder of the Christian religion; the promised Messiah and Saviour of the world; the Lord and Head of the Christian church.

1. The Names.—(1) "Jesus" (Iēsous) is the Gr equivalent of the Heb "Joshua" (יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, y'hōshua'), meaning "Jehovah is salvation." It

1. Jesus stands therefore in the LXX and Apoc for "Joshua," and in Acts 7 45 and He 4 8 likewise represents the OT Joshua; hence in RV is in these passages rendered "Joshua." In Mt 1 21 the name is commanded by the angel to be given to the son of Mary, "for it is he that shall save his people from their sins" (see below on "Nativity"). It is the personal name of the Lord in the Gospels and the Acts, but generally in the Epistles appears in combination with "Christ" or other appellative (alone in Rom 3 26; 4 24; 1 Cor 12 3; 2 Cor 11 4; Phil 2 10; 1 Thess 4 14; He 7 22; 10 19, etc.).

(2) "Christ" (Christos) is the Gr equivalent of the Heb "Messiah" (מָשִׁיחַ, māshīaḥ; cf in the NT, Jn 1 41; 4 25, "Messiah"), meaning "anointed" (see MESSIAH).

2. Christ It designates Jesus as the fulfiller of the Messianic hopes of the OT and of the Jewish people. It will be seen below that Jesus Himself made this claim. After the resurrection it became the current title for Jesus in the apostolic church. Most frequently in the Epistles He is called "Jesus Christ," sometimes "Christ Jesus" (Rom 8 1.2.39; 1 Cor 1 2.30; 4 15; Eph 1 1; Phil 1 1; Col 1 4.28 AV; 1 Thess 2 14, etc.), often "Christ" alone (Rom 1 16 AV; 5 6.8; 6 4.8.9; 8 10, etc.). In this case "Christ" has acquired the force of a proper name. Very frequently the term is associated with "Lord" (kūrios)—"the [or "our"] Lord Jesus Christ" (Acts 11 17; 15 11 AV; 16 31 AV; 20 21; 28 31; Rom 1 7; 5 1.11; 13 14; 1 Cor 16 23, etc.).

II. Order of Treatment.—In studying, as it is proposed to do in this art., the earthly history of Jesus and His place in the faith of the apostolic church, it will be convenient to pursue the following order:

First, as introductory to the whole study, certain questions relating to the sources of our knowledge of Jesus, and to the preparation for, and circumstances of, His historical appearance, invite careful attention (Part I).

Next, still as preliminary to the proper narrative of the life of Jesus, it is desirable to consider certain problems arising out of the presentation of that life in the Gospels with which modern thought is more specially concerned, as determining the attitude in which the narratives are approached. Such are the problems of the miracles, the Messiahship, the sinless character and supernatural claims of Jesus (Part II).

The way is then open for treatment in order of the actual events of Christ's life and ministry, so far as recorded. These fall into many stages, from His nativity and baptism till His death, resurrection and ascension (Part III).

A final division will deal with Jesus as the exalted Lord in the aspects in which He is presented in the teaching of the Epistles and remaining writings of the NT (Part IV).

PART I. INTRODUCTORY

1. The Sources.—The principal, and practically the only sources for our knowledge of Jesus Christ are the four Canonical Gospels—distinction being made in these between the first three (Synoptic) Gospels, and the Gospel of John. Nothing, either in the few notices of Christ in non-Christian authors, or in the references in the other books of the

NT, or in later Christian lit., adds to the information which the Gospels already supply. The so-called apocryphal Gospels are worthless as authorities (see s.v.); the few additional sayings of Christ (cf Acts 20 35) found in outside writings are of doubtful genuineness (cf a collection of these in Westcott's Intro to the Study of the Gospels, Appendix C; see also LOGIA).

It marks the excess to which skepticism has gone that writers are found in recent years who deny the very existence of Jesus Christ (Kalt-

2. Denial hoff, Das Christus-Problem, and Die of Existence Entstehung des Christenthums; Jensen, of Jesus Das Gilgamesch-Epos, I; Drews, Die Christusmythe; cf on Kalthoff, Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus, ET, 313 ff; Jensen is reviewed in the writer's The Resurrection of Jesus, ch ix). The extravagance of such skepticism is its sufficient refutation.

Of notices outside the Christian circles the following may be referred to.

(1) Josephus.—There is the famous 3. Extra- passage in Jos, Ant, XVIII, iii, 3, Christian commencing, "Now there was about Notices this time, Jesus, a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man," etc. It is not unlikely that Jos had some reference to Jesus, but most agree that the passage in question, if not entirely spurious, has been the subject of Christian interpolation (on the lit. and different views, see Schurer, Jewish People in the Time of Christ, Div II, vol II, 143 ff; in support of interpolation, Eldersheim on "Josephus," in Dict. of Christ. Biog.).

(2) Tacitus.—The Rom historian, Tacitus, in a well-known passage relating to the persecution of Nero (Ann. xv.44), tells how the Christians, already "a great multitude" (ingens multitudo), derived their name "from one Christus, who was executed in the reign of Tiberius by the procurator of Judaea, Pontius Pilate."

(3) Suetonius also, in his account of Claudius, speaks of the Jews as expelled from Rome for the raising of tumults at the instigation of one "Chrestus" (impulsore Chresto), plainly a mistake for "Christus." The incident is doubtless that referred to in Acts 18 2.

The four Gospels, then, with their rich contents, remain as our primary sources for the knowledge of the earthly life of Jesus.

4. The Gospels (1) The Synoptics.—It may be taken for granted as the result of the best criticism that the first three Gospels (Mt, Mk, Lk) all fall well within the apostolic age (cf Harnack, Altchr. Lit., Pref; see GOSPELS). The favorite theory at present of the relations of these Gospels is, that Mk is an independent Gospel, resting on the teaching of Peter; that Mt and Lk have as sources the Gospel of Mk and a collection of discourses, probably attributable to the apostle Matthew (now commonly called Q); and that Lk has a third, well-authenticated source (Lk 1 1-4) peculiar to himself. The present writer is disposed to allow more independence to the evangelists in the embodying of a tradition common to all; in any case, the sources named are of unexceptionable authority, and furnish a strong guaranty for the reliability of the narratives. The supreme guaranty of their trustworthiness, however, is found in the narratives themselves; for who in that (or any) age could imagine a figure so unique and perfect as that of Jesus, or invent the incomparable sayings and parables that proceeded from His lips? Much of Christ's teaching is high as heaven above the minds of men still.

(2) The Fourth Gospel.—The Fourth Gospel stands apart from the Synoptics in dealing mainly with another set of incidents (the Jerusalem ministry), and discourses of a more private and intimate kind than those belonging to the Galilean teaching. Its aim, too, is doctrinal—to show that Jesus is “the Son of God,” and its style and mode of conception are very different from those of the Synoptic Gospels. Its contents touch their narratives in only a few points (as in Jn 6 4-21). Where they do, the resemblance is manifest. It is obvious that the reminiscences which the Gospel contains have been long brooded over by the apostle, and that a certain interpretative element blends with his narration of incidents and discourses. This, however, does not warrant us in throwing doubt, with so many, on the genuineness of the Gospel, for which the external evidence is exceptionally strong (cf Sanday, The Criticism of the Fourth Gospel; Drummond, Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel; and see JOHN, GOSPEL OF). The Gospel is accepted here as a genuine record of the sayings and doings of Jesus which it narrates.

II. The Preparation.—In the Gospels and throughout the NT Jesus appears as the goal of OT revelation, and the point to which all providential developments tended. 1. Both Gentile and Jewish He came, Paul says, in “the fulness of the time” (Gal 4 4). It has often been shown how, politically, intellectually, morally, everything in the Graeco-Roman world was ready for such a universal religion as Jesus brought into it (cf Baur’s Hist of the Church in the First Three Cents., ET, ch i). The preparation in Israel is seen alike in God’s revelations to, and dealings with, the chosen people in the patriarchal, Mosaic, monarchical and prophetic periods, and in the developments of the Jewish mind in the centuries immediately before Christ.

As special lines in the OT preparation may be noted the ideas of the Messianic king, a ruler of David’s house, whose reign would be 2. OT Preparation righteous, perpetual, universal (cf Isa 7 13-9 7; 32 1.2; Jer 33 15.16; Ps 2 1-10, etc); of a Righteous Sufferer (Ps 22, etc), whose sufferings are in Isa 53 declared to have an expiatory and redeeming character; and of a Messianic kingdom, which, breaking the bounds of nationalism, would extend through the whole earth and embrace all peoples (cf Isa 60; Ps 87; Dnl 2 44; 7 27, etc). The kingdom, at the same time, is now conceived of under a more spiritual aspect. Its chief blessings are forgiveness and righteousness.

The age succeeding the return from exile witnessed a manifold preparation for the advent of Christ. Here may be observed the 3. Post-exilian Preparation decentralization of the Jewish religious ideals through the rise of synagogue worship and the widespread dispersion of the race; the contact with Hellenic culture (as in Philo); but esp. the marked sharpening of Messianic expectations. Some of these were of a crude apocalyptic character (see APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE; ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT); many were political and revolutionary; but some were of a purer and more spiritual kind (cf Lk 2 25.38). To these purer elements Jesus attached Himself in His preaching of the kingdom and of Himself as its Lord. Even in the gentile world, it is told, there was an expectation of a great One who about this time would come from Judaea (Tac. Hist. v.13; Suet. Vespas. 4).

III. The Outward Situation.—Of all lands Pal was the most fitted to be the scene of the culminating revelation of God’s grace in the person and work of Jesus Christ, as before it was fitted to be the abode of the people chosen to receive and preserve the revelations that prepared the way for that final manifestation. At once central and secluded—at the junction of

1. The Land the three great continents of the Old World, Asia, Africa and Europe—the highway of nations in war and commerce—touching mighty powers on every hand, Egypt, Syria, Assyria, kingdoms of Asia Minor, as formerly more ancient empires, Hittite and Babylonian, now in contact with Greece and Rome, yet singularly inclosed by mountain, desert, Jordan gorge, and Great Sea, from ready entrance of foreign influences, Pal has a place of its own in the history of revelation, which only a Divine wisdom can have given it (cf Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, Part II, ch ii; G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. of the Holy Land, Book I, chs i, ii; Lange, Life of Christ, I, 246 ff).

Its divisions.—Pal, in the Rom period, was divided into four well-defined provinces or districts—Judaea, with Jerus as its center, in the S., the stronghold of Jewish conservatism; Samaria, in the middle, peopled from Assyrian times by mixed settlers (2 K 17 24-34), preponderatingly heathen in origin, yet now professing the Jewish religion, claiming Jewish descent (cf Jn 4 12), possessing a copy of the law (Sam Pent), and a temple of their own at Gerizim (the original temple, built by Manasseh, c 409 BC, was destroyed by John Hyrcanus, 109 BC); Galilee —“Galilee of the Gentiles” (Mt 4 15; cf Isa 9 1)—in the N., the chief scene of Christ’s ministry, freer and more cosmopolitan in spirit, through a large infusion of gentile population, and contact with traders, etc, of varied nationalities: these in Western Pal, while on the E., “beyond Jordan,” was Peraea, divided up into Peraea proper, Batanaea, Gaulonitis, Ituraea, Trachonitis, Decapolis, etc (cf Mt 4 25; 19 1; Lk 3 1). The feeling of bitterness between Jews and Samaritans was intense (Jn 4 9). The language of the people throughout was ARAMAIC (q.v.), but a knowledge of the Gr tongue was widely diffused, especially in the N., where intercourse with Gr-speaking peoples was habitual (the NT writings are in Gr). Jesus doubtless used the native dialect in His ordinary teaching, but it is highly probable that He also knew Gr, and was acquainted with OT Scriptures in that language (the LXX). In this case He may have sometimes used it in His preaching (cf Roberts, Discussions on the Gospels).

The miserable story of the vicissitudes of the Jewish people in the cent. succeeding the great persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes 2. Political Situation and the Maccabean revolt—a story made up of faction, intrigue, wars, murders, massacres, of growing degeneracy of rulers and nation, of repeated sackings of Jerus and terrible slaughters—till Herod, the Idumaeen, misnamed “the Great,” ascended the throne by favor of the Romans (37 BC), must be read in the books relating to the period (Ewald, Hist of Israel, V; Milman, Hist of Jews; Schürer, Hist of the Jewish People in Time of Christ, Div I, Vol I; Stanley, Jewish Church, III, etc). Rome’s power, first invited by Judas Maccabaeus (161 BC), was finally established by Pompey’s capture of Jerus (63 BC). Herod’s way to the throne was tracked by crime and bloodshed, and murder of those most nearly related to him marked every step in his advance. His taste for splendid buildings—palace, temple (Mt 24 1; Jn 2 20), fortresses, cities (Sebaste, Caesarea, etc)—and lavish magnificence of his royal estate and administration, could not conceal the hideousness of his crafty, unscrupulous selfishness, his cold-blooded cruelty, his tyrannous oppression of his subjects. “Better be Herod’s hog than his son,” was the comment of Augustus, when he heard of the dying king’s unnatural doings.

Changes in territory.—At the time of Christ's birth, the whole of Pal was united under Herod's rule, but on Herod's death, after a long reign of 37 (or, counting from his actual accession, 34) years, his dominions were, in accordance with his will, confirmed by Rome, divided. Judaea and Samaria (a few towns excepted) fell to his son Archelaus (Mt 2 22), with the title of "ethnarch"; Galilee and Peraea were given to Herod Antipas, another son, with the title of "tetrarch" (Mt 14 1; Lk 3 1.19; 23 7; Acts 13 1); Herod Philip, a third son, received Ituraea, Trachonitis, and other parts of the northern trans-Jordanic territory, likewise as "tetrarch" (Lk 3 1; cf Mt 14 3; Mk 6 17). A few years later, the tyranny of Archelaus provoked an appeal of his subjects to Augustus, and Archelaus, summoned to Rome, was banished to Gaul (7 AD). Thereafter Judaea, with Samaria, was governed by a Roman procurator, under the oversight of the prefect of Syria.

In the religious situation the chief fact of interest is the place occupied and prominent part played by the religious sects—the Pharisees,

3. The Religious Sects—the Sadducees, and (though unmentioned in the Gospels, these had an important influence on the early history of the church) the Essenes.

The rise and characteristics of these sects can here only be alluded to (see special arts.).

(1) The scribes.—From the days of Ezra zealous attention had been given to the study of the law, and an order of men had arisen—the "scribes"—whose special business it was to guard, develop and expound the law. Through their labors, scrupulous observance of the law, and, with it, of the innumerable regulations intended to preserve the law, and apply it in detail to conduct (the so-called "tradition of the elders," Mt 15 2 ff), became the ideal of righteousness. The sects first appear in the Maccabean age. The Maccabean conflict reveals the existence of a party known as the "Assidaeans" (Heb hāsīdīm), or "pious" ones, opposed to the lax Hellenizing tendencies of the times, and staunch observers of the law. These in the beginning gave brave support to Judas Maccabaeus, and doubtless then embraced the best elements of the nation.

(2) The Pharisees.—From them, by a process of deterioration too natural in such cases, developed the party of legalists known in the Gospels as the "Pharisees" ("separated"), on which Christ's sternest rebukes fell for their self-righteousness, ostentation, pride and lack of sympathy and charity (Mt 6 2 ff; 23; Lk 18 9-14). They gloried in an excessive scrupulosity in the observance of the externals of the law, even in trivialities. To them the multitude that knew not the law were "accursed" (Jn 7 49). To this party the great body of the scribes and rabbis belonged, and its powerful influence was eagerly sought by contending factions in the state.

(3) The Sadducees.—Alongside of the Pharisees were the "Sadducees" (probably from "Zadok")—rather a political and aristocratic clique than a religious sect, into whose possession the honors of the high-priesthood and other influential offices hereditarily passed. They are first met with by name under John Hyrcanus (135-106 BC). The Sadducees received only the law of Moses, interpreted it in a literal, secularistic spirit, rejected the Pharisaic traditions and believed in neither resurrection, angel nor spirit (Acts 23 8). Usually in rivalry with the Pharisees, they are found combining with these to destroy Jesus (Mt 26 3-5.57).

(4) The Essenes.—The third party, the "Essenes," differed from both (some derive also from the Assidaeans) in living in fraternities apart from the general community, chiefly in the desert of Engedi, on the N.W. shore of the Dead Sea, though some were found also in villages and towns; in rejecting animal sacrifices, etc., sending only gifts of incense to the temple; in practising celibacy and community of goods; in the wearing of white garments; in certain customs (as greeting the sunrise with prayers) suggestive of oriental influence. They forbade slavery, war, oaths, were given to occult studies, had secret doctrines and books, etc. As remarked, they do not appear in the Gospel, but on account of certain resemblances, some have sought to establish a connection between them and John the Baptist and Jesus. In reality, however, nothing could be more opposed than Essenism to the essential ideas and spirit of Christ's teaching (cf Schürer, as above, Div II, Vol II, 188 ff; Kuenen, Hibbert Lects on National Religions and Universal Religions, 199-208; Lightfoot, Colossians, 114-79).

IV. The Chronology.—The leading chronological questions connected with the life of Jesus are discussed in detail elsewhere (CHRON OF THE NT; QUIRINIUS, etc); here it is sufficient to indicate the general scheme of dating adopted in the present art., and some of the grounds on which it is preferred. The chief questions relate to the dates of the birth and baptism of Jesus, the duration of the ministry and the date of the crucifixion.

Though challenged by some (Caspari, Bosanquet, Conder, etc, put it as late as 1 BC) the usual date for the death of Herod the Great,

1. Date of the Birth of Jesus—March, 4 BC (year of Rome 750), may be assumed as correct (for grounds of this dating, see Schürer, op. cit., Div I, Vol I, 464-67). The birth of Jesus was before, and apparently not very long before, this event (Mt 2). It may therefore be placed with probability in the latter part of the previous year (5 BC), the ordinary dating of the commencement of the Christian era being thus, as is generally recognized, four years too late. There is no certainty as to the month or day of the birth. The Christmas date, December 25, is first met with in the W. in the 4th cent. (the eastern date was January 6), and was then possibly borrowed from a pagan festival. December, in the winter season, seems unlikely, as unsuitable for the pasturing of flocks (Lk 2 8), though this objection is perhaps not decisive (Andrews, Conder). A more probable date is a couple of months earlier. The synchronism with Quirinius (Lk 2 2) is considered in connection with the nativity. The earlier datings of 6, 7, or even 8 BC, suggested by Ramsay, Mackinlay and others, on grounds of the assumed Rom census, astronomical phenomena, etc, appear to leave too long an interval before the death of Herod, and conflict with other data, as Lk 3 1 (see below).

John is said by Luke to have begun to preach and baptize "in the fifteenth year of Tiberius" (Lk 3 1), and Jesus "was about thirty years

2. Date of Baptism—of age" (ver 23) when He was baptized by John, and entered on His ministry. If the 15th year of Tiberius is dated, as seems most likely, from his association with Augustus as colleague in the government, 765 AUC, or 12 AD (Tac. Ann. i.3; Suet. on Augustus, 97), and if Jesus may be supposed to have been baptized about 6 months after John commenced his work, these data combine in bringing us to the year 780 AUC, or 27 AD, as the year of Our Lord's baptism, in agreement with our former conclusion as to the date of His birth in 5 BC. To place the birth earlier is to make Jesus 32 or 33 years of age at His baptism—an unwarrantable extension of the "about." In accord with this is the statement in Jn 2 20 that the temple had been 46 years in building (it began in 20-19 BC) at the time of Christ's first Passover; therefore in 780 AUC, or 27 AD (cf Schürer, op. cit., Div I, Vol I, 410).

The determination of the precise duration of Our Lord's ministry involves more doubtful elements.

Setting aside, as too arbitrary, schemes
3. Length of Ministry which would, with some of the early Fathers, compress the whole ministry into little over a single year (Browne, Hort, etc)—a view which involves without authority the rejection of the mention of the Passover in Jn 6 4—there remains the choice between a two years' and a three years' ministry. Both have able advocates (Turner in art. "Chronology," and Sanday in art. "Jesus Christ," in HDB, advocate the two years' scheme; Farrar, Ramsay, D. Smith, etc, adhere to the three years' scheme). An important point is the view taken of the unnamed "feast" in Jn 5 1. John has already named a Passover—Christ's first—in 2 13.23; another, which Jesus did not attend, is named in 6 4; the final Passover, at which He was crucified, appears in all the evangelists. If the "feast" of Jn 5 1 (the art. is probably to be omitted) is also, as some think, a Passover, then John has four Passovers, and a three years' ministry becomes necessary. It is claimed, however, that in this case the "feast" would almost certainly have been named. It still does not follow, even if a minor feast—say Purim—is intended, that we are shut up to a two years' ministry. Mr. Turner certainly goes beyond his evidence in affirming that "while two years must, not more than two years can, be allowed for the interval from Jn 2 13.23 to Jn 11 55." The two years' scheme involves, as will be seen on consideration of details, a serious overcrowding and arbitrary transposition of incidents, which speak to the need of longer time. We shall assume that the ministry lasted for three years, reserving reasons till the narrative is examined.

On the hypothesis now accepted, the crucifixion of Jesus took place at the Passover of 30 AD. On the two years' scheme it would fall a 4. Date of Christ's Death year earlier. On both sides it is agreed that it occurred on the Friday of the week of the Passover, but it is disputed whether this Friday was the 14th or the 15th day of the month. The Gospel of John is pleaded for the former date, the Synoptics for the latter. The question will be considered in connection with the time of the Last Supper. Meanwhile it is to be observed that, if the 15th is the correct date, there seems reason to believe that the 15th of Nisan fell on a Friday in the year just named, 783 AUC, or 30 AD. We accept this provisionally as the date of the crucifixion.

PART II. THE PROBLEMS OF THE LIFE OF JESUS

I. The Miracles.—Everyone is aware that the presence of miracle in the Gospels is a chief ground of the rejection of its history by the representatives of the "modern" school.

1. The "Modern" Attitude It is not questioned that it is a supernatural person whose picture is presented in the Gospels. There is no real difference between the Synoptics and John in this respect. "Even the oldest Gospel," writes Bousset, "is written from the standpoint of faith; already for Mark, Jesus is not only the Messiah of the Jewish people, but the miraculous eternal Son of God, whose glory shone in the world" (Was wissen wir von Jesus? 54, 57). But the same writer, interpreting the "modern" spirit, declares that no account embracing supernatural events can be accepted as historical. "The main characteristic of this modern mode of thinking," he says, "rests upon the determination to try to explain everything that takes place in the world by natural causes, or—to express it in another form—it rests on the determined assertion of universal laws to which all phenomena, natural and spiritual, are subject" (What Is Religion? ET, 283).

With such an assumption it is clear that the Gospels are condemned before they are read. Not only is Jesus there a supernatural person, but He is presented as supernatural in natural in character, in works, in the Gospels claims (see below); He performs miracles; He has a supernatural birth, and a supernatural resurrection. All this is swept away. It may be allowed that He had remarkable gifts of healing, but these are in the class of "faith-cures" (thus Harnack), and not truly supernatural. When one seeks the justification for this self-confident dogmatism, it is difficult to discover it, except on the ground of a pantheistic or monistic theory of the universe which excludes the personal God of Christianity. If God is the Author and Sustainer of the natural system, which He rules for moral ends, it is impossible to see why, for high ends of revelation and redemption, a supernatural economy should not be engrafted on the natural, achieving ends which could not otherwise be attained. This does not of course touch the question of evidence for any particular miracle, which must be judged of from its connection with the person of the worker, and the character of the apostolic witnesses. The well-meant effort to explain all miracles through the action of unknown natural laws—which is what Dr. Sanday calls "making both ends meet" (Life of Christ in Recent Research, 302)—breaks down in the presence of such miracles as the instantaneous cleansing of the leper, restoration of sight to the blind, the raising of the dead, acts which plainly imply an exercise of creative power. In such a life as Christ's, transcendence of the ordinary powers of Nature is surely to be looked for.

II. The Messiahship.—A difficulty has been found in the fact that in all the Gospels Jesus knew Himself to be the Messiah at least from

1. Reserve of Jesus the time of His baptism, yet did not, even to His disciples, unreservedly announce Himself as such till after Criticism Peter's great confession at Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16 13 ff.). On this seeming secrecy the bold hypothesis has been built that Jesus in reality never made the claim to Messiahship, and that the passages which imply the contrary in Mk (the original Gospel) are unhistorical (Wrede; cf on this and other theories, Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus, ET; Sanday, The Life of Christ in Recent Research). So extreme an opinion is rejected by most; but modern critics vie with each other in the freedom with which they treat the testimony of the evangelists on this subject. Baldensperger, e.g., supposes that Jesus did not attain full certainty on His Messiahship till near the time of Peter's confession, and arbitrarily transposes the earlier sections in which the title "Son of Man" occurs till after that event (Das Selbstbewusstsein Jesu, 2d ed, 246). Bousset thinks that Jesus adopted the Messianic rôle as the only one open to Him, but bore it as a "burden" (cf his Jesus). Schweitzer connects it with apocalyptic ideas of a wildly fantastic character (op. cit., ch xix).

There is, however, no need for supposing that Peter's confession marks the first dawn of this knowledge in the minds of the apostles.

2. A Growing Revelation Rather was it the exalted expression of a faith already present, which had long been maturing. The baptism and temptation, with the use of the title "Son of Man," the tone of authority in His teaching, His miracles, and many special incidents, show, as clearly as do the discourses in John, that Jesus was from the beginning fully conscious of His vocation, and His reserve in the use of the title sprang, not from any doubt in His own mind as to His right to it, but from His desire to avoid false associations till the true nature of His Messiahship should be revealed. The Messiahship was in process of self-revelation throughout to those who had eyes to see it (cf Jn 6 66-71). What it involved will be seen later.

III. Kingdom and Apocalypse.—Connected with the Messiahship is the idea of the "Kingdom of God" or "of heaven," which some in

1. The Kingdom—modern times would interpret in a purely eschatological sense, in the light of Jewish apocalyptic conceptions (Johannes Weiss, Schweitzer, etc).

Present or Future? The kingdom is not a thing of the present, but wholly a thing of the future, to be introduced by convulsions of Nature and the Parousia of the Son of Man. The language of the Lord's Prayer, "Thy kingdom come," is quoted in support of this contention, but the next petition should guard against so violent an inference. "Thy will be done," Jesus teaches His disciples to pray, "as in heaven, so on earth" (Mt 6 10). The kingdom is the reign of God in human hearts and lives in this world as well as in the next. It would not be wrong to define it as consisting essentially in the supremacy of God's will in human hearts and human affairs, and in every department of these affairs. As Jesus describes the kingdom, it has, in the plain meaning of His words, a present being on earth, though its perfection is in eternity. The parables in Mt 13 and elsewhere exhibit it as founded by the sowing of the word of truth (Sower), as a mingling of good and evil elements (Tares), as growing from small beginnings to large proportions (Mustard Seed), as gradually leavening humanity (Leaven), as of priceless value (Treasure; Pearl; cf Mt 6 33); as terminating in a judgment (Tares, Dragnet); as perfected in the world to come (Mt 13 43). It was a kingdom spiritual in nature (Lk 17 20, 21), universal in range (Mt 8 11; 21 43, etc), developing from a principle of life within (Mk 4 26-29), and issuing in victory over all opposition (Mt 21 44).

It is difficult to pronounce on the extent to which Jesus was acquainted with current apocalyptic beliefs, or allowed these to color the

may be doubted whether they more than superficially affected even its form. Jewish apocalyptic knew nothing of a death and resurrection of the Messiah and of His return in glory to bring in an everlasting kingdom. What Jesus taught on these subjects sprang from His own Messianic consciousness, with the certainty He had of His triumph over death and His exaltation to the right hand of God. It was in OT prophecy, not in late Jewish apocalypse, that His thoughts of the future triumph of His kingdom were grounded, and from the vivid imagery of the prophets He borrowed most of the clothing of these thoughts. Isa 53, e.g., predicts not only the rejection and death of the Servant of Jehovah (vs 3.7-9.12), but the prolongation of His days and His victorious reign (vs 10-12). Dnl, not the Book of En, is the source of the title, "Son of Man," and of the imagery of coming on the clouds of heaven (Dnl 7 13). The ideas of resurrection, etc, have their ground in the OT (see ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT). With the extravagant, unspiritual forms into which these conceptions were thrown in the Jewish apocalyptic books His teaching had nothing in common.

The new apocalyptic school represented by Schweitzer reduces the history of Jesus to folly, fanaticism and hopeless disillusionment.

IV. The Character and Claims.—Where the Gospels present us in Jesus with the image of a

1. Denial of Christ's Moral Perfection—flawless character—in the words of the writer to the Hebrews, "holy, guileless, undefiled, separated from sinners" (He 7 26)—modern criticism is driven by an inexorable necessity to deprive Jesus of His sinless perfection, and to impute to Him the error, frailty, and moral infirmity that belong to ordinary mortals. In Schweitzer's portrait (cf op. cit.), He is an apocalyptic enthusiast, ruled by illusory ideals, deceiving Himself and others as to who He was, and as to the impending end of the world. Those who show a more adequate appreciation of Christ's spiritual greatness are still prevented by their humanitarian estimate of His person and their denial of the supernatural in history from recognizing the possibility of His sinlessness. It may confidently be said that there is hardly a single writer of the modern school who grants Christ's moral perfection. To do so would be to admit a miracle in humanity, and we have heard that miracle is by the highest rational necessity excluded. This, however, is precisely the point on which the modern so-called "historical-critical" mode of presentation most obviously breaks down. The ideal of perfect holiness in the Gospels which has fascinated the conscience of Christendom for 18 cents., and attests itself anew to every candid reader, is not thus lightly to be got rid of, or explained away as the invention of a church gathered out (without the help of the ideal) promiscuously from Jews and Gentiles. It was not the church—least of all such a church—that created Christ, but Christ that created the church.

(1) The sinlessness assured.—The sinlessness of Jesus is a datum in the Gospels. Over against a sinful world He stands as a Saviour who is Himself without sin. His is the one life in humanity in which is presented a perfect knowledge and unbroken fellowship with the Father, undeviating obedience to His will, unswerving devotion under the severest strain of temptation and suffering to the highest ideal of goodness. The ethical ideal was never raised to so absolute a height as it is in the teaching of Jesus, and the miracle is that, high as it is in its unsullied purity, the character of Jesus corresponds with it, and realizes it. Word and life for once in history perfectly agree. Jesus, with the keenest sensitiveness to sin in thought and feeling as in deed, is conscious of no sin in Himself, confesses no sin, disclaims the presence of it, speaks and acts continually on the assumption that He is without it. Those who knew Him best declared Him to be without sin (1 Pet 2 22; 1 Jn 3 5; cf 2 Cor 5 21). The Gospels must be rent in pieces before this image of a perfect holiness can be effaced from them.

(2) What this implies.—How is this phenomenon of a sinless personality in Jesus to be explained? It is itself a miracle, and can only be made credible by a creative miracle in Christ's origin. It may be argued that a Virgin Birth does not of itself secure sinlessness, but it will hardly be disputed that at least a sinless personality implies miracle in its production. It is precisely because of this that the modern spirit feels bound to reject it. In the Gospels it is not the Virgin Birth by itself which is invoked to explain Christ's sinlessness, but the supernatural conception by the Holy Spirit (Lk 1 35). It is because of this conception that the birth is a virgin one. No explanation of the supernatural element in Christ's Person is more rational or credible (see below on "Nativity").

If Jesus from the first was conscious of Himself as without sin, and if, as the converse of this, He knew Himself as standing in an unbroken filial fellowship with the Father, 2. Sinless- ness and He must early have become conscious of His special vocation, and learnt to distinguish Himself from others as one called to bless and save them.

Here is the true germ of His Messianic consciousness, from which everything subsequently is unfolded. He stood in a rapproch with the Father which opened His spirit to a full, clear revelation of the Father's will regarding Himself, His mission, the kingdom. He came to found, His sufferings as the means of salvation to the world, the glory that awaited Him when His earthly work was done. In the light of this revelation He read the OT Scriptures and saw His course there made plain. When the hour had come He went to John for baptism, and His brief, eventful ministry, which should end in the cross, began. This is the reading of events which introduces consistency and purpose into the life of Jesus, and it is this we mean to follow in the sketch now to be given.

PART III. COURSE OF THE EARTHLY LIFE OF JESUS

The wonderful story of the life of the world's Redeemer which we are now to endeavor to trace falls naturally into several divisions:

1. Divisions A. From the Nativity to the Baptism and Temptation.
- B. The Early Judean Ministry.
- C. The Galilean Ministry and Visits to the Feasts.

D. The Last Journey to Jerusalem.

E. The Passion Week—Betrayal, Trial, and Crucifixion.

F. The Resurrection and Ascension.

To avoid misconception, it is important to remember, that, rich as are the narratives of the Gospels, materials do not exist for a complete biography or "Life" of Jesus. There is a gap, broken only by a single incident, from His infancy till His 30th year; there are cycles of events out of myriads left unrecorded (Jn 21 25); there are sayings, parables, longer discourses, connected with particular occasions; there are general summaries of periods of activity comprised in a few verses. The evangelists, too, present their materials each from his own standpoint—Matthew from the theocratic, Mark from that of Christ's practical activity, Luke from the universalistic and human-sympathetic, John from the Divine. In reproducing the history respect must be had to this focusing from distinct points of view.

A. FROM THE NATIVITY TO THE BAPTISM AND TEMPTATION

I. The Nativity.—OT prophecy expired with the promise on its lips, "Behold, I send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me: and the Lord, whom ye seek, will suddenly come to his temple; and the messenger of the covenant, whom ye desire, behold, he cometh, saith Jehovah of hosts" (Mal 3 1). In the years immediately before Christ's birth the air was tremulous with the sense of impending great events. The fortunes of the Jewish people were at their lowest ebb. Pharisaic formalism, Sadducean unbelief, fanatical Zealotry, Herodian sycophantism, Roman oppression, seemed to have crushed out the last sparks of spiritual religion. Yet in numerous quiet circles in Judaea, and even in remote Galilee, little godly bands still nourished their souls on the promises, looking for "the consolation of Israel" and "redemption of Jerusalem" (Lk 2 25.38). Glimpses of these are vouchsafed in Zacharias and Elisabeth, in Simeon, in Anna, in Joseph and Mary (Lk 1, 2; Mt 1 18 ff). It was in hearts in these circles that the stirrings of the prophetic spirit began to make themselves felt anew, preparing for the Advent (cf Lk 2 27.36).

In the last days of Herod—perhaps in the year 748 of Rome, or 6 BC—the aged priest Zacharias, of the course of Abijah (1 Ch 24 10; cf Schürer, Div II, Vol I, 219 ff), was the Baptist ministering in the temple at the altar (Lk 1) of incense at the hour of evening prayer. Scholars have reckoned, if on somewhat precarious grounds, that the ministry of the order to which Zacharias belonged fell in this year in the month of April or in early October (cf Andrews, Life of Our Lord). Now a wonderful thing happened. Zacharias and his wife Elisabeth, noted for their blameless piety, were up to this time childless. On this evening an angel, appearing at the side of the altar of incense, announced to Zacharias that a son should be born to them, in whom should be realized the prediction of Malachi of one coming in the spirit and power of Elijah to prepare the way of the Lord (cf Mal 4 5.6). His name was to be called John. Zacharias hesitated to believe, and was stricken with dumbness till the promise should be fulfilled. It happened as the angel had foretold, and at the circumcision and naming of his son his tongue was again loosed. Zacharias, filled with the Spirit, poured forth his soul in a hymn of praise—the Benedictus (Lk 1 5-25.57-80; cf JOHN THE BAPTIST).

Meanwhile yet stranger things were happening in the little village of Nazareth, in Galilee (now en-Nāṣurah). There resided a young

3. The Annunciation Mary, betrothed to a carpenter of the village (cf Mt 13 55), called Joseph, sults (Lk 1: who, although in so humble a station, 26-56; Mt 1:18-25) 1). Mary, most probably, was likewise of Davidic descent (Lk 1 32; on the genealogies, see below). The fables relating to the parentage and youth of Mary in the Apocryphal Gospels may safely be discarded. To this maiden, three months before the birth of the Baptist, the same angelic visitant (Gabriel) appeared, hailing her as "highly favored" of God, and announcing to her that, through the power of the Holy Spirit, she should become the mother of the Saviour. The words "Blessed art thou among women," in AV of ver 28 are omitted by RV, though found below (ver 42) in Elisabeth's salutation. They give, in any case, no support to Mariolatry, stating simply the fact that Mary was more honored than any other woman of the race in being chosen to be the mother of the Lord.

(1) The amazing message.—The announcement itself was of the most amazing import. Mary herself was staggered at the thought that, as a virgin, she should become a mother (ver 34). Still more surprising were the statements made as to the Son she was to bear. Conceived of the Holy Spirit (Lk 1 35; Mt 1 18), He would be great, and would be called "the Son of the Most High" (Lk 1 32)—"the Son of God" (ver 35); there would be given to Him the throne of His father David, and His reign would be eternal (vs 32.33; cf Isa 9 6.7); He would be "holy" from the womb (ver 35). His name was to be called Jesus (ver 31; cf Mt 1 21), denoting Him as Saviour. The holiness of Jesus is here put in connection with His miraculous conception, and surely rightly. In no case in the history of mankind has natural generation issued in a being who is sinless, not to say superhuman. The fact that Jesus, even in His human nature, was supernaturally begotten—was “Son of God”—does not exclude the higher and eternal Sonship according to the Divine nature (Jn 1 18). The incarnation of such a Divine Being as Paul and John depict, itself implies miracle in human origin. On the whole message being declared to her, Mary accepted what was told her in meek humility (Lk 1 38).

1. Hidden Piety in Judaism suddenly come to his temple; and the messenger of the covenant, whom ye desire, behold, he cometh, saith Jehovah of hosts" (Mal 3 1). In the years immediately before Christ's birth the air was tremulous with the sense of impending great events. The fortunes of the Jewish people were at their lowest ebb. Pharisaic formalism, Sadducean unbelief, fanatical Zealotry, Herodian sycophantism, Roman oppression, seemed to have crushed out the last sparks of spiritual religion. Yet in numerous quiet circles in Judaea, and even in remote Galilee, little godly bands still nourished their souls on the prom-

(2) The visit to Elisabeth.—With the announcement to herself there was given to Mary an indication of what had befallen her kinswoman Elisabeth, and Mary's first act, on recovering from her astonishment, was to go in haste to the home of Elisabeth in the hill country of Judaea (vs 39 ff). Very naturally she did not rashly forestall God's action in speaking to Joseph of what had occurred, but waited in quietness and faith till God should reveal in His own way what He had done. The meeting of the two holy women was the occasion of a new outburst of prophetic inspiration. Elisabeth, moved by the Spirit, greeted Mary in exalted language as the mother of the Lord (vs 42-45)—a confirmation to Mary of the message she had received; Mary, on her part, broke forth in rhythmical utterance, “My soul doth magnify the Lord,” etc (vs 46-56). Her hymn—the sublime Magnificat—is to be compared with Hannah's (1 S 2 1-11), which furnishes the model of it. Mary abode with Elisabeth about three months, then returned to her own house.

(3) Joseph's perplexity.—Here a new trial awaited her. Mary's condition of motherhood could not long be concealed, and when Joseph first became aware of it, the shock to a man so just (Mt 1 19) would be terrible in its severity. The disappearance of Joseph from the later gospel history suggests that he was a good deal older than his betrothed, and it is possible that, while strict, upright and conscientious, his disposition was not as strong on the side of sympathy as so delicate a case required. It is going too far to say with Lange, “He encountered the modest, but unshakably firm Virgin with decided doubt; the first Ebionite”; but so long as he had no support beyond Mary's word, his mind was in a state of agonized perplexity. His first thought was to give Mary a private “bill of divorcement” to avoid scandal (ver 19). Happily, his doubts were soon set at rest by a Divine intimation, and he hesitated no longer to take Mary to be his wife (ver 24). Luke's Gospel, which confines itself to the story of Mary, says nothing of this episode; Matthew's narrative, which bears evidence of having come from Joseph himself, supplies the lack by showing how Joseph came to have the confidence in Mary which enabled him to take her to wife, and become sponsor for her child. The trial, doubtless, while it lasted, was not less severe for Mary than for Joseph—a prelude of that sword which was to “pierce through [her] own soul” (Lk 2 35). There is no reason to believe that Joseph and Mary did not subsequently live in the usual relations of wedlock, and that children were not born to them (cf Mt 13 55, 56, etc).

Matthew gives no indication of where the events narrated in his first chapter took place, first mentioning Nazareth on the occasion of the return of the holy family from Egypt (2 23). In 2 1 he transports us to Bethlehem as the city of Christ's birth. It is left to Luke to give an account of the circumstances which brought Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem—thus fulfilling prophecy (Mic 5 2; Mt 2 5, 6)—at this critical hour, and to record the lowly manner of Christ's birth there.

(1) The census of Quirinius.—The emperor

Augustus had given orders for a general enrolment throughout the empire (the fact of periodical enrolments in the empire is well established by Professor W. M. Ramsay in his Was Christ Born at Bethlehem?), and this is stated to have been given effect to in Judaea when Quirinius was governor of Syria (Lk 2 1, 2). The difficulties connected with the enrolment or census here mentioned are discussed in the art. QUIRINIUS. It is known that Quirinius did conduct a census in Judaea in 6 AD (cf Acts 5 37), but the census at Christ's birth is distinguished from this by Luke as “the first enrolment.” The difficulty was largely removed when it was ascertained, as it has been to the satisfaction of most scholars, that Quirinius was twice governor of Syria—first, after Herod's death, 4-1 BC, and again in 6-11 AD. The probability is that the census was begun under Varus, the immediate predecessor of Quirinius—or even earlier under Saturninus—but was delayed in its application to Judaea, then under Herod's jurisdiction, and was completed by Quirinius, with whose name it is officially connected. That the enrolment was made by each one going to his own city (ver 3) is explained by the fact that the census was not made according to the Rom method, but, as befitted a dependent kingdom, in accordance with Jewish usages (cf Ramsay).

(2) Jesus born.—It must be left undecided whether the journey of Mary to Bethlehem with Joseph was required for any purpose of registration, or sprang simply from her unwillingness to be separated from Joseph in so trying a situation. To Bethlehem, in any case, possibly by Divine monition, she came, and there, in the ancestral city of David, in circumstances the lowliest conceivable, brought forth her marvelous child. In unadorned language—very different from the embellishments of apocryphal story—Luke narrates how, when the travelers arrived, no room was found for them in the “inn”—the ordinary eastern khan or caravanserai, a square enclosure, with an open court for cattle, and a raised recess round the walls for shelter of visitors—and how, when her babe was born, Mary wrapped Him in swaddling clothes, and laid Him in a manger. The wearied pair having, according to Luke, been crowded out of, and not merely within, the inn, there is every probability that the birth took place, not, as some suppose, in the courtyard of the inn, but, as the oldest tradition asserts (Justin Martyr, Dial. with Trypho, 78), in a cave in the neighborhood, used for similar purposes of lodgment and housing of cattle. High authorities look favorably on the “cave of the nativity” still shown, with its inscription, Hic de virgine Maria Jesus Christus natus est, as marking the sacred spot. In such incredibly mean surroundings was “the only begotten of the Father” ushered into the world He came to redeem. How true the apostle's word that He “emptied” Himself (Phil 2 7)! A problem lies in the very circumstances of the entrance into time of such a One, which only the thought of a voluntary humiliation for saving ends can solve.

Born, however, though Jesus was, in a low condition, the Father did not leave Him totally without witness to His Sonship. There

5. The Infancy.—were rifts in the clouds through which cidents of the hidden glory streamed. The scenes in the narratives of the Infancy exhibit (Lk 2:8-39; a strange commingling of the glorious Mt 2:1-12) and the lowly.

(1) The visit of the shepherds.—To shepherds watching their flocks by night in the fields near Bethlehem the first disclosure was made. The season, one would infer, could hardly have been winter, though it is stated that there is frequently an interval of dry weather in Judaea between the middle of December and the middle of February, when such a keeping of flocks would be possible (Andrews). The angel world is not far removed from us, and as angels preannounced the birth of Christ, so, when He actually came into the world (cf He 1 6), angels of God made the night vocal with their songs. First, an angel appearing in the midst of the Divine glory—the “Shekinah”—announced to the sorely alarmed shepherds the birth of a “Saviour who was Christ the Lord” at Bethlehem; then a whole chorus of the heavenly host broke in with the refrain, “Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace among men in whom He is well pleased” (lit. “men of good pleasure”)—since, the Christmas hymn of the generations (Lk 2 1-14). The shepherds, guided as to how to recognize the babe (ver 12), went at once, and found it to be even as they had been told. Thence they hastened to spread abroad the tidings—the first believers, the first worshippers, the first preachers (vs 15-20). Mary cherished the sayings in the stillness of her heart.

(2) The circumcision and presentation in the temple.—Jewish law required that on the 8th day the male child should be circumcised, and on the same day He received His name (cf Lk 1 59-63). Jesus, though entirely pure, underwent the rite which denoted the putting off of fleshly sin (Col 2 11), and became bound, as a true Israelite, to render obedience to every Divine commandment. The name “Jesus” was then given Him (Lk 2 21). On the 40th day came the ceremony of presentation in the temple at Jerus, when Mary had to offer for her purifying (Lev 12; Mary’s was the humble offering of the poor, “a pair of turtle-doves, or two young pigeons” [Lev 12 8; Lk 2 24]), and when the first-born son had to be redeemed with 5 shekels of the sanctuary (Nu 18 15.16; about $3.60). The observance was an additional token that Christ—personally sinless—did not shrink from full identification with our race in the responsibilities of its sinful condition. Ere it was completed, however, the ceremony was lifted to a Diviner level, and a new attestation was given of the dignity of the child of Mary, by the action and inspired utterances of the holy Simeon and the aged prophetess Anna. To Simeon, a righteous and devout man, “looking for the consolation of Israel,” it had been revealed that he should not die till he had seen the Lord’s Christ, and, led by the Spirit into the temple at the very time when Jesus was being presented, he recognized in Him the One for whom he had waited, and, taking Him in his arms, gave utterance to the beautiful words of the Nunc Dimittis—“Now lettest thou thy servant depart, Lord,” etc (Lk 2 25-32). He told also how this child was set for the falling and rising of many in Israel, and how, through Him, a sword should pierce through Mary’s own soul (vs 34.35). Entering at the same hour, the prophetess Anna—now in extreme old age (over 100; a constant frequenter of the temple, ver 37)—confirmed his words, and spoke of Him to all who, like herself, looked “for the redemption of Jerus.”

(3) Visit of the Magi.—It seems to have been after the presentation in the temple that the incident took place recorded by Matthew of the visit of the Magi. The Magi, a learned class belonging originally to Chaldaea or Persia (see MAGI), had, in course of time, greatly degenerated (cf Simon Magus, Acts 8 9), but those who now came to seek Christ from the distant East were of a nobler order. They appeared in Jerus inquiring, “Where is He that is born King of the Jews?” and declaring that they had seen His star in the East, and had come to worship Him (Mt 2 2). Observers of the nightly sky, any significant appearance in the heavens would at once attract their attention. Many (Kepler, Ideler, etc; cf Ramsay, op. cit., 215 ff) are disposed to connect this “star” with a remarkable conjunction—or series of conjunctions—of planets in 7-6 BC, in which case it is possible that two years may have elapsed (cf the inquiry of Herod and his subsequent action, vs 7.16) from their observation of the sign. On the other hand, the fact of the star reappearing and seeming to stand over a house in Bethlehem (ver 9) rather points to a distinct phenomenon (cf BETHLEHEM, STAR OF). The inquiry of the Magi at once awakened Herod’s alarm; accordingly, having ascertained from the scribes that the Christ should be born at Bethlehem (Mic 5 2), he summoned the Magi, questioned them as to when exactly the star appeared, then sent them to Bethlehem to search out the young child, hypocritically pretending that he also wished to worship Him (Mt 2 7.8). Herod had faith enough to believe the Scriptures, yet was foolish enough to think that he could thwart God’s purpose. Guided by the star, which anew appeared, the wise men came to Bethlehem, offered their gifts, and afterward, warned by God, returned by another road, without reporting to Herod. It is a striking picture—Herod the king, and Christ the King; Christ a power even in His cradle, inspiring terror, attracting homage! The faith of these sages, unrepelled by the lowly surroundings of the child they had discovered, worshipping, and laying at His feet their gold, frankincense and myrrh, is a splendid anticipation of the victories Christ was yet to win among the wisest as well as the humblest of our race. Herod, finding himself, as he thought, befooled by the Magi, avenged himself by ordering a massacre of all the male children of two years old, and under, in Bethlehem and its neighborhood (vs 16-19). This slaughter, if not recorded elsewhere (cf, however, Macrobius, quoted by Ramsay, op. cit., 219), is entirely in keeping with the cruelty of Herod’s disposition. Meanwhile, Joseph and Mary had been withdrawn from the scene of danger (ver 17) connects the mourning of the Bethlehem mothers with Rachel’s weeping, Jer 31 15).

The safety of Mary and her threatened child was provided for by a Divine warning to retire for a time to Egypt (mark the recurring expression, “the young child and his mother” Egypt and —the young child taking the lead, vs Return to 11.13.14.20.21), whither, accordingly, Nazareth they were conducted by Joseph (ver (Mt 2:13-14). The sojourn was not a long one. 15.19-23) Herod’s death brought permission to return, but as Archelaus, Herod’s son (the worst of them), reigned in Judaea in his father’s stead (not king, but “ethnarch”), Joseph was directed to withdraw to Galilee; hence it came about that he and Mary, with the babe, found themselves again in Nazareth, where Luke anew takes up the story (2 39), the thread of which had been broken by the incidents in Mt. Matthew sees in the return from Egypt a refilling of the experiences of Israel (Hos 11 1), and in the settling in Nazareth a connection with the OT prophecies of Christ’s lowly estate (Isa 11 1, nēṣer, “branch”; Zec 3 8; 6 12, etc).

The objections to the credibility of the narratives of the Virgin Birth have already partly been adverted to. (See further the arts. on MARY; THE VIRGIN BIRTH; and the writer’s volume, The Virgin Birth of Christ.)

7. Questions and Objections (1) The Virgin Birth.—The narratives in Mt and Lk are attested by all MSS and VSS genuine parts of their respective Gospels, and as coming to us in their integrity. The narrative of Lk is generally recognized as resting on an Aram. basis, which, from its diction and the primitive character of its conceptions, belongs to the earliest age. While in Luke’s narrative everything is presented from the standpoint of Mary, in Mt it is Joseph who is in the forefront, suggesting that the virgin mother is the source of information in the one case, and Joseph himself in the other. The narratives are complementary, not contradictory. That Mk and Jn do not contain narratives of the Virgin Birth cannot be wondered at, when it is remembered that Mark's Gospel begins of purpose with the Baptism of John, and that the Fourth Gospel aims at setting forth the Divine descent, not the circumstances of the earthly nativity. "The Word became flesh" (Jn 1:14)—everything is already implied in that. Neither can it be objected to that Paul does not in his letters or public preaching base upon so essentially private a fact as the miraculous conception—at a time, too, when Mary probably still lived. With the exception of the narrow sect of the Jewish Ebionites and some of the gnostic sects, the Virgin Birth was universally accepted in the early church.

(2) The genealogies (Mt 1:1-17; Lk 3:23-28).—Difficulty is felt with the genealogies in Mt and Lk (one descending, the other ascending), which, while both professing to trace the descent of Jesus from David and Abraham (Lk from Adam), yet go entirely apart in the pedigree after David. See on this the art. GENEALOGIES OF JESUS CHRIST. A favorite view is that Mt exhibits the legal, Lk the natural descent of Jesus. There is plausibility in the supposition that though, in form, a genealogy of Joseph, Lk's is really the genealogy of Mary. It was not customary, it is true, to make out pedigrees of females, but the case here was clearly exceptional, and the passing of Joseph into the family of his father-in-law Heli would enable the list to be made out in his name. Celsus, in the 2d cent., appears thus to have understood it when he derides the notion that through so lowly a woman as the carpenter's wife, Jesus should trace His lineage up to the first man (Origen, Con. Cel., ii.32; Origen's reply proceeds on the same assumption. Cf art. on "Genealogies" in Kitto, II).

II. The Years of Silence—the Twelfth Year.—

With the exception of one fragment of incident—that of the visit to Jerus and the Temple in His 12th year—the Canonical Gospels are silent as to the history of Jesus from the return to Nazareth (Lk 2:40) till His baptism by John. This long period, which the Apocryphal Gospels crowd with silly fables (see APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS), the inspired records leave to be regarded as being what it was—a period of quiet development of mind and body, of outward uneventfulness, of silent garnering of experience in the midst of the Nazareth surroundings. Jesus "grew, and waxed strong, filled with wisdom; and the grace of God was upon him . . . advanced in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and men" (Lk 2:40-52). The incarnation was a true acceptance of humanity, with all its sinless limitations of growth and development. Not a hint is offered of that omniscience or omnipotence which theology has not infrequently imputed to Jesus even as child and boy. His schooling was probably that of the ordinary village child (He could read, Lk 4:17 ff, and write, Jn 8:6-8); He wrought at the carpenter's bench (cf Mk 6:3; Justin Martyr, following tradition, speaks of Him as making "ploughs and yokes," Dial., 88). His gentleness and grace of character endeared Him to all who knew Him (Lk 2:52). No stain of sin clouded His vision of Divine things. His after-history shows that His mind was nourished on the Scriptures; nor, as He pondered psalms and prophets, could His soul remain unvisited by presentiments, growing to convictions, that He was the One in whom their predictions were destined to be realized.

Every year, as was the custom of the Jews, Joseph and Mary went, with their friends and neighbors, in companies, to Jerus to the Passover. When Jesus was 12 years old, it would seem that, for the first time, He was permitted to accompany them. It would be to Him a strange and thrilling experience. Everything He saw—the hallowed sites, the motley crowd, the service of the temple, the very shocks His moral consciousness would receive from contact with abounding scandals—would intensify His feeling of His own unique relation to the Father. Every relationship was for the time suspended and merged to His thought in this higher one. It was His Father's city whose streets He trod; His Father's house He visited for prayer; His Father's ordinance the crowds were assembled to observe; His Father's name, too, they were dishonoring by their formalism and hypocrisy. It is this exalted mood of the boy Jesus which explains the scene that follows—the only one rescued from oblivion in this interval of growth and preparation. When the time came for the busy caravan to return to Nazareth, Jesus, acting, doubtless, from highest impulse, "tarried behind" (ver 43). In the large company His absence was not at first missed, but when, at the evening halting-place, it became known that He was not with them, His mother and Joseph returned in deep distress to Jerus. Three days elapsed before they found Him in the place where naturally they should have looked first—His Father's house. There, in one of the halls or chambers where the rabbis were wont to teach, they discovered Him seated "in the midst," at the feet of the men of learning, hearing them discourse, asking questions, as pupils were permitted to do, and giving answers which awakened astonishment by their penetration and wisdom (vs 46,47). Those who heard Him may well have thought that before them was one of the great rabbis of the future! Mary, much surprised, asked in remonstrance, "Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us?" evoking from Jesus the memorable reply, "How is it that ye sought me? knew ye not that I must be in my Father's house?" or "about my Father's business?" AV (vs 48,49). Here was the revelation of a self-consciousness that Mary might have been prepared for in Jesus, but perhaps, in the common intercourse of life, was tending to lose sight of. The lesson was not unneeded. Yet, once it had been given, Jesus went back with Joseph and Mary to Nazareth, and "was subject unto them"; and Mary did not forget the teaching of the incident (ver 51).

III. The Forerunner and the Baptism.—Time passed, and when Jesus was nearing His 30th year, Judaea was agitated by the message

1. The Preaching of John (Mt 3:1-12; Mk 1:1-8; Lk 3:1-18) of a stern preacher of righteousness who had appeared in the wilderness by the Jordan, proclaiming the imminent approach of the kingdom of heaven, summoning to repentance, and baptizing those who confessed their sins. Tiberius had succeeded Augustus on the imperial throne;

Judaea, with Samaria, was now a Rom province, under the procurator Pontius Pilate; the rest of Pal was divided between the tetrarchs Herod (Galilee) and Philip (the eastern parts). The Baptist thus appeared at the time when the land had lost the last vestige of self-government, was politically divided, and was in great ecclesiastical confusion. Nurtured in the deserts (Lk 1:80), John's very appearance was a protest against the luxury and self-seeking of the age. He had been a Nazirite from his birth; he fed on the simplest products of nature—locusts and wild honey; his coarse garb of camel's hair and leathern girdle was a return to the dress of Elijah (2 K 1:8), in whose spirit and power he appeared (Lk 1:17) (see JOHN THE BAPTIST).

The coming Christ.—John's preaching of the kingdom was unlike that of any of the revolutionaries of his age. It was a kingdom which could be entered only through moral preparation. It availed nothing for the Jew simply that he was a son of Abraham. The Messiah was at hand. He (John) was but a voice in the wilderness sent to prepare the way for that Greater than himself. The work of the Christ would be one of judgment and of mercy. He would lay the axe at the root of the tree—would winnow the chaff from the wheat—yet would baptize with the Holy Spirit (Mt 3 10-12; Lk 3 15-17). Those who professed acceptance of his message, with its condition of repentance, John baptized with water at the Jordan or in its neighborhood (cf Mt 3 6; Jn 1 28; 3 23).

John's startling words made a profound impression. All classes from every part of the land, including Pharisees and Sadducees

2. Jesus Is Baptized (Mt 3 7), came to his baptism. John was not deceived. He saw how little change of heart underlay it all. The Regenerator had not yet come. But one day there appeared before him one whom he intuitively recognized as different from all the rest—as, indeed, the Christ whose coming it was his to herald. John, up to this time, does not seem to have personally known Jesus (cf Jn 1 31). He must, however, have heard of Him; he had, besides, received a sign by which the Messiah should be recognized (Jn 1 33); and now, when Jesus presented Himself, Divinely pure in aspect, asking baptism at his hands, the conviction was instantaneously flashed on his mind, that this was He. But how should he, a sinful man, baptize this Holy One? “I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?” (Mt 3 14). The question is one which forces itself upon ourselves—How should Jesus seek or receive a “baptism of repentance”? Jesus Himself puts it on the ground of meekness. “Suffer it now; for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness” (ver 15). The Head was content to enter by the same gateway as the members to His specific vocation in the service of the kingdom. In submitting to the baptism, He formally identified Himself with the expectation of the kingdom and with its ethical demands; separated Himself from the evil of His nation, doubtless with confession of its sins; and devoted Himself to His life-task in bringing in the Messianic salvation. The significance of the rite as marking His consecration to, and entrance upon, His Messianic career, is seen in what follows. As He ascended from the water, while still “praying” (Lk 3 21), the heavens were opened, the Spirit of God descended like a dove upon Him, and a voice from heaven declared: “This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased” (Mt 3 16, 17). It is needless to inquire whether anyone besides John (cf Jn 1 33) and Jesus (Mt 3 16; Mk 1 10) received this vision or heard these words; it was for them, not for others, the vision was primarily intended. To Christ's consecration of Himself to His calling, there was now added the spiritual equipment necessary for the doing of His work. He went forward with the seal of the Father's acknowledgment upon Him.

IV. The Temptation.—On the narrative of the baptism in the first three Gospels there follows at once the account of the temptation of Jesus in the wilderness. The psychological naturalness of the incident is generally acknowledged. The baptism of Jesus was a crisis in His experience. He had been plennished by the Spirit for His work; the heavens had been opened to Him, and His mind was agitated by new thoughts and emotions; He was conscious of the possession of new powers. There was need for a period of retirement, of still reflection, of coming to a complete understanding with Himself as to the meaning of the task to which He stood committed, the methods He should employ, the attitude He should take up toward popular hopes and expectations. He would wish to be alone. The Spirit of God led Him (Mt 4 1; Mk 1 12; Lk 4 1) whither His own spirit also impelled. It is with a touch of similar motive that Buddhist legend makes Buddha to be tempted by the evil spirit Mara after he has attained enlightenment.

The scene of the temptation was the wilderness of Judaea. Jesus was there 40 days, during which, it is told, He neither ate nor drank

2. Nature of the Temptation (cf the fasts of Moses and Elijah, Ex 24 18; 34 28; Dt 9 18; 1 K 19 8). Mk adds, “He was with the wild beasts” (ver 13). The period was probably one of intense self-concentration. During the whole of it He endured temptations of Satan (Mk 1 13); but the special assaults came at the end (Mt 4 2 ff; Lk 4 2 ff). We assume here a real tempter and real temptations—the question of diabolic agency being considered after. This, however, does not settle the form of the temptations. The struggle was probably an inward one. It can hardly be supposed that Jesus was literally transported by the devil to a pinnacle of the temple, then to a high mountain, then, presumably, back again to the wilderness. The narrative must have come from Jesus Himself, and embodies an ideal or parabolic element. “The history of the temptation,” Lange says, “Jesus afterwards communicated to His disciples in the form of a real narrative, clothed in symbolical language” (Comm. on Mt, 83, ET).

The stages of the temptation were three—each in its own way a trial of the spirit of obedience.

(1) The first temptation was to distrust. Jesus, after His long fast, was an hungered. He had become conscious also of supernatural powers. The point on which the temptation laid hold was His sense of hunger—the most overmastering of appetites. “If thou art the Son of God, command that these stones become bread.” The design was to excite distrustful and rebellious thoughts, and lead Jesus to use the powers entrusted to Him in an unlawful way, for private and selfish ends. The temptation was promptly met by a quotation from Scripture: “Man shall not live by bread alone,” etc (Mt 4 4; Lk 4 4; cf Dt 8 3). If Jesus was in this position, it was His Father who had brought Him there for purposes of trial. Man has a higher life than can be sustained on bread; a life, found in depending on God's word, and obeying it at whatever cost.

(2) The second temptation (in Lk the third) was to presumption. Jesus is borne in spirit (cf Ezk 40 1, 2) to a pinnacle of the temple. From this dizzy elevation He is invited to cast Himself down, relying on the Divine promise: “He shall give His angels charge over thee,” etc (cf Ps 91 11, 12). In this way an easy demonstration of His Messiahship would be given to the crowds below. The temptation was to overstep those bounds of humility and dependence which were imposed on Him as Son; to play with signs and wonders in His work as Messiah. But again the tempter is foiled by the word: “Thou shalt not make trial of [try experiments with, propose tests, put to the proof] the Lord thy God” (Mt 4 7; Lk 4 12; cf Dt 6 16).

(3) The third temptation (Lk's second) was to worldly sovereignty, gained by some small concession to Satan. From some lofty elevation—no place on a geographical map—the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them are flashed before Christ's mind, and all are offered to Him on condition of one little act of homage to the tempter. It was the temptation to choose the easier path by some slight pandering to falsehood, and Jesus definitely repelled it by the saying: “Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve” (Mt 4 10; Lk 4 8). Jesus had chosen His path. The Father's way of the cross would be adhered to.

tion typify the whole round of Satanic assault on man through body, mind, and spirit (Lk 4 13; cf 1 Jn 2 16), and the whole round of Messianic temptation. Jesus was constantly being tempted (a) to spare Himself; (b) to gratify the Jewish sign-seekers; (c) to gain power by sacrifice of the right. In principle the victory was gained over all at the commencement. His way was henceforth clear.

B. THE EARLY JUDEAN MINISTRY

1. The Testimonies of the Baptist.—While the Synoptics pass immediately from the temptation of Jesus to the ministry in Galilee after the imprisonment of the Baptist (Mt Synoptics 4 12; Mk 1 14.15; Lk 4 14), the Fourth Gospel furnishes the account, full of interest, of the earlier ministry of Jesus in Judaea while the Baptist was still at liberty.

The Baptist had announced Christ's coming; had baptized Him when He appeared; it was now his privilege to testify to Him as having Threefold come, and to introduce to Jesus His Witness of first disciples.

the Baptist John's work had assumed proportions which made it impossible for the ecclesiastical authorities any longer to ignore it (cf Lk 3 15). A deputation consisting of priests and Levites was accordingly sent to John, where he was baptizing at Bethany beyond Jordan, to put to him categorical questions about his mission. Who

a) First Testimony was he? And by what authority did —Jesus and he baptize? Was he the Christ? or Popular Elijah? or the expected prophet? (cf 6

Messianic Expectation 14; 7 4; Mt 16 14). To these questions John gave distinct and straight-(vs 19-28) forward replies. He was not the Christ, not Elijah, not the prophet. His answers grow briefer every time, "I am not the Christ"; "I am not"; "No." Who was he then? The answer was emphatic. He was but a "voice" (cf

Isa 40 3)—a preparer of the way of the Lord. In their midst already stood One—not necessarily in the crowd at that moment—with whose greatness his was not to be compared (vs 26.27). John utterly effaces himself before Christ.

The day after the interview with the Jerus deputies, John saw Jesus coming to him—probably fresh from the temptation—and bore a b) Second Testimony second and wonderful testimony to His Messiahship. Identifying Jesus with the subject of his former testimonies, and stating the ground of his knowledge in the sign God had given him

—Christ and the Sin (vs 30-34), he said, "Behold, the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world" (ver 29). The words are

World (vs 29-34) rich in suggestion regarding the character of Jesus, and the nature, universality and efficacy of His work (cf 1 Jn 3 5). The "Lamb" may point specifically to the description of the vicariously

Suffering Servant of Jeh in Isa 53 11.

The third testimony was borne "again on the morrow," when John was standing with two of his disciples (one Andrew, ver 40, the other doubtless the evangelist himself).

c) Third Testimony Pointing to Jesus, the Baptist repeated his former words, "Behold, the Lamb of God." While the words are the same, the design was different. In the first "behold" the idea is the recognition of Christ; in the second there is a call to duty—a hint to follow Jesus.

—Christ and the Duty of the Disciple (vs 35-37) On this hint the disciples immediately acted (ver 37). It is next to be seen how this earliest "following" of Jesus grew.

II. The First Disciples.—John's narrative shows that Jesus gathered His disciples, less by a series of distinct calls, than by a process of

1. Spiritual spiritual accretion. Men were led to

Accretion Him, then accepted by Him. This (Jn 1: 37-51) process of selection left Jesus at the close of the second day with five real and true followers. The history con-futes the idea that it was first toward the close of His ministry that Jesus became known to His disciples as the Messiah. In all the Gospels it was as the Christ that the Baptist introduced Jesus; it was as the Christ that the first disciples accepted and confessed Him (vs 41.45.49).

The first of the group were Andrew and John—the unnamed disciple of ver 40. These followed Jesus in consequence of their Master's

a) Andrew testimony. It was, however, the few hours' converse they had with Jesus Discipleship in His own abode that actually decided as the Fruit them. To Christ's question, "What of Spiritual seek ye?" their answer was practically

Converse "Thyself." "The mention of the time (vs 37-40) —the 10th hour, i.e. 10 AM—is one of the small traits that mark St. John.

He is here looking back on the date of his own spiritual birth" (Westcott).

John and Andrew had no sooner found Christ for themselves ("We have found the Messiah," ver 41) than they hastened to tell others of their discovery. Andrew at once

b) Simon sought out Simon, his brother, and

Discipleship brought him to Jesus; so, later, Philip

a Result of sought Nathanael (ver 45). Christ's

Personal unerring eye read at once the quality

Testimony of the man whom Andrew introduced to Him. "Thou art Simon the son of (vs 41.42) John: thou shalt be called Cephas"—

"Rock" or "Stone" (ver 42). Mt 16 18, therefore, is not the original bestowal of this name, but the confirmation of it. The name is the equivalent of "Peter" (Pétros), and was given to Simon, not with any official connotation, but because of the strength and clearness of his convictions. His general steadfastness is not disproved by His one unhappy failure. (Was it thus the apostle acquired the name "Peter"?)

The fourth disciple, Philip, was called by Jesus Himself, when about to depart for Galilee (ver 43). Friendship may have had its influence

c) Philip— on Philip (like the foregoing, he also the Result was from Bethsaida of Galilee, ver 44), of Scriptural but that which chiefly decided him was

Evidence the correspondence of what he found

(vs 43.44) in Jesus with the prophetic testimonies (ver 45).

Philip sought Nathanael (of Cana of Galilee, 21 2)—the same probably as Bartholomew the Apostle —and told him he had found Him of

d) Nathan- whom Moses in the law and the prophael—Disci- ets had written (ver 45). Nathanael

pleship an doubted, on the ground that the Mes-

Effect of siah was not likely to have His origin

Heart- in an obscure place like Nazareth (ver

Searching 46; cf 7 52). Philip's wise answer

Power was, "Come and see"; and when Na-

(vs 45-51) thanael came, the Lord met him with a word which speedily rid him of his hesitations. First, Jesus attested His seeker's sincerity ("Behold, an Israelite indeed," etc, ver 47); then, on Nathanael expressing surprise, revealed to him His knowledge of a recent secret act of meditation or devotion ("when thou wast under the fig tree," etc, ver 48). The sign was sufficient to convince Nathanael that he was in the presence of a superhuman, nay a Divine, Being, therefore, the Christ—"Son of God . . . King of Israel" (ver 49). Jesus met his faith with further self-disclosure. Nathanael had believed on comparatively slight evidence; he would see greater things: heavens opened, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man (ver 51). The allusion is to Jacob's vision (Gen 28 10-22)—a Scripture which had possibly been the theme of Philip's meditation in his privacy. Jesus puts Himself in place of that mystic ladder as the medium of reopened communication between heaven and earth.

The name "Son of Man"—a favorite designation of Jesus for Himself—appears here for the first time in the Gospels. It is disputed whether it was a current Messianic title (see SON OF MAN), but at least it had this force on the lips of Jesus Himself, denoting Him as the possessor of a true humanity, and as standing in a representative relation to mankind universally. It is probably borrowed from Dnl 7 13 and appears in the Book of En (see APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE). The higher title, "Son of God," given to Jesus by Nathanael, could not, of course, as yet carry with it the transcendental associations of John's Prologue (1 1.14.18), but it evidently conveyed an idea of superhuman dignity and unique relation to God, such as the better class of minds would seem to have attributed to the Messiah (cf Jn 5 18; 10 33 ff; Mt 26 63).

2. "Son of Man" and "Son of God"

III. The First Events.—An interval of a few weeks is occupied by a visit of Jesus to Cana of Galilee (Jn 2 1 ff) and a brief sojourn in Capernaum (ver 12); after which Jesus returned to Jerus to the Passover as the most appropriate place for His public manifestation of Himself as Messiah (vs 13 ff). The notes of time in Jn suggest that the Passover (beginning of April, 27 AD) took place about three months after the baptism by John (cf 1 43; 2 1.12).

Prior to His public manifestation, a more private unfolding of Christ's glory was granted to the disciples at the marriage feast of Cana of

1. The First Galilee (cf ver 11). The marriage was doubtless that of some relative of the (Jn 2:1-11) family, and the presence of Jesus at the feast, with His mother, brethren and disciples (as Joseph no more appears, it may be concluded that he was dead), is significant as showing that His religion is not one of antagonism to natural relations. The marriage festivities lasted seven days, and toward the close the wine provided for the guests gave out. Mary interposed with an indirect suggestion that Jesus might supply the want. Christ's reply, lit. "Woman, what is that to thee and to me?" (ver 4), is not intended to convey the least tinge of reproof (cf Westcott, in loc), but intimates to Mary that His actions were henceforth to be guided by a rule other than hers (cf Lk 2 51). This, however, as Mary saw (ver 5), did not preclude an answer to her desire. Six waterpots of stone stood near, and Jesus ordered these to be filled with water (the quantity was large; about 50 gallons); then when the water was drawn off it was found changed into a nobler element—a wine purer and better than could have been obtained from any natural vintage. The ruler of the feast, in ignorance of its origin, expressed surprise at its quality (ver 10). The miracle was symbolical—a "sign" (ver 11)—and may be contrasted with the first miracle of Moses—turning the water into blood (Ex 7 20). It points to the contrast between the old dispensation and the new, and to the work of Christ as a transforming, enriching and glorifying of the natural, through Divine grace and power.

After a brief stay at Capernaum (ver 12), Jesus went up to Jerus to keep the Passover. There it was His design formally to manifest Himself. Other "signs" He wrought at the feast, leading many to believe on Him—not, however, with a deep or enduring faith (vs 23-25)—but the special act by which He signalized His appearance was His public cleansing of the temple from the irreligious trafficking with which it had come to be associated.

A like incident is related by the Synoptics at the close of Christ's ministry (Mt 21 12.13; Mk 11 15-18; Lk 19 45.46), and it is a question whether the act was actually repeated, or whether the other evangelists, who do not narrate the events of the early ministry, simply record it out of its chronological order. In any case, the act was a fitting inauguration of the Lord's work. A regular market was held in the outer court of the temple. Here the animals needed for sacrifice could be purchased, foreign money exchanged, and the doves, which were the offerings of the poor, be obtained. It was a busy, tumultuous, noisy and unholy scene, and the "zeal" of Jesus burned within Him—had doubtless often done so before—as He witnessed it. Arming Himself with a scourge of cords, less as a weapon of offence, than as a symbol of authority, He descended with resistless energy upon the wrangling throng, drove out the dealers and the cattle, overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and commanded the doves to be taken away. Let them not profane His Father's house (Jn 2 14-16). No one seems to have opposed. All felt that a prophet was among them, and could not resist the overpowering authority with which He spake and acted. By and by, when their courage revived, they asked Him for a "sign" in evidence of His right to do such things. Jesus gave them no sign such as they demanded, but uttered an enigmatic word, and left them to reflect on it, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up" (ver 19). The authenticity of the saying is sufficiently vouched for by the perverted use made of it at Christ's trial (Mt 26 61 ff). It is a word based on the foresight which Christ had that the conflict now commencing was to end in His rejection and death. "The true way to destroy the Temple, in the eyes of Jesus, was to slay the Messiah. . . . If it is in the person of the Messiah that the Temple is laid in ruins, it is in His person it shall be raised again" (Godet). The disciples, after the resurrection, saw the meaning of the word (Jn 2 22).

2. The First Passover, and Cleansing of the Temple (vs 13-25)

As a sequel to these stirring events Jesus had a nocturnal visitor in the person of Nicodemus—a Pharisee, a ruler of the Jews, a "teacher of Israel" (ver 10), apparently no longer young (ver 4). His coming by night argues, besides some fear of man, a constitutional timidity of disposition (cf 19 39); but the interesting thing is that he did come, showing that he had been really impressed by Christ's words and works. One recognizes in him a man of candor and uprightness of spirit, yet without adequate apprehensions of Christ Himself, and of the nature of Christ's kingdom. Jesus he was prepared to acknowledge as a Divinely commissioned teacher—one whose mission was accredited by miracle (ver 2). He was interested in the kingdom, but, as a morally living man, had no doubt of his fitness to enter into it. Jesus had but to teach and he would understand.

3. The Visitor of Israel (ver 10), apparently no longer young (ver 4). His coming by night argues, besides some fear of man, a constitutional timidity of disposition (cf 19 39); but the interesting thing is that he did come, showing that he had been really impressed by Christ's words and works. One recognizes in him a man of candor and uprightness of spirit, yet without adequate apprehensions of Christ Himself, and of the nature of Christ's kingdom. Jesus he was prepared to acknowledge as a Divinely commissioned teacher—one whose mission was accredited by miracle (ver 2). He was interested in the kingdom, but, as a morally living man, had no doubt of his fitness to enter into it. Jesus had but to teach and he would understand.

(1) The new birth.—Jesus in His reply laid His finger at once on the defective point in His visitor's relation to Himself and to His kingdom: "Except one be born anew, he cannot see the kingdom of God" (ver 3); "Except one be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God" (ver 5). Nicodemus was staggered at this demand for a spiritual new birth. There is reason to believe that proselytes were baptized on being received into the Jewish church, and their baptism was called a "new birth." Nicodemus would therefore be familiar with the expression, but could not see that it had any applicability to him. Jesus teaches him, on the other hand, that he also needs a new birth, and this, not through water only, but through the Spirit. The change was mysterious, yet plainly manifest in its effects (vs 7.8). If Nicodemus did not understand these "earthly things"—the evidence of which lay all around him—how should he understand "heavenly things," the things pertaining to salvation?

(2) "Heavenly things."—These "heavenly things" Jesus now proceeds to unfold to Nicodemus: "As Moses lifted up the serpent," etc (ver 14). The "lifting up" is a prophecy of the cross (cf 12 32-34). The brazen serpent is the symbol of sin conquered and destroyed by the death of Christ. What follows in 3 16-21 is probably the evangelist's expansion of this theme—God's love the source of salvation (ver 16), God's purpose not the world's condemnation, but its salvation (vs 17.18) the self-judgment of sin (vs 19 ff).

Retiring from Jerus, Jesus commenced a ministry in Judaea (ver 22). It lasted apparently about 6 months. The earlier Gospels pass over it. This is accounted for by the fact that the ministry in Judaea was still preparatory. Jesus had publicly asserted His Messianic authority. A little space is now allowed to test the result.

4. Jesus and John (Jn 3:22-36) asserted His Messianic authority. A little space is now allowed to test the result.

Meanwhile Jesus descends again to the work of prophetic preparation. His ministry at this stage is hardly distinguishable from John's. He summons to the baptism of repentance. His disciples, not Himself, administer the rite (3 23; 4 2); hence the sort of rivalry that sprang up between His baptism and that of the forerunner (3 22-26). John was baptizing at the time at Aenon, on the western side of the Jordan; Jesus somewhere in the neighborhood. Soon the greater teacher began to eclipse the less. "All men came to Him" (ver 26). John's reply showed how pure his mind was from the narrow, grudging spirit which characterized his followers. To him it was no grievance, but the fulfilment of his joy, that men should be flocking to Jesus. He was not the Bridegroom, but the friend of the Bridegroom. They themselves had heard him testify, "I am not the Christ." It lay in the nature of things that Jesus must increase; he must decrease (vs 27-30). Explanatory words follow (vs 31-36).

IV. Journey to Galilee—the Woman of Samaria.—Toward the close of this Judean ministry the Baptist appears to have been cast into prison for his faithfulness in reproving Herod Antipas for taking his brother Philip's wife (cf Jn 3 24; Mt 14 3-5)). It seems most natural to connect the departure to Galilee in Jn 4 3 with that narrated in Mt 3 13, though some think the imprisonment of the Baptist did not take place till later. The motive which Jn gives was the hostility of the Pharisees, but it was the imprisonment of the Baptist which led Jesus to commence, at the time He did, an independent ministry. The direct road to Galilee lay through Samaria; hence the memorable encounter with the woman at that place.

Jesus, being wearied, paused to rest Himself at Jacob's well, near a town called Sychar, now 'Askar. It was about the sixth hour—or 6 o'clock in the evening. The time of year is determined by ver 35 to be "four months" before harvest, i.e. December (there is no reason for not taking this literally). It suits the evening hour that the woman of Samaria came out to draw water. (Some, on a different reckoning, take the hour to be noon.) Jesus opened the conversation by asking from the woman a draught from her pitcher. The proverbial hatred between Jews and Samaritans filled the woman with surprise that Jesus should thus address Himself to her. Still greater was her surprise when, as the conversation proceeded, Jesus announced Himself as the giver of a water of which, if a man drank, he should never thirst again (vs 13.14). Only gradually did His meaning penetrate her mind, "Sir, give me this water," etc (ver 15). The request of Jesus that she would call her husband led to the discovery that Jesus knew all the secrets of her life. She was before a prophet (ver 19). As in the case of Nathanael, the heart-searching power of Christ's word convinced her of His Divine claim.

The conversation next turned upon the right place of worship. The Samaritans had a temple of their own on Mount Gerizim; the Jews, on the other hand, held to the exclusive validity of the temple at Jerus. Which was right? Jesus in His reply, while pronouncing for the Jews as the custodians of God's salvation (ver 22), makes it plain that distinction of places is no longer a matter of any practical importance. A change was imminent which would substitute a universal religion for one of special times and places (ver 20). He enunciates the great principle of the new dispensation that God is a Spirit, and they who worship Him must do so in spirit and in truth. Finally, when she spoke of the Messiah, Jesus made Himself definitely known to her as the Christ. To this poor Samaritan woman, with her receptive heart, He unveils Himself more plainly than He had done to priests and rulers (ver 26).

3. The True Worship The woman went home and became an evangelist to her people, with notable results (vs 28.39). Jesus abode with them two days and confirmed the impression made by her testimony (vs 40-42). Meanwhile, He impressed on His disciples the need of earnest sowing and reaping in the service of the Kingdom, assuring them of unfailing reward for both sower and reaper (vs 35-38). He Himself was their Great Example (ver 34).

4. Work and Its Reward The woman went home and became an evangelist to her people, with notable results (vs 28.39). Jesus abode with them two days and confirmed the impression made by her testimony (vs 40-42). Meanwhile, He impressed on His disciples the need of earnest sowing and reaping in the service of the Kingdom, assuring them of unfailing reward for both sower and reaper (vs 35-38). He Himself was their Great Example (ver 34).

C. THE GALILEAN MINISTRY AND VISITS TO THE FEASTS

Galilee was divided into upper Galilee and lower Galilee. It has already been remarked that upper Galilee was inhabited by a mixed population—hence called "Galilee of the Gentiles" (Mt 4 15). The highroads of commerce ran through it. It was "the way of the sea" (AV)—a scene of constant traffic. The people were rude, ignorant, and superstitious, and were densely crowded together in towns and villages. About 160 BC there were only a few Jews in the midst of a large heathen population; but by the time of Christ the Jewish element had greatly increased. The busiest portion of this busy district was round the Sea of Galilee, at the N.E. corner of which stood Capernaum—wealthy and cosmopolitan. In Nazareth, indeed, Jesus met with a disappointing reception (Lk 4 16-30; Mt 13 54-57; cf Jn 4 43-45); yet in Galilee generally He found a freer spirit and greater receptiveness than among the stricter traditionalists of Judaea.

1. The Scene It has already been remarked that upper Galilee was inhabited by a mixed population—hence called "Galilee of the Gentiles" (Mt 4 15). The highroads of commerce ran through it. It was "the way of the sea" (AV)—a scene of constant traffic. The people were rude, ignorant, and superstitious, and were densely crowded together in towns and villages. About 160 BC there were only a few Jews in the midst of a large heathen population; but by the time of Christ the Jewish element had greatly increased. The busiest portion of this busy district was round the Sea of Galilee, at the N.E. corner of which stood Capernaum—wealthy and cosmopolitan. In Nazareth, indeed, Jesus met with a disappointing reception (Lk 4 16-30; Mt 13 54-57; cf Jn 4 43-45); yet in Galilee generally He found a freer spirit and greater receptiveness than among the stricter traditionalists of Judaea.

It is assumed here that Jesus returned to Galilee in December, 27 AD, and that His ministry there lasted till late in 29 AD (see "Chronology" above).

2. The Time On the two years' scheme of the public ministry, the Passover of Jn 6 4 has to be taken as the second in Christ's ministry—therefore as occurring at an interval of only 3 or 4 months after the return. This seems impossible in view of the crowding of events it involves in so short a time—opening incidents, stay in Capernaum (Mt 4 13), three circuits in "all Galilee" (Mt 4 23-25 ||; Lk 8 1-4; Mt 9 35-38; Mk 6 6), lesser journeys and excursions (Sermon on Mount: Gadara); and the dislocations it necessitates, e.g. the plucking of ears of corn (about Passover time) must be placed after the feeding of the 5,000, etc. It is simpler to adhere to the three years' scheme.

A division of the Galilean ministry may then fitly be made into two periods—one preceding, the other succeeding the Mission of the Twelve in Mt 10 ||. One reason for this division is that after the Mission of the Twelve the order of events is the same in the first three evangelists till the final departure from Galilee.

First Period—From the Beginning of the Ministry in Galilee till the Mission of the Twelve

I. Opening Incidents.—From sympathetic Samaria (Jn 4 39), Jesus had journeyed to unsympathetic Galilee, and first to Cana, where His first miracle had been of Noble-wrought. The reports of His miracles man's Son in Judaea had come before Him (ver (Jn 4:43-54) 45), and it was mainly His reputation as a miracle-worker which led a nobleman—a courtier or officer at Herod's court—to seek Him at Cana on behalf of his son, who was near to death. Jesus rebuked the sign-seeking spirit (ver 48), but, on the fervent appeal being repeated, He bade the nobleman go his way: his son lived. The man's prayer had been, "Come down"; but he had faith to receive the word of Jesus (ver 50), and on his way home received tidings of his son's recovery. The nobleman, with his whole household, was won for Jesus (ver 53). This is noted as the second of Christ's Galilean miracles (ver 54).

A very different reception awaited Him at Nazareth, "His own country," to which He next came. We can scarcely take the incident recorded in Lk 4 16-30 to be the same as that Visit to in Mt 13 54-58, though Matthew's Nazareth habit of grouping makes this not impossible. The Sabbath had come, and Lk 4:16-30) on His entering the synagogue, as was His wont, the repute He had won led to His being asked to read. The Scripture He selected (or which came in the order of the day) was Isa 61 1 ff (the fact that Jesus was able to read from the synagogue-roll is interesting as bearing on His knowledge of Heb), and from this He proceeded to amaze His hearers by declaring that this Scripture was now fulfilled in their ears (ver 21). The "words of grace" he uttered are not given, but it can be understood that, following the prophet's guidance, He would hold Himself forth as the predicted "Servant of Jehovah," sent to bring salvation to the poor, the bound, the broken-hearted, and for this purpose endowed with the fulness of the Spirit. The idea of the passage in Isa is that of the year of jubilee, when debts were canceled, inheritances restored, and slaves set free, and Jesus told them He had come to inaugurate that "acceptable year of the Lord." At first He was listened to with admiration, then, as the magnitude of the claims He was making became apparent to His audience, a very different spirit took possession of them. "Who was this that spoke thus?" "Was it not Joseph's son?" (ver 22). They were disappointed, too, that Jesus showed no disposition to gratify them by working before them any of the miracles of which they had heard so much (ver 23). Jesus saw the gathering storm, but met it resolutely. He told His hearers He had not expected any better reception, and in reply to their reproach that He had wrought miracles elsewhere, but had wrought none among them, quoted examples of prophets who had done the same thing (Elijah, Elisha, vs 24-28). This completed the exasperation of the Nazarenes, who, springing forward, dragged Him to the brow of the hill on which their city was built, and would have thrown Him down, had something in the aspect of Jesus not restrained them. With one of those looks we read of occasionally in the Gospels, He seems to have overawed His townsmen, and, passing in safety through their midst, left the place (vs 28-30).

After leaving Nazareth Jesus made His way to Capernaum (probably Tell Hum), which thereafter seems to have been His headquarters. He "dwelt" there (Mt 4 13). It is called in Mt 9 1, "his own city." Before teaching in Capernaum itself, however, He appears to have opened His ministry by evangelizing along the shores of the Sea of Galilee (Mt 4 18; Mk 1 16; Lk 5 1), and there, at Bethsaida (on topographical questions, see special arts.), He took His first step in gathering His chosen disciples more closely around Him.

Hitherto, though attached to His person and cause, the pairs of fisher brothers, Simon and Andrew, James and John—these last the "sons of Zebedee"—had not been in constant attendance upon Him. Since the return from Jerus, they had gone back to their ordinary avocations. The four were "partners" (Lk 5 10). They had "hired servants" (Mk 1 20); therefore were moderately well off. The time had now come when they were to leave "all," and follow Jesus entirely.

Luke alone records the striking miracle which led to the call. Jesus had been teaching the multitude from a boat borrowed from Simon, and now at the close He bade Simon put out into the deep, and let down his nets. Peter told Jesus they had toiled all night in vain, but he would obey His word. The result was an immense draught of fishes, so that the nets were breaking, and the other company had to be called upon for help. Both boats were filled and in danger of sinking. Peter's cry in so wonderful a presence was, "Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord."

The miracle gave Jesus opportunity for the word He wished to speak. It is here that Mt and Mk take up the story. The boats had b) "Fishers been brought to shore when, first to of Men" Simon and Andrew, afterward to James and John (engaged in "mending their nets," Mt 4 21; Mk 1 19), the call was given: "Come ye after me, and I will make you fishers of men." At once, all was left—boats, nets, friends—and they followed Him. Their experience taught them to have large expectations from Christ.

Jesus is now found in Capernaum. An early Sabbath—perhaps the first of His stated residence in the city—was marked by notable events. The Sabbath found Jesus as usual (Mt 4:13; in the synagogue—now as teacher. Lk 4:31) The manner of His teaching is specially noticed: "He taught them as having authority, and not as the scribes" (Mk 1 22). The scribes gave forth nothing of their own. They but repeated the dicta of the great authorities of the past. It was a surprise to the people to find in Jesus One whose wisdom, like waters from a clear fountain, came fresh and sparkling from His own lips. The authority also with which Jesus spoke commanded attention. He sought support in the opinion of no others, but gave forth His statements with firmness, decision, dignity and emphasis.

While Jesus was teaching an extraordinary incident occurred. A man in the assembly, described as possessed by "an unclean spirit" (Mk 1 23; Lk 4 33), broke forth in cries, addressing Jesus by name ("Jesus, thou Nazarene"), speaking of Him as "the Holy One of God," and asking "What have we to do with thee? Art thou come to destroy us?" The diseased consciousness of the sufferer bore a truer testimony to Christ's dignity, holiness and power than most of those present could have given, and instinctively, but truly, construed His coming as meaning destruction to the empire of the demons. At Christ's word, after a terrible paroxysm, from which, however, the man escaped unhurt (Lk 4 35), the demon was cast out. More than ever the people were "amazed" at the word which had such power (Mk 1 27).

a) Christ's Teaching (Mk 1:22. 27; Lk 4:32) b) The Demoniac in the Synagogue (Mk 1:23-27; Lk 4:33-37)

Demon-possession—its reality.—This is the place to say a word on this terrible form of malady—demon-possession—met with so often in the Gospels. Was it a reality? or a hallucination? Did Jesus believe in it? It is difficult to read the Gospels, and not answer the last question in the affirmative. Was Jesus, then, mistaken? This also it is hard to believe. If there is one subject on which Jesus might be expected to have clear vision—on which we might trust His insight—it was His relation to the spiritual world with which He stood in so close rapport. Was He likely then to be mistaken when He spoke so earnestly, so profoundly, so frequently, of its hidden forces of evil? There is in itself no improbability—rather analogy suggests the highest probability—of realms of spiritual existence outside our sensible ken. That evil should enter this spiritual world, and that human life should be deeply implicated with that evil—that its forces should have a mind and will organizing and directing them—are not beliefs to be dismissed with scorn. The presence of such beliefs in the time of Christ is commonly attributed to Bab, Pers or other foreign influences. It may be questioned, however, whether the main cause was not something far more real—an actual and permitted "hour and the power of darkness" (Lk 22 53) in the kingdom of evil, discovering itself in manifestations in the bodies and souls of men, that could be traced only to a supernatural cause (see DEMONIC POSSESSION). (The present writer discusses the subject in an art. in the Sunday School Times for June 4, 1910. It would be presumptuous even to say that the instance in the Gospels have no modern parallels. See a striking paper in Good Words, edited by Dr. Norman MacLeod, for 1867, on "The English Demoniac.") It should be noted that all diseases are not, as is sometimes affirmed, traced to demonic influence. The distinction between other diseases and demonic possession is clearly maintained (cf Mt 4 24; 10 1; 11 5, etc.). Insanity, epilepsy, blindness, dumbness, etc. were frequent accompaniments of possession, but they are not identified with it.

Jesus, on leaving the synagogue, entered the house of Peter. In Mk it is called "the house of Simon and Andrew" (1 29). Peter was married (cf 1 Cor 9 5), and apparently his mother-in-law and brother lived with him in Capernaum. It was an anxious time in the household, for the mother-in-law lay "sick of a fever"—"a great fever," as Luke the physician calls it. Taking her by the hand, Jesus rebuked the fever, which instantaneously left her. The miracle, indeed, was a double one, for not only was the fever stayed, but strength was at once restored. "She rose up and ministered unto them" (Lk 4 39).

The day's labors were not yet done; were, indeed, scarce begun. The news of what had taken place quickly spread, and soon the extraordinary spectacle was presented of 'the whole city' gathered at the door of the dwelling, bringing their sick of every kind to be healed. Demoniacs were there, crying and being rebuked, but multitudes of others as well. The Lord's compassion was unbounded. He rejected none. He labored unweariedly till every one was healed. His sympathy was individual: "He laid his hands on every one of them" (Lk 4 40).

II. From First Galilean Circuit till Choice of the Apostles.—The chronological order in this section is to be sought in Mk and Lk;

1. The First Circuit (Mk 1:35-45; Lk 4:42-44; cf Mt 4:23-25) The morning after that eventful Sabbath evening in Capernaum, Jesus took steps for a systematic visitation of the towns and villages of Galilee. The task He set before Himself was prepared for by early, prolonged, solitary prayer (Mk 1 35; many instances show that Christ's life was steeped in prayer). His disciples followed Him, and reported that the multitudes sought Him. Jesus intimated to them His intention of passing to the next towns, and forthwith commenced a tour of preaching and healing "throughout all Galilee." Even if the expression "all Galilee" is used with some latitude, it indicates a work of very extensive compass. It was a work likewise methodically conducted (cf Mk 6 6: "went round about the villages," lit. "in a circle"). Galilee at this time was extraordinarily populous (cf Jos, BJ, III, iii, 2), and the time occupied by the circuit must have been considerable. Mt's condensed picture (4 23-25) shows that Christ's activity during this period was incredibly great. He stirred the province to its depths. His preaching and miracles drew enormous crowds after Him. This tide of popularity afterward turned, but much of the seed sown may have produced fruit at a later day.

The one incident recorded which seems to have belonged to this tour was a sufficiently typical one. While Jesus was in a certain city a man "full of leprosy" (Lk 5 12) came and threw himself down before Him, seeking to be healed. The man did not even ask Jesus to heal him, but expressed his faith, "If thou wilt, thou canst make me clean." The man's apparent want of importunity was the very essence of his importunity. Jesus, moved by his earnestness, touched him, and the man was made whole on the spot. The leper was enjoined to keep silence—Jesus did not wish to pass for a mere miracle-worker—and bade the man show himself to the priests and offer the appointed sacrifices (note Christ's respect for the legal institutions). The leper failed to keep Christ's charge, and published his cure abroad, no doubt much to his own spiritual detriment, and also to the hindrance of Christ's work (Mk 1 45).

His circuit ended, Jesus returned to Capernaum (Mk 2 1; lit. "after days"). Here again His fame at once drew multitudes to see and hear Him. Among them were now persons of more unfriendly spirit. Pharisees and doctors, learning of the new rabbi, had come out of "every village of Galilee and Judaea and Jerusalem" (Lk 5 17), to hear and judge of Him for themselves. The chief incidents of this visit are the two now to be noted.

In a chamber crowded till there was no standing room, even round the door, Jesus wrought the cure upon the paralytic man. The scene was a dramatic one. From Christ's words "son," lit. "child" (Mk 2 5), we infer that the paralytic was young, but his disablement seems to have been complete. It was no easy matter, with the doorways blocked, to get the man brought to Jesus, but his four bearers (ver 3) were not easily daunted. They climbed the flat roof, and, removing part of the covering above where Jesus was, let down the man into the midst. Jesus, pleased with the inventiveness and perseverance of their faith, responded to their wish. But, first, that the spiritual and temporal might be set in their right relations, and the attitude of His hearers be tested, He spoke the higher words: "Son, thy sins are forgiven" (ver 5). At once the temper of the scribes was revealed. Here was manifest evasion. Anyone could say, "Thy sins are forgiven." Worse, it was blasphemy, for "who can forgive sins but one, even God?" (ver 7). Unconsciously they were conceding to Christ the Divine dignity He claimed. Jesus perceives at once the thoughts of the cavilers, and proceeds to expose their malice. Accepting their own test, He proves His right to say, "Thy sins are forgiven," by now saying to the palsied man, "Take up thy bed and walk" (vs 9.11). At once the man arose, took his bed, and went forth whole. The multitude were "amazed" and "glorified God" (ver 12).

The call of Matthew apparently took place shortly after the cure of the paralytic man. The feast was possibly later (cf the connection with the appeal of Jairus, Mt 9 18), but the call and the feast are best taken together, as they are in all the three narratives.

b) Call and Feast of Matthew (Mt 9:9-13; Mk 2:13-17; Lk 5:27-32) (1) The call.—Matthew is called "Levi" by Luke, and "Levi, the son of Alphaeus" by Mark. By occupation he was a "publican" (Lk 5 27), collector of custom-dues in Capernaum, an important center of traffic. There is no reason to suppose that Matthew was not a man of thorough uprightness, though naturally the class to which he belonged was held in great odium by the Jews. Passing the place of toll on His way to or from the lake-side, Jesus called Matthew to follow Him. The publican must by this time have seen and heard much of Jesus, and could not but keenly feel His grace in calling one whom men despised. Without an instant's delay, he left all, and followed Jesus. From publican, Matthew became apostle, then evangelist.

(2) The feast.—Then, or after, in the joy of his heart, Matthew made a feast for Jesus. To this feast he invited many of his own class—"publicans and sinners" (Mt 9 10). Scribes and Pharisees were loud in their remonstrances to the disciples at what seemed to them an outrage on all propriety. Narrow hearts cannot understand the breadth of grace. Christ's reply was conclusive: "They that are whole have no need of a physician, but they that are sick," etc (Mk 2 17, etc).

(3) Fasting and joy.—Another line of objection was encountered from disciples of the Baptist. They, like the Pharisees, "fasted oft" (Mt 9 14), and they took exception to the unconstrained way in which Jesus and His disciples entered into social life. Jesus defends His disciples by adopting a metaphor of John's own (Jn 3 29), and speaking of Himself as the heavenly bridegroom (Mk 2 19). Joy was natural while the bridegroom was with them; then, with a sad forecast of the end, He alludes to days of mourning when the bridegroom should be taken away (ver 20). A deeper answer follows. The spirit of His gospel is a free, spontaneous, joyful spirit, and cannot be confined within the old forms. To attempt to confine His religion within the outworn forms of Judaism would be like putting a patch of undressed cloth on an old garment, or pouring new wine into old wine-skins. The garment would be rent; the wine-skins would burst (vs 21.22 ||). The new spirit must make forms of its own.

At this point is probably to be introduced the visit to Jerus to attend "a feast," or, according to another reading, "the feast" of the Jews, recorded in Jn 5. The feast may, if the article is admitted, have been the Passover (April), though in that case one would expect it to be named; it may have been Purim (March), only this is not a feast Jesus might be thought eager to attend; it may even have been Pentecost (June). In this last case it would succeed the Sabbath controversies to be mentioned later. Fortunately, the determination of the actual feast has little bearing on the teaching of the chapter.

Bethesda ("house of mercy") was the name given to a pool, fed by an intermittent spring, possessing healing properties, which was situated by the sheep-gate (not "market," AV), i.e. near the temple, on the E. Porches

a) The Healing at Bethesda (vs 1-16) were erected to accommodate the invalids who desired to make trial of the waters (the mention of the angel, ver 4, with part of ver 3, is a later gloss, and is justly omitted in RV). On one of these porches lay an impotent man. His infirmity was of long standing—38 years. Hope deferred was making his heart sick, for he had no friend, when the waters were troubled, to put him into the pool. Others invariably got down before him. Jesus took pity on this man. He asked him if he would be made whole; then by a word of power healed him. The cure was instantaneous (vs 8.9). It was the Sabbath day, and as the man, at Christ's command, took up his bed to go, he was challenged as doing that which was unlawful. The healed man, however, rightly perceived that He who was able to work so great a cure had authority to say what should and should not be done on the Sabbath. Meeting the man after in the temple, Jesus bade him "sin no more"—a hint, perhaps, that his previous infirmity was a result of sinful conduct (ver 14).

Jesus Himself was now challenged by the authorities for breaking the Sabbath. Their strait, artificial rules would not permit even of acts of mercy on the Sabbath. This led, on the part of Jesus, to a momentous assertion of His Divine dignity.

b) Son and Father (vs 17-29) He first justified Himself by the example of His Father, who works continually in the upholding and government of the universe (ver 17)—the Sabbath is a rest from earthly labors, for Divine, heavenly labor (Westcott)—then, when this increased the offence by its suggestion of "equality" with the Father, so that His life was threatened (ver 18), He spoke yet more explicitly of His unique relationship to the Father, and of the Divine prerogatives it conferred upon Him. The Jews were right: if Jesus were not a Divine Person, the claims He made would be blasphemous. Not only was He admitted to intimacy with the Divine counsel (vs 20.21; cf Mt 11 27), but to Him, He averred, was committed the Divine power of giving life (vs 21.26), of judgment (vs 22.27), of resurrection—spiritual resurrection now (vs 24.25), resurrection at the last day (vs 28.29). It was the Father's will that the Son should be honored even as Himself (ver 23).

These stupendous claims are not made without adequate attestation. Jesus cites a threefold witness: (1) the witness of the Baptist, whose testimony they had been willing for a time to receive (vs 33.35);

c) The Threefold Witness (vs 30-47) (2) the witness of the Father, who by Christ's works supported His witness to Himself (vs 36-38); (3) the witness of the Scriptures, for these, if read with spiritual discernment, would have led to Him (vs 39.45-47). Moses, whom they trusted, would condemn them. Their rejection of Jesus was due, not to want of light, but to the state of the heart: "I know you, that ye have not the love of God in yourselves" (ver 42); "How can ye believe," etc (ver 44).

Shortly after His return to Galilee, if the order of events has been rightly apprehended, Jesus became involved in new disputes with the Pharisees about Sabbath-keeping. Possibly we hear in these the echoes of the charges brought against Him at the feast in Judaea. Christ's conduct, and the principles involved in His replies, throw valuable light on the Sabbath institution.

The first dispute was occasioned by the action of the disciples in plucking ears of grain and rubbing them in their hands as they passed a) Plucking of the Ears through the grainfields on a Sabbath (the note of time "second-first," in of Grain Lk 6 1 AV, is omitted in RV. In (Mt 12:1-8; Mk 2: 23-28; Lk 6:1-5) any case the ripened grain points to a time shortly after the Passover). The law permitted this liberty (Dt 23 25), but Pharisaic rigor construed it into an offence to do the act on the Sabbath (for specimens of the minute, trivial and vexatious rules by which the Pharisees converted the Sabbath into a day of wretched constraint, see Farrar's Life of Christ, Edersheim's Jesus the Messiah, and similar works). Jesus, in defending His disciples, first quotes OT precedents (David and the showbread, an act done apparently on the Sabbath, 1 S 21 6; the priests' service on the Sabbath—"One greater than the temple" was there, Mt 12 6), in illustration of the truth that necessity overrides positive enactment; next, falls back on the broad principle of the design of the Sabbath as made for man—for his highest physical, mental, moral and spiritual well-being: "The sabbath was made for man," etc (Mk 2 27). The claims of mercy are paramount. The end is not to be sacrificed to the means. The Son of Man, therefore, asserts lordship over the Sabbath (ver 28 ||).

The second collision took place on "another sabbath" (Lk 6 6) in the synagogue. There was present a man with a withered hand.

b) The Man Withered Hand The Pharisees themselves, on this occasion, eager to entrap Jesus, seem to have provoked the conflict by a question, "Is it lawful to heal on the sabbath day?" (Mt 12 10). Jesus met them by an appeal to their own practice in permitting the rescue of a sheep that had fallen into a pit on the Sabbath day (vs 11.12), then, bidding the man stand forth, retorted the question on themselves, "Is it lawful on the sabbath day to do good, or to do harm? to save a life, or to kill?" (Mk 3 4)—an allusion to their murderous intents. On no reply being made, looking on them with holy indignation, Jesus ordered the man to stretch forth his hand, and it was at once perfectly restored. The effect was only to inflame to "madness" (Lk 6 11) the minds of His adversaries, and Pharisees and Herodians (the court-party of Herod) took counsel to destroy Him (Mk 3 6 ||).

Jesus, leaving this scene of unprofitable conflict, quietly withdrew with His disciples to the shore, and there continued His work of teaching and healing. People from all the neighboring districts flocked to His ministry. He taught them from a little boat (Mk 3 9), and healed their sick. Mt sees in this a fulfilment of the oracle which is to be found in Isa 42 1-4.

c) Withdrawal to the Sea The work of Jesus was growing on His hands, and friends and enemies were rapidly taking sides. The time accordingly had come for selecting and attaching to His person a definite number of followers—not simply disciples—who might be prepared to carry on His work after His departure. (Mt 10: 1-4; Mk 3: 13-19; Lk 6:12-16; Acts 1:13) This He did in the choice of twelve apostles. The choice was made in early morning, on the Mount of Beatitudes, after a night spent wholly in prayer (Lk 6 12).

"Apostle" means "one sent." On the special function of the apostle it is sufficient to say here that those thus set apart were chosen for the special end of being Christ's witnesses and accredited ambassadors to the world, a) The Apostolic Function able from personal knowledge to bear testimony to what Christ had been, said and done—to the facts of His life, death and resurrection (cf Acts 1 22. 23; 2 22-32; 3 15; 10 39; 1 Cor 15 3-15, etc); but, further, as instructed by Him, and endowed with His Spirit (cf Lk 24 49; Jn 14 16.17.26, etc), of being the depositories of His truth, sharers of His authority (cf Mt 10 1; Mk 3 15), messengers of His gospel (cf 2 Cor 5 18-21), and His instruments in laying broad and strong the foundations of His church (cf Eph 2 20; 3 5). So responsible a calling was never, before or after, given to mortal men.

Four lists of the apostles are given—in Mt, Mk, Lk, and Acts (1 13, omitting Judas). The names are given alike in all, except that b) The Lists "Judas, the son [or brother] of James" (Lk 6 16; Acts 1 13) is called by Mt "Lebbaeus," and by Mk "Thaddaeus."

The latter names are cognate in meaning, and all denote the same person. "Bartholomew" (son of Tolmai) is probably the Nathanael of Jn 1 47 (cf 21 2). The epithet "Cananaean" (Mt 10 4; Mk 3 18) marks "Simon" as then or previously a member of the party of the Zealots (Lk 6 15). In all the lists Peter, through his gifts of leadership, stands first; Judas Iscariot, the betrayer, stands last. There is a tendency to arrangement in pairs: Peter and Andrew; James and John; Philip and Bartholomew; Thomas and Matthew; lastly, James, the son of Alphaeus, Judas, son or brother of James, Simon the Zealot and Judas Iscariot. The list contains two pairs of brothers (three, if "brother" be read with Judas), and at least one pair of friends (Philip and Nathanael).

All the apostles were men from the humbler ranks, yet not illiterate, and mostly comfortably circumstanced. All were Galileans, except

c) The Men betrayer, whose name "Iscariot" i.e. "man of Kerioth," marks him as a Judaeen. Of some of the apostles we know a good deal; of others very little; yet we are warranted in speaking of them all, Judas excepted, as men of honest minds, and sincere piety. The band held within it a number of men of strongly contrasted types of character. Allusion need only be made to the impetuous Peter, the contemplative John, the matter-of-fact Philip, the cautious Thomas, the zealous Simon, the conservative Matthew, the administrative Judas. The last-named—Iscariot—is the dark problem of the apostolate. We have express testimony that Jesus knew him from the beginning (Jn 6 64). Yet He chose him. The character of Judas, when Jesus received him, was doubtless undeveloped. He could not himself suspect the dark possibilities that slept in it. His association with the apostles, in itself considered, was for his good. His peculiar gift was, for the time, of service. In choosing him, Jesus must be viewed as acting for, and under the direction of, the Father (Jn 5 19; 17 12). See special arts. on the several apostles.

III. From the Sermon on the Mount till the Parables of the Kingdom—a Second Circuit.—The choice of the apostles inaugurates a

1. The Sermon on the Mount new period of Christ's activity. Its first most precious fruit was the delivery to the apostles and the multitudes who thronged Him as He came down from the mountain (Lk 6 17) of that great manifesto of His kingdom popularly known as the Sermon on the Mount. The hill is identified by Stanley (Sinai and Pal, 368) and others with that known as "the Horns of Hattin," where "the level place" at the top, from which Christ would come down from one of the higher horns, exactly suits the conditions of the narrative. The sick being healed, Jesus seated Himself a little higher up, His disciples near Him, and addressed the assembly (cf Mt 7 28,29). The season of the year is shown by the mention of the "lilies" to be the summer.

Its scope.—His words were weighty. His aim was at the outset to set forth in terms that were unmistakable the principles, aims and dispositions of His kingdom; to expound its laws; to exhibit its righteousness, both positively, and in contrast with Pharisaic formalism and hypocrisy. Only the leading ideas can be indicated here (see BEATITUDES; SERMON ON MOUNT; ETHICS OF JESUS). Matthew, as is his wont, groups material part of which is found in other connections in Lk, but it is well to study the whole in the well-ordered form in which it appears in the First Gospel.

In marked contrast with the lawgiving of Sinai, Christ's first words are those of blessing. Passing a) The Blessings (Mt 5:1-6; Lk 6:20-26) He shows on what inner conditions the blessings of the kingdom depend. His beatitudes (poverty of spirit, mourning, meekness, hunger and thirst after righteousness, etc) reverse all the world's standards of judgment on such matters.

In the possession of these graces consists true godliness of character; through them the heirs of the kingdom become the salt of the earth, the light of the world. The obligation rests on them to let their light shine (cf Mk 4 21-23; Lk 8 16; 11 33).

Jesus defines His relation to the old law—not a Destroyer, but a Fulfiller—and proceeds to exhibit

b) True Righteousness—the Old and the New Law (Mt 5:17-48; Lk 6:27-36) the nature of the true righteousness in contrast to Pharisaic literalism and formalism. Through adherence to the latter they killed the spirit of the law. With an absolute authority—"But I say unto you"—Jesus leads everything back from the outward letter to the state of the heart. Illustrations are taken from murder, adultery, swearing, retaliation, hatred of enemies, and a spiritual expansion is given to every precept. The sinful thought or desire holds in it the essence of transgression. The world's standards are again reversed in the demands for non-resistance to injuries, love of enemies and requital of good for evil.

Pursuing the contrast between the true righteousness and that of the scribes and Pharisees, Jesus next draws attention to motive in religion. The Pharisees erred not simply in having regard only to the letter of the Law, but in acting in morals and religion from a false motive. He had furnished the antidote to their literalism; He now assails their ostentation and hypocrisy. Illustrations are taken from almsgiving, prayer and fasting, and in connection with prayer the Lord's Prayer is given as a model (Lk introduces this in another context, 11 1-4).

The true motive in religious acts is to please God; the same motive should guide us in the choice of what is to be our supreme good.

c) Religion and Hypocrisy—True and False Motive (Mt 6:1-18; cf Lk 11:1-8) He had furnished the antidote to their literalism; He now assails their ostentation and hypocrisy. Illustrations are taken from almsgiving, prayer and fasting, and in connection with prayer the Lord's Prayer is given as a model (Lk introduces this in another context, 11 1-4).

The true motive in religious acts is to please God; the same motive should guide us in the choice of what is to be our supreme good.

d) The True Good and Cure for Care (Mt 6:19-34; cf Lk 11:33-36; 12:22-34) Earthly treasure is not to be put above heavenly. The kingdom of God and His righteousness are to be first in our desires. The eye is to be single. The true cure for worldly anxiety is then found in trust of the heavenly Father. His children are more to God than fowls and flowers, for whom His care in Nature is so conspicuously manifest.

Seeking first the kingdom they have a pledge—no higher conceivable—that all else they need will be granted along with it (this section on trust, again, Lk places differently, 12 22-34).

Jesus finally proceeds to speak of the relation of the disciple to the evil of the world. That evil has

e) Relation to the World's Evil—the Conclusion (Mt 7:1-29; Lk 6:37-49; cf 11:9-13) been considered in its hostile attitude to the disciple (Mt 5 38 ff); the question is now as to the disciple's free relations toward it. Jesus inculcates the duties of the disciple's bearing himself wisely toward evil—with charity, with caution, with prayer, in the spirit of ever doing as one would be done by—and of being on his guard against it. The temptation is great to follow the worldly crowd, to be misled by false teachers, to put profession for practice. Against these perils the disciple is energetically warned. True religion will ever be known by its fruits. The discourse closes with the powerful similitude of the wise and foolish builders. Again, as on an earlier occasion, Christ's auditors were astonished at His teaching, and at the authority with which He spoke (Mt 7 28,29).

A series of remarkable incidents are next to be noticed.

(1) The healing of the centurion's servant apparently took place on the same day as the delivery of the Sermon on the Mount (Lk 7 1.2). It had been a day of manifold and exhausting labors for Jesus. A walk of perhaps 7 miles brought Him back to Capernaum, the crowds accompanying. Yet no sooner, on His return, does He hear a new appeal for help than His love replies, "I will come and heal him."

2. Intervening Incidents

a) Healing of the Centurion's Servant (Mt 8:15-13; Lk 7:1-10) The supplicant was a Rom centurion—one who had endeared himself to the Jews (Lk 7 5)—and the request was for the healing of a favorite servant, paralyzed and tortured with pain. First, a deputation sought Christ's good offices, then, when Jesus was on the way, a second message came, awakening even Christ's astonishment by the magnitude of its faith. The centurion felt he was not worthy that Jesus should come under his roof, but let Jesus speak the word only, and his servant would be healed. "I have not found so great faith," Jesus said, "no, not in Israel." The word was spoken, and, on the return of the messengers, the servant was found healed.

The exciting events of this day gathered so great a crowd round the house where Jesus was as left Him no leisure even to eat, and His friends, made anxious for His health, sought to restrain Him (Mk 3 20,21).

b) The Widow of Nain's Son Raised (Lk 7:11-17) It was probably to escape from this local excitement that Jesus, "soon afterwards," is found at the little town of Nain, a few miles S.E. of Nazareth. A great multitude still followed Him. Here, as He entered the city, occurred the most wonderful of the works He had yet wrought. A young man—the only son of a widowed mother—was being carried out for burial. Jesus, in compassion, stopped the mournful procession, and, in the calm certainty of His word being obeyed, bade the young man arise. On the instant life returned, and Jesus gave the son back to his mother. The amazement of the people was tenfold intensified. They felt that the old days had come back: that God had visited His people.

It was apparently during the journey or circuit which embraced this visit to Nain, and as the result of the fame it brought to Jesus (Lk 7 17,18; note the allusion to the dead being raised in Christ's reply to John), that the embassy was sent from the

It was apparently during the journey or circuit which embraced this visit to Nain, and as the result of the fame it brought to Jesus (Lk 7 17,18; note the allusion to the dead being raised in Christ's reply to John), that the embassy was sent from the Baptist in prison to ask of Jesus whether He was indeed He who should come, or would they look for another. It was a strange question c) Embassy on the lips of the forerunner, but is of John's probably to be interpreted as the expression of perplexity rather than of actual doubt. There seems no question of His Gen- but that John's mind had been thrown into serious difficulty by the reports 11:2-30; which had reached him of the work Lk 7:18-35) of Jesus. Things were not turning out as he expected. It was the peaceful, merciful character of Christ's work which stumbled John. The gloom of his prison wrought with his disappointment, and led him to send this message for the satisfaction of himself and his disciples.

(1) Christ's answer to John.—If doubt there was, Jesus treated it tenderly. He did not answer directly, but bade the two disciples who had been sent go back and tell John the things they had seen and heard—the blind receiving their sight, the lame walking, the deaf cured, the dead raised, the Gospel preached. Little doubt the Messiah had come when works like these—the very works predicted by the prophets (Isa 35 5,6)—were being done. Blessed were those who did not find occasion of stumbling in Him. Jesus, however, did more. By his embassy John had put himself in a somewhat false position before the multitude. But Jesus would not have His faithful follower misjudged. His was no fickle spirit. Jesus nobly vindicated him as a prophet and more than a prophet; yea, a man than whom a greater had not lived. Yet, even as the new dispensation was higher than the old, one "but little" in the kingdom of heaven—one sharing Christ's humble, loving, self-denying disposition—was greater even than John (Mt 11 11).

(2) A perverse people—Christ's grace.—The implied contrast between Himself and John led Jesus further to denounce the perverse spirit of His own generation. The Pharisees and lawyers (Lk 7 30) had rejected John; they were as little pleased with Him. Their behavior was like children objecting to one game because it was merry, and to another because it was sad. The flood of outward popularity did not deceive Jesus. The cities in which His greatest works were wrought—Chorazin, Bethsaida, Capernaum—remained impenitent at heart. The heavier would be their judgment; worse even than that on Tyre and Sidon, or on Sodom itself. Over against their unbelief Jesus reasserts His dignity and declares His grace (Mt 11 25-30). All authority was His; He alone knew and could reveal the Father (no claims in Jn are higher). Let the heavy laden come to Him, and He would give them rest (parts of these passages appear in another connection in Lk 10 12-21).

Yet another beautiful incident connected with this journey is preserved by Lk—the anointing of

d) The First Anointing—Who Was a Sinner (Lk 7:36-50) who was a sinner. In Nain or some other city visited by Him, Jesus was invited to dine with a Pharisee named Simon. His reception was a cold one (vs 44-46). During the meal, a respectable society—one, however, as the story implies, whose heart Jesus had reached, and who, filled with sorrow, love, shame, penitence, had turned from her life of sin, entered the chamber. There, bathing Christ's feet with her tears, wiping them with her tresses, and imprinting on them fervent kisses, she anointed them with a precious ointment she had brought with her. Simon was scandalized. Jesus could not be a right-thinking man, much less a prophet, or He would have rebuked this misbehavior from such a person. Jesus met the thought of Simon's heart by speaking to him the parable of the Two Debtors (vs 41,42). Of two men who had been freely forgiven, one 500, the other 50 shillings, which would love his creditor most? Simon gave the obvious answer, and the contrast between his own reception of Jesus and the woman's passionate love was immediately pointed out. Her greater love was due to the greater forgiveness; though, had Simon only seen it, he perhaps needed forgiveness even more than she. Her faith saved her and she was dismissed in peace. But again the question arose, "Who is this that even forgiveth sins?"

3. Second Galilean Circuit—Events at Capernaum Luke introduces here (Lk 8 1-4) a second Galilean circuit of Jesus, after 19-21; Mt the return from which a new series of exciting incidents took place at Capernaum.

The circuit was an extensive one—"went about through cities and villages [lit. "according to city and village"]", preaching." During this journey Jesus was attended by the Twelve, and by devoted women (Mary Magdalene, Joanna, wife of Herod's steward, Susanna, and others), who ministered to Him of their substance (vs 2,3). At the close of this circuit Jesus returned to Capernaum.

Jesus, no doubt, wrought numerous miracles on demoniacs (cf Lk 8 1,2; out of Mary Magdalene He is said to have cast 7 demons—perhaps a form of speech to indicate the severity of the possession). The demoniac now brought to Jesus was blind and dumb. Jesus cured him, with the double result that the people were filled with amazement: "Can this be the son of David?" (Mt 12 23), while the Pharisees blasphemed, alleging that Jesus cast out demons by the help of Beelzebub (Gr Beelzeboul), the prince of the demons (see s.v.). A quite similar incident is narrated in Mt 9 32-34; and Lk gives the discourse that follows in a later connection (11 14 ff). The accusation may well have been repeated more than once. Jesus, in reply, points out, first, the absurdity of supposing Satan to be engaged in warring against his own kingdom (Mt 18 25 ff ||; here was plainly a stronger than Satan); then utters the momentous word about blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. All other blasphemies—even that against the Son of Man (Mt 12 32)—may be forgiven, for they may proceed from ignorance and misconception; but deliberate, perverse rejection of the light, and attributing to Satan what was manifestly of God, was a sin which, when matured—and the Pharisees came perilously near committing it—admitted of no forgiveness, either in this world or the next, for the very capacity for truth in the soul was by such sin destroyed. Mk has the strong phrase, "is guilty of an eternal sin" (3 29). Pertinent words follow as to the root of good and evil in character (Mt 12 33-37). See BLASPHEMY.

The sign of Jonah.—Out of this discourse arose the usual Jewish demand for a "sign" (Mt 12 38; cf Lk 11 29-32), which Jesus met by declaring that no sign would be given but the sign of the prophet Jonah—an allusion to His future resurrection. He reiterates His warning to the people of His generation for their rejection of greater light than had been enjoyed by the Ninevites and the Queen of Sheba.

Two incidents, not dissimilar in character, interrupted this discourse—one the cry of a woman in the audience (if the time be the same, Lk 11 27, 28), "Blessed is the womb that bare thee," etc, to which Jesus replied, "Yea rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God, and keep it"; the other, a message that His mother and brethren

c) Christ's (doubtless anxious for His safety) de-Mother and sired to speak with Him. To this,
Brethren stretching out His hand toward His disciples, Jesus answered, "Behold, my mother and my brethren" (Mk 3 34), etc. Kinship in the spiritual kingdom consists in fidelity to the will of God, not in ties of earthly relationship.

On the same day on which the preceding discourses were delivered, Jesus, seeing the multitudes, passed to the shore, and entering a 4. Teaching boat, inaugurated a new method in in Parables His public teaching. This was the (Mt 13:1- speaking in parables. Similitude, 52; Mk 4: metaphor, always entered into the
1-34; Lk teaching of Jesus (cf Mt 7 24-27), 8:4-15; 13: and parable has once been met with 18-21) (Lk 7 41.42); now parable is systematically employed as a means of imparting and illustrating important truths, while yet veiling them from those whose minds were hostile and unresponsive (Mk 4 10-12; Lk 8 9.10). The parable thus at once reveals and conceals. The motive of this partially veiled teaching was the growing hostility of the Pharisees. In its nature the parable (from a verb signifying "to place side by side") is a representation in some form of earthly analogy of truths relating to Divine and eternal things (see PARABLE). The parables of the kingdom brought together in Mt 13 form an invaluable series, though not all were spoken in public (cf Mt 13 36-52), and some may belong to a later occasion (cf Lk 13 18-21). Mk adds the parable of the Seed Growing Secretly (4 26-29). Of three of the parables (the Sower, the Tares, the Dragnet), Jesus Himself gives the interpretation.

Parables of the kingdom.—In series the parables at once mirror the origin, mixed character and development of the kingdom in its present imperfect earthly condition, and the perfection which awaits it after the crisis at the end. In the parable of the Sower is represented the origin of the kingdom in the good seed of the word, and the varied soils on which that seed falls; in the Seed Growing Secretly, the law of orderly growth in the kingdom; in the parable of the Tares, the mixed character of the subjects of the kingdom; in those of the Mustard Seed and Leaven, the progress of the kingdom—external growth, internal transformative effect; in those of the Treasure and Pearl the finding and worth of the kingdom; in that of the Dragnet the consummation of the kingdom. Jesus compares His disciples, if they understand these things, to householders bringing out of their treasure "things new and old" (Mt 13 52).

IV. From the Crossing to Gadara to the Mission of the Twelve—a Third Circuit.—It was on the evening of the day on which He spoke

1. Crossing the parables—though the chronology of the Lake of the incident seems unknown to Lk
—Still (8 22)—that Jesus bade His disciples of the cross over to the other side of the Storm (Mt lake. At this juncture He was accosted
8:18-27; by an aspirant for discipleship. Mat-
Mk 4:35- thew gives two cases of aspirants;
41; Lk 8: Luke (but in a different connection, 22-25; cf 9 57-62), three. Luke's connection 9:57-62) (departure from Galilee) is perhaps preferable for the second and third;
 but the three may be considered together.

The three aspirants may be distinguished as, (a) The forward disciple: he who in an atmosphere of enthusiasm offered himself under impulse, without counting the cost. The zeal of this would-be follower Jesus checks with the pathetic words, "The foxes have holes," etc (Mt 8 20; Lk 9 58). (b) The procrastinating disciple. The first candidate needed repression; the second needs ima) Aspirants pulsion. He would follow Jesus, but for Dis- first let him bury his father. There had cipleship come a crisis, however, when the Lord's claim was paramount: "Leave the dead to bury their own dead" (Mt 8 22). There are at times higher claims than mere natural relationships, to which, in themselves, Jesus was the last to be indifferent. (c) The wavering disciple. The third disciple is again one who offers himself, but his heart was too evidently still with the things at home. Jesus, again, lays His finger on the weak spot, "No man, having put his hand to the plow, and looking back," etc (Lk 9 62). As mentioned, the latter two cases tally better with a final departure from Galilee than with a temporary crossing of the lake.

The inland lake was exposed to violent and sudden tempests. One of these broke on the disciples' boat as they sailed across.

b) The Everyone's life seemed in jeopardy.
Storm Jesus, meanwhile, in calmest repose,
Calmed was asleep on a cushion in the stern (Mk 4 38). The disciples woke Him almost rudely: "Teacher, carest thou not that we perish?" Jesus at once arose, and, reproving their want of faith, rebuked wind and waves ("Peace, be still"). Immediately there was a great calm. It was a new revelation to the disciples of the majesty of their Master. "Who then is this, that even the wind and the sea obey him?"

The lake being crossed, Jesus and His disciples came into the country of the Gadarenes (Mt), or Gerasenes (Mk, Lk)—Gadara being

2. The the capital of the district (on the to-
Gadarene pography, cf Stanley, Sinai and Pal, (Gerasene) 380-81). From the lake shore rises a Demoniac mountain in which are ancient tombs.
(Mt 8:28- Here Jesus was met by a demoniac 34; Mk 5: (Mt mentions two demoniacs: M.
1-20; Lk 8: Henry's quaint comment is, "If there 26-39) were two, there was one." Possibly one was the fiercer of the two, the other figuring only as his companion). The man, as described, was a raving maniac of the worst type (Mk 5 3-5), dwelling in the tombs, wearing no clothes (Lk 8 27), of supernatural strength, wounding himself, shrieking, etc. Really possessed by "an unclean spirit," his consciousness was as if he were indwelt by a "legion" of demons, and from that consciousness he addressed Jesus as the Son of God come for their tormenting. In what follows it is difficult to distinguish what belongs to the broken, incoherent consciousness of the man, and the spirit or spirits who spake through him. In the question, "What is thy name?" (Mk 5 9) Jesus evidently seeks to arouse the victim's shattered soul to some sense of its own individuality. On Jesus commanding the unclean spirit to leave the man, the request was made that the demons might be permitted to enter a herd of swine feeding near. The reason of Christ's permission, with its result in the destruction of the herd ("rushed down the steep into the sea") need not be too closely scrutinized. It may have had an aspect of judgment on the (possibly) Jewish holders of the swine; or it may have had reference to the victim of the possession, as enabling him to realize his deliverance. Whatever the difficulties of the narrative, none of the rationalistic explanations afford any sensible relief from them. The object of the miracle may be to exclude rationalistic explanations, by giving a manifest attestation of the reality of the demon influence. When the people of the city came they found the man fully restored—"clothed and in his right mind." Yet, with fatal shortsightedness, they besought Jesus to depart from their borders. The man was sent home to declare to his friends the great things the Lord had done to him.

Repelled by the Gerasenes, Jesus received a warm welcome on His return to Capernaum on the western shore (Mk 5 21). It was

3. Jairus' Daughter Raised— It was in connection with this feast, probably at this point that Matthew gave the feast formerly referred to.

Woman with Issue of Blood (Mt 9:13-26; Mk 5:21-43; Lk 8:40-56)—Matthew himself informs us (9 18), that Jairus, one of the rulers of the Mt synagogue, made his appeal for help. His little daughter, about 12 years old (Lk 8 42), was at the point of death; indeed, while Jesus was coming, she died. The ruler's faith, though real, was not equal to the centurion's, who believed that Jesus could heal without being present. Jesus came, and having expelled the professional mourners, in sacred privacy, a) Jairus' Appeal and Its Result—only the father and mother, with Peter, James and John being permitted to enter the death-chamber, raised the girl to life. It is the second miracle on record of the raising from the dead.

On the way to the ruler's house occurred another wonder—a miracle within a miracle. A poor woman, whose case was a specially

b) The Afflicted Woman Cured—distressing one, alike as regards the nature of her malady, the length of its continuance, and the fruitlessness of her application to the physicians, crept up to Jesus, confident that if she could but touch the border of His garment, she would be healed. The woman was ignorant; her faith was blended with superstition; but Jesus, reading the heart, gave her the benefit she desired. It was His will, however, that, for her own good, the woman thus cured should not obtain the blessing by stealth. He therefore brought her to open confession, and cheered her by His commendatory word.

At this point begins apparently a new evangelistic tour (Mt 9 35; Mk 6 6), extending methodically to "all the cities and villages." To it

4. Incidents of Third Circuit (Mt 9:27-38; Mk 6:1-6)—belong in the narratives the healing of two blind men (cf the case of Bartimaeus, recorded later); the cure of a demoniac who was dumb—a similar case to that in Mt 12 22; and a second rejection at Nazareth (Mt, Mk). The incident is similar to that in Lk 4

16-30, and shows, if the events are different, that the people's hearts were unchanged. Of this circuit Mt gives an affecting summary (9 35-38), emphasizing the Lord's compassion, and His yearning for more laborers to reap the abundant harvest.

Partly with a view to the needs of the rapidly growing work and the training of the apostles, and partly as a witness to Israel (Mt 10

5. The Twelve Sent Forth—Dis- 6.23), Jesus deemed it expedient to send the Twelve on an independent mission. The discourse in Mt attached course of to this event seems, as frequently, Jesus (Mt 10; Mk 6:7-13; Lk 9:1-6; cf Lk 10:2-24; 12:2-12, 13 9-13). to be a compilation. Parts of it are given by Luke in connection with the mission of the Seventy (Lk 10 1 ff; the directions were doubtless similar in both cases); parts on other occasions (Lk 12 2-12; 21 12-17, etc; cf Mk 13 9-13).

The Twelve were sent out two by two. Their work was to be a copy of the Master's—to preach the gospel and to heal the sick. To this end they were endowed with authority over unclean spirits, and over all manner of sickness. They were to go forth free from all encumbrances—no money, no scrip, no changes of raiment, no staff (save that in their hand, Mk 6 8), sandals only a) The Commission—on their feet, etc. They were to rely for support on those to whom they preached. They were for the present to confine their ministry to Israel. The saying in Mt 10 23, "Ye shall not have gone through the cities of Israel, till the Son of man be come," apparently has reference to the judgment on the nation, not to the final coming (cf 16 28).

The mission of the Twelve was the first step of Christianity as an aggressive force in society. Jesus speaks of it, accordingly, in the light

b) Counsels and Warnings—of the whole future that was to come out of it. He warns His apostles faithfully of the dangers that awaited them; exhorts them to prudence and circumspection ("wise as serpents," etc); holds out to them Divine promises for consolation; directs them when persecuted in one place to flee to another; points out to them from His own case that such persecutions were only to be expected. He assures them of a coming day of revelation; bids them at once fear and trust God; impresses on them the duty of courage in confession; inculcates in them supreme love to Himself. That love would be tested in the dearest relations. In itself peace, the gospel would be the innocent occasion of strife, enmity and division among men. Those who receive Christ's disciples will not fail of their reward.

When Christ had ended His discourse He proceeded with His own evangelistic work, leaving the disciples to inaugurate theirs (Mt 11 1).

Second Period—After the Mission of the Twelve till the Departure from Galilee

I. From the Death of the Baptist till the Discourse on Bread of Life.—Shortly before the events now

1. The Murder of the Baptist and Herod's Alarms (Mt 14:1-12; Mk 6:14-29; Lk 9:7-9; cf 3:18-20)—to be narrated, John the Baptist had been foully murdered in his prison by Herod Antipas at the instigation of Herodias, whose unlawful marriage with Herod John had unsparingly condemned. Jos gives as the place of the Baptist's imprisonment the fortress of Machaerus, near the Dead Sea (Ant, XVIII, v, 2); or John may have been removed to Galilee. Herod would ere this have killed John, but was restrained by fear of the people (Mt 14 5). The hate of Herodias, however, did not slumber. Her relentless will contrasts with the vacillation of Herod, as Lady Macbeth in Shakespeare contrasts with Macbeth. A birthday feast gave her the opening she sought for. Her daughter Salome, pleasing Herod by her dancing, obtained from him a promise on oath to give her whatever she asked. Prompted by Herodias, she boldly demanded John the Baptist's head. The weak king was shocked, but, for his oath's sake, granted her what she craved. The story tells how the Baptist's disciples reverently buried the remains of their master, and went and told Jesus. Herod's conscience did not let him rest. When rumors reached him of a wonderful teacher and miracle-worker in Galilee, he leaped at once to the conclusion that it was John risen from the dead. Herod cannot have heard much of Jesus before. An evil conscience makes men cowards.

Another Passover drew near (Jn 6 4), but Jesus did not on this occasion go up to the feast. Returning from their mission, the apostles reported to Jesus what they had said and done (Lk 9 10); Jesus had also heard of the Baptist's fate, and of Herod's fears, and now proposed to His disciples a retirement to a desert place across the lake, near Bethsaida (on the topography, cf Stanley, op. cit., 375, 381). As it proved, however, the multitudes had observed their departure, and, running round the shore, were at the place before them (Mk 6 33).

2. The Feeding of the Five Thousand (Mt 14:13-21; Mk 6:30-44; Lk 9:10-17; Jn 6:1-14) The purpose of rest was frustrated, but Jesus did not complain. He pitied the shepherdless state of the people, and went out to teach and heal them. The day wore on, and the disciples suggested that the fasting multitude should disperse, and seek victuals in the nearest towns and villages. This Jesus, who had already proved Philip by asking how the people should be fed (Jn 6 5), would not permit. With the scanty provision at command—5 loaves and 2 fishes—He fed the whole multitude. By His blessing the food was multiplied till all were satisfied, and 12 baskets of fragments, carefully collected, remained over. It was a stupendous act of creative power, no rationalizing of which can reduce it to natural dimensions.

The enthusiasm created by this miracle was intense (Jn 6 14). Mt and Mk relate (Lk here falls for a time out of the Synopsis) that Jesus hurriedly constrained His disciples to enter into their boat and recross the lake—this though a storm was gathering—while He Himself remained in the mountain alone in prayer. Jn gives the key to this action in the statement that the people were about to take Him by force and make Him a king (ver 15). Three hours after midnight found the disciples still in the midst of the lake, "distressed in rowing" (Mk 6 48), deeply anxious because Jesus was not, as on a former occasion, with them. At last, at the darkest hour of their extremity, Jesus was seen approaching in a way unlooked-for—walking on the water. Every new experience of Jesus was a surprise to the disciples. They were at first terrified, thinking they saw a spirit, but straightway the well-known voice was heard, "Be of good cheer: it is I; be not afraid." In the rebound of his feelings the impulsive Peter asked Jesus to permit him to come to Him on the water (Mt). Jesus said "Come," and for the first moment or two Peter did walk on the water; then, as he realized his unwonted situation, his faith failed, and he began to sink. Jesus, with gentle chiding, caught him, and assisted him back into the boat. Once again the sea was calmed, and the disciples found themselves safely at land. To their adoring minds the miracle of the loaves was eclipsed by this new marvel (Mk 6 52).

On the return to Gennesaret the sick from all quarters were brought to Jesus—the commencement apparently of a new, more general ministry of healing (Mk 6 56). Meanwhile—here we depend on Jn—the people on the other side of the lake, when they found that Jesus was gone, took boats hastily, and came over to Capernaum. They found Jesus apparently in the synagogue (ver 59). In reply to their query, "Rabbi, when camest thou hither?" Jesus first rebuked the motive which led them to follow Him—not because they had seen in His miracles "signs" of higher blessings, but because they had eaten of the loaves and were filled (ver 26)—then spoke to them His great discourse on the bread from heaven. "Work," He said, "for the food which abideth unto eternal life, which the Son of man shall give unto you" (ver 27). When asked to authenticate His claims by a sign from heaven like the manna, He replied that the manna also (given not by Moses but by God) was but typical bread, and surprised them by declaring that He Himself was the true bread of life from heaven (vs 35.51). The bread was Christ's flesh, given for the life of the world; His flesh and blood must be eaten and drunk (a spiritual appropriation through faith, ver 63), if men were to have eternal life. Jesus of set purpose had put His doctrine in a strong, testing manner. The time had come when His hearers must make their choice between a spiritual acceptance of Him and a break with Him altogether. What He had said strongly offended them, both on account of the claims implied (ver 42), and on account of the doctrine taught, which, they were plainly told, they could not receive because of their carnality of heart (vs 43.44.61-64). Many, therefore, went back and walked no more with Him (vs 60.61.66); but their defection only evoked from the chosen Twelve a yet more confident confession of their faith. "Would ye also go away?"

Peter's first confession.—Peter, as usual, spoke for the rest: "Lord, to whom shall we go? . . . We have believed and know that thou art the Holy One of God" (ver 69). Here, and not first at Caesarea, Philippi (Mt 16 16), is Peter's brave confession of his Master's Messiahship. Twelve thus confessed Him, but even of this select circle Jesus was compelled to say, "One of you [Judas] is a devil" (Jn 6 70.71).

II. From Disputes with the Pharisees till the Transfiguration.—The discourse in Capernaum seems to mark a turning-point in the Lord's ministry in Galilee. Soon after we find Him ceasing from public teaching, and devoting Himself to the instruction of His apostles (Mt 15 21; Mk 7 24, etc).

Meanwhile, that Christ's work in Galilee was attracting the attention of the central authorities, is shown by the fact that scribes and Pharisees came up from Jerus to watch Him. They speedily found ground of complaint against Him in His unconventional ways and His total disregard of the traditions of the elders. They specially blamed Him for allowing His disciples to eat bread with "common," i.e. unwashed hands. Here was a point on which the Pharisees laid great stress (Mk 7 3.4). Ceremonial ablutions (washing "diligently," Gr "with the fist"; "baptizings" of person and things) formed a large part of their religion. These washings were part of the "oral tradition" said to have been delivered to Moses, and transmitted by a succession of elders. Jesus set all this ceremonialism aside. It was part of the "hypocrisy" of the Pharisees (Mk 7 6). When questioned regarding it, He drew a sharp distinction between God's commandment in the Scriptures and man's tradition, and accused the Pharisees (instancing "Corban" [q.v.], in support, vs 10-12) of making "void" the former through the latter. This led to the wider question of wherein real defilement consisted. Christ's rational position here is that it did not consist in anything outward, as in meats, but consisted in what came from within the man: as Jesus explained afterward, in the outcome of his heart or moral life: "Out of the heart of men evil thoughts proceed," etc (vs 20-23). Christ's saying was in effect the abrogation of the old ceremonial distinctions, as Mk notes: "making all meats clean" (ver 19). The Pharisees, naturally, were deeply offended at His sayings, but Jesus was unmoved. Every plant not of the Father's planting must be rooted up (ver 13).

From this point Jesus appears, in order to escape notice, to have made journeys privately from place to place. His first retreat was to the borders, or neighborhood, of Tyre and Sidon. From Mk 7 31 it is to be inferred that He entered the heathen ter-

4. Gennesaret—Discourse on the Bread of Life (Mt 14:34-36; Mk 6:53-56; Jn 6:22-71) They found Jesus apparently in the synagogue (ver 59). In reply to their query, "Rabbi, when camest thou hither?" Jesus first rebuked the motive which led them to follow Him—not because they had seen in His miracles "signs" of higher blessings, but because they had eaten of the loaves and were filled (ver 26)—then spoke to them His great discourse on the bread from heaven. "Work," He said, "for the food which abideth unto eternal life, which the Son of man shall give unto you" (ver 27). When asked to authenticate His claims by a sign from heaven like the manna, He replied that the manna also (given not by Moses but by God) was but typical bread, and surprised ritory. He could not, however, be hid (Mk 7 24). It was not long ere, in the house into which He had entered, there reached Him the

2. Retirement to Tyre and Sidon—the Her "little daughter" was grievously afflicted with an evil spirit. Flinging Syrophenician herself at His feet, and addressing Him as "Son of David," she besought Him for her child. At first (Mt 15:21-28; Mk 7:24-30) Jesus seemed—yet only seemed—to repel her, speaking of Himself as sent only to the lost sheep of Israel, and of the unmeetness of giving the children's loaf to the dogs (the Gr softens the expression, "the little dogs"). With a beautiful urgency which won for her the boon she sought, the woman seized on the word as an argument in her favor. "Even the dogs under the table eat of the children's crumbs." The child at Jesus' word was restored.

Christ's second retreat was to Decapolis—the district of the ten cities—E. of the Jordan. Here also He was soon discovered, and

3. At Decapolis—followed by the multitude. Sufferers were brought to Him, whom He cured (Mt 15 30). Later, He fed the crowds. (Mt 15:29-39; Mk 7:1-10)

The miracle of the deaf man is attested only by Mk. The patient was doubly afflicted, being deaf, and having an impediment in his speech. The cure presents several peculiarities—its privacy (ver 33); the actions of Jesus in putting his fingers into his ears, etc (a mode of speech by signs to the a) The Deaf Man (Mk 7:32-37) His "sign," accompanied by prayer, doubtless occasioned by something in the man's look; the word Ephphathá (ver 34)—"Be opened."

The charge to those present not to blazon the deed abroad was disregarded. Jesus desired no cheap popularity.

The next miracle closely resembles the feeding of the Five Thousand at Bethsaida, but the place and numbers are different; 4,000 instead of

b) Feeding of Four Thousand 5,000; 7 loaves and a few fishes, instead of 5 loaves and 2 fishes; 7 baskets of fragments instead of 12 (Mark's term (Mt 15:32-39; Mk 8:1-9) denotes a larger basket). There is no reason for doubting the distinction of the incidents (cf Mt 16 9.10; Mk 8 19.20).

Returning to the plain of Gennesaret (Magdala, Mt 15 39 AV; parts of Dalmanutha, Mk 8 10), Jesus soon found Himself assailed by

4. Leaven of the Pharisees, etc—His old adversaries. Pharisees and Sadducees were now united. They came "trying" Jesus, and asking from Him a "sign from heaven"—some

Cure of Blind Man (Mt 16:1-12; Mk 8:11-26) signal Divine manifestation. "Sighing deeply" (Mk) at their caviling spirit, Jesus repeated His word about the sign of Jonah. The times in which they lived were full of signs, if they, so proficient in weather signs, could only see them. To be rid of such questioners, Jesus anew took boat to Bethsaida. On the way He warned His disciples against the leaven of the spirit they had just encountered. The disciples misunderstood, thinking that Jesus referred to their forgetfulness in not taking bread (Mark states in his graphic way that they had only one loaf). The leaven Christ referred to, in fact, represented three spirits: (1) the Pharisaic leaven—formalism and hypocrisy; (2) the Sadducean leaven—rationalistic skepticism; (3) the Herodian leaven (Mk 8 15)—political expediency and temporizing. Arrived at Bethsaida, a miracle was wrought on a blind man resembling in some of its features the cure of the deaf man at Decapolis. In both cases Jesus took the patients apart; in both physical means were used—the spittle ("spit on his eyes," Mk 8 23); in both there was strict injunction not to noise the cure abroad. Another peculiarity was the gradualness of the cure. It is probable that the man had not been blind from his birth, else he could hardly have recognized men or trees at the first opening. It needed that Jesus should lay His hands on Him before he saw all things clearly.

The next retirement of Jesus with His disciples was to the neighborhood of Caesarea Philippi, near the source of the Jordan. This was of Passion (1) The voices of the age and the eternal truth.—The question put to the (Mt 16:13-28; Mk 8:27-30; Lk 9:18-27) Twelve in this remote region was: "Who do men say that the Son of man is?" "Son of man," as already said, was the familiar name given by Jesus to Himself, to which a Messianic significance might or might not be attached, according to the prepossessions of His hearers. First the changeful voices of the age were recited to Jesus: "Some say John the Baptist; some, Elijah," etc. Next, in answer to the further question: "But who say ye that I am?" there rang out from Peter, in the name of all, the unchanging truth about Jesus: "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." In clearness, boldness, decision, Peter's faith had attained a height not reached before. The confession embodies two truths: (1) the Divinity, (2) the Messiahship, of the Son of man. Jesus did honor to the confession of His apostle. Not flesh and blood, but the Father, had revealed the truth to him. Here at length was "rock" on which He could build a church. Reverting to Peter's original name, Simon Bar-Jonah, Jesus declared, with a play on the name "Peter" (pétros, "rock," "piece of rock") He had before given him (Jn 1 42), that on this "rock" (pétra), He would build His church, and the gates of Hades (hostile evil powers) would not prevail against it (Mt 16 18). The papacy has reared an unwarrantable structure of pretensions on this passage in supposing the "rock" to be Peter personally and his successors in the see of Rome (none such existed; Peter was not bishop of Rome). It is not Peter the individual, but Peter the confessing apostle—Peter as representative of all—that Christ names "rock"; that which constituted him a foundation was the truth he had confessed (cf Eph 2 20). This is the first NT mention of a "church" (ekklesiá). The Christian church, therefore, is founded (1) on the truth of Christ's Divine Sonship; (2) on the truth of His Messiahship, or of His being the anointed prophet, priest and king of the new age. A society of believers confessing these truths is a church; no society which denies these truths deserves the name. To this confessing community Jesus, still addressing Peter as representing the apostolate (cf Mt 18 18), gives authority to bind and loose—to admit and to exclude. Jesus, it is noted, bade His disciples tell no man of these things (Mt 16 20; Mk 8 30; Lk 9 21).

(2) The cross and the disciple.—The confession of Peter prepared the way for an advance in Christ's teaching. From that time, Matthew notes, Jesus began to speak plainly of His approaching sufferings and death (16 21). There are in all three solemn announcements of the Passion (Mt 16 21-23; 17 22,23; 20 17-19 ||). Jesus foresaw, and clearly foretold, what would befall Him at Jerus. He would be killed by the authorities, but on the third day would rise again. On the first announcement, following His confession, Peter took it upon him to expostulate with Jesus: "Be it far from thee, Lord," etc (Mt 16 22), an action which brought upon him the stern rebuke of Jesus: "Get thee behind me, Satan," etc (ver 23). The Rock-man, in his fall to the maxims of a worldly expediency, is now identified with Satan, the tempter. This principle, that duty is only to be done when personal risk is not entailed, Jesus not only repudiates for Himself, but bids His disciples repudiate it also. The disciple, Jesus says, must be prepared to deny himself, and take up his cross. The cross is the symbol of anything distressing or painful to bear. There is a saving of life which is a losing of it, and what shall a man be profited if he gain the whole world, and forfeit his (true, higher) life? As, however, Jesus had spoken, not only of dying, but of rising again, so now He encourages His disciples by announcing His future coming in glory to render to every man according to His deeds. That final coming might be distant (cf Mt 24 36); but (so it seems most natural to interpret the saying 16 28') there were those living who would see the nearer pledge of that, in Christ's coming in the triumphs and successes of His kingdom (cf Mk 9 1; Lk 9 27; Mt 26 64).

About eight days after the announcement of His passion by Jesus, took place the glorious event of the transfiguration. Jesus had spoken

6. The Transfiguration—the Epileptic Boy (Mt 17:1-20; Mk 9:2-29; Lk 9:28-43) Tradition connects the scene of the transfiguration with Mount Tabor, but it more probably took place on one of the spurs of Mount Hermon. Jesus had ascended the mountain with Peter, James and John, for prayer. It was while He was praying the wonderful change happened. For once the veiled glory of the only begotten from the Father (Jn 1 14) was permitted to burst forth, suffusing His person and garments, and changing them into a dazzling brightness. His face did shine as the sun; His raiment became white as light ("as snow," AV, Mk). Heavenly visitants, recognized from their converse as Moses and Elijah, appeared with Him and spoke of His decease (Lk). A voice from an enveloping cloud attested: "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Little wonder the disciples were afraid, or that Peter in his confusion should stammer out: "It is good for us to be here: if thou wilt, I will make here three tabernacles [booths]." This, however, was not permitted. Earth is not heaven. Glimpses of heavenly glory are given, not to wean from duty on earth, but to prepare for the trials connected therewith.

The spectacle that met the eyes of Jesus and the chosen three as they descended was distressing in the extreme. A man had brought his epileptic boy—a sore sufferer and dumb—to the disciples to see if they could cast out the evil spirit that possessed him, but they were not able. Their failure, as Jesus showed, was a failure of faith; none the less did their discomfiture afford a handle to the gainsayers, who were not slow to take advantage of it (Mk 9 14). The man's appeal was now to Jesus, "If thou canst do anything," etc (ver 22). The reply of Jesus shifted the "canst" to the right quarter, "If thou canst [believe]" (ver 23). Such little faith as the man had revived under Christ's word: "I believe; help thou mine unbelief." The multitude pressing around, there was no call for further delay. With one energetic word Jesus expelled the unclean spirit (ver 25). The first effect of Christ's approach had been to induce a violent paroxysm (ver 20); now the spirit terribly convulsed the frame it was compelled to relinquish. Jesus, taking the boy's hand, raised him up, and he was found well. The lesson drawn to the disciples was the omnipotence of faith (Mt 17 19,20) and power of prayer (Mk 9 28,29).

III. From Private Journey through Galilee till Return from the Feast of Tabernacles.—Soon after the last-mentioned events Jesus passed

1. Galilee and Capernaum privately through Galilee (Mk 9 30), returning later to Capernaum.

During the Galilean journey Jesus made to His disciples His 2d announcement of His approaching sufferings and death, accompanied as before by the assurance of His resurrection. The disciples still could not take in the meaning of His words, though what He said made them "exceeding sorry" (Mt 17 23).

a) Second Announcement of Passion (Mt 17:22,23; Mk 9:30-33; Lk 9:44,45) The return to Capernaum was marked by an incident which raised the question of Christ's relation to temple institutions. The collectors of tribute for the temple inquired of Peter:

"Doth not your teacher pay the half-shekel?" (Gr didrachma, or double drachm, worth about 32 cents or 1s. 4d.). The origin of this tax was in the half-shekel of atonement-money of Ex 30 11-16, which, though a special contribution, was made the basis of

b) The Temple Tax later assessment (2 Ch 24 4-10; in Nehemiah's time the amount was one-third of a shekel, Neh 10 32), and its object was the upkeep of the temple worship (Schurer). The usual time of payment was March, but Jesus had probably been absent and the inquiry was not made for some months later. Peter, hasty as usual, probably reasoning from Christ's ordinary respect for temple ordinances, answered at once that He did pay the tax. It had not occurred to him that Jesus might have something to say on it, if formally challenged. Occasion therefore was taken by Jesus gently to reprove Peter. Peter had but recently acknowledged Jesus to be the Son of God. Do kings of the earth take tribute of their own sons? The half-shekel was suitable to the subject-relation, but not to the relation of a son. Nevertheless, lest occasion of stumbling be given, Jesus could well waive this right, as, in His humbled condition, He had waived so many more. Peter was ordered to cast his hook into the sea, and Jesus foretold that the fish he would bring up would have in its mouth the necessary coin (Gr statēr, about 64 cents or 2s. 8d.). The tax was paid, yet in such a way as to show that the payment of it was an act of condescension of the king's Son.

On the way to Capernaum a dispute had arisen among the disciples as to who should be greatest in the Messianic kingdom about to be set up. The fact of such disputing showed how largely even their minds were yet dominated by worldly, sensuous ideas of the kingdom. Now, in the house (Mk 33-50; Lk 9 33), Jesus takes occasion to check their spirit of ambitious rivalry, and to inculcate much-needed lessons on greatness and kindred matters.

c) Discourse on Greatness and Forgiveness (Mt 18:1-35; Mk 9:33-50; Lk 9:46-50)

(1) Greatness in humility.—First, by the example of a little child, Jesus teaches that humility is the root-disposition of His kingdom. It alone admits to the kingdom, and conducts to honor in it. He is greatest who humbles himself most (Mt 18 4), and is the servant of all (Mk 9 35). He warns against slighting the "little ones," or causing them to stumble, and uses language of terrible severity against those guilty of this sin.

(2) Tolerance.—The mention of receiving little ones in Christ's name led John to remark that he had seen one casting out demons in Christ's name, and had forbidden him, because he was not of their company. "Forbid him not," Jesus said, "for there is no man who shall do a mighty work in my name, and be able quickly to speak evil of me. For he that is not against us is for us" (Mk 9 39,40).

(3) The erring brother.—The subject of offences leads to the question of sins committed by one Christian brother against another. Here Christ inculcates kindness and forbearance; only if private representations and the good offices of brethren fail, is the matter to be brought before the church; if the brother repents he is to be unstintedly forgiven ("seventy times seven," Mt 18 22). If the church is compelled to interpose, its decisions are valid (under condition, however, of prayer and Christ's presence, vs 18-20).

(4) Parable of the Unmerciful Servant.—To enforce the lesson of forgiveness Jesus speaks the parable of the Unmerciful Servant (Mt 18 23-35). Himself forgiven much, this servant refuses to forgive his fellow a much smaller debt. His lord visits him with severest punishment. Only as we forgive others can we look for forgiveness.

The Gospel of Jn leaves a blank of many months between chs 6 and 7, covered only by the statement, "After these things, Jesus walked in Galilee" (7 1). In this year of His

2. The Feast of Tabernacles ministry Jesus had gone neither to the feast of the Passover nor to Pentecost.

—Discourses, etc The Feast of Tabernacles was now at hand (October). To this Jesus went up, (Jn 7—10: 21) and Jn preserves for us a full record of His appearance, discourses and doings there.

The brethren of Jesus, still unpersuaded of His claims (ver 5), had urged Jesus to go up with them to the feast. "Go up," in their sense, a) The Private Journey—Divided Opinions included a public manifestation of Himself as the Messiah. Jesus replied that His time for this had not yet come. Afterward He went up quietly, and in the midst of the feast appeared in the (Jn 7:1-10) temple as a teacher. The comments made about Jesus at the feast before His arrival vividly reflect the divided state of opinion regarding Him. "He is a good man," thought some. "Not so," said others, "but He leadeth the multitude astray." His teaching evoked yet keener division. While some said, "Thou hast a demon" (ver 20), others argued, "When the Christ shall come, will he do more signs?" etc (ver 31). Some declared, "This is of a truth the prophet," or "This is the Christ"; others objected that the Christ was to come out of Bethlehem, not Galilee (vs 40-42). Yet no one dared to take the step of molesting Him.

Christ's wisdom and use of the Scriptures excited surprise. Jesus met this surprise by stating that His knowledge was from the Father, and with reference to the division of opinion about Him laid down the principle that knowledge of the truth was the result of the obedient will: "If any man willeth to do his will, he shall know of the teaching, whether it is of God" (ver 17). It was objected that they knew who Jesus was, and whence He came. In a sense, Jesus replied, this was true; in a deeper sense, it was not. He came from the Father, whom they knew not (vs 28,29). The

b) The Test of Truth—Self-Witness; a Foiled Purpose last and great day of the feast—the eighth (Nu 29 35)—brought with it a new self-attestation. Jesus stood and cried, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink. He that believeth on me . . . from within him shall flow rivers of living water" (vs 37,38). The words are understood to have reference to the ceremony of pouring out a libation of water at this feast—the libation, in turn, commemorating the gift of water at the striking of the rock. The evangelist interprets the saying of the Spirit which believers should receive. Meanwhile, the chief priests and Pharisees had sent officers to apprehend Jesus (ver 32), but they returned without Him. "Why did ye not bring him?" The reply was confounding, "Never man so spake" (vs 45,46). The retort was the poor one, "Are ye also led astray?" In vain did Nicodemus, who was present, try to put in a moderating word (vs 50,51). It was clear to what issue hate like this was tending.

The discourses at the feast are at this point interrupted by the episode of the woman taken in adultery (8 1-11), which, by general consent, does not belong to the original text of the Gospel. It is probably, however, an authentic incident, and illustrates, on the one hand, the eagerness of the official classes to find an accusation against Jesus, and, on the other, the Saviour's dignity and wisdom in foiling such attempts, His spirit of mercy and the action of conscience in the accusers. In His continued teaching, Jesus put forth even higher claims than in the foregoing discourse. As He had applied to Himself the water from the rock, so now He applied to Himself the symbolic meaning of the two great candelabra, which were lighted in the temple court during the feast and bore reference to the pillar of cloud and fire. "I am the light of the world," said Jesus (ver 12). Only a Divine being could put forth such a claim as that. The Jews objected that they had only His witness to Himself. Jesus replied that no other could bear adequate witness of Him, for He alone knew whence He came and whither He went (ver 14). But the Father also had borne witness of Him (ver 18). This discourse, delivered in the "treasury" of the temple (ver 20), was soon followed by another, no man yet daring to touch Him. This time Jesus warns the Jews of the fate their unbelief would entail upon them: "Ye shall die in your sins" (ver 24). Addressing Himself next specially to the Jews who believed in Him, He urged them to continuance in His word as the condition of true freedom. Resentment was again aroused at the suggestion that the Jews, Abraham's seed, were not free. Jesus made clear that the real bondage was that of sin; only the Son could make spiritually free (vs 34-36). Descent from Abraham meant nothing, if the spirit was of the devil (vs 39-41). A new conflict was provoked by the saying, "If a man keep my word, he shall never see death" (ver 51). Did Jesus make Himself greater than Abraham? The controversy that ensued resulted in the sublime utterance, "Before Abraham was born, I am" (ver 58). The Jews would have stoned Him, but Jesus eluded them, and departed.

The Feast of Tabernacles was past, but Jesus was still in Jerus. Passing by on a Sabbath (ver 14), He saw a blind man, a beggar (ver 8), well known to have been blind from his birth. The narrative of the cure and examination of this blind man is adduced by Paley as bearing in its inimitable circumstantiality every mark of personal knowledge on the part of the historian. The man, cured in strange but symbolic fashion by the anointing of his eyes with clay (Blind Man (ch 9) thereby apparently sealing them more firmly), then washing in the Pool of Siloam, became an object of immediate interest, and every effort was made by the Pharisees to shake his testimony as to the miracle that had been wrought. The man, however, held to his story, and his parents could only corroborate the fact that their son had been born blind, and now saw. The Pharisees themselves were divided, some reasoning that Jesus could not be of God because He had broken the Sabbath—the old charge; others, Nicodemus-like, standing on the fact that a man who was a sinner could not do such signs (vs 15.16). The healed man applied the logic of common-sense: "If this man were not from God, he could do nothing" (ver 33). The Pharisees, impotent to deny the wonder, could only cast him out of the synagogue. Jesus found him, and brought him to full confession of faith in Himself (vs 35-38).

Yet another address of Jesus is on record arising out of this incident. In continuation of His reply to the question of the Pharisees (9 40), c) The Good Shepherd (10:1-21) "Are we also blind?" Jesus spoke to them His discourse on the Good Shepherd. Flocks in eastern countries are gathered at night into an inclosure surrounded by a wall or palisade. This is the "fold," which is under the care of a "porter," who opens the closely barred door to the shepherds in the morning. As contrasted with the legitimate shepherds, the false shepherds "enter not by the door," but climb over some other way. The allusion is to priests, scribes, Pharisees and generally to all, in any age, who claim an authority within the church unsanctioned by God (Godet). Jesus now gathers up the truth in its relation to Himself as the Supreme Shepherd. From His fundamental relation to the church, He is not only the Shepherd, but the Door (vs 7-14). To those who enter by Him there is given security, liberty, provision (ver 9). In His capacity as Shepherd Christ is preëminently all that a faithful shepherd ought to be. The highest proof of His love is that, as the Good Shepherd, He lays down His life for the sheep (vs 11.15.17). This laying down of His life is not an accident, but is His free, voluntary act (vs 17.18). Again there was division among the Jews because of these remarkable sayings (vs 19-21).

Chronological note—Though John does not mention the fact, there is little doubt that, after this visit to Jerus, Jesus returned to Galilee, and at no long interval from His return, took His final departure southward. The chronology of this closing period in Galilee is somewhat uncertain. Some would place the visit to the Feast of Tabernacles before the withdrawal to Caesarea Philippi, or even earlier (cf Andrews, Life of Our Lord, etc); but the order adopted above appears preferable.

D. LAST JOURNEY TO JERUSALEM—JESUS IN PERAEA

An interval of two months elapses between vs 21 and 22 in Jn 10—from the Feast of Tabernacles (October) till the Feast of the Dedication (December). This period witnessed the final withdrawal of Jesus from Galilee. Probably while yet in Galilee He sent forth the seventy disciples to prepare His way in the cities to which He should come (Lk 10 1). Repulsed on the borders of Samaria (Lk 9 51-53), He passed over into Peraea ("beyond Jordan"), where he exercised a considerable ministry. The record of this period, till the entry into Jerus, belongs in great part to Luke, who seems to have had a rich special source relating to it (9 51-19 27).

The discourses in Lk embrace many passages and sections found in other connections in Mt, and it is difficult, often, to determine their proper chronological place, if, as doubtless sometimes happened, portions were not repeated.

1. From Leaving Galilee till the Feast of the Dedication.

Conscious that He went to suffer and die, Jesus steadfastly set His face to go to 1. Rejected Jerus. His route was first by Samaria by Samaria—an opportunity of grace to that people—but here, at a border village, the 51-55) messengers He sent before Him, probably also He Himself on His arrival, were repulsed, because of His obvious intention to go to Jerus (ver 53). James and John wished to imitate Elijah in calling down fire from heaven on the rejecters, but Jesus rebuked them for their thought (RV omits the reference to Elijah, and subsequent clauses, vs 55.56).

In the present connection Luke inserts the incidents of the three aspirants formerly considered (9 57-62; cf p. 1645). It was suggested that the second and third cases of the 2. Mission may belong to this period.

Seventy (Lk 10:1-20) A new and significant step was now taken by Jesus in the sending out of 70 disciples, who should go before Him, two by two, to announce His coming in the cities and villages He was about to visit. The number sent indicates how large a following Jesus had now acquired. (Some see a symbolical meaning in the number 70, but it is difficult to show what it is.) The directions given to the messengers are similar to those formerly given to the Twelve (9 1-5; cf Mt 10); a passage also found in Mt in a different connection (11 21-24) is incorporated in this discourse, or had originally its place in it (vs 13-15). In this mission Jesus no longer made any secret of His Messianic character. The messengers were to proclaim that the kingdom of God was come nigh to them in connection with His impending visit (ver 9). The mission implies that a definite route was marked out by Jesus for Himself (cf 13 22), but this would be subject to modification according to the reception of His emissaries (vs 10.11.16). The circuit need not have occupied a long time with so many engaged in it. The results show that it aroused strong interest. Later the disciples returned elated with their success, emphasizing their victory over the demons (ver 17). Jesus bade them rejoice rather than their names were written in heaven (ver 20). Again a passage is inserted (vs 21.22) found earlier in Mt (11 25-27; cf also vs 23.24, with Mt 13 16.17).

Jesus had now passed "beyond the Jordan," i.e. into Peraea, and vast crowds waited on His teaching (cf Mt 19 1 f; Mk 10 1; Lk 12 1).

3. The Lawyer's Question—Parable of Good Samaritan (Lk 10:25-37) At one place a lawyer put what he meant to be a testing question, "What shall I do to inherit eternal life?" Jesus referred him to the great commandments of love to God and one's neighbor, eliciting the further query, "And who is my neighbor?" In reply Jesus spoke to him the immortal parable of the Good Samaritan, and asked who proved neighbor to him who fell among the robbers. The lawyer could give but one answer, "He that showed mercy on him." "Go," said Jesus, "and do thou likewise."

The incident of Martha and Mary, which Luke inserts here (vs 38-42), comes in better later, when Jesus was nearer Bethany.

At this place Luke brings together a variety of discourses, warnings and exhortations, great parts of which have already been noticed in earlier contexts. It does not follow that Lk has not, in many cases, preserved the original connection. This is probably the case with the Lord's Prayer

(11 1-4), and with portions of what Mt includes in the Sermon on the Mount (e.g. 11 9-13.33-36; 12 22-34; cf 13 24-27 with Mt 7 13.14.22.23), and in other discourses (e.g. 11 42-52 = Mt 23 23-36; 12 2-12 = Mt 10 26-33; 12 42-48 = Mt 24 45-51; 13 18-21, parables of Mustard Seed and Leaven = Mt 13 31.32, etc).

Of matter original to Lk in these chs may be noted such passages as that on the Friend at Midnight (11 5-8), the incident of the man who

a) Original to Luke wished Jesus to bid his brother divide his inheritance with him, to whom Jesus spoke the parable of the Rich Fool (12 13-21), the parable of the Barren Fig Tree, called forth by the disposition to regard certain Galileans whom Pilate had slain in a tumult at the temple, and eighteen on whom the tower of Siloam had fallen, as sinners above others (13 1-9: "Nay," said Jesus, "but, except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish"), and most of the teaching in ch 14, referred to below. In 11 37.38, we have the mention of a Pharisee inviting Jesus to dine, and of his astonishment at the Lord's neglect of the customary ablutions before eating. Ver 53 gives a glimpse of the fury to which the scribes and Pharisees were aroused by the severity of Christ's denunciations. They "began to press upon him vehemently . . . laying wait for him, to catch something out of his mouth." In 13 31 ff it is told how the Pharisees sought to frighten Jesus from the district by telling Him that Herod would fain kill Him. Jesus bade them tell that "fox" that His work would go on uninterruptedly in the brief space that remained ("day" used enigmatically) till He was "perfected" (ver 32). The woe on Jerus (vs 34.35) is given by Mt in the discourse in ch 23.

Of the miracles in this section, the casting out of the demon that was dumb (11 14 ff) is evidently

b) The Infirm Woman—the Dropped Man the same incident as that already noted in Mt 12 22 ff. Two other miracles are connected with the old accusation of Sabbath breaking. One was the healing in a synagogue on the Sabbath day of a woman bowed down for 18 years with "a spirit of infirmity" (13 10-17); the other was the cure on the Sabbath of a man afflicted with dropsy at a feast in the house of a ruler of the Pharisees to which Jesus had been invited (14 1-6). The motive of the Pharisee's invitation, as in most such cases, was hostile (ver 1). In both instances Jesus met the objection in the same way, by appealing to their own acts of humanity to their animals on the Sabbath (13 15.16; 14 5).

This feast at the Pharisee's house had an interesting sequel in the discourse it led Jesus to utter against vainglory in feasting, and on

c) Parable of the Great Supper the spirit of love which would prompt the Great to the table being spread for the helpless and destitute rather than for the selfish enjoyment of the select few, closing, in answer to a pious ejaculation of one of the guests, with the parable of the Great Supper (14 7-24). The parable, with its climax in the invitation to bring in the poor, and maimed, and blind, and those from the highways and hedges, was a commentary on the counsels He had just been giving, but it had its deeper lesson in picturing the rejection by the Jews of the invitation to the feast God had made for them in His kingdom, and the call that would be given to the Gentiles to take their place.

The injunctions to the multitudes as to the sacrifice and cross-bearing involved in discipleship are pointed by the examples of a man building a tower, and a king going to the Cost war, who count the cost before entering on their enterprises (vs 25-35).

At or about this time—perhaps before the incidents in Lk 14—Jesus paid the visit to Jerus at the Feast of the Dedication described in

5. Martha and Mary Jn 10 22-39. This seems the fitting place for the introduction of the episode of Martha and Mary which Luke narrates a little earlier (10 38-42). The "village" into which Jesus entered was no doubt Bethany (Jn 11 1). The picture given by Luke of the contrasted dispositions of the two sisters—Martha active and "serving" (cf Jn 12 2), Mary retiring and contemplative—entirely corresponds with that in Jn. Martha busied herself with preparations for the meal; Mary sat at Jesus' feet, and heard His word. To Martha's complaint, as if her sister were idling, Jesus gave the memorable answer, "One thing is needful: for Mary hath chosen the good part," etc (Lk 10 42).

The Feast of the Dedication, held in December, was in commemoration of the cleansing of the temple and restoration of its worship after its

6. Feast of the Dedication (164 BC). Great excitement was occasioned by the appearance of Jesus at this feast, and some asked, "How long dost thou hold us in suspense? If thou art the Christ, tell us plainly." Jesus said He had told them, and His works attested His claim, but they were not of His true flock, and would not believe. To His own sheep He gave eternal life. The Jews anew wished to stone Him for claiming to be God. Jesus replied that even the law called the judges of Israel "gods" (Ps 82 6, "I said, Ye are gods, and all of you sons of the Most High"): how could it then be blasphemy for Him whom the Father had sanctified and sent into the world to say of Himself, "I am the Son of God"? The Jews sought to take Him, but He passed from their midst.

II. From the Abode at Bethabara till the Raising of Lazarus.—After leaving Jerus Jesus went beyond Jordan again to the place where John at first baptized (Jn 10 40; cf 1 28, called in AV "Bethabara," in RV "Bethany," distinct from the Bethany of ch 11). There He "abode," implying a prolonged stay, and many resorted to Him. This spot, sacred to Jesus by His own baptism, may be regarded now as His headquarters from which excursions would be made to places in the neighborhood. Several of the incidents recorded by Luke are probably connected with this sojourn.

The stronger the opposition of scribes and Pharisees to Jesus became, the more by natural affinity did the classes regarded as out-

1. Parables of Lost Sheep, Lost Piece of Silver, and Prodigal Son cast feel drawn to Him. He did not repel them, as the Pharisees did, but ate and drank with them. Publicans and sinners gathered to His teaching, and He associated with them. The murmuring was great: "This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them."

The defence of Jesus was in parables, and the Pharisees' reproach may be thanked for three of the most beautiful parables Jesus ever spoke—the Lost Sheep (cf Mt 18 12-14), the Lost Piece of Silver, and the Prodigal Son (ch 15). Why does the shepherd rejoice more over the one lost sheep brought back than over the ninety-nine that have not gone astray? Why does the woman rejoice more over the recovery of her lost drachma than over all the coins safe in her keeping? Why does the father rejoice more over the prodigal son come back in rags and penitence from the far country than over the obedient but austere brother that had never left the home? The stories were gateways into the inmost heart of God. There is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth more than over ninety-nine just persons that need no repentance (ver 7).

Two other parables, interspersed by discourses (in part again met with in other connections, cf 16

2. Parables of the Unjust Steward, the Rich Man and Lazarus (Lk 16) 13 with Mt 6 24; ver 16 with Mt 11 12; ver 18 with Mt 5 32; 19 9, etc), were spoken at this time—that of the Unjust Steward (16 1-9) and that of the Rich Man and Lazarus (vs 19-31). The dishonest steward, about to be dismissed, utilized his opportunities, still dishonestly, to make friends of his master's creditors; let the "children of light" better his example by right-

eously using mammon to make friends for themselves, who shall receive them into everlasting habitations. The rich man, pampered in luxury, let the afflicted Lazarus starve at his gate. At death—in Hades—the positions are reversed: the rich man is in torment, stripped of all he had enjoyed; the poor man is at rest in Abraham's bosom, compensated for all he suffered. It is character, not outward estate, that determines destiny. The unmerciful are doomed. Even a messenger from the unseen world will not save men, if they hear not Moses and the prophets (ver 31).

In this connection Lk (17 1-10) places exhortations to the disciples on occasions of stumbling, forgiveness, the power of faith, renunciation of merit ("We are unprofitable servants"), some of which are found elsewhere (cf Mt 18 6,7,15,21, etc).

While Jesus was in the trans-Jordanic Bethabara, or Bethany, or in its neighborhood, a message came to Him from the house of Martha

3. The Summons to Bethany—Raising of Lazarus (Jn 11) and Mary in the Judaean Bethany (on the Mount of Olives, about 2 miles E. to Bethany from Jerus), that His friend Lazarus ("he whom thou lovest") was sick. The conduct of Jesus seemed strange, for He abode still two days where He was (Jn 11 6). As the sequel showed, this was only for the end of a yet more wonderful manifestation of His power and love, to the glory of God (ver 4). Meanwhile Lazarus died, and was buried. When Jesus announced His intention of going into Judaea, the disciples sought hard to dissuade Him (ver 8); but Jesus was not moved by the fears they suggested. He reached Bethany (a distance of between 20 and 30 miles) on the fourth day after the burial of Lazarus (ver 17), and was met on the outskirts by Martha, and afterward by Mary, both plunged in deepest sorrow. Both breathed the same plaint: "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died" (vs 21,32). To Martha Jesus gave the pledge, "Thy brother shall rise again," strengthening the faith she already had expressed in Him (ver 22) by announcing Himself as "the resurrection, and the life" (vs 25,26); at Mary's words He was deeply moved, and asked to be taken to the tomb. Here, it is recorded, "Jesus wept" (ver 35), the only other instance of His weeping in the Gospels being as He looked on lost Jerus (Lk 19 41). The proof of love was manifest, but some, as usual, suggested blame that this miracle-worker had not prevented His friend's death (ver 37). Arrived at the rock-tomb, Jesus, still groaning in Himself, caused the stone at its mouth to be removed, and, after prayer, spoke with a loud voice, "Lazarus, come forth" (ver 43). The spirit returned, and the man who had been dead came forth bound with his grave-clothes. He was released and restored to his sisters.

Even this mighty deed did not alter the mind of the Pharisees, who held a council, and decided, on the advice of Caiaphas (ver 50), that for the safety of the nation it was "expedient" that this man should die.

The circumstantiality of this beautiful narrative speaks irresistibly for its historical truth, and the objections raised by critical writers center really in their aversion to the miraculous as such.

III. From the Retirement to Ephraim till the Arrival at Bethany.—

The hostility of the ruling classes was now so pronounced that, in the few weeks that remained till Jesus should go up to the Passover, He deemed it advisable to abide in privacy at a city called Ephraim (situation uncertain). That He was in secrecy during this period is implied in the statement (ver 57) that if anyone knew where He was, he was to inform the chief priests and Pharisees. The retirement would be for Jesus a period of preparation for the ordeal before Him, as the wilderness had been for the commencement of His ministry.

On His leaving this retreat to resume His advance to Jerus the narratives again become rich in incident and teaching.

2. The Journey Resumed It is not easy to define the route which brought Jesus again to the border line between Samaria and Galilee (Lk 17 11), but, in traversing this region, He was met by ten lepers, who besought Him for a cure. Jesus (Lk 17: 11-19) bade them go and show themselves to the priests, and on the way they were cleansed. Only one of the ten, and he a Samaritan, returned to give thanks and glorify God. Gratitude appeared in the unlikely quarter.

At some point in this journey the Pharisees sought to entrap Jesus on the question of divorce. Was it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause? (Mt 19 3). Jesus in reply admitted the permission to divorce given by Moses (Mk 10 3-5), but declared that this was for the hardness of their hearts, and went back to the original institution of marriage in which the two so joined were declared to be "one flesh." Only Another question asked by the Pharisees of Jesus was as to when the kingdom of God should come.

4. Pharisaic Questionings The expectation excited by His own ministry and claims was that it was near; when should it appear? Rebuking their worldly ideas, Jesus (Lk 17: 20-37) warned them that the kingdom did not come "with observation"—was not a "Lo, there! Lo, here!"; it was "within" them, or "in their midst," though they did not perceive it. In the last decisive coming of the Son of Man there would be no dubiety as to His presence (vs 24,25). He adds exhortations as to the suddenness of His coming, and the separations that would ensue (vs 26-37), which Mt gives as part of the great discourse on the Last Things in ch 24.

In close connection with the foregoing, as furnishing the ground for the certainty that this day of the Son of Man would come, Jesus spoke the parable of the Unjust Judge. This judge, though heedless of the claims of right, yet yielded to the widow's importunity, and granted her justice against her adversary. How much more surely will the righteous, long-suffering

b) Coming of the Kingdom (Lk 17: 20-37) The expectation excited by His own ministry and claims was that it was near; when should it appear? God avenge His own elect, who cry unto Him day and night (vs 7.8)! Yet men, in that supreme hour, will almost have lost faith in His coming (ver 8).

A series of sayings and incidents at this time throw light upon the spirit of the kingdom.

The spirit of self-righteousness is rebuked and humble penitence as the condition of acceptance is enforced in the parable of the Pharisee and Publican. The Pharisee posing in his self-complacency at his fastings and tithes, and thanking God for his superiority to others, is set in vivid contrast to the abased publican, standing afar off, and able only to say, "God, be thou merciful to me a sinner" (ver 13).

a) Parable of Pharisee and Publican (Lk 18: 9-14) Yet it was he who went down to his house "justified" (ver 14). A similar lesson is inculcated in the beautiful incident of the blessing of the babes.

The disciples rebuked the mothers for bringing their little ones, but Jesus, "moved with indignation" (Mk), received and blessed the babes, declaring that to such (to them and those of like spirit) belonged the kingdom of heaven. "Suffer the little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me," etc.

b) Blessing of the Babes (Mt 19:13-15; Mk 10:13-16; Lk 18:15-17) A third illustration—this time of the peril of covetousness—is afforded by the incident of the rich young ruler.

This amiable, blameless, and evidently sincere young man ("Jesus looking upon him loved him," Mk 10 21) knelt, and addressing Jesus as "Good Teacher," asked what he must do to inherit eternal life. Jesus first declined the term "good," in the easy, conventional sense in which it was applied, then referred the ruler to the commandments as the standard of doing. All these, however, the young man averred he had observed from his youth up. He did not know himself. Jesus saw the secret hold his riches had upon his soul, and revealed it by the searching word, "If thou wouldest be perfect, go, sell that which thou hast," etc (Mt 19 21; cf Mk, "One thing thou lackest," etc). This was enough. The young man could not yield up his "great possessions," and went away sorrowing. Jesus bases on his refusal earnest warnings against the love of riches, and points out, in answer to a question of Peter, that loss for His sake in this life is met with overwhelmingly great compensations in the life to come.

Not unconnected with the foregoing teachings is the third solemn announcement to the disciples, so hard to be persuaded that the kingdom was not immediately to be set up in glory, of His approaching sufferings and death, followed by resurrection. The disciples had been "amazed" and "afraid" (Mk) at something strange in the aspect and walk of Jesus as they were on the way, going to Jerus (cf 18:31-33; Lk 9 51). His words gave the explanation. With them should be taken what is said in a succeeding incident of His baptism of suffering (Mk 10 38.39; cf Lk 12 50).

The spirit of the kingdom and sacrifice for the kingdom have already been associated with the idea of reward, but the principles underlying this reward are now made the subject of special teaching. First by the parable of the Laborers in the Vineyard the lesson is inculcated that reward in the kingdom is not according to any legal rule, but is governed by a Divine equity, in accordance with which the last may often be equal to, or take precedence of, the first.

The laborers were hired at different hours, yet all at the end received the same wage. The murmuring at the generosity of the householder of those who had worked longest betrayed a defectiveness of spirit which may explain why they were not more highly rewarded. In strictness, the kingdom is a gift of grace, in the sum total of its blessings one and the same to all.

Still there are distinctions of honor in God's kingdom, but these are not arbitrarily made. This is the lesson of the reply of Jesus to the plea of the mother of the sons of Zebedee, James and John, with, apparently, the concurrence of the apostles themselves, that they might sit one on the right hand and the other on the left hand in His kingdom. It was a bold and ambitious request, and naturally moved the indignation of the other apostles. Still it had its ground in a certain nobility of spirit. For when Jesus asked if they were able to drink of His cup and be baptized with His baptism, they answered, "We are able." Jesus told them they should share that lot of suffering, but to sit on His right hand and on His left were not favors that could be arbitrarily bestowed, but would be given to those for whom it had been prepared of His Father—the preparation having regard to character and fitness, of which the Father alone was judge. Jesus went on to rebuke the spirit which led one to seek prominence over another, and laid down the essential law, "Whosoever would become great among you shall be your minister," enforcing it by His own never-to-be-forgotten example, "Even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many" (Mt 20 28; Mk 10 45).

b) The Sons of Zebedee (Mt 20:20-28; Mk 10:35-45) Accompanied by a great throng, possibly of pilgrims to the feast, Jesus drew near to the influential city of Jericho, in the Jordan valley, about 17 miles distant from Jerus. Here two notable incidents marked His progress.

As they approached the city (Lk) (Mt and Mk place the incident as they "went out") a blind beggar, Bartimaeus, hearing that "Jesus the Nazarene" (Mk) passed by, loudly called on Him as the "Son of David" to have mercy on him. The multitude would have restrained the man, but their rebukes only made him the more urgent in his cries. Jesus stopped in His way, called the blind man to Him, then, when he came, renewing his appeal, healed him. The cry of the beggar shows that the Davidic descent, if not the Messiahship, of Jesus was now known. Mt varies from the other evangelists in speaking of "two blind men," while Mt and Mk, as noted, make the cure take place on leaving, not on entering the city. Not improbably there are two healings, one on entering Jericho, the other on going from the city, and Matthew, after his fashion, groups them together (Luke's language is really indefinite; lit. "as they were near to Jericho").

The entrance of Jesus into Jericho was signalized by a yet more striking incident. The chief collector of revenue in the city was Zacchaeus, rich, but held in opprobrium ("a sinner") because of his occupation. Being little of stature, Zacchaeus had climbed into the branches of a sycomore tree to see Jesus as He passed. To his amazement, and that of the crowd, Jesus stopped

7. The Rewards of the Kingdom This reward are now made the subject of special teaching. First by the parable of the Laborers in the Vineyard the lesson is inculcated that reward in the kingdom is not according to any legal rule, but is governed by a Dion His way, and called Zacchaeus by name to hasten to come down, for that day He must abide at his house. Zacchaeus joyfully received Him, and, moved to a complete change in his views of duty, declared his purpose of giving half his goods to the poor, and of restoring fourfold anything he might have taken by false accusation. It was a revolution in the man's soul, wrought by love. "Today," Jesus testified, "is salvation come to this house. . . . For the Son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost."

The expectations of the multitude that the kingdom of God should immediately appear led Jesus to speak the parable of the Pounds, fore-

c) Parable of the Pounds (Lk 19: 11-27) warning them that the consummation of the kingdom they looked for might be longer delayed than they thought, and impressing on them the need of loyalty, faithfulness and diligence, if that day, when it came, was not to prove disastrous to them. The nobleman went into a "far country" to receive a kingdom, and his ten servants were to trade with as many pounds (each=100 drachmas) in his absence. On his return the faithful servants were rewarded in proportion to their diligence; the faithless one lost what he had; the rebellious citizens were destroyed. Thus Jesus foreshadowed the doom that would overtake those who were plotting against Him, and checked hopes that disregarded the moral conditions of honor in His kingdom.

Arrival at Bethany.—From Jericho Jesus moved on to Bethany, the abode of Lazarus and his sisters. To His halt here before His public entrance into Jerus the next events belong.

E. THE PASSION WEEK—BETRAYAL, TRIAL AND CRUCIFIXION

We reach now the closing week and last solemn events of the earthly life of Jesus. The importance attached to this part of their narratives is seen by the space the evangelists devote to it. Of the Gospels of Mt and Mk fully one-third is devoted to the events of the Passion Week and their sequel in the resurrection; Luke has several chs; John gives half his Gospel to the same period. It is obvious that in the minds of the evangelists the crucifixion of Jesus is the pivot of their whole narrative—the dénouement to which everything tends from the first.

1. The Events Preceding the Last Supper.—The arrival in Bethany is placed by John "six days before the Passover" (12 1). Assuming that the public entry into Jerus took place on the Sunday, and that the 14th of Nisan fell on the following Thursday, this would lead to the arrival being placed on the Friday or Saturday preceding, according to the mode of reckoning.

1. The Chronology It is in the highest degree unlikely that Jesus would journey from Jericho on the Jewish Sabbath; hence He may be supposed to have arrived on the Friday evening. The supper at which the anointing by Mary took place would be on the Saturday (Sabbath) evening. Mt and Mk connect it with events two days before the Passover (Mt 26 2; Mk 14 1), but parenthetically, in a way which leaves the other order open.

This beautiful deed occurred at a supper given in honor of Jesus at the house of one Simon, a leper (Mt and Mk)—probably cured by Jesus—at which Martha, Mary and

2. The Anointing at Bethany (Mt 26: 6-13; Mk 14: 3-9; Jn 12: 1-9) Lazarus were guests. Martha aided in serving (Jn 12 2). In the course of the meal, or at its close, Mary brought a costly box of nard (valued by Judas at "300 shillings," about $50, or £10; cf ARVm on Jn 6 7), and with the perfume anointed the head (Mt, Mk) and feet (Jn) of Jesus, wiping His feet with her hair (Mt and Mk, though not mentioning the "feet," speak of the "body" of Jesus). Indignation, instigated by Judas (Jn), was at once awakened at what was deemed wanton waste. How much better had the money been given to the poor! Jesus vindicated Mary in her loving act—a prophetic anointing for His burial—and declared that wherever His gospel went, it would be spoken of for a memorial of her. It is the hearts from which such acts come that are the true friends of the poor. The chief priests were only the further exasperated at what was happening, and at the interest shown in Lazarus, and plotted to put Lazarus also to death (Jn 12 10).

On the day following—Palm Sunday—Jesus made His public entry as Messiah into Jerus. All the evangelists narrate this event.

3. The Entry into Jerusalem (Mt 21: 1-11; Mk 11: 1-11; Lk 19: 29-44; Jn 12: 12-19) The Mount of Olives had to be crossed from Bethany, and Jesus sent two disciples to an adjacent village—probably Bethphage (this seems to have been also the name of a district)—where an ass and its colt would be found tied. These they were to bring to Him, Jesus assuring them of the permission of the owners. Garments were thrown over the colt, and Jesus seated Himself on it. In this humble fashion (as Mt and Jn note, in fulfilment of prophecy, Zec 9 9), He proceeded to Jerus, from which a multitude, bearing palm branches, had already come out to meet Him (Jn). Throngs accompanied Him, going before and after; these, spreading their garments, and strewing branches in the way, hailed Him with hosannas as the Son of David, the King of Israel, who came in the name of the Lord. Very different were the feelings in the breasts of the Pharisees. "Behold," they said, "how ye prevail nothing; lo, the world is gone after him" (Jn 12 19). They bade Jesus rebuke His disciples, but Jesus replied that if they were silent, the very stones would cry out (Lk 19 40).

Jesus weeping over Jerusalem—return to Bethany.—One incident in this progress to Jerus is related only by Lk (19 41-44). As at a bend in the road Jerus became suddenly visible, Jesus paused and wept over the city, so blind to its day of visitation, and so near to its awful doom. Not His own sufferings, but the thought of Jerusalem's guilt and woes, filled Him with anguish. On reaching the city, Mark's testimony is explicit that He did no more than enter the temple, and 'look round on all things' (11 11). Then eventide having come, He returned to Bethany with the Twelve.

The morning of Monday found Jesus and His disciples again on their way to the city. Possibly the early hours had been spent by Jesus in solitary prayer, and, as they

4. Cursing of the Fig Tree—Second Cleansing of Temple (Mt 21: 12-22; Mk 11: 12-26; Lk 19: 45-48) Jesus in solitary prayer, and, as they went, it is recorded that "he hungered." A fig tree from which, from its foliage, fruit might have been expected, stood invitingly by the wayside, but when Jesus approached it, it was found to have nothing but leaves—a striking symbol of the outwardly religious, but spiritually barren Jewish community.

And in this sense Jesus used it in pronouncing on it the word of doom, "No man eat fruit from thee henceforward for ever" (Mk). Next morning (Tuesday), as the disciples passed, the tree was found withered from the roots. Mt combines the events of the cursing and the withering, placing both on the second day, but Mk more accurately distinguishes them. Jesus used the surprise of the disciples as the occasion of a lesson on the omnipotence of faith, with added counsels on prayer.

Were there two cleansings?—Pursuing His journey on the first morning, Jesus reached the temple, and there, as His first act, is stated by Mt and Mk to have cleansed the temple of the traders. It is a difficult question whether this is a second cleansing, or the same act as that recorded by John at the beginning of the ministry (Jn 2 13-22; see above), and here narrated out of its chronological order. The acts are at least quite similar in character and significance. In favor of a second cleansing is the anger of the priests and scribes (Mk 11 18; Lk 19 47), and their demand next day for His authority. No other incidents are recorded of this visit to the temple, except the healing of certain blind and lame, and the praises of the children, "Hosanna to the son of David"—an echo of the previous day's proceedings (Mt 21 14-16). In the evening He went back to Bethany.

Far different is it with the third day of these visits of Jesus to the temple—the Tuesday of the Passion Week.

5. The Eventful Tuesday This is crowded with parables, discourses, incidents, so numerous, impressive, tragical, as to oppress the mind in seeking to grasp how one short day could embrace them all. It was the last day of the appearance of Jesus in the temple (Jn 12 36), and marks His final break with the authorities of the nation, on whom His words of denunciation (Mt 23) fell with overwhelming force. The thread of the day's proceedings may thus be briefly traced.

On His first appearance in the temple on the Tuesday morning, Jesus was met by a demand from the

a) The Demand for Authority—Parables chief priests, scribes and elders (representatives of the Sanhedrin), for the authority by which He acted as He did. Jesus met them by a counter-question, "The baptism of John, was it from heaven, or from men?" (Mt 21: 23-22: 14; Mk 11: 27-12: 12; Lk 20: 1-18) dilemma was obvious. If John was Divinely accredited, why did they not accept his testimony to Jesus? Yet they feared to say his mission was of men, for John was universally esteemed a prophet. They could therefore only lamely reply: "We cannot tell" (AV). Matters had now come to an issue, and Jesus, reverting to the method of parable, set forth plainly their sin and its results to themselves and others.

The Two Sons—the Wicked Husbandmen—the Marriage of the King's Son.—The parables spoken on this occasion were: that of the Two Sons, one who said "I go not," but afterward repented and went, the other who said, "I go, sir," but went not—pointing the moral that the publicans and harlots went into the kingdom of God before the self-righteous leaders who rejected the preaching of John (Mt 21 28-32); that of the Wicked Husbandmen, who slew the servants, and finally the son, sent to them, and were at length themselves destroyed, the vineyard being given to others—a prophecy of the transferring of the kingdom to the Gentiles (Mt, Mk, Lk); and that of the Marriage of the King's Son (Mt 22 2-14), akin to that of the Great Supper in Lk 14 16-24 in its gathering in of the outcasts to take the place of those who had been bidden, but distinguished from it by the feature of the wedding garment, the lack of which meant being thrust into the outer darkness. The Pharisees easily perceived that these parables were spoken of them (Mt 21 45; Mk 12 12; Lk 20 19), and were correspondingly enraged, yet dared not touch Jesus for fear of the people.

The attempt was next made on the part of the Pharisees, Herodians and Sadducees—now joined in a common cause—to ensnare Jesus by captious and compromising questions. These attempts He met with a wisdom and dignity which foiled His adversaries, while He showed a ready appreciation of a candid spirit when it presented itself, and turned the point against His opponents by putting a question on the Davidic sonship of the Messiah.

b) Ensna- (1) Tribute to Caesar—the Resurre- ing Ques- tion—the Great Commandment.—First
tions, etc the Pharisees with the Herodians sought (Mt 22:1- to entrap Him by raising the question
46; Mk 12: of the lawfulness of tribute to Caesar.
13-37; Lk By causing them to produce a denarius
20:19-44) bearing Caesar's image and superscrip-tion, Jesus obtained from them a recognition of their acceptance of Caesar's authority, and bade them render Caesar's things to Caesar, and God's to God. The Sadducees next tried Him with the puzzle of the wife who had seven husbands, leading up to denial of the resurrection; but Jesus met them by showing that marriage relations have no place in the resurrection life, and by pointing to the implication of a future life in God's word to Moses, "I am the God of Abraham," etc. God "is not the God of the dead, but of the living," a fact which carried with it all the weight of resurrection, as needed for the completion of the personal life. The candid scribe, who came last with His question as to which commandment was first of all, had a different reception. Jesus met Him kindly, satisfied him with His answer, and pronounced him "not far from the kingdom of God" (Mk 12 34).

(2) David's Son and Lord.—The adversaries were silenced, but Jesus now put to them His own question. If David in Ps 110 could say "Jeh saith unto my lord, Sit thou on my right hand," etc, how was this reconcilable with the Christ being David's son? The question was based on the acceptance of the oracle as spoken by David, or one of his house, of the Messiah, and was intended to suggest the higher nature of Christ as one with God in a Divine sovereignty. David's son was also David's Lord.

At this point, in audience of the multitudes and of His disciples in the temple, Jesus delivered that

39-52) scribes and Pharisees any authority they lawfully possessed (vs 2,3), Jesus specially dwelt on their divorce of practice from precept. They said and did not (ver 3). He denounced their perversion of the right, their tyranny, their ostentation, their keeping back others from the kingdom, their zeal in securing proselytes, only to make them, when gained, worse than themselves, their immoral casuistry, their scruples about trifles, while neglecting essentials, their exaltation of the outward at the expense of the inward, their building the tombs of the prophets, while harboring the spirit of those that killed the prophets. He declared them to be foul and corrupt to the last degree: 'sons of Gehenna' (vs 15,33). So awful a condition meant ripeness for doom. On them, through that law of retribution which binds generation with generation in guilt and penalty, would come all the righteous blood shed since the days of Abel (the allusion to "Zachariah son of Barachiah," ver 35, is unmistakably to 2 Ch 24 21—this being the last book in the Heb Canon—but "Barachiah" seems a confusion with Zec 1 1, perhaps through a copyist's gloss or error). At the close indignation melts into tenderness in the affecting plaint over Jerus—"O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, . . . how often would I have gathered thy children together," etc (vs 37-39)—words found in Lk in an earlier context (13 34,35), but assuredly also appropriate here. For other parts of the discourse found earlier, cf Lk 11 39-52. All seems to have been gathered up afresh in this final accusation. It can be imagined that the anger of the Pharisees was fierce at such words, yet they did not venture openly to touch Him.

Before finally leaving the temple, Jesus seems to have passed from the outer court into the women's

d) The Widow's Offering (Mk 12:41-44; Lk 21:1-4) the receptacles provided for the gifts of the worshippers. Many who were wealthy cast of their gold and silver into the treasury, but the eye of Jesus singled out one poor widow who, creeping up, cast in two mites (Gr lepta, the smallest of coins), which made up but a farthing.

It was little, but it was her all, and Jesus immortalized her poor offering by declaring that, out of her want, she had given more than the wealthiest there. Gifts were measured in His sight by the willingness that prompted them, and by the sacrifice they entailed.

It is perhaps to this crowded day, though some place it earlier in the week (on Sunday or Monday), that the incident should be referred of the request of certain Greeks to see

e) The Visit of the Greeks (Jn 12:20-36) (Jn these Greeks were, or whence they came, is unknown, but they were evidently proselytes to the Jewish faith, and men of a sincere spirit. Their request was made through Philip of Bethsaida, and Philip and Andrew conveyed it to Jesus. It is not said whether their wish was granted, but we can hardly doubt that it was. Jesus evidently saw in the incident a prelude of that glory that should accrue to Himself through all men being drawn to Him (vs 23.32). But He saw as clearly that this "glorifying" could only be through His death (vs 24.33), and He universalized it into a law of His Kingdom that, as a grain of wheat must fall into the earth and die if it is to be multiplied, so only through sacrifice can any life be made truly fruitful (vs 24.25). The thought of death, however, always brought trouble to the soul of Jesus (ver 27), and a voice from the Father was given to comfort Him. The multitude thought it thundered, and failed to apprehend the meaning of the voice, or His own words about being "lifted up" (vs 29.34).

Jesus had now bidden farewell to the temple. As He was going out, His disciples—or one of them (Mk)—called His attention to the magnificence of the buildings of the temple, eliciting from Him the startling Last Things reply that not one stone should be left (Mt 24; Mk upon another that should not be thrown 13; Lk 21: down. Later in the evening, when seated on the Mount of Olives on their return journey, in view of the temple, Andrew, James and John (Mk) asked Him privately when these things should be, and what would be the signs of their fulfilment. In Mt the question is put more precisely, "When shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming [parousia], and of the end of the world?" (or "consummation of the age"). It is in answer to these complex questions that Jesus spoke His great discourse on the destruction of Jerus and His final coming, some of the strands in which it is difficult now to disentangle. In the extended report in Mt 24 certain passages appear which are given elsewhere by Luke (cf Lk 17 20-37). It may tend to clearness if a distinction be observed between the nearer event of the destruction of Jerus—also in its way a coming of the Son of Man—and the more remote event of the final parousia. The former, to which vs 15-28 more specially belong, seems referred to by the "these things" in ver 34, which, it is declared, shall be fulfilled in that generation. Of the final parousia, on the other hand, it is declared in ver 36 that "of that day and hour knoweth no one, not even the angels of heaven, neither the Son, but the Father only" (cf Mk 13 32). The difficulty occasioned by the "immediately" of ver 29 is relieved by recalling the absence of perspective and grouping of future events in all apocalyptic prophecy—the consummation ever rising as the background of the immediate experience which is its prelude. The discourse then divides itself into a general part (vs 4-14), delineating the character of the entire period till the consummation (false Christs and prophets, wars, tribulations, apostasies, preaching of the gospel to all nations, etc); a special part relating to the impending destruction of the city, with appropriate warnings (vs 15-28); and a closing part (vs 32-51) relating mainly to the final parousia, but not without reference to preceding events in the extension of Christ's kingdom, and ingathering of His elect (vs 30.31). Warning is given of the suddenness of the coming of the Son of Man, and the need of being prepared for it (vs 37-51). The whole is a massive prophecy, resting on Christ's consciousness that His death would be, not the defeat of His mission, but the opening up of the way to His final glorification and triumph.

To this great discourse on the solemnities of the end, Jesus, still addressing His disciples, added three memorable parables of instruction and

g) Parables of Ten Virgins, Talents and Last Judgment (Mt 25) warning (Mt 25)—the first, that of the Ten Virgins, picturing, under the figure of virgins who went to meet the bridegroom with insufficient provision of oil for their lamps, the danger of being taken unawares in waiting for the Son of Man; the second, that of the Talents, akin to the parable in Lk of the Pounds (19 11-27), emphasizing the need of diligence in the Lord's absence; the third, that of the Sheep and Goats, or Last Judgment, showing how the last division will be made according as discipleship is evinced by loving deeds done to those in need on earth—such deeds being owned by Christ the King as done to Himself. Love is thus declared to be the ultimate law in Christ's kingdom (cf 1 Cor 13); the loveless spirit is reprobated. "These shall go away into eternal punishment: but the righteous into eternal life" (ver 46).

Lk 21 37.38 might suggest that Jesus taught in the temple every day till the Thursday of the Passover; if, however, the denunciation took place, as nearly all agree, on Tuesday, an exception must be made of the Wednesday, which Jesus probably spent in retirement in Bethany in preparation of spirit for His last great conflict (others arrange differently, and put some of the preceding events in this day). The summary in Jn 12 36-43 connects the blindness of mind of the Pharisees with Isaiah's vision (6 10), and with the prophecy of the rejected Servant (53 1).

The plot for the destruction of Jesus was meanwhile maturing. Two days before the Passover (Tuesday evening), Jesus forewarned the disciples of His approaching atmosphere of trayal and crucifixion (Mt 26 2); and Plotting—probably at that very hour a secret meeting of the chief priests and elders was being held in the court of the house (Mt 26:1-5. of the high priest, Caiaphas (Mt), to consult as to the means of putting Him 14:1.2.10. to death. Their resolve was that it should not be done on the feast day, lest there should be a tumult; but the appearance of Judas, who since the anointing had seemingly meditated this step, speed-

1-6) should not be done on the feast day, lest there should be a tumult; but the appearance of Judas, who since the anointing had seemingly meditated this step, speedily changed their plans. For the paltry sum of 30 pieces of silver (shekels of the sanctuary, less than $20 or £4; the price of a slave, Ex 21 32; cf Zec 11 12), the recreant disciple, perhaps persuading himself that he was really forcing Jesus to an exercise of His Messianic power, agreed to betray his Lord. The covenant of infamy was made, and the traitor now only waited his opportunity to carry out his project.

II. From the Last Supper till the Cross.—A question of admitted difficulty arises in the comparison of the Synoptics and Jn as to the dates of the Last Supper and of the crucifixion. The Synoptics seem clearly to place the Last Supper on the evening of the 14th of Nisan (in Jewish reckoning, the beginning of the 15th), and to identify it with the ordinary paschal meal (Mt 26 17-19). The crucifixion then took place on the 15th. Jn, on the contrary, seems to place the supper on the day before the Passover (13 1), and the crucifixion on the 14th, when the Passover had not yet been eaten (18 28; 19 14). Many, on this ground, affirm an irreconcilable discrepancy between Jn and the Synoptics, some (e.g. Meyer, Farrar, less decisively Sanday) preferring Jn; others (Strauss, Baur, Schmiedel, etc) using the fact to discredit Jn. By those who accept both accounts, various modes of reconciliation are proposed. A favorite opinion (early church writers; many moderns, as Godet, Westcott, Farrar) is that Jesus, in view of His death, anticipated the Passover, and ate His parting meal with His disciples on the evening of the 13th; others (e.g. Tholuck, Luthardt, Edersheim, Andrews, D. Smith), adhering to the Synoptics, take the view, here shared, that the apparent discrepancy is accounted for by a somewhat freer usage of terms in Jn. Details of the discussion must be sought in the works on the subject. The case for the anticipatory view is well given in Westcott, Intro to the Study of the Gospels, 339 ff; and in Farrar, Life of Christ, Excur. X; a good statement of that for the Synoptics may be seen in Andrews, Life of Our Lord; cf Tholuck, Comm. on Jn, on 13 1; Luthardt, Comm. on Jn, on 13 1; 18 28; D. Smith, Days of His Flesh, App. II. The language of the Synoptists ("the first day of unleavened bread, when they sacrificed the passover," Mk 14 12) leaves no doubt that they intended to identify the Last Supper with the regular Passover, and it is hardly conceivable that they could be mistaken on so vital a point of the apostolic tradition. This also was the view of the churches of Asia Minor, where John himself latterly resided. On the other hand, the phrase to "eat the passover" in Jn 18 28 may very well, in John's usage, refer to participation in the special sacrifices which formed a chief feature of the proceedings on the 15th. The allusion in Jn 13 1 need mean no more than that, the Passover now impending, Jesus, loving His disciples to the end, gave them a special token of that love during the meal that ensued. The "preparation of the passover" in Jn 19 14 31 most naturally refers to the preparation for the Sabbath of the Passover week, alluded to also by the Synoptics (Mt 27 62; Mk 15 42; Lk 23 54). The objections based on rabbinical regulations about the Sabbath are convincingly met by Tholuck (see also Andrews). We assume, therefore, that Our Lord ate the Passover with His disciples at the usual time—the evening of the 14th of Nisan (i.e. the beginning of the 15th).

In the scene in the upper chamber, at the observance of the Last Supper, we enter the holy of holies of this part of the Lord's history. It

2. The Last Supper (Mt 26:17-35; Mk 14:12-31; Lk 22:7-38; Jn 13:cf 1 Cor 11:23-25) is difficult, in combining the narratives, to be sure of the order of all the particulars, but the main events are clear. They may be exhibited as follows:

31; Lk 22-7-38; Jn 13; cf 1 Cor 11:23-25) On "the first day of unleavened bread"—Thursday, 14th of Nisan—Jesus bade two of His disciples (Lk names Peter and John) make the needful preparations for the observance of the Passover. This included the sacrificing of the lamb at the temple, and the securing of a guest-chamber. Jesus bade the disciples follow a man whom they would meet bearing a) The Preparation a pitcher, and at the house where they stopped they would find one willing to receive them. The master of the house, doubtless a disciple, at once gave them "a large upper room furnished and ready" (Mk); there they made ready.

Evening being come, Jesus and the Twelve assembled, and took their places for the meal. We gather from Jn 13 23 that John reclined next to Jesus (on the right), and the sequel shows that Judas and Peter were near on the other side. It

b) Dispute about Precedence was probably this arrangement that gave rise to the unseemly strife for precedence among the disciples narrated in Lk 22 24-30. The spirit thus displayed Jesus rebuked, as He had more than once had occasion to do (cf Mk 9 33-37); then (for here may be inserted the beautiful incident in Jn 13 1 ff), rising from the table, He gave them an amazing illustration of His own precept, "He that is chief [let him become] as he that doth serve. . . . I am in the midst of you as he that serveth" (Lk 22 26,27), in divesting Himself of His garments, girding Himself with a towel, and performing the act of a servant in washing His disciples' feet. Peter's exclamation must have expressed the feelings of all: "Lord, dost thou wash my feet?" The act of the Divine Master was a wonderful lesson in humility, but Jesus used it also as a parable of something higher. "If I wash thee not [i.e. if thou art not cleansed by the receiving of my word and spirit, which this washing symbolizes], thou hast no part with me"; then on Peter's further impulsive protest, "Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head," the word: "He that is bathed needeth not save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit" (i.e. sanctification of the inner man is once for all, but there is need for cleansing from the sins of the daily walk). Resuming His place at the table, He bade them imitate the example He had just given them.

Judas "Is it I?"—An ominous word had accompanied the reply to Peter, "Ye are not all clean" (Jn 13 10.11). As the supper proceeded, the meaning of this was made plain. Judas, who had already sold his Master, was at the table with the rest. He had permitted Jesus to wash his feet, and remained unmoved by that surpassing act of condescending love. Jesus was "troubled in spirit," and now openly declared, "One of you shall betray me" (the Gr word means lit. "deliver up": cf Lk 22 4.6, and RVm throughout). It was an astounding announcement to the disciples, and from one and another came the trembling question, "Lord, is it I?" Jesus answered that it was one of those dipping his hand with Him in the dish (Mk), and spoke of the woe that would overtake the betrayer ("Good were it for that man if he had not been born"). John, at a sign from Peter, asked more definitely, "Who is it?" (Jn). Jesus said, but to John only, it was he to whom He would give a sop, and the sop was given to Judas. The traitor even yet sought to mask his treachery by the words, "Is it I, Rabbi?" and Jesus replied, though still not aloud, "Thou hast said" (Mt); then, as Satanic passion stirred the breast of Judas, He added, "What thou doest, do quickly" (Jn). Judas at once rose and went out—into the night (13 30). The disciples, not comprehending his abrupt departure, thought some errand had been given him for the feast or for the poor. Jesus was relieved by his departure and spoke of the glory coming to Himself and to His Father, and of love as the mark of true discipleship (13 31-35).

The forms of the observance of the Passover by the Jews are given elsewhere (see PASSOVER). Luke alone of the NT writers speaks of 2 cups (22 17.20); in Jewish practice 4 cups were used. The "Western" text D omits Lk's 2d cup, from which some (cf Sanday, HDB) infer duplication, but this is not necessary. Lk's 1st cup (ver 17) may be that with which the paschal supper opened; the 2d cup—that mentioned by all the writers—was probably the 3d Jewish cup, known as "the cup of blessing" (cf 1 Cor 10 16). Some, however, as Meyer, make it the 4th cup. It is implied in Mt, Mk, Jn, that by this time Judas had gone. Left thus with His own, the essentials of the paschal meal being complete, Jesus proceeded, by taking and distributing bread and wine, associating them with His body and blood, soon to be offered in death upon the cross, to institute that sacred rite in which, through all ages since (though its simplicity has often been sadly obscured) His love and sacrifice have been commemorated by His church. There are variations of phrase in the different accounts, but in the essentials of the sacramental institution there is entire agreement. Taking bread, after thanks to God, Jesus broke it, and gave it to the disciples with the words, "This is my body"; the cup, in like manner, after thanksgiving, He gave them with the words, "This is my blood of the covenant [in Lk and Paul, "the new covenant in my blood"] which is poured out for many" (Mt adds, "unto remission of sins"). Lk and Paul add what is implied in the others: "This do in remembrance of me" (Lk 22 19; 1 Cor 11 24). Nothing could more plainly designate the bread and wine as holy symbols of the Lord's body and blood, offered in death for man's redemption, and sealing in His blood a new covenant with God; nor, so long as the rite is observed in its Divine simplicity, as Jesus instituted it, will it be possible to expunge from His death the character of a redeeming sacrifice. In touching words Jesus intimated that He would no more drink of the fruit of the vine till He drank it new with them in their Father's Kingdom (on the doctrinal aspects, see EUCHARIST; SACRAMENT; LORD'S SUPPER).

c) The Lord's Supper

The Supper was over, and parting was imminent, but Jesus did not leave the holy chamber till He had poured out His inmost heart in those d) The Last Discourses tender, consolatory, profoundly spiritual addresses which the beloved disciple—Inter- has preserved for us in the 14th, 15th, 16th and 17th chs of his Gospel, followed by the wonderful closing intercessory Prayer prayer of ch 17. He was leaving them, but their hearts were not to be disquieted, for they would see Him again (14 18; 16 16 ff), and if, ere long, He would part with them again in visible form, it was only outwardly He would be separated from them, for He would send them the Holy Spirit, the Paraclete, who would take His place, to guide them into all truth, and bring all things to their remembrance that He had said to them (14 16.17; 15 26; 16 7-14). If He went away, it was to prepare a place for them, and He would come again to receive them to Himself in His Father's house (14 1-3); let them meanwhile show their love to Him by keeping His commandments (14 15.23.24). In the Spirit He Himself and the Father would dwell in the souls that loved Him (14 21-23). The intimacy of their union with Him would be like that of branches in the vine; only by abiding in Him could they bring forth fruit (15 1 ff). They would have tribulations (15 18 ff; 16 1.2), but as His dying bequest He left them His own peace (14 27); that would sustain their hearts in all trial (16 33). With many such promises did He comfort them in view of the terrible ordeal through which they were soon to pass; then, addressing His Father, He prayed for their holy keeping, and their final admission to His glory (17 9-18.24).

These solemn discourses finished, Jesus and His disciples sang a hymn (the "Hallel") and departed to go to the Mount of Olives. Comparing the evangelists, one would infer that the conversation in which Jesus foretold the denial of Peter at least commenced before they left the chamber (Lk 22 31 ff; Jn connects it, probably through relation of subject, with the exposure of Judas, 13 36-38); but it seems to have continued on the way (Mt, Mk). Jesus had spoken of their being

e) The Departure and Warning "offended" in Him that night. In his exaltation of spirit, Peter declared that though all should be offended in Him, he would never be offended.

Jesus, who had already warned Peter that Satan sought to have him, that he might sift him as wheat (Lk 22 31; but "I made supplication for thee," etc), now told him that before the cock should crow, he would thrice deny Him. Peter stoutly maintained that he would die rather than be guilty of so base an act—so little did he or the others (Mt 26 35; Mk 14 31) know themselves! The enigmatic words in Lk 22 36 about taking scrip and sword point metaphorically to the need, in the times that were coming upon them, of every lawful means of provision and self-defence; the succeeding words show that "sword" is not intended to be taken literally (ver 38).

Descending to the valley, Jesus and His disciples, crossing the brook Kidron ("of the cedars"), entered the "garden" (Jn) known as 3. Gethsemane—Gethsemane ("oil-press"), at the foot of the Mount of Olives. Here took the Betrayal place the agony, which is the proper and Arrest commencement of the Passion, the (Mt 26:36—betrayal by Judas and the arrest of 56; Mk 14: Jesus.

32-52; Lk 22:39-53; During the evening the thoughts of Jesus had been occupied mainly with Jn 18:1-12) His disciples; now that the hour had come when the things predicted concerning Him should have fulfilment (Lk 22 37: "your hour, and the power of darkness," ver 53), it was inevitable that mind and spirit

a) Agony in the Garden should concentrate on the awful bodily and mental sufferings that lay before Him. It was not the thought of physical suffering alone—from that also the pure and sensitive humanity of Jesus shrank with natural horror—but death to Him, the Holy One and Prince of Life, had an indescribably hateful character as a hostile power in humanity, due to the judgment of God on sin, and now descending upon Him through the workings of the vilest of human passions in the religious heads of His nation. What anguish to such an One, filled with love and the desire to save, to feel Himself rejected, betrayed, deserted, doomed to a malefactor's cross—alone, yet not alone, for the Father was with Him! (Jn 16 32). The burden on His spirit when He reached Gethsemane was already, as the language used shows, all but unendurable—"amazed," "sore troubled," "My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death" (Mk). There, bidding the other disciples wait, He took with Him Peter, and James, and John, and withdrew into the recesses of the garden. Leaving these also a little behind, He sank on the ground in solitary "agony" (Lk), and "with strong crying and tears" (He 5 7), poured out His soul in earnest supplication to His Father. "Let this cup pass away from me"—it could not be, but thus the revulsion of His nature was expressed—"howbeit not what I will, but what thou wilt." The passage in Lk (22 44), "His sweat became as it were great drops of blood," etc, though omitted in certain MSS, doubtless preserves a genuine trait. Returning to the three, He found them overpowered with sleep: even the support of their wakeful sympathy was denied Him! "Watch and pray," He gently admonished them, "that ye enter not into temptation." A second and third time the same thing happened—wrestling with God on His part, sleep on theirs, till, with Divine strengthening (Lk 22 41), victory was attained, and calm restored.

"Sleep on now," He said to His disciples (the crisis is past; your help can avail no more): "Arise, let us be going" (the future has to be faced; the betrayer is at hand. See the remarkable sermon of F. W. Robertson, II, sermon 22).

The crisis had indeed arrived. Through the darkness, even as Jesus spoke, was seen flashing the light of torches and lanterns, revealing a b) Betrayal mingled company of armed men—by Judas—Rom soldiers, temple officers (Jn), Jesus others—sent by the chief priests, scribes and elders, to apprehend Jesus. Arrested

Their guide was Judas. It had been found impracticable to lay hands on Jesus in public, but Judas knew this retreat (Jn 18 2), and had arranged, by an act of dastardly treachery, to enable them to effect the capture in privacy. The sign was to be a kiss. With an affectation of friendship, only possible to one into whose heart the devil had truly entered (Lk 22 3; Jn 13 27), Judas advanced, and hailing Jesus as "Master," effusively kissed Him (Mt 26 49; Mk 14 45m). Jesus had asked, "Betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?" (Lk); now He said, "Friend, do that for which thou art come" (Mt). The soldiers essayed to take Jesus, but on their first approach, driven back as by a supernatural power, they fell to the ground (Jn). A proof thus given of the voluntariness of His surrender (cf Mt 26 53: "Thinkest thou that I cannot beseech my Father," etc), Jesus, remarking only on the iniquity of secret violence when every day they had opportunity to take Him in the temple, submitted to be seized and bound. At this point Peter, with characteristic impetuosity, remembering, perhaps, his pledge to die, if need be, with Jesus, drew a sword, and cut off the right ear of the high priest's servant, Malchus (Jn gives the names). If he thought his deed justified by what Jesus had earlier said about "swords" (Lk 22 36,38), he was speedily undeceived by Jesus' rebuke (Mt 26 52; Jn 18 11), and by His healing of the ear (Lk; the last miracle of Jesus before His death). How little this flicker of impulsive boldness meant is shown by the general panic that immediately followed. "All the disciples," it is related, "left him, and fled" (Mt, Mk). Mk tells of a young man who had come upon the scene with only a linen cloth cast about his naked body, and who fled, leaving the cloth behind (14 51.52). Not improbably the young man was Mark himself.

It would be about midnight when Jesus was arrested, and He was at once hurried to the house of Caiaphas, the high priest, where in expectation of the capture, a company of chief priests, scribes and elders—members of the Sanhedrin—were already assembled. Here the first stage in the trial of Jesus took place.

4. Trial before the Sanhedrin (Mt 26:57-75; 27:1-10; Mk 14:53-72; 15:1; Lk 22:54-71; Jn 18:12-27; cf Acts 1:18.19)

The legal and constitutional questions connected with the trial of Jesus are considered in the art. on JESUS CHRIST, ARREST AND TRIAL OF; see also Dr. Taylor Innes, The Trial of Jesus Christ; on the powers of the Sanhedrin, see SANHEDRIN, and cf Schürer, Jewish People, etc., II, 1, pp. 163 ff. There seems little doubt that, while certain judicial forms were observed, the trial was illegal in nearly every particular. The arrest itself was arbitrary, as not founded on any formal accusation (the Sanhedrin, however, seems to have arrogated to itself powers of this kind; cf Acts 4 1 ff); but the night session, lack of definite charge, search for testimony, interrogation of accused, haste in condemnation, were unquestionably in flagrant violation of the established rules of Jewish judicial procedure in such cases. It is to be remembered that the death of Jesus had already been decided on by the heads of the Sanhedrin, so that the trial was wholly a means to a foregone conclusion. On the historical side, certain difficulties arise. Jn seems to make the first interrogation of Jesus take place before Annas, father-in-law to Caiaphas (on Annas, see below; though deposed 15 years before, he retained, in reality, all the dignity and influence of the high-priesthood; cf Lk 3 2; Acts 4 6); after which He is sent to Caiaphas (Jn 18 13.14.19-24). The narrative is simplified if either (1) vs 19-23 are regarded as a preliminary interrogatory by Annas till matters were prepared for the arraignment before Caiaphas; or (2) ver 24 is taken as retrospective (in the sense of "had sent," as in AV), and the interrogation is included in the trial by Caiaphas (cf ver 19: "the high priest"). Annas and Caiaphas may be presumed from the account of Peter's denials to have occupied the same official residence; else Annas was present on this night to be in readiness for the trial. The frequently occurring term "chief priests" denotes the high priests, with those who had formerly held this rank, and members of their families (cf Schurer, op. cit., 203 ff). They formed, with the scribes, the most important element in the Sanhedrin.

First Jesus was led before Annas, then by him, after a brief interview, was transferred, still bound, to Caiaphas. Annas had been dea) Before Annas and Caiaphas—the Unjust Judgment posed, as above noticed, much earlier (15 AD), but still retained the name and through his sons and relations, as long as he lived, exercised much of the authority of high priest. Like all those holding this high office, he and Caiaphas were Sadducees. Annas—if he is the questioner in Jn 18 19-23—asked Jesus concerning His disciples and His teaching. Such interrogation was unlawful, the duty of the accuser, in Jewish law, being to produce witnesses; properly, therefore, Jesus referred him to His public teaching in the temple, and bade him ask those who heard Him there. An officer standing by struck Jesus with his hand for so speaking: an indignity which Jesus endured with meek remonstrance (vs 22.23).
